"Then here goes." And lifting Maud to his feet, he shifted his light burden easily to his shoulder. Everybody knows it is easier to climb a hill than to descend one. Jack Courtenay had the experience of a practised hunter, and his muscles were like steel. Then he was borne up by a strange new feeling he had never known before. This girl hanging over his shoulder, with her clothing torn in shreds, her arms bare and bleeding, her bandaged foot steadied upon his arm—this girl was his little cousin Edith.

When they reached the top she had fallen into a sleep of exhaustion. Jack wrapped what there was left of his light summer coat about her, and, plunging on, reached the plateau when it was quite dark. But he knew every foot of the way and reached the lodge of rocks, where he encountered by some of the jaded pleasure party, who had been hunting for the fugitives in all directions that were safe to pursue. Rapidly explaining the situation, Jack led the way with his unconscious burden to the open road, where the carriages were still waiting. Jack placed Edith in the rather cold protection of his aunt, and mounting the box, took the reins, and drove successfully home.

Con Belden invited Miss Alfiero to a seat in his buggy, but not knowing even a broken sentence of French, Spanish, or Portuguese, which were the only languages at Miss Alfiero's command, he drove homeward admitted of leisure for quiet reflection with them both.

At last the weary cavalcade reached Courtenay Heights. Night had fallen, and dinner had been waiting a whole half-hour. The guests flew to their rooms to make their horrid toilets, leaving what a momentous matter a delay of the kind can be to Miss Courtenay. Jack lifted his cousin from the carriage, carried her carefully up the steps, put her gently upon the bed in her own room, and left her to the care of her trusty maid. He cast one hurried look upon her, full of conflicting emotions. But her eyes were closed. She was white as the pillows she was presently among. Then he ran up the stairs, two at a time, knowing so well that distraction or delay from one of his aunt's carefully devised dinners on the one grievance that rendered her desperate. He was dressed and descending the stairs again in less than half an hour. As he passed his aunt's dressing-room he fancied he saw through the half-open door Miss Courtenay herself, sitting perfectly erect in her high-backed chair. Jack paused, for this was certainly a most wonderful spectacle. Dinner upon the table, and his aunt still in her room. She must be ill. He strode to the door, and entered. Yes, she was there. She had not removed her hat or her gloves, but sat bolt-upright, gazing at nothing, with a stony impassibility. She had the aspect of one who had received a mortal blow. When she saw Jack her features were convulsed for a moment, and she trembled from head to foot.

"You have betrayed me," she said, in a low, strained voice.

Jack closed the door, and went over to his aunt. He tried to take her cold, glazed hands in his own. "You are ill," he said.

But she drew her hands away, and repeated, "You have betrayed me." Then she continued, in a low, broken voice: "Your cousin Edith refuses to keep her engagement. You have been making love to her, and tempted her to the overthrow of all my plans."

"Did she tell you so?" said Jack. His voice was also strained and harsh. They looked singularly alike, the aunt and the nephew, as they confronted each other.

"No," said Miss Courtenay; "but I divined it. Am old enough to trust you. You knew my heart was set upon this match. How could you deal me such a blow? Why didn't you leave the girl alone? She at least was dutiful. I could have borne your own trifling with the most important duties of life. I have grown to expect nothing but scoffing frivolity on your hands. But you might at least have left me the one serious triumph that it be over now—all is over. There will be a disgraceful esclandre; you will give all those people food for amusement—to my expense. I have loved you better than anything in the world. I wanted her to marry on that you could have all. And you have betrayed me."

She had drawn off her glover now, and thrown them upon the floor. She had thrown her bonnet upon the table. How old she had suddenly grown! How shrivelled and wrinkled were the hands she wrung together! Her proud high features seemed to shrink, and her face plunge before his eyes to a senile helplessness and despair. He could not bear it.

He knelt by her side, and spoke in hot, hurried tones. "See here, Aunt Graciela," he said, "you do me an injustice; but we won't stop to talk of that. I have done you a hundred, my whole life too been an infamy. My love for Edith has taught me that. I do love Edith with my whole heart and soul. But I have never told her so, nor will I, without your consent. Further than this, I'll go down to-night, while the poor child is lying helpless yonder, and offer my worthless car. cass to the piece of merchandise you have brought from Brazil for my benefit. What little love Edith may have nourished in toy behalf will be snuffed out like the flame of a candle. Her pride will do the rest. She will keep to her compact with Belden, and I will retire with my swarthy conquest to the swamps of Brazil. You at least will be triumphant and happy."

His aunt had never taken her eyes from his face. "I ask," she said, "will you do all this for me?—on the honor of a Courtenay?"

"We won't mention the honor of the Courtenays," he said, with a cynical sneer; "but I'll stick to my word. Mark you, I'm not sure that so she'n't trip up with the Alfieri. There's always some or less of risk in these speculations."

"Never mind the Alfieri," said Miss Courtenay. Her face had regained its strength of expression. She began smoothing her hair and making little touches to her toilet as she talked. "The Alfieri's red parasol has been my bete noire for many a day; it has spoiled many a well-chosen effect for me. You have not yet dined?"

"I have no appetite," said Jack, grimly.

"But you will give me your arm to the dining-room? We will stop on our way at Edith's door. I will remain outside while you make my peace with her. Tell her I send you to her as my apology. If she wants you, she can keep you forever. I've changed my mind, Jack: we'll keep the Courtenay property to ourselves. There's enough for us all. I've been a wicked woman, Jack. Do you go and make my peace with Edith. I was a little harsh with the poor child last night. I hope it's not too late to make my peace with God. You had an awful look in your face just now—a horrible, murderous look. I don't think the Alfieri would have brew safe with you, Jack."

He arose at his feet and lifted the old lady in his arms. He strained her to his breast till her old bones cracked within her.

"Shall I carry you to Edith'n door?" he told, capturously.

"Thank you, no," she gasped; "I'll walk, Jack. Dear me! I wonder what will the world say?"

"Hang the world!" said Jack. He should be used as a stranger expression.

But there was an elopement and a murder in that night's news from the world that caused the Courtenay affair to fall flat. Edith still swings in her hammock at Courtenay Heights, but with her is a little blue-eyed fairy with long golden curls. Near by a handsome old lady sits erect in his high-backed chair, and on she gazes upon the beautiful child a dreamy speculation in her dim old eyes, and I fear she has already begun planning out the future of her little grandniece. Griselda Courtenay, for "the thing that hath been, it is that which shall be, and that which is done is that which shall be done. One generation passeth away, and another generation cometh, but the world abideth forever."

BENJAMIN SILLIMAN CHURCH.

BENJAMIN SILLIMAN CHURCH, the recently appointed Engineer of the New Aqueduct, was born April 7, 1836, at Angelica, Allegheny County, New York. He is the eldest son of Mr JOHN B. CHURCH and MARIA SILLIMAN, daughter of Professor BENJAMIN SILLIMAN, Jun., and granddaughter of JONATHAN TRUMBULL, WASHINGTON'S friend and counsels, and the original "Brother JONATHAN." On his father's side Mr CHURCH is descended from old Knickerbocker stock, such as the SCHUYLERS, VAN CORTLANDTS, VAN RENSSELAERS, LIVINGSTONS, etc., while among his mother's ancestry was numbered one of the "goodly company" of the Mayflower.

Mr. CHURCH was graduated at Dartmouth College in 1856, and at once entered upon the profession of civil engineering. He was employed for a time on the New Haven Railroad, then in making the original topographical survey of Central Park, and later was appointed Topographical Engineer of the Hydrographic Survey of the Croton River and Basin. He was engaged, also, under General CULLUM R. GOETHEL, in the construction of the great reservoir in Central Park, and was afterward placed in charge of the Croton Aqueduct as resident engineer. This important position he held continuously up to the time of his recent appointment, excepting for a short period during the civil war, when in the army as a captain in the Twelfth New York Regiment, and as Topographical Engineer to the Army of the Potomac.

Mr CHURCH'S long and faithful service in connection with the Croton Aqueduct, and his familiarity with the entire system of the New York water supply, peculiarly fit him for the new field of duty to which he has been called. It is worthy of note that Mr CHURCH'S great-grandfather, JOHN B. CHURCH, was President of the Manhattan Company, the first water company of the city, and that his great-great-grandfather, General PHILIP SCHUYLER, brought to this country and presented to the city the first plans for sewerage of New York.

LONG BRANCH.

So many causes been operated to bring the name of Long Branch before the public that its reputation is, perhaps, even more wide-spread than that of Saratoga. During President GRANT'S administration it was virtually the summer capital of the country, and a view of its sun-lit sea brought comfort to the death-bed of President GARFIELD. It has been the scene of important cabinet meetings, and of protracted sessions of Congressional committees. In the palmy days of FISK, TWEED, and their followers, Long Branch became notorious for its prodigacy, and for the lavish expenditure of money and ostentatious display of wealth made by those mushroom millionaires. At that time its reputation was so unsavory that many pious persons termed it the "Devil's Stronghold." To this day the cural visitor to New York whose curiosity impels him to run down to "the Branch" does or with feelings similar to those with which he first steps inside a theatre.

The Long Branch of to-day is, however, a far different place from that of twelve or fifteen years ago. Then it was an isolated cluster of hotels, bounded on either side for miles by stretches of lonesome beach, of which the solitudes were unbroken by human habitations. Now it forms but a small part of the great cottage city that extends, with almost unbroken ranks, from Sandy Hook to Barnegat, and which during the summer months transforms the once desolate wastes of yellow sand into scenes of abounding life and ceaseless activity.

Most of the cottager and hotels composing this city by the sea are picturesque buildings of unique design; but, while their interiors are triumphs of decorative art and good taste, their exterior coloring, from one end of the New Jersey coast to the other, seems to have been ordered by one mind, and in the ruled of a man who had successfully cornered the brown paint market. For fifty miles there is no relief from the dull monotony of brown, even by varying shades of the same. Instead of the cheerful, bright red roofs of New-England sea-side cottages, the shingles of these summer residents of New Jersey seem to exhibit only a reddish tinge of the all-pervading color.

What the houses lack in color is partly compensated in design, and by the surroundings of those situated a short distance back from the coast, where the landscape gardener has found opportunities for the exercise of his art. The country between Long Branch and the Shrewsbury River, including Ramsen's Neck, is a revelation of what may be accomplished in the way of landscape by the combination of nature and art supported by wealth. Its roads are hard, smooth, and well shaded, and for miles the adjoining grounds, in the midst of which are set architectural gems of chalet-like cottage or more pretentious dwellings, evidence the most skillful cultivation.

Long Branch, being the eldest of the coast settlements, retains many hotel buildings which, while comfortable and well located, are relics of the time when every carpenter was his own architect, and houses were built and added to in compliance with the exigencies of their occupants, rather than with a view to external appearance. In contrast to the severe simplicity of these reminders of the past are the gaudy structures which, under the terse of "club-houses," have recently been erected by gamblers for business purposes, and in which their trade is carried on day and night with an ever increasing run of custom.

That peculiar imitation of young manhood recently classified as the "dude" seems to find Long Branch a congenial haunt, and there attains the perfection of his species. The mention of this summer's season at the West End Hotel has been the appearance of the "Prince of the Dudes," a being whose sole apparent object of existence is the display and rapid change from one to another of various costumes of gorgeous raiment. His ambition to life seems to be that of impressing the spectator with his utter helplessness and inability to perform, unaided, any act demanding physical or mental exertion. Long Branch is, however, or easily accessible from New York that a large number of business men of the city find it convenient to run down every evening to their summer homes on its breezy coast, and then the young women of its hotels and cottages are not entirely dependent upon the feeble-minded dudes for masculine society or for partners at the hotel hops.

The constant tearing away of the fine bluff, which is the pride of Long Branch, by winter storms, in the cause of great uneasiness to hotel proprietors and cottage owners. Early in this century houses stood three hundred feet east of the present bluff, and the coast-line was still beyond them. When the ocean encroaches another three hundred feet it will have swallowed the sites of all the existing hotels and cottages. With this prospect before them, it would seem as though the owners of this valuable property would make every effort to save it. As yet however, along the whole line of the Long Branch bluff but one such effort has been made. This is in the shape of a carefully filled embankment, having a slope of one and a half to one, its face covered with turf, and the whole running upon a massive sea-wall of masonry. On page 563 our artist has given an illustration of this artificial embankment, and, in contrast to it, one of the natural bluff, its face furrowed by deep gullies, which are used as depositories for tin cans and all forms of rubbish and unsightly refuse.

In 1784 JOHN SLOCUM, of Rhode Island, wrestled with the champion Indian wrestler of New Jersey for possession of the land now occupied by Long Branch. The match was to catch on each can, best two out of three falls to win. The white man was victorious after an exciting struggle, witnessed by half a dozen men of his own color and a great concourse of the red-skins. Most of the land thus gained remained in possession of the SLOCUM family until thirty years ago, when the scene of the great wrestling match began to show signs of its destined greatness as a watering-place, and they disposed of it to speculators.

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

An explanation of the fact that many of the bodies of persons drowned in Lake Winnipesaugee are never recovered may be to a discovery recently made by a professional diver in those waters. While searching for the body of a drowned man, the diver walked into a bed of quicksand in the bottom of the lake. In the centre of the bed a cold spring bubbled up. He felt himself sinking into the sand, and gave the signal for his helpers to draw him to the surface. It is believed that if the body of a drowned person should rest on the quicksand surrounding one of these springs it would be engulfed, and would never appear again.

An unusual feature in modern warfare is the employment of elephants by the Annamites in their struggle against the invading Frenchmen. Being unable to hold their earth works against a recent attack, instead of spiking their cannon, they hitched elephants to the guns and hauled them off in short order.

The London Telegraph commends the National Park in the Yellowstone region to English travellers in the United States. "When the European stranger reaches the Mammoth Hot Springs of the Gardiner River," it says, "he will be more than repaid for having travelled five thousand miles from England to see them," and, "upon arriving at the Yellowstone Park, he will be amazed at the marvels which gion it the name of Wonderland."

A congress of Americanists recently assembled in Copenhagen. An Americanite is said to be a student of early American history. Not to be behind the countries of the Old World, America should convene a congress of Europeanists.

The closing exercises of a school in Honolulu consisted in part of the production of Pinafore by Hawaiian children. The Hawaiian Gazette speaks highly of the children's proficiency in English and of their acting.

There is considerable interest in the Sandwich Islands in the matter of quick passages by steamship from San Francisco. The best time yet made was that of the new steam-ship Mariposa, which recently went from San Francisco to Honolulu in five days and twenty-one hours. As she steamed into the harbor, past the king's boat-house, his Majesty, who was seated on the veranda, exchanged a wave of recognition with Colonel Sprecklos, the owner of the vessel.

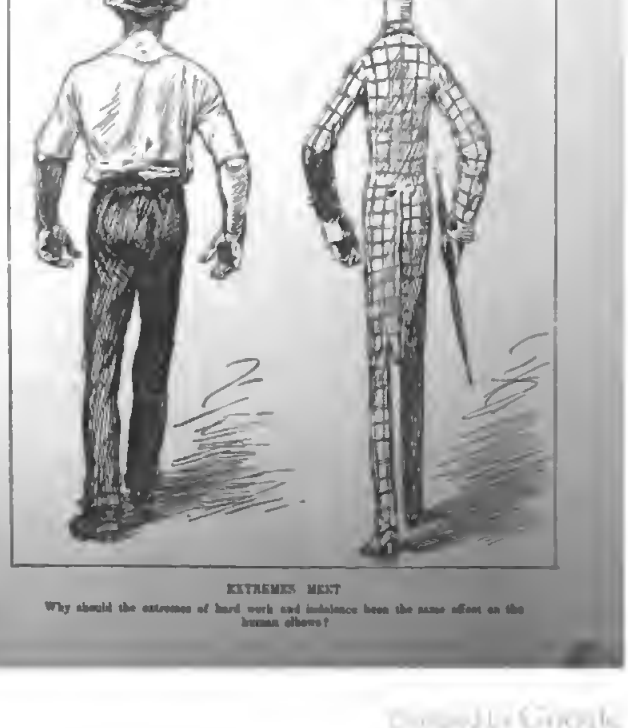
Governor Jarvis, of North Carolina, has accepted the invitation of Governor Butler to attend the opening of the Foreign Exhibition in Boston. The Governor of North Carolina will have an opportunity to say to the Governor of Massachusetts that it is a long time between drinks drunk by the Democratic Executives of those States to each other's health.

In the literature of summer resorts a new term has made its appearance. The public is informed that a large number of "society solids"—whatever they may be—have arrived at a well-known New Jersey resort.

The telegraph brings information that the huntsmen of the President's party in the far West brought into camp on a recent evening three antelopes, a bear, several grouse, and a slow rabbit. A good many persons who have not been educated on sportsmen will ask what a slow rabbit is, and whether the designation is of a species of rubber, or applies or only the individual rabbit that was brought in on this occasion. If the latter, then the inquiry as to whether huntsmen who can bag antelopes should consider an unfortunate and exceptional rabbit worth their powder suggests itself.

It seems that Cetewayo, the Zulu king, is not dead. He has recovered from the wounds he suffered in the battle between his forces and the insurgents, and has requested Queen Victoria or order an investigation as to the treatment he received. Perhaps he desires to have England punish his enemies if they are found guilty of hurting him. When he reads it, he read to him, the verdict of the English press to the effect that his supposed taking off war an event not wholly without compensating advantages, and therefore not to be deeply deplored. he may reconsider his request for an investigation under British auspices.

A most remarkable story comes from a watering-place in France. M Grotien was about to make an ascent in a hot-air balloon. A young woman who was to ascend with him was seated in the car, and the aeronaut was holding with his right hand a cord which was attached to the balloon. Suddenly the aeronaut broke away, the cord in M Grotien's hand became entangled around two of his fingers, and he was snatched from the ground and carried to a height of some eighteen hundred feet. Vainly he tried to haul himself up and loop the cord around his arm, but he became exhausted, and being limp by the two fingers while the balloon was blown along for a distance of about four miles at that great height. The young woman in the basket fainted. As the air in the balloon cooled, the car descended till M Grotien's body touched the ground, and, still held by his fingers, he was whisked over the rough country for half a mile, through thorny bushes. The cure has is that the aeronaut suffered an internal injury, and will probably recover.



EXTREMES MEET

Why should the extremes of hard work and indolence been the same effect on the human elbows?

THE ENGLISH BANDS FOR PRIVATE THEATRICALS INVADING BLACKVILLE.—Drawn by A. R. Waud.

THE COUNT OF CHAMBORD.

HENRI CHARLES FERDINAND MARIE DIEUDONNÉ, Count of Chambord, Duke of Bordeaux, and—to thousands of devoted followers—HENRY V. to the grace of God King of France, was born in Paris September 30, 1820. In the March of that year was thus that France learned of the approaching birth of an heir to the throne of St. Louis from the lips of a strong man, amidst blood and coils, in a proscenium box of the Opera. His birth was announced by the traditional one hundred and one cannon. The boy grew up in a cold, melancholy home. The King was old, the Dauphin gloomy, the Dauphiness had still around her the atmosphere of the Temple and the Reign of Terror. The only cheerful person near the child was his mother, and the Tuileries seemed like the abode of spectres save when the young prince enlivened the gloom by his laughter and movement. He was a pretty child, full of vivacity, and it was charming to see him, with his blonde hair and the ribbon of St. Louis across his breast, galloping before the battalions of the Guard. When CHARLES X had to fly, the boy refused to move, and clung to the legs of a table till removed by force. Forty-eight hours later CHARLES X resigned the crown to the Duke of Angoulême, and the duke devised it to the child. For twelve hours he was King of France, and documents still exist, "in the name of the King HENRY V," dated Rambouillet, August 1. The young prince was soon the sole survivor of the royal exiles. He travelled, and learned much, wandering around the confines of that native land which he could not enter, and dwelling in England, Germany, and Italy.

The revolution of 1848 came. An officer high in the military hierarchy said, "If the King will mount his horse, General DE CASTELLANE and the army will follow him." But HENRY V did not mount, but remained in his voluntary exile. Since then his life has been spent between Frohsdorf and Gorizia. During the Empire he foresaw the shipwreck of the Bonapartists, and after Sedan he issued a proclamation calling on the nation to rally round him and repulse the invader. In 1871 he dated a manifesto from Chambord in which he assumed the title of King. But his nearest approach to the throne was in 1873. The Orleanist princes acknowledged him the head of the house, and as the only representative of the monarchical principle in France. Deputations of ardent royalists went to Frohsdorf and returned with accounts of the concessions he was ready to make; the Bishop of Orleans directed his clergy to pray for his restoration, even the carriages for the royal entry into Paris were prepared. But Henry again declared that he would listen to no conditions, give no guarantees, and reckoned on implicit obedience; nor would he have any flag but the white flag of the Bourbons. With this declaration his last chance of regaining the throne vanished forever, and the supporters of his cause have been waiting for a less impracticable successor.

The Count of Chambord was lame from a fracture of the leg, and was very corpulent. His face was intelligent, his forehead high, his eyes blue, his manners ample and gracious. The late Empress of Russia described him as "the first gentleman of the world."

THE LATE COUNT OF CHAMBORD.

The Count died peacefully at Frohsdorf on the morning of August 24, after an illness of several weeks. The portrait given herewith is engraved from a recent photograph.

EEL FISHERIES.

As history records, in alluding to articles of food, give consider able prominence to the eel. The Italians have always devoted great attention to this particular fishery. The numerous lagoons of the Po where it enters the Adriatic have always been famous for the superior qualities of their eels and lampreys. The various Italian cities are supplied from those waters. In Great Britain and the northern states of Europe eels are also taken in great numbers. Those taken in the sandy shallow bays of Long Island are, however, superior to all others in delicacy of flavor. The silver eels from those once famed waters have long been celebrated, particularly when prepared by the famous caterers scattered along its southern shores. This is due not so much to the superior skill with which they are cooked as to the fact that they go from the water directly to the frying-pan, before the oil peculiar to them has had time to become rancid. It was supposed up to within a few years that the supply of eels in the Long Island waters was exhaustless. At this time it looks as if a few short seasons more of the ruthless pursuit of them would render them only a matter of the past.

New York, since it has become so large a distributing center for articles of food, finds the supplies of eels which were formerly received from Long Island and its contiguous points no longer adequate even for the local demand. Stimulated by the yearly increased price paid for them, fish, the Long Island salters have almost exhausted their once prolific fishing grounds. It is well known that the eel is a most copious breeder if these fishermen had been content to pursue it only as an article of food it might long be as numerous as ever. The transfer of the immature and petty grown specimens to the soil as a fertilizer has brought a mischief which can never be repaired. Or, again, had they been content formerly to use the methods for taking it now in vogue, the extermination of the fisheries would not be as near at hand. And only is this true of those of Long Island, but of all the waters from which eels are taken.

The use of the net is a powerful factor in the extinction of all fisheries. In none more so than that of eels. When the demand for this article of food first became pressing, nets were first employed with very great profit, it not being uncommon occurrence to see eight hundred dozen of marketable eels at a single cast. When a diminution of the supply no longer made these profitable the eel-pot was substituted. This is a cylindrical wicker structure a couple of feet or more in length. At one end is a funnel through which the eels enter; at the other, a movable cover, admitting of the removal of the fish and the baiting of the trap. In the larger bays these pots or traps are sunk and moored, while in the smaller estuaries they are fastened in pole-arbors into the sand or mud of the bottom. One fisherman will sometimes tend a hundred of these traps, running them in the morning to take out the eels, and again in the evening to set and bait them. For many years succeeding the decade of years this method of taking eels has been fairly successful and profitable. It might to-day still continue to be so had the smaller eels, of which large numbers are always taken with the marketable kind, been returned to the water for another year's growth, instead of being thrown upon the flats for the propagation of the crops. Under such a system it is not surprising that eels are scarce, and selling to-day at eighteen and twenty cents a pound, as against five and six cents a pound a few years since. It will also in a measure explain why waters which had long ago were considered exhaustless in their supply of eels are becoming worthless as harvests.

Another and a powerful factor which has accelerated the decline and exhaustion of the eel fishery is the practice of scraping the shallow water near the shore with fine meshed nets. These catch in large quantities the small fry—the food of the eel. A larger portion of these are, as in the case with the small eels, used for fertilizing purposes. This wasteful destruction of bait is alone sufficient to account for the growing scarcity not only of eels, but of all other varieties of fish which feed upon the same. From the window of his residence on the edge of one of these Long Island estuaries the writer sees row upon row of pound stakes, the traps attached to which have not been tended for days on account of

Those who formerly followed with profit the eel fishery are now lamenting the decline of the same. Had these eel-men shown a common prudence and forethought, as would they do it even now, the end would not be so near.

The halcyon days of this class of men was before the completion of the net-work of railways which now covers Long Island. They then held the monopoly of the supplies of fish for the New York market. The eel fishery gave employment to large numbers of men, most of whom have gone into other and possibly less profitable pursuits. It developed a set of specialists in the profession, who devoted themselves exclusively to the skinning of live eels. A great rivalry existed between these experts. Matches of absorbing interest arose from it. In these, rival eel-skinners were pitted against each other as to which could skin the greater number of eels in a given time. These contests were exhilarating breaks in the monotony of Long Island life. Any one who has attempted to pick up a live eel will appreciate the dexterity which enabled these operators to skin a fabulous number of dozens within a certain time. These once famous manipulators have retired.

Again, the eel fishery gave employment to a large number of teamsters, who transported the products of the same to market. Ice was not used in these days. The eels, after being skinned, were put in benches of a dozen each and immersed in the water of cold springs. At night the teamsters loaded their wagons from these sources. By early morning the eels were for sale to the city markets. From the eastern end of the island the journey occupied two or even three nights. During the warm hours of the day the eels were unloaded from the wagons and placed in springs near which the teamsters always halted. Eels then were sold by the dozen, and fetched less than what a single pound now costs. To-day, if the local supply of eels to the New York market was withdrawn, it would not sensibly affect the supply, so much has the eel fishery of Long Island declined. Rapid transit and refrigerator cars have opened new sources of supply, which in their turn, through profligate waste, are certain to be speedily exhausted.

A few years past, when the bays were frozen over, it was a common sight to see scores of men armed with eel spears fishing through the ice. Eighteen and twenty dozen of large eels was an uncommon catch to each man. The winter fishing is no longer profitable. Again two men in a boat at night, by the glare of [illegible] at the bow of a boat, [illegible] same with large eels [illegible] the shallow waters near the [illegible]. Fashionable now seldom avail themselves of this method of taking eels. It is mostly resorted to by amateurs, who are content if, after half the night spent in pushing about the shores, they secure eels enough for a single meal.

There is a remedy for all this. There is no reason why the eel fishery, considering the enormous prolificness of the eel, should not be restored to its pristine vigor. The remedy is impracticable, however, under our corrupt legislation and nerveless enforcement of the laws.

THE ROOK AND THE SABBATH.

A CLERICAL friend, a rector of long experience, who has given much attention to the habits of rooks, tells me that these birds quite understand the difference between Sundays and week-days. He speaks more particularly of those that breed about churches, and their behavior, noted by him scores of times, is fair proof of the fact, however singular it may seem. Shy enough during the other days of the week, on Sundays they will be comparatively tame, permitting nearer approach, as though they knew that on the Lord's day there was no danger of their being molested. I myself have noticed their air of fearlessness as trusting confidence on this day greater than on others, and have no doubt of the fact. But how is it brought about? Sagacious bird as is the rook, its sagacity can hardly be equal to counting seven, or keeping a calendar. That it can tell a gun from an umbrella, as walking-stick, or farm implement, is a fact well known; but its being able to distinguish Sundays from week-days is a still greater stretch of reasoning intelligence.

My friend offers an explanation, which is no doubt the true one, that the birds are made aware of the sanctity of the day, as rather its safety to themselves, by the ringing of the bells, and the [illegible] ing of the people for worship.

It would be worth noting whether they also lay aside their shyness on occasions when there is a funeral or week-day service in the church.

In relationship with the fact of the rook distinguishing between Sundays and week days is another of almost equal singularity, their choosing trees in proximity to the church as a nesting place. For that they show this preference seems unquestionable. Proof of it may be seen in many country churches, where there are rookeries established on a scanty lot of trees of no great height, and easily accessible to the birdnesting boy, while in the near neighborhood are clumps of tall ones, just the sort one would expect rooks to build upon, showing no a nest. Nor can it be shelter that rules the selection. Often the trees by the church are in exposed situations, and the nests blown off to their last stick during the autumn equinoctials, whereas on other trees, only a few hundred yards distant, they would have remained throughout the winter with but little damage done, and so saved the labor of their rebuilding in spring.

It would seem, then, as though those birds have a knowledge of sanctities, as a church affords them protection, which it usually does, both from gun and nest-robbing boy, partly from the force of public opinion, and, at times, fear of the vicar.

ULSTER SUPERSTITIONS.

A woman who had been in many ways helped by the wee folk found that her dreams foretold their gifts. Night after night she dreamed that she found a heap of golden money beside a great stone in a certain field. At last she went to the field, and found not only the stone, but the money. She took some, and returned for more from time to time. But her conscience grew troublesome. She feared the might be defrauding some one, and so she weakly babbled her doubts to her neighbors. The result was that the gold vanished, and never again did she find one single coin beside the stone of her dreams.

A poor woman dreamed nightly of being told by the fairies that if she would dig in the dry moat of a fort she would find a treasure of gold. She told her dream to her sons, and begged of them to dig for her, but for a long time they laughed at her fancy. At last they agreed to dig, so that she might cease from troubling them, and they did indeed find a buried treasure—not, however, of gold or money, but an exquisitely chased silver bell inclosed in outer cases of bronze, which is now to be seen in a well-known antiquarian collection.

A certain woman of a "very gentle" (fairy-haunted) district of Ulster had only one cow, and her neighbors told her story thus: "When very young she was so beautiful that the fairies loved her well, and at last carried her off to their country. To her, bound by their charms and spells, the fairies' home seemed a place of dazzling beauty—the true fairy-land of old stories and of poetry. Her work was light, for she was only asked to wait on them as they moved about their palaces. One day she was standing by as they washed in sweet-smelling oil, and the ally dipped her fingers in the oil. By chance she put the wet finger to her eye, when suddenly she saw all the surroundings she had fancied so beautiful to be only the nooks and mossy corners under a gentle thorn. The splendid carving was the twisting of the gnarled old roots, and the country of the fairies was but her father's field. Being no longer bewitched, she easily reached her home, and was said to be the only human captive ever restored from fairy spells to a human hearth. But she found that the magic oil had made one eye all-powerful to see the generally unseen pranks of her old captors. For a long time she feared to speak of what she saw, and would sit still while the room was crowded with fairies, who played all sorts of tricks on the unconscious people around. But one day her caution failed her. She was at a country fair, and as she bought something at a stall she could see the whole place crowded by these sprites, who were robbing salmon and buyers, and injuring the wares. As one ill-favored old fairy watched something from under her eyes she screamed with indignation and pushed him away. He turned, and rosing a little wand in his hand, rushed furiously at her, and put out the eye that had been bathed in fairy oil. She never saw more looked on a fairy, and was regarded till her death with much respect and awe by her neighbors."

Another tale, concerning a man yet living, seems to show that these powerful enemies can be daunted by any one daring enough to defy them. A small farmer in the north had upon his farm a "very gentle" wood. He duly respected the fairies, and would not permit any of their trees to be meddled with. Therefore he expected their good offices in return. His finest and favorite cow, however, was suddenly attacked by the sort of illness that is generally regarded as the effect of spells. He looked at his suffering cow and her untasted food, and went straight to the wood, where, in a loud voice, he three times repeated this sentence: "If my cow does not get better before night, there will not be one gentle bush standing in this wood by to-morrow evening." And after uttering this threat he was not astonished on going home to find the cow in the byre eating her mash, and as well as ever.

If these powerful small people make concessions at times, they are more apt to demand them, as the following tale proves: In the parish where the gentle wood still remains undescerated, any passer-by may see near the high-road a farm-house, close to which grows an old thorn, surrounded by a very high wall. The effect is so strange that a question is nearly always asked, and always thus answered: "The people who lived by the farm always had a respect for the thorn, which was very gentle, and the fairies who crowded round it had a great wish for them, and would do anything for them. But the farmer and his wife grew old, their daughters married, and servants had to be hired to do the work. Soon after these changes the good people ceased to befriend the house—the cows gave less milk, the butter would not come, the crops were poor. The old people fretted over the change, but failed to guess its cause. One gray morning, as the farmer was leaving for his work, he met on the threshold a very grave and dignified little man in green, who did not reach more than half-way to his knee, and who said him, with a low bow, and sweeping off a plumed hat, that he had been sent by the king, his master, to make a formal complaint of the servant-girls, who threw all the sweepings and potato parings at the roots of the old thorn. Now it happened that the king's favorite palace was under this very thorn, and he and his queen and court used to delight on summer evenings in sitting in their green bowers among the twisted stems of the thorn. But now their pleasant retreat was made abominable to them, and unless things were altered king and court must leave the place, and take their blessing from the farmer and his people. On this news the farmer vowed a vow to the small ambassador that he would at once repair the damage done, and make it impossible for anything in future to annoy the wee folk. The wall was built, the land offices recommenced, and were never withdrawn; and on summer evenings the faint sounds of fairy talk and mirth could reach the ears of those who never dared to peep over the wall of solid stone which still encircles the crooked old tree, and averted the fairies' threat of 'bad luck by the bushel.'"

THE COOK'S DILEMMA.
"Two teaspoonfuls of cream of tartar and one of soda to a quart of flour" was formerly the standing direction in every kitchen for making light biscuit, cake, etc. It has been found of late that the old rule won't work, double this quantity of cream of tartar being frequently required to produce the former result, and even then, owing to the great variation in strength of the best cream of tartar that can be purchased at the stores, uniform results can no longer be depended upon in its use.
The cause of this inferiority of modern cream of tartar is explained by the Massachusetts State Board of Health, and also by the New York State Board of Health, which, in a recent examination of 27 samples of cream of tartar, obtained by dealers to be of the best quality, found them adulterated with alum, terra alba, phosphate of calcium, etc., from 5 to 95 per cent. Five samples were adulterated with terra alba to such an extent that they were really terra alba and a little cream of tartar added. In the soda examined, from 17 per cent. of carbonate of lime to 25 per cent. of ground gypsum were found. Of course it is impossible to produce light or wholesome bread with such stuff as this for a leavening material, and the best cooks, if relying upon its use, most frequently fail in their work. The old formula, therefore, no longer to be relied upon, must give way to new methods.
Science, fortunately, comes to the aid of the cook in this dilemma with the ever-ready baking powder, but here again the greatest care is necessary, in selecting a baking powder, to avoid one that may not only spoil the work of the cook but will make the cookery produced to nutriment of danger to the health. Most of the baking powders and bread preparations of the market are made either from the very cream of tartar above described, from alum, which is poison, or from phosphates derived by disgusting processes from the solution of old bones in sulphuric acid, and hence their use is attended with the same inconvenience and dangerous results that follow the use of adulterated cream of tartar. The only way to overcome these difficulties would seem to be in the selection of a baking powder of a thoroughly well-established reputation, whose absolute purity, wholesomeness, and chemical power as a leavening agent have been confirmed beyond contravention. The Royal Baking Powder meets this want more nearly than any other, and has been recommended by the Government chemist as the most acceptable and perfect substitute for the old fashioned cream of tartar and soda. It is undoubtedly pure, and its merits have given it a sale probably equalling that of all other baking powders combined. Its manufacturers have an advantage over all others in possessing facilities for obtaining pure materials. They refine their cream of tartar direct from the imported crude grape acid by means of patented processes, exclusively their own, by which the cream of tartar is rendered absolutely pure and uniform in strength. In addition to this, they employ a number of expert chemists who thoroughly test every pound of ingredient used, and admit no material into the Royal Baking Powder compound until they have demonstrated it chemically pure. As a consequence, the action of this powder is always uniform, as well as of the highest degree of power, and never fails to produce light, sweet, wholesome, and palatable bread, biscuit, or cake. With its universal market, and the great magnitude of its sales, this company finds it to its interests to adopt these extraordinary methods, which no baking powder whose market is limited to a single state or locality can afford.

WHAT SOCIAL CLASSES OWE TO EACH OTHER.

BY

WILLIAM GRAHAM SUMNER,

16mo, Cloth, 90 cents.

"These articles treat various aspects of the question of political economy which are full of interest and importance. With the fine touch of a scientific expert the author lays bare the weakness and shallowness of much that is urged in the name of philanthropy and humanity and reform, and asserts, upon American and rational principles, the right of the rich to be rich, or, in other words, the right of every man to reap all the legitimate and honorable rewards of his abilities and opportunities."

ALTIORA PETO.

A NOVEL.

By LAURENCE OLIPHANT,

Author of "Piccadilly," "Irene Macgillicuddy," &c.

16mo, Paper, 90 cents; 4to, Paper, 20 cents.

The opening chapters overflow with drollery.—London Times.

It is impossible to exaggerate the sense of infinite refreshment inspired by this work of genuine wit, of strong good sense, of sharp insight, and of scholarly style.—Graphic, London.

The book is full of humor.—Saturday Review, London.

It is a pleasure that this brilliant writer is once more pouring the vein he worked with such distinguished success in "Piccadilly." "Altiora Peto," if we may judge from the first part in first volume as it should be called perhaps, bids fair to become one of the most remarkable novels of the time.—St. James's Gazette, London

GOING TO THE DOGS

Good bye, old comrade! On many a morn
The echoing notes of the huntsman's horn
Have called us to fields of merriment,
Where the fleet hounds followed the anise scent.

Your gallant spirit was loath to wait
While the farmer's low hung back the gate;
But, though you vaulted so free and far,
You caught a fall by the topmost bar.

It was death to you, and no sport to me,
For I've left in the lurch while the rest rode free;
And here I must leave you and pick my way,
Over fences and ditches, as best I may.

You shall not be buried, my gallant steed!
On your corse first limbs the hounds shall feed;
And in them, as by prove, you ne'er shall lag,
But still follow the trail of the anise-bag.

RE-OPENING OF THE ART COMPETITION.

The judges appointed to award the prizes in the Art Competition for the illustration of ALFRED DOMETT'S "Christmas Hymn" have reported [see HARPER'S WEEKLY dated September 1] that they "are not satisfied by the conditions of the competition to awarding any prize whatsoever." Three hundred and thirty-eight drawings entered into the competition, and twenty-three were received after the list of August—too late to be considered.

Pursuant to the intimation given in their original "offer to young American artists," the MESSRS. HARPER have determined to re-open the competition, enlarging its scope and modifying the limitations as to age, in accordance with suggestions made by the judges.

For the best original illustration appropriate to Christmas—the drawing to be suitable for publication in HARPER'S MAGAZINE, *to be made especially for this competition, and to be the exclusive work of an American artist not over twenty-seven years of age—*MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS offer an award of THREE THOUSAND DOLLARS, upon the honorable understanding that the successful competitor shall use the same for the prosecution of art study in one or more of the best American schools, including also a sojourn abroad of at least six months for the study of the old masters. The award will be paid in such installments and at such times as shall best suit the convenience of the recipient for the purposes specified.

The drawings must be received by MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS, at Franklin Square, New York, not later than March 1, 1884, addressed "Art Competition, Harper's Magazine"; and each must be designated by an assumed name or motto, which should also be given, together with the real name, age, and residence of the artist, in a sealed envelope securely attached to the drawing, and not to be opened until the result of the competition shall have been determined. The name of the successful competitor will not be publicly announced until the publication of the drawing.

MR. R. SWAIN GIFFORD, N.A., MR. F. D. MILLET, A.N.A., and MR. CHARLES PARSONS, A.N.A., Superintendent of the Art Department at HARPER & BROTHERS', will act as judges of the competition.

The treatment of the subject is left to the artist, limited only by the special reference to Christmas. Either the Bible story of the Nativity, or the social features of Christmas, past or present, may be chosen for illustration. The judges, in making the award, will take into consideration not only the technical art value of each drawing, but also the appropriateness of the subject selected, the sufficiency of the illustration, and especially the originality of conception and treatment. The combination of different designs in a single picture should be avoided.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK, September 8, 1883.

RE-OPENING OF THE HARPER ART COMPETITION.

WE stated last week that the art competition proposed by the Messrs. HARPER would be re-opened, and the detailed announcement of the re-opening appears in this paper. There is one change in the plan which will commend itself at once to general approval. It is proposed that the prize shall be awarded to the best original illustration appropriate to Christmas, and suitable for publication in HARPER'S MAGAZINE. The treatment is to be left to the artist, limited only by this special reference, and the successful drawing will be engraved for HARPER'S MAGAZINE of December, 1884. The other general terms and conditions are the same as before, and the same judges will serve upon the new competition. Their report, which was published in HARPER'S WEEKLY of September 1, was a clear and conclusive statement of the reasons of their decision, and it may be profitably studied by all who propose to compete.

The new competition is open to all American artists of not more than twenty seven years of age, with the same honorable understanding of the prosecution of art study. It is an opportunity of the greatest advantage to every young artist in the country, and one which may well stimulate his best endeavor. The subject proposed is one of the richest suggestion. Christmas may be treated either from the point of view of the Bible story of the nativity, or from that of its social and domestic aspect. There is no subject which appeals more variously to the poetic and artistic imagination. The significance and associations of the day are at once so hallowed and so tender that its mere name is full of delightful suggestion. Its scope may be seen in literature from MILTON'S hymn to DOMETT'S poem, from the old carols and the Christmas songs of good cheer of which English collections are full, to the holiday tales of DICKENS and THACKERAY and the beautiful Christmas papers of IRVING. It should be understood, however, that, while the artist may avail himself of all the knowledge which may be derived from literature, he must not select a subject that would require, for its explanation, any accompanying letter-press, aside from its title or legend.

It is this broad and enticing field which the competition opens to every young American artist. The successful design will not only secure a prize which will provide the opportunity of study of the great works of art in their various countries, but it will also secure publication in the most exquisite and adequate form, and the immediate attention of a million of readers. To the young artist this is an inestimable advantage. It launches him under the best possible auspices upon a promising career, leaving the further successful prosecution of his voyage, where it must always finally rest, upon his own energy, industry, and ability. It will be observed that the terms of the new competition, which should be carefully read, contain a new condition. In addition to the payment of the first award for the design which shall be found most suitable, three other awards of $500 each will be made, according to fitness and excellence, and such successful designs will be published in HARPER'S WEEKLY, HARPER'S BAZAR, and HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE respectively. These last awards, however, will not be subject to the condition of art study, etc. We shall await with high expectation the results of this offer.

A FEARFUL WILD-FOWL

THE sage Bottom was of opinion that there was no more fearful wild-fowl than your lion, living, and the Albany Argus is quite sure that the repeal of the law which fixes a term of four years for subordinate officers would produce an aristocratic class. It urges surely holds, therefore, that the Constitution in not prescribing a fixed term for the clerks and subordinate officers of the government favors an aristocracy. It must also hold, logically, that JEFFERSON and MADISON, in their unsparing condemnation of the law which changed the constitutional tenure betrayed their sympathy with an aristocratic government, and that BENTON and LOWNDES and CALHOUN, in seeking the repeal of the law as injurious to the public interests, advocated the creation of a class with exclusive privileges. These fathers of the party of the Argus, it appears, according to that paper, did not comprehend the nature of a popular government, and according to the same authority, if its reasoning be correct, not only is the Constitution an aristocratic instrument, but the Argus own business is conducted upon aristocratic principles. We presume that the Argus employs reporters, compositors, pressmen, and other assistants so long as the relation is mutually satisfactory. While the honest and sober and efficient employé in the Argus office is satisfied with his wages, and the Argus is satisfied with his work, he remains, and we have no doubt that the Argus would laugh as heartily at the solemn assertion that its system of employment was an aristocracy fatal to American institutions as all intelligent men laugh at its grave proposition that the same system applied to the transaction of the public business would produce an aristocratic class.

What is an aristocracy? It is a privileged class, a class which enjoys exclusive advantages. It has certain prerogatives which belong to it as a class which are transmitted by descent, and which are not attainable by others. Does the Argus mean to say that any civil service reform association has ever made a demand for exclusive rights for any class of citizens, or does it mean to plead guilty to the amusing absurdity of saying that a body of workmen who hold their places by satisfactory service for ten years or more, but who may be summarily dismissed at any moment, constitute an aristocracy? The reform movement demands that the minor administrative places in the government service shall be open upon perfectly equal terms to the whole body of citizens, and shall be filled by those who show themselves to be the best fitted for them, and that the persons employed shall be dismissed when their service is unsatisfactory. The system which the Argus defends shuts out from those places all citizens, however deserving and competent, except a little circle of dependents of a few politicians, who can retain the most unfit and idle of those dependents in place. Under the system of the Argus, probably ninety or ninety-five per cent. of the people have no chance whatever of entering the public service. Under the reformed system, the whole non-political service is open to all who choose to compete and to rely upon their own merit, and not upon the favor of a boss, to enter the service and to remain in it. The system defended by the Argus is the cast-off rags of despotism, royalty, privilege, and personal favoritism.

The Argus and all the other supporters of the un-American and exclusive spoils system try to produce the impression that the reform proposes by the repeal of the four years' law to give to the government employé a vested right in his place, and to provide that when he is once in he can not be turned out except for a crime and by an indictment, trial, and conviction. The fact is that the reformed system proposes that a man who has proved his fitness for the place that he seeks shall hold it until he is dismissed, precisely as he does in every other employment. And it provides that the superior officer shall not be tempted to remove him in order to put a favorite in his place. Under the system of the Argus the most useless, lazy, and dishonest employé may be retained if the "boss" politician who "backs" him chooses to retain him, and the most diligent, faithful, and admirable employé may be peremptorily turned out if a politician wishes his place for one of his own men. A supporter of this sort of privilege as against the equal rights of all the people should understand the meaning of the phrases that he uses. The public business of this country is not the property of a few political bosses. It is the concern of the whole people, and their interest in it is that it shall be transacted honestly, intelligently, and economically. It is because the people see that the system advocated by the Argus is neither honest, intelligent, nor economical—by which we do not mean, of course, that the office-holders are dishonest—that they have determined to change it.

THE MUTUAL DUTY OF SOCIAL CLASSES.

THE series of papers contributed to HARPER'S WEEKLY a few months since by Professor W. G. SUMNER has now been collected and published by the HARPERS in a neat little volume. It contains barely 170 pages, and it merits very careful attention. Professor SUMNER is a bold, aggressive, positive writer, profoundly assured of the justice of his own views, not in the least tender of those of others, and, above all, contemptuous of "sentimental" views, not of human relations, but of the laws of society. The little book will be held by many cursory readers to illustrate the coldness and hardness, even the cruelty and selfishness of social science, and its inability to determine human relations in a humane and satisfactory manner. But the reader who follows it closely—and its crisp and even sparkling style will be sure to draw him on—will find that, more than any book of the kind which he knows, it shows him just what the discussion of social laws proposes, and the relation to those laws of individual human conduct.

The author thinks that much social unhappiness and suffering are directly due to what he calls sentimentality, or the intrusion of personal and private feeling into investigations of actual law. It is the object of social science, not to prescribe conduct, but to study and elucidate laws, and having furnished the data for a wise decision of the application of the law in any particular instance, to leave the decision itself to the individual. As in the natural world, the law of gravity does not and can not distinguish between objects, and an apple falls from the tree or a child from a window in obedience to the same force, so in human society the laws are impartial, and the necessity of observing them is just as imperative, and the folly of blaming the student and interpreter of social laws as cruel and cold as just as conspicuous. The accumulation of great wealth by individuals the author does not hold to be wrong. But because he alleges the right of the rich man to be rich, he does not assert or imply, as has been charged, that combined aggregations of wealthy men may not be dangerous to the community. Indeed, there is no more plainer statement of the dangerous tendencies of great wealth than that of Professor SUMNER.

He holds that the power of wealth in the state should be restrained by checks and guaranties. A plutocracy might be far worse than an aristocracy and nowhere in the world, he says, is the danger of a plutocracy so formidable as it is here. Its natural opponent is a republican democracy, and experience already shows that the serious contest is between the plutocratic and democratic forces. Wealth by cunning combinations can destroy the guaranties of liberty. It can buy legislatures to make the laws and bribe courts to interpret them, and muzzle the press to silence exposure. But this is only to say that the people do not choose honest and fit legislators. The remedy is with the people, and it is a sure and final remedy, except in one contingency, which is, that the people themselves are corrupted, and then, of course, popular government, in its real sense, expires. This little book not only says, most decisively, Clear your mind of cant, but it helps you to clear it. It is often what the Germans call keck, or brusquely self-sufficient; but it is a very valuable and suggestive mental appetizer, and it is well worthy the attention of those who wish to be guided to definite principles in the treatment of great questions which can not be avoided.

THE DEMOCRATIC DICTATOR.

THE Democratic party in New York has an absolute dictator in Mr. JOHN KELLY. He succeeded TWEED as the head of Tammany Hall, but he is not TWEED, and is not as black as he is sometimes painted. He is an excellent representative of the politics that spring from patronage, and of the kind of leader which is known as a boss. He is master of his party in New York simply because he omits to the methods and morals of politics upon which the various Democratic politicians agree a courage which none of them possess. Mr. TILDEN, who is his only rival, has a more elaborate system of cultivating personal relations and maintaining a wider organization of information and details, but Mr. TILDEN never dared to bolt and to give victory to the opposition by dividing his own party. It is by the courage that split his party in 1879 that Mr. KELLY governs his party today. The insurrection of the County Democracy he treats with perfect and just contempt. The Democratic State Convention of last year admitted him and his men, and the "harmony" of last autumn in the city was merely an acknowledgment of his ascendency.

There is the same cry for harmony now, and the regret which is expressed in Democratic papers that harmony was disregarded by the State Committee at Saratoga means only the fear that Mr. KELLY may decide to bolt again and prevent all chance of party success. Democratic harmony means merely unconditional surrender to JOHN KELLY. The late action of the State Committee was puerile, because it was sheer bravado. Probably not a single member of the Committee, as a delegate to the Convention, would vote against the admission of Tammany, although his vote in the Committee branded Tammany as irregular if it did not unite with the County Democracy, which every Democrat knew that it would not do. Mr. KELLY knows, and every Democrat and Republican in New York and in the country knows, that the Convention would not dare to exclude Tammany. The Buffalo Courier says that the vote of New York is indispensable to Democratic success in 1864. Mr. KELLY casts 40,000 votes. Without them the Democratic party is beaten. To shut Tammany out of the State Convention is to lose those votes. The Convention would not dare to do it, and Tammany will be admitted.

Mr KELLY is the one courageous man in his party. If it does not do what he thinks that it ought to do, he defeats it. What other Democratic leader does the same? What Democratic club or hall, except Tammany, dares to bolt and scratch and kick? What Democratic association, except Tammany, ever resolves in regard to its party, as the Third Ward Republican Association in Brooklyn resolved the other evening, "to drive from office every unworthy incumbent, be he Republican or not"? Of course "unworthy," in the mind of Tammany—if such a phrase may be permitted—means only not useful to Tammany. But the action is the same. It is the feeble bravado of independence and reform upon the part of "respectable Democrats," followed by the most servile acceptance of the things against which they organize and protest, which leaves them in so pitiful a plight by the side of Tammany. "The woods are full" of Republican scratchers and kickers and bolters, but the only Democratic kicker is Tammany. Yet Tammany controls its party, and the Democrat who openly defeated his party four years ago is its absolute dictator to-day. It is a striking illustration of the political value of mere courage and independence, even for the most selfish purposes. Thus it appears that the way proposed to the country to get rid of Republican rascality is to intrust the government to a party which can be successful only by reporting at that head-quarters of purity and reform, Tammany Hall.

IMPRISON PRIZE FIGHTERS.

THE prompt and energetic action of Governor CHITTENDEN, of Missouri, and Governor GLICK, of Kansas, and their Attorney Generals, in letting STARR and MILLARTT know that even training for a prize-fight would send each to State-prison, has so alarmed these fellows that they have concluded to quit the country entirely, and go to Mexico. We are pleased to see such wholesome measures and so desirable a result following quickly on the position taken in our columns a fortnight since. There are far too many swindlers, thieves, and other criminals of Western Europe here already, without inviting the most brutal and ruffianly class of them all, and rewarding them with columns of free advertising and thousands of dollars of gate-money, and enabling them to open fashionable rum-shops, and lure our youth to associate and drink with them. If the Associated Press would notify its correspondents that any reference to these degrading exhibitions, or to those who take part in them, would be followed by their dismissal from the service, the columns now devoted to bloody dog-fights, and bloodier cock-fights, in newspapers claiming to be respectable, could be used for encouraging many a reputable work, often of large public benefit, about which they are now silent.

There are dissolute classes in every city, ready at the briefest notice to welcome such shows, to rob and pillage, to hang negroes to lamp posts, and do what they can to replace order with anarchy, the moment the strong arm of the law is drawn back. For such as these we have to keep, in this city alone, nearly three thousand police constantly on the watch, at an expense annually of millions. But the favorite pastimes of these criminal classes, and the description of them, are most dangerous things to set before our youth, and all respectable men should do their part to keep them out of sight, and to discountenance any paper which talks about them, and panders in any way to the classes which enjoy them. An editorial paragraph deprecating such work is lost on the reader the moment he sees five times as much space in another part of the same paper devoted to a minute description of the affair itself. If the editors of the daily press, and the Governors of all the States, will do their duty as vigorously as did the two gentlemen named, the MAZEPPAS and BRUMBYES, the WILLIAMSES and MITCHELLS, will soon learn to keep away from the United States, and to spend their days in Mexico, England, and other congenial lands, where creatures of their stamp appear to thrive.

LOW TIDE.

AMONG the grave offenses which are alleged against the Republican party to "jaunketing." The word describing the crime is not felicitously chosen, for WEBSTER defines jaunketing as feasting in secret, and it can not be truthfully alleged that the President is faking in secret, or that Secretary CHANDLER takes trips in the Tallapoosa by stealth. The fact, however, remains that the President has gone a-fishing, and that Secretary CHANDLER has gone a-sailing in a revenue-cutter. Moreover, the other Republicans are somewhere, and the government is apparently "running itself."

It is not alleged that anything is going wrong, or that the presence of the President and the cabinet in Washington during the vacation would make the slightest difference in routine work, nor can it be said that the Secretary of State in Newport, or the Secretary of the Navy at a New Hampshire navy-yard or upon a cruise, are so far from Washington that a catastrophe might occur before they could reach the capital. All that can be truthfully said upon the subject is that it is the dull—and dull—political season; the season, in fact, of political drivel and "emptins."

Some inquirer in Connecticut asks the Herald to tell the real truth about Mr TILDEN's force and vigor. The Herald replies that certainly it will do so with pleasure. Mr TILDEN is a good man, and weighs about a hundred and fifty pounds. That is the way in which the Herald treats a great and good statesman. Then a Republican journal states that it so whispered about that the Democratic Governor of New York has gone junketing to the North Woods, and that junketing as obviously not exclusively a Republican crime, and that it is not positively necessary to turn out the Republicans in order to suppress junketing. Meanwhile, Mr. TILDEN treats with mysterious and suspicious silence the question whether he killed HANCOCK, and from time to time an anonymous writer details the private colloquies of General GARFIELD and DORSEY to show the utter baseness and rascality of—GARFIELD. The ship of state is in the very doldrums of political anarchy. Happy the people which has no annals!

AN UNCROWNED KING.

IT was a harmless gentleman and a pathetically droll figure in the history of the time who lately died at Frohsdorf. He was perhaps the only King who ever passed a long life, with all the pleasure and adulation, and without one of the cares and responsibilities, of royalty. He was an reverently honored by the legitimate of France as if he had sat upon the throne, and their homage was even more sublimated by the fact of his deprivation of the actual crown. Those who saw and knew the French pilgrims returning from a visit to his Majesty describe them as full of a kind of tender exaltation, as if they had been caught up in beatific vision.

This is very droll when one thinks of the placid fat gentleman, who enjoyed his dinner, and passed his time in hunting and religious observances and receiving the flattery of those who regarded him as a kind of sacred being. He has been always highly commended for his fidelity to the belief that God really designed him to be the supreme ruler of Frenchmen, and also for his steady refusal to assert his right by force of arms. He has been certainly the most gentle and undemonstrative of royal exiles and pretenders. But it is not improbable that he preferred the pomp and form of royalty to its actual substance. He was evidently not a man of energy, and of what the French call initiative; and a life of the purblind excitement and agitation which that of a French king must be could have had little charm for the mild and cappetic HENRY.

When his opportunity came, and without intrigue or effort of his own, he put it aside, and declined to mount the throne, upon a plea of objection to the national flag—a flag which at the moment was double dear to French pride, because it had just been covered with defeat and misfortune—was an act at such a time allowed as much disinclination to wear the crown as inability to grasp the situation. It certainly showed his entire unfitness for the position which he possibly held to have been divinely allotted to him. His death leaves as the representative of the old royal house of France an intelligent and accomplished gentleman in full sympathy with his time, and whose position may serve his country by constantly reminding it that there is a living and white head of an anti republican tendency, if at any time the republic by extravagance or by reaction should steadily flounce.

PERSONAL.

THE Athenæum prints an interesting budget of letters written by Lady BYRON, Mrs. LEIGH, and Lord BYRON. It thinks the time has come when the scandalous legends that have sullied the fair fame of the poet, his wife, and his sister should be finally dispelled, and it believes that no one can rise from the perusal of these letters without feeling that the stories long current are baseless.

—Both the public and Mr WILLIAM BLACK are to be congratulated upon the announcement that Mr BLACK's next novel, which will be begun in HARPER'S MAGAZINE for February, will be illustrated by Mr EDWIN A. ABBEY. The title of the work is Judith Shakespeare, Her Love Affairs and other Adventures, and the scenes are laid in and near Stratford-upon-Avon, a region with which Mr ABBEY's travels and studies have made him familiar, but his main qualifications are his alert imagination and delicate sympathy.

—Mr E. G. HOUGHTON, a foreigner in Japan, got to like both rice and pickles, not even excepting the infamous daikon, "a half-putrid, half-salted preparation of large horse-radish, and the finest thing in the world to make rice go down; for if you take a piece and chew it well till the taste is all over your mouth, you could, I believe, eat anything else in the world afterward to get rid of the taste again."

—M. RENAN professes to think very lightly of literary glory. "I tried to care for literature for a while, only to gratify M. SCHERER, who had a great deal of influence over me. Since his death I care no longer. I see very well that talent has a value only because the world is childish. If the world had a strong enough head, it could content itself with truth. Literary skill has injured me more on a second than it has helped me for itself. I here never in the least rested on it. I here always been the least literary of men." Yet it is entirely to his extraordinary literary skill that M. RENAN is indebted for the vastness of the audience that he addresses.

—Mr ERNEST W. LONGFELLOW describes COCTEAU as a short, thick man, with a great shock of iron-gray hair protruding from under his old straw hat, eyes small, but very bright, no to a rather heavy and puffy face of a pale and sallow hue; nose large, with open and very sensitive nostrils, clean-shaved, save for a heavy, drooping gray mustache, which concealed a large, sensuous mouth, finally a receding chin, almost lost in a thick neck, suggestive of apoplexy. "Not a handsome man, certainly," continues Mr LONGFELLOW, "as the nose and chin destroy the symmetry of a sense of power that was unmistakable. There was a flash in his eyes that revealed the sacred fire, and you felt that he was no common man, as his outward aspect might lead you at first to imagine. He was ungraceful, but with a certain old-fashioned courtesy, especially with ladies, that made up for the want of polish." It may be added that Mr LONGFELLOW's picture of his father's house at Cambridge, Massachusetts, has been accepted by the Prince of Wales.

—Mr CHARLES DUDLEY WARNER writes that during his stay in Tangier he one often attended to his errands by a chevening boy in a ragged gown, handsome, and with the breeding of a prince, who, having picked up a little French and a little English, aspired to earn a few coppers by being a guide. "You know Mark Twain?" he asked, by way of scraping acquaintance on his first appearance. "Yes, I know Mark Twain very well. Do you?" "Yaas, he friend to me. I guide to him. He very good man, Mark Twain." "Why, you young rascal, you weren't born when he was in Tangier sixteen years ago." "Oh, yaas, born enough. He know him. He very good man. Plenty back-sheesh."

—The awards to American artists at the Munich International Exhibition are as follows: Mr HOWARD NEAL becomes Hors Concours, and Messrs. E. A. ABBEY, T. E. ROSENTHAL, WILLIAM M. CHASE, and F. D. MILLET receive medals of the second class.

—President ARTHUR reached his zenith as a fisherman when, at one cast in a tributary of the Yellowstone, he landed three trout weighing together four and a quarter pounds, and at each of six other casts he landed two specimens almost as fine.

—The Arab of the desert is pronounced by a recent traveller to be a continual fraud and sham, with his haughty, frowning air, his gravity and laziness, his courage and courtesy, those qualities being only a mask to hide a soul which is often mean, grasping, cowardly, and treacherous, and which only his brother Arab knows how to estimate at its true value.

—The feeling of the average American frontiersman toward his neighbor the Indian is expressed by a far Western newspaper as follows: "By a 'good Indian' we mean a dead Indian."

—Young Mr ARTHUR, the President's son, is described by a Block Island correspondent as a meek-mannered prince, with long slim legs, a stoop in his shoulders, a brier-wood pipe in his mouth, a heavy lower jaw, and a resemblance to his grandfather, who preached in New England thirty years ago.

—"Miss WOOLSON," says the Academy, "is American—very American—but in the best sense. For the Major is a book few Europeans, if any, could have written, concentrating as it does such nervous power and earnest sentiment upon purely domestic incident. The old Major, dimly conscious of his failing mind, the sickly little boy, his pretended pupil, but really his playmate, and the faithful women who jealously hide from the world, and even from himself, the secret of his imbecility, form a truly pathetic and truly beautiful group, very difficult to draw, but very well drawn indeed."

—It is reported that Mr W. H. VANDERBILT has offered Miss THURSBY $10,000 a year to sing in the choir of St. Bartholomew's church on Sundays. Miss THURSBY will sing in concert also the coming season. The average salary of a singer in a quartet choir of a New York church is six hundred dollars a year.

—The Rev. H. J. LYNCH, a Catholic clergyman of Lakeville, Connecticut, has incurred the ill-will of some residents of that charming village by erecting a large crucifix, twelve feet high, in front of his church, and in full view of the street. The objectors have prepared an address in which they ask him to use his influence in procuring the removal of the image, because "such a display is not in harmony with American ideas and customs, is shocking to the sensibilities of many, and entirely at variance with the sentiments and wishes of a great portion of the people of this community."

—Mr. HENRY HALL has sent two hundred dollars for the relief of the sufferers by the catastrophe at Jacksonville. "A catastrophe," he writes, "which is more than an Italian catastrophe; it is more than a human catastrophe; it is a universal catastrophe. I feel troubled. I send my mite." But the sorrows of the poor in any part of the world on any day of the year are really more pitiable. Only there are less picturesque.

—Miss ELSIE TERRY, the leading lady of Mr HENRY IRVING's company, will receive a salary of $1500 a week while playing in this country. Though she is an actress of the first water, the sum is considered very large. Yet Mrs. LANGTRY, who is not an actress at all, earned more than twice as much.

—Lord TALBOT, eldest son, Lord GARMOYLE, is to marry Miss FORTESCUE, the actress, who bought up all the photographs of that lady that were exposed for sale in the shops, and has asked her not to sit again for her portrait. It is not said whether the negatives of those photographs have been purchased too.

—The Rev. PERCIVAL HARRIS has been visiting a monastery in the Pyrenees, and Monsignor CAPEL has been lecturing in Monterey on "Life in a Cloister."

—A visitor at the White Sulphur Springs, Virginia, finds that at the hotel it is unnecessary to lock things up. "Even cigars lying on the table are not coveted by the porter. The chairs are all open by day and by night, and nothing is touched. The porter emptys out into your room in the morning, takes away your boots, blacks them, and brings them back. It gives a New Yorker a curious sensation—this leaving everything open. The same trust in human nature pervades every part of the place. Down in the bath houses, if you can not make change, it is no matter—pay it tomorrow. At the cigar stand, if you have not the requisite quarter, it will do as well next time you call."

—Mr CYRUS W. FIELD has invested fifteen thousand dollars in an Artesian well just dug in the cellar of his new building at No. 1 Broadway. It is expected to discharge fifty gallons of pure cold water a minute the year round, from a depth of twelve hundred feet. Though situated only about five hundred feet from the Bay of New York, this well has not a drop of salt water.

—M. ERNEST OLLIVIER condemns the French school books as irreligious and partisan, and has written a pamphlet on the need of religion in social life. "So long," he says, "as the world moves amid the awful silence of mystery, and our life is given over to evil, so long as death hovers over the objects of our love, and children are carried by it from their parents, stoicism can only serve for a few unbending hearts, and there will be temples and dogmas, prayers and priests."

—Mr HENRY JAMES, on a recent visit to Chambord, in France, where the late "Henry V." held court, found in a strange mixture of society and solitude. Its park, now disfeatured, is [illegible] miles in circumference. The towers, the turrets, the [illegible] the gables, the lanterns, the chimneys of the palace, [illegible] more "like the spires of a city than the salient points of a single building. A little village clusters within view of the stately windows, and a couple of inns near by offer entertainment to pilgrims. The palace itself is a wilderness of empty chambers—a royal and romantic barrack. Its exiled owner had not the means to keep up four hundred rooms, he contented himself with preserving the large outside. The repairs of the prodigious roof alone must have absorbed a large part of his revenue. The great feature of the interior is the celebrated double staircase rising straight through the building, with two courses of steps, so that people may ascend and descend without meeting. THE GREAT EARTHQUAKE.

The island of Java, the scene of the recent terrible earthquakes, lies south of the island of Sumatra, separated from it by the Straits of Sunda, and extends to the eastward 640 miles, with a width varying from 36 to 126 miles. Two mountain chains extend the whole length, broken by rich valleys, which yield sugar and the highly prized Java coffee. Numerous volcanoes show themselves along the mountain chains, but are not often in eruption, though earthquake shocks are of common occurrence.

The city of Batavia, on the north side of the western end, is the seat of government for all the Dutch possessions to the East, and has a population of 120,000 inhabitants, European and Javanese. It is beautifully laid out, with wide carriage drives on each side of canals shaded by luxuriant tropical foliage.

Anjer, recently swept out of existence, is also on the western end of the island. It was a town of about 900 or 1000 inhabitants, who derived support principally by supplying vessels in the China trade with fresh provisions, water, etc. They stopped there for that purpose and for orders, as it is in communication by telegraph with Europe and China. Situated on a low point of land only a few feet above the sea, it fell an easy prey to the tidal wave.

The unpaved streets of the town were wide, and the low thatch-roofed houses were embowered in graceful foliage, effectually protecting them from the rays of the mid-day sun. On the extreme point a short distance from the sea, was the old landmark so well known to all East Indiamen, the great banyan tree, which towered above all surrounding objects, rendering it conspicuous many miles at sea. It was the largest tree of any kind known in the East, and although not attaining the height of some of those found in the Yosemite Valley, it had a much greater bulk. It was 1760 feet in height; the trunk, or rather the assemblage of trunks, was 275 feet in diameter, while the dense foliage spread in a circle of 192 feet in diameter. The ladder shown in the picture was used to reach a house built on the closely knitted branches sixty feet from the ground, yet completely hidden from view.

The captain of a steamer which was in the Straits of Sunda during the eruptions reports that ashes fell on the deck of his vessel to the depth of eighteen inches, and that he passed masses of floating pumice stone several feet in depth. It is estimated that 10,000 persons lost their lives at Tyringee, and that the total number of persons killed by the eruption and tidal waves was 30,000.

On the lowlands of Batavia, where the waters have receded and quieted down, hundreds of bruised and mangled bodies are lying exposed. A sanitary corps has been formed, and the corpses are being removed and buried as fast as possible, in order to prevent the breeding and spread of contagion. The Straits have become dangerous to navigation on account of the formation of new islands.

THE MILKING HOUR.

You good old Boss, stand quietly now,
And don't be turning your head this way.
You're looking for Donald, it's plain to see,
But he won't be here to-day,
Nobody came with me, dear old Boss,
Not even to carry my pail; for, you see,
Donald's gone whistling down the lane,
And Donald is vexed with me.

And all because of a trifling thing:
He asked me a question, and I said "Nay."
I never dreamed that he would not guess
It was only a woman's way.
I wonder if Donald has ever learned
The motto of "Try and try again."
I think, if he had, it might have been
He had not learned in vain.

And there needn't have stretched between us two,
On this fair evening, the meadow wide,
And I needn't have milked alone to-night,
With nobody at my side.
What was it he said to me vester eve,
Something about—about my eyes?
It's strange how clever that Donald can be;
That is, whenever he tries.

Now, Boss, old cow, you mustn't tell
That I've cried a little while milking you:
For, don't you see? it is nothing to me
What Donald may choose to do.
If he chose to go whistling down the lane,
I chose to stay gayly coming here:
But it's lonely without him, after all,
Now isn't it, Boxer dear?

I—hark! who's that? Oh, Donald, it's you!
Did you speak?—excuse me—what did you say?
"May you carry my pail?" Well, yes; at least,
I suppose, if you try, you may.
But, Donald, if I had answered No,
Do you think it would have occurred to you
Not to be vexed at a woman's way.
But to try what coaxing would do?

THE LAWN TENNIS CHAMPIONSHIP.

For the third successive year, notwithstanding the objections of a considerable section of tennis-players, the annual lawn tennis championship has been held at Nasport. The desire to change the scene to some ground in the near neighborhood of New York was a praiseworthy expression of local pride, but any one who has attended the Newport tournament, and also has had an opportunity of contrasting the conveniences offered by the Casino with those provided by any club in the New York district, would in candor be forced to acknowledge that the committee of the National Association was right in withstanding the desire for change. Apart from the conveniences of the Casino for players, it would be difficult to imagine a fairer scene than the lawns presented during the four days on which the tournament was held. Lawn tennis is a pastime enjoying a social prestige higher than that bestowed upon any other game or sport which may be indulged in without great expense, and this prestige should be maintained, if for no other reason than that it is almost the only out-door game of invert in which both ladies and gentlemen and children can take part. It can never, probably, be as popular (in the exact sense of the word) as base-ball, but it does not need to be so. The two games are entirely distinct, and while New York, Buffalo, Chicago, and other large centres of population are the natural centres of the game of base-ball, lawn tennis finds its most suitable head-quarters at the beautiful city of cottages on Narragansett Bay.

Although the tournament of 1885 was a thorough success, there were some elements of disappointment, chief of which was the comparatively small number of entries for the two events of the meeting. This may be in part explained by the absence from the country of some of the best players, and partly by a feeling that the winners of last year are still so far ahead of their rivals that real competition was out of the question; and it seems hardly possible that more than a fourth of those who took part in the games could have entered with any expectation or hope of winning championship honors. Still, though only one can win, the benefit to each individual contestant, and so to the game itself, can not be measured only by the chance that only one person has of winning the prize. The champions of years to come are among the younger of the defeated competitors, while those who are older in the game, and whose day is now passing, should be credited with a fine public spirit in encouraging the younger players by their presence.

But notwithstanding the small number of entries, the standard of play was as high as in promise well fits the future of lawn tennis in this country. Mr Parrish, of Philadelphia, is young, and gives every indication of becoming a more than usually good player, even among the best. Mr. Foxhall Keene is still younger, and is already a first-class player, with an ease and grace of style that promise well. Mr Howard Taylor, although defeated in the tournament by Fassett, has already won the championship at Harvard University—an institution from which not only Mr Sears, the champion, but also at least ten of the next best players here come. These young men, not yet out of their teens, are the coming champions. On the other hand, some excellent players, among whom may be mentioned Messrs. Van Rensselaer, Osborne, M Peet, M Paton, A. Newbold, G. M Smith, and H. Powers, play as well now as it is probable they will ever play. In such a game as lawn tennis youth is a factor of supreme importance.

For three successive years Mr Richard D Sears has held the lawn tennis championship of the United States. He is a young man, twenty-two years old, and graduated in the class of '83 at Harvard University. His record as a tennis-player has not been approached in this country, he having suffered defeat only once where a prize or an honor was to be bestowed. This was in the match for the Harvard championship of last year, which was won by Mr J S Clark, one of the two brothers who lately faced the famous Renshaw brothers, the English champions, across a net, and were thoroughly and honorably beaten. It is not probable that Mr Sears will figure as a tournament player after the present season, except to defend his championship, nor is he likely to improve much in his play, although this year's form shows a marked advance over that of last year. His game is particularly graceful and accurate, his judgment excellent, and his facility in recovering apparently hopeless returns wonderful. It is difficult, in view of the fact that he is actually the best American player, to say in what respect he is weak; but if he were matched against the best English players it would probably be seen that his play is not sufficiently aggressive to prevail in the best company. In this respect, indeed, he seems to be inferior to his closest competitor, Dr Dwight. In the final match for the championship between these two gentlemen it was a noticeable fact that while the latter played mainly from about the service-line, depending almost entirely on his skill in volleying, Mr Sears took up his position nearer to the base-line than to the service-line, and although the greater distance from the net gave him a better chance to make sure of his returns, the position of his opponent, about midway in the court, enabled the latter to play a severer game. If the two players were equal in other respects, the aggressive attitude of Dr Dwight would probably be the means of reversing their respective positions as victor and vanquished.

Dr Dwight is a physician practising at Boston, and is about ten years older than Mr Sears. In addition to being the second amateur tennis-player in America, he is the popular and hard-working president of the National Lawn Tennis Association, under whose rules and auspices the Newport tournament directly, and indirectly all other open tournaments, are held. To his energy the success of the recent meeting was mostly due, and it is not too much to say that to him the game of lawn tennis owes much of the success that has attended its adoption in this country. It was a matter of great regret that the match officially devolving upon him in connection with the Newport meeting naturally rendered him less fit than he would otherwise have been to examine the great effort which his match with Mr Sears required. Not, indeed, that the result would probably have been different, but the light would have been clearer. As it was, the first two sets went to Mr Sears easily, his opponent winning but two games out of fourteen. In the third set, however, Dr Dwight played brilliantly, the score of games standing at the close of the tenth game "five all." Then ensued the closest game that has ever been witnessed in an important match, for, being a final match, with the games at "five all," two games had to be won in succession by the same player before victory could be claimed. The eleventh game was scored by Mr Sears, his opponent counting only one are, but the next game was called for Dwight, bringing the score back to "deuce games." Again the latter player added a game; but Mr Sears, playing brilliantly, won the next, and the score was called "deuce games" again. The fifteenth game of the set was also won by Mr Sears, but so determined was the play of Dr Dwight that it was only after a game that lasted several minutes, during which no less than twenty-four aces in all were scored, that the match was decided in favor of Sears, by three sets to none. In the last set nine games fell to the winner and seven to the loser; and in the last game of the last set Mr Sears won thirteen aces and Dr. Dwight eleven, "deuce" having been called nine times. In the first set the winner scored twenty-eight aces against the loser's twenty-three, in the second, twenty-nine against thirteen; while in the third set the winner made fifty-five aces against fifty-three for the loser. A closer set than this could hardly be possible.

But though such stern antagonists for the single handed championship, these two gentlemen play together as partners in the double-handed game, and at Newport they had little difficulty in sweeping everything before them for the second year in succession. Their only American rivals are the brothers Clark, who are now abroad. Had they been able to take part in the Newport tournament, this invincible pair of brothers would have made a hard fight with the actual winners, and would very likely have beaten them, seeing that they have already done so twice. As it turned out, the final match in the doubles was the hollowest of defeats, for the losing pair, Messrs. A Van Rensselaer and A Newbold, won only four games out of twenty-two. The circumstances under which they played, however, were such as to modify any adverse criticism that might be made on their display on that occasion, and their pluck is worthy of all commendation. A voyage of ten miles across Narragansett Bay in an open cat boat, and with a rougher sea rolling than had been known on the coast since the March gales, was sufficient to have upset the mental as well as physical equilibrium of even the strongest men; but as the weather prevented the Narragansett Pier boat from running on the day set for the final match of the doubles, Messrs. Van Rensselaer and Newbold were obliged to make this hazardous and inconvenient trip as forfeit the match. No wonder, then, that in such a state of disquietude they were unable to push the winners. But even had they been in the best condition, the final result would hardly have been different, for the winning pair played a stronger game than they have ever before exhibited, and in fact it is doubtful if even their late conquerors, the Clarks, could have won against such play. In this match, at least, Dr Dwight played more brilliantly than his partner and subsequent victor, and showed himself to be second to none as a double-handed player.

If the apprenticeship is long and the contest stern, the rewards are both handsome and costly. Mr Sears, by winning the singles, acquired a handsome silver cup given by the National Association, a bronze plaque given under conditions by two Philadelphia gentlemen, a silver cup presented by the governors of the Newport Casino, to be played for as often as the National Tournament is held on their grounds; and the "Horsman Trophy," a full-sized lawn tennis racquet, ornamented with gold and jewels, and strung with harp strings. This handsome trophy was presented last year by Mr E. I. Horsman, of New York, and is to be played for every year until it has been won three times, not necessarily in succession, by the same person. Mr Sears has won it twice, and there seems to be a strong probability that a year hence he will be justified in proudly regarding it as his own personal property.

CHAPTER XII.

GEORGE LOSES A PENNY.

When King Ferdinand II., by the grace of God and the will of nations more powerful than his own, ruled over the Two Sicilies, it used to be the custom of all well-to-do Neapolitans, as well as of the numerous strangers who dwelt within their gates, to drive up and down the Chiaja for a matter of three hours every afternoon. The Chiaja, as everybody knows, follows the curves of the most beautiful bay in the world, and is, or at all events was as hot, dusty, and unwholesome a strip of highway as ever gave slaves of fashion were condemned to frequent. The slaves of fashion, however, swallowed the dust and the bad smells without apparent inconvenience. Lady Constance Milner took her turn of the treadmill conscientiously with the others. At regular intervals her carriage, with the swarthy Antonio on the box, passed beneath my post of observation, and I was not long in discovering that her last appearance invariably occurred between half past four and a quarter to five; at which hour I concluded that she was in the habit of going home.

At five o'clock one evening, therefore, I took my way to the Hôtel Crocelle, and was gratified to hear from the hall porter that Lady Constance had just returned from her drive. All the greater was my disappointment, on reaching the first floor, when Antonio, who was sitting on a chair in the passage, reading a newspaper, rose and blandly informed me that her ladyship did not receive. Now, as the sound of several voices was distinctly audible through the door over which he was mounting guard, it was pretty clear that Antonio had not been instructed to make this reply to all applicants; still, since I had given no notice of my coming, I could not very well complain of the door being shut in my face, and I left my card, remarking that I should hope to be more fortunate on some future occasion. Three days later I accordingly presented myself again at the same door, and was again met with the same discouraging announcement—"Her ladyship does not receive." This time the buzz of conversation on the other side of the door being just as loud as before, I ventured to point out to Antonio that, whether her ladyship received or not, she was entertaining visitors at that moment; to which he replied, "Yes, sir," with an impassive countenance.

"Well," I said, impatiently, "will she receive me if I call to-morrow?"

"I can not tell you, sir."

"Can't you ask?"

"Impossible, sir."

I turned away, and took myself off in deep disgust; and it is quite possible that Lady Constance would never have had another opportunity of cultivating the writer's acquaintance if George had not displayed such bad taste in enabling loudly over what he was pleased to call my re buff. As he chose to make up that line I said I would very soon show him that I was not so easily rebuffed. "I'll lay you ten to one in sheteveer you like that I am admitted into her drawing-room this very afternoon," I added.

George answered that he never betted, but that, for once in a way, he didn't mind making a frane in a penny about it; and I set off, fully determined to attain my object. Antonio was ready for me with his usual formula; but I had a practical rejoinder to cut him short with. I held out a napoleon, which he promptly grabbed and transferred to his pocket. "And now," said I, "you will be so good as to take my card to Lady Constance and say I am waiting."

The man looked doubtful. "Her ladyship is rather particularly engaged this afternoon, sir," he said.

"I don't care two straws about that. It isn't that I am specially anxious to see her," I explained; "but I have a wager upon it; and in fact, if you don't deliver my message, I shall open the door and walk in unannounced."

Antonio raised his eyebrows slightly, but made no further objection. He was absent for about a couple of minutes, during which time I saw him to confuse that the tide of my audacity turned and began to ebb with alarming rapidity; but when he re-appeared it was only to hold the door open, and I entered, hoping for the best.

The room in which I found myself was a fine one, and presented an aspect of rather more luxury than one is accustomed to associate with the salons of hotels. At the further end of it Lady Constance was standing, tall and stern, beckling my card between her long, shapely fingers, and talking to a gray-headed man, whom back was turned toward me and who was wearing his feet by the fire. I advanced, unconsciously conscious of my person, and eager to explain what certainly were the appearance of a rather unwarrantable intrusion.

"I'm afraid you must think it very cool of me to force my way in like this," I began, "but as there were no good as to say that I might call—as this is the third time that I have been, you see—and—and I thought perhaps there was some mistake—"

Lady Constance paid no attention whatever to my breathless excuses. She stepped back for a moment to hold out her hand to me, requested me to sit down, at the same time pressing me a somewhat remote chair, and then resumed her own seat and her conversation with a stranger. They spoke in a language which was wholly unknown to me, and were evidently little affected by my presence as if I had indeed and dumb.

This cavalier treatment at least gave me time to cool down and to recover my self-possession, so that I did not find it an embarrassing matter to have done under ordinary circumstances. I thought I would sit the other visitor out, as soon as his leaving was over, once might begin. In the mean time I took stock of the apartment, which, with its stands of hot-house plants its Oriental and Spanish rugs, its piles of books and newspapers, and its bronze and other knick-knacks carelessly deposited here and there, offered characteristic enough of its temporary mistress. It was the habitation of a nomad, but of a nomad with a well-lined purse, and I was wondering what Mowbray and others could be meant by representing Lady Constance as a person without fortune, when my musings were agreeably interrupted by the discovery that couple beside the fire were talking about Lady Constance looked me full in the face, and a few words, and laughed; and then the stranger—a man of something over middle age, with a weather-beaten, wrinkled face, and no unkempt beard and mustache—pushed back his chair, scrutinized my deliberately, and laughed too.

I was furious; but what could I do? To up and walk away, without having spoken a word, would be too ridiculous, and I had not the courage to offer any observation. There was one thing for it but to sit still and wait for the end. I suppose I must have sat there for at least a quarter of an hour, smoothing my hat, and looking quite wretched, before the stranger got up. Lady Constance accompanied him to the door, talking animatedly as she went, and then, returning to the fire-place, stood, with her elbow resting on the mantel piece, looking down at the glowing logs.

When she broke silence, it was to say quite privately, as though there had been nothing in the previous conduct or mine which called for remark. "The worst of these people is that one can never be any possibility tell whether they are speaking the truth or not. It is so annoying that they should be able so lie readily that they become a second nature to them and from never knowing for certain who are their friends or who are their enemies, they end by suspecting everybody. I sometimes doubt whether the system is altogether a good one."

She looked up at me half interrogatively as she ceased speaking; so I said that, upon the whole of it, the system did not seem to be a very good one.

She laughed. "You can hardly judge of yet, I suppose," she remarked. "Do you know who that man is who has just left the room?"

I said, "At the least."

"And if I told you his name you would probably be none the wiser. His name is Sapio Herr Muller, and he just manages to keep body and soul together by giving music lessons. three years ago he was commanding an army Hungary, and he might be a rich man now if he have, if he had chosen to make terms and the Austrians, as others did. The word 'patriot' out of favor nowadays; yet it would be a fine thing in me be a patriot in the sense that the word is one. He has given up literally everything for his country—his time and his health and money, and, as some people would say his morality into the bargain. To die for your country is all very well, but there are hundreds and thousands of men who are ready to do that much. Herr Muller goes a great deal further. He has plotted for his country, he has lied for her, he would kill as near for her as a matter of course. If he thought Hungary would be in any way benefited by her death he would assassinate himself without a moment's hesitation."

"I should think a man of that kind would be a rather uncomfortable sort of friend," I remarked.

"He is not my friend. He is nobody's friend except Hungary's. He only comes to see me because he thinks I can do something for Hungary."

"And can you?"

"No. But I like to hear him talk, and he gives me information, though, as I said just now, I can't be sure whether it is trustworthy information or not. For the moment, however, I look about as hopeless as they see for him and others like him; but their cause will triumph in the long-run, I fancy. I don't know whether you believe that truth is great and will prevail?"

"I am quite certain of it," I said, decidedly.

"Yes, at your age one is quite certain about most things. Upon the whole, I agree with you, but then, as Pilate so naturally asked, 'What is truth?'"

"I don't altogether understand what you mean," I said, "but it doesn't appear to me that conspiracies and reasonableness are likely to do much good to any cause."

"The secret societies are more formidable than you imagine, though. I have never belonged to one myself, but I have had opportunities of observing what they can do, and I know that they can at least frighten the authorities. No government can suppress them, and no bad government will be able to sleep comfortably while they exist. Therefore I am inclined to think that the conspirators will wear out the bad governments, in spite of the fact that most conspirators are fools, and some are ruffians."

"And do you help these fools and ruffians?" I asked.

"So people say."

I did not like to press the question further; though I was becoming more and more interested in this singular woman. I was, however, sufficiently at my ease by this time to recur to the subject of my unceremonious entry, and to offer a somewhat less incoherent apology for it. "I'm afraid I interrupted you," I said, in conclusion.

"Well," she answered, with a smile, "I think you must have seen for yourself that you did not do that. Even Herr Muller, who is suspicion incarnate, was convinced that there was no danger in talking Magyar before you. I am not at all offended indeed. I rather admire your self-assertion. It is a great gift, only you should be careful of abusing it. Another time, if Antonio tells you that I do not receive, I must ask you to take him at his word; but most likely he will not tell you so again. If I remember rightly, you were to come here with a view to expatiating upon the perfections of some charming girl, with whom you are violently in love. Please be so kind as to put another log upon the fire, and then you can embark upon your narrative. I am all attention."

"Upon second thoughts," I said, after complying with her request, "I would rather leave that subject alone. It would not interest you."

"To be honest," she replied, "I don't think it would, and love affair is so very like another, unfortunately. Nevertheless, I am quite willing to be bored for a quarter of an hour. I can't give you a longer time than that, because I am going out to dinner. By the-way, you might as well dine with me to-morrow, if you have no other engagement, and bring Mr. Fisticuffs with you."

"Fisticuffs, as you call him, is by way of not going into society," I answered, "but I shall be delighted to come, and I will deliver your kind invitation to him."

Do; and tell him, at the same time, from me, that if he refuses to go with you into the gay world, he will be neglecting a very important part of his duties. He has been put in charge of a perishable piece of property, and unless he restores it to its owners in good condition he will be held responsible, as sure as we live in a world of injustice."

Whether this argument, which I duly reported to George, had any effect upon him, or whether, as he himself averred, he was anxious to see what a gang of conspirators and cut-throats looked like, I can not say; but he decided, rather to my surprise, to accompany me to the Hotel Crocelle on the following evening, and went away confessing that Lady Constance did not appear to be so black as she was painted.

Lady Constance tickled my vanity as much as anybody's, though I was not quite prepared to admit that at the time. I stood upon a different footing with her from that of the mature Lotharios who adored her, the assorted specimens of humanity who ate her dinners, and the conspirators whom she half distrusted and also wholly distrusted her. I was her friend, so some ancient even her confidant. I was with her at all hours, in public and in private, it was I who escorted her to the Opera, and called her carriage when she left a reception or a ball; it was to me that new arrivals who wished to be presented to her most commonly addressed themselves. All this was naturally flattering to the self-love of a young and inexperienced member of Society, and I could see but too well that I was the subject of a good deal of remark, and of some envy. Indeed, she told me as much herself, with that frankness which was one of her chief attractions.

"Do you know," she asked me one day, "that all Naples sets you down as my devoted slave?"

"All Naples is not very far wrong," I replied, gallantly.

"Apparently not. Does it never strike you that you are treading upon rather dangerous ground?"

I answered that I hoped it was not rude to say I didn't see the danger. "I said just long ago why it was that I could not fall in love with you," I added.

"You are a very confident young man," she returned, laughing. "But, without falling in love with me, you may very easily fall in love with the life that I lead, and find a retreat in buttercups and daisies and cards and what a bore analyzed after it. If that happens, don't blame me."

"I certainly shall not blame you in any case," I declared; "but it will not happen. For one thing, I shall probably never return to the buttercups and daisies for more than a month or two at a time, and, for another thing, I love the country a thousand times better than any town. This sort of thing is very exciting and very good fun, and I like talking to the people whom I meet at your hotel; but it is not for the sake of meeting them that I go there, all the same."

"Is it not? Then may I ask why you do go there every day? If you could give a perfectly truthful answer it might be interesting."

I considered for a moment, and then gave her what I believed to be a perfectly honest answer. "I suppose what you mean to ask is, Why do I consider it such a privilege to be constantly in your society? Well, of course you know that you are very clever, and that you have the gift of making everybody like you, and so on, you are told that scores of times every day. But it seems to me that you are something much more than clever and charming. It seems to me that you care a great deal more for everything that is worth caring for than other people do who make much louder professions. You are always trying to rise above the pettinesses of commonplace life, and indeed you do rise above them, although you live in the midst of them. You give to the poor and say nothing about it; your sympathies are all with the weak and the oppressed and the poor devils who are not of luck. You are just as kind to the ragged patriots who are not over and above civil in return as you are to ambassadors and courtiers. I haven't seen much of the world yet, it is true, but I'm certain that there can't be many people like you in it." I blushed as I concluded my profession of faith, which, to be sure, was a trifle more high-flown in tone than I had intended to make it at starting.

"Dear me!" said Lady Constance, "is that it, is the conception that you have formed of my character? Now see how far my love of truth carries me. I am going to shatter this pleasing vision at a blow. What should you say if I told you that the money which I so generously bestow upon the poor is only a small part of what I make out of the oppressed and ragged patriots?"

"You make money out of them?" I ejaculated, considerably staggered.

"Exactly so. Not out of their purses there would be a material difficulty about that, apart from the immorality of the proceeding. But I have made, and hope to make again, handsome sums out of the information they give me. In point of fact, I gamble on the Bourse and the Stock Exchange. I sometimes hear of impending events a day or more before the rest of the world hears of them, and I profit by my knowledge. Does that shock you?"

Lady Constance was not greatly lowered in my esteem by the above disclosure. I knew nothing of Bourse transactions, but it appeared to me, upon reflection, that this form of gambling was no more reprehensible than getting a good tip about a horse and then backing him, which has never yet been held to be anything but a prudent course of action. Besides, her quarters disarmed censure.

What I did see quite expert, and not might certainly to have expected, from my fascinating friend, was captive. She had no accustomed me to look upon oneself as a necessary participator in all her movements that I was not only astounded, but somewhat offended, when she announced to me in a casual way, at a crowded reception, where I met her one evening, that she intended to leave for Palermo the next day.

"Surely this is a very sudden decision?" I exclaimed.

"I always make my decisions suddenly," she answered, and turned away to talk to some body else.

I was more than half inclined to march off home, asking no further questions, and commending her personally to the devil; but, after all our intimacy, I felt that it would be a melancholy thing if we were to part in that way; and so, later in the evening, I took another opportunity of approaching her. "Is this really to be good-by, then?" I asked, somewhat ruffly.

"Oh," said she, laughing, "we are sure to meet again. People are always turning up. I generally find it much more difficult to avoid my friends than to encounter them."

"I hope you don't want to avoid me?" I said, tentatively, "because the fact is, I was rather thinking of moving on to Palermo myself."

For a moment she turned upon me a look of manifest impatience and displeasure, but it vanished at once. "Yes?" she returned, coldly. "I thought you were going to Rome." And without giving me time to make any reply she took the arm of one of her elderly admirers and left the room.

After this it may be thought that if I had possessed any sense of self-respect whatsoever I should have abandoned all idea of proceeding to Sicily, and such was, indeed, my own view of the matter until the following afternoon, when I went to the Hotel Crocelle to inquire whether Lady Constance had really left, and was informed that she had started that morning, accompanied, among other friends, by a certain Mr. Sotheran, which news caused me to change my mind. For, at the risk of seeming to imply too much, I will confess at once that I was jealous of this Mr. Sotheran. He was a middle-aged man, reputed to be very rich, and known by all who frequented the entertainments at the Hotel Crocelle to be profoundly enamored of their hostess.

Therefore (though the relation of cause to effect in my conduct is not, I admit, very clear), I determined to pursue Lady Constance's party—not immediately, but as soon as I could do so consistently with a due regard to appearances. I remained at Naples for three weeks, feeling more bored than I had ever done in my life before, but at the expiration of that period I felt myself entitled to make a move, and accordingly took passages for my Mentor and myself on board the Palermo steamer.

An angry man was George Warern when I broke the news of our impending departure to him. All his dormant suspicions of Lady Constance revived, and he worked himself up into something as nearly resembling a passion as his sober nature could compass.

I kept my temper, and George, poor fellow, recovered his after a time, and consented to cross the sea with me, perceiving, I suppose, that he could not really do otherwise. It was impossible to make him understand that my feelings for Lady Constance were simply those of friendship, and I pardoned his absurd assertion that she had made me the laughing-stock of Naples, merely remarking that there were more things within the range of human sentiments than were dreamed of in his narrow philosophy.

He had his revenge when we reached our destination. Lady Constance and her friends were seated at Palermo, and occupied the first floor of the very hotel in which we were lodged, but, alas! when I went down-stairs on the day after our arrival to pay my respects, I was received by the imperturbable Antonio with his old inscrutable nonchalance. "Her ladyship does not receive."

I waited for my second reprise. I lolled up the stairs to our room on the third floor, two steps at a time, and indignantly told George what had occurred. "I've had enough of this," I said. "Either I have offended Lady Constance, or else, as you say, she is sick of me. Anyhow, I shall not trouble my head about her any more. Let's be off to Catania."

"What!—without seeing the Cathedral of Monreale or the Palatine Chapel!" exclaimed George. "I am delighted to hear that you have come to your senses, Charley; but, all the same, I wouldn't rush into extreme, if I were you. We may never be in Sicily again, you know."

"Very well," I answered, "go and see your sights, and may they make you happy! I want to get out of this. Come on to Catania when you have done your duty in Murrey, and you will find me there reading hard at Adam Smith."

As luck would have it a coasting steamer was just about to get under way for the ports on the other side of the island. I packed up hastily, went on board of her, and was soon gliding over a glassy sea toward the Straits of Messina. At Catania—a dusty, melancholy town, built upon the hard black lava which poured down upon it from Etna and more than half destroyed it two centuries ago—I spent a couple of solitary days, during which time I am afraid that I reflected more upon the fickleness of women than upon the Wealth of Nations. But on the evening of the third day a most surprising and delightful incident occurred. I was walking pensively down the principal street about the hour of sunset, when I received a smart tap on the shoulder from the handle of a parasol and, turning round, found myself face to face with Lady Constance her self.

"I saw you from a shop on the other side of the road, where Mrs Gilbert and Mr Sotheran are buying hard bargains with a curiosity dealer," she said, "so I thought I would cross and inquire whether you had had a quarrel with Mr Warren, because we left him at Palermo."

"Good heavens!" I exclaimed, in no astonishment, "how do you come to be here?"

"We drove," she answered; "and oh, what a tedious drive it was, to be sure! To-morrow we go on to Syracuse, and the next day we return by way of Taormina and Messina. Don't you want to see Taormina? I can't offer you a seat in our carriage because of Mr Sotheran's legs, which are particularly unmanageable, and have to be packed sideways, but I should think you could easily hire a horse and ride over to meet us."

"Of course I should like it of all things," I answered, with some hesitation, "only—"

"Only what?"

"Well, honestly speaking, I am rather surprised at your wishing for my company. I thought I had been so unlucky as to displease you, or else that I had bored you beyond endurance."

"What can have put such a very strange notion into your head?" said she, talking through a fan, and looking down the street. "There is Mrs Gilbert waving excited signals to me. I suppose she has succeeded in making some hideous purchase. Is it understood, then, that we meet the day after to-morrow?" I shall insist upon starting from Syracuse at break of day, because Mr Sotheran loathes early rising, and you may expect to see us at Taormina by noon or thereabouts. Good-night—a rivederci!"

THE MUNICH INTERNATIONAL ART EXHIBITION.

Of the many art exhibitions for which the year 1883 has been so remarkable—probably the most interesting is the one held in this city. Coming as it does after the others, it has the great advantage of being the recipient of almost all the best works which formed the principal attraction at Rome, Vienna, Amsterdam, Berlin, and Paris. It is especially interesting to American, as from the fact of a separate department being allotted to them. But whether the feeling on the part of Americans who visit our exhibit will be one of unalloyed satisfaction, after passing through the other magnificent halls, is a question. That our show is a meagre one must be confessed, but it is a mere in the right direction, and much praise is due to those who, in the face of so many difficulties, have brought it about, and to the munificence of individuals, without which nothing could have been done. One thing is certain: no one can go through our rooms without being convinced that there are some American artists who reflect honor on their country, whose works, if not strictly of the first rank, approach it closely.

Our department might have been made an epitome of history had it embraced examples of early French and Spanish experience, colonial and Puritan life, or the Dutch company of New York; those subjects would have been of general interest to all Europeans, and their want is generally commented upon. Suppose the case of an ordinary chance visitor to our department. He comes to the portal, and sees over it the word "America." "Ah!" he says to himself, or perhaps to his frau, "now we will see something new, that young, fresh country, full of pulsing life, must certainly produce something worth seeing." He passes in, and rubs his eyes in amazement; he must have made a mistake, and got into some alcove or side hall of some of the other departments, for he sees nothing, generally speaking, but reflexes of Continental schools. The familiar faces of peasants confront him, incidents of German life, French landscapes exude from English harbor and romance, Holland scenes, etc., and among them all a few, a very few, distinctively American paintings, which in conception and execution are in the right direction. Much of this puzzling condition of our exhibit is due to the fact that the work of American artists residing abroad is stronger than, and to a certain extent overshadows, the rest, and gives to the entire collection the essentially foreign tone alluded to. Those who are studying, of course, have the excuse that they must paint what they have about them, and what their teachers feel themselves competent to criticise; but the men whose reputation is already established, who can pick and choose what they wish, should not so completely ignore the claims of their birth-place for some recognition; in fact, they should be chiefly instrumental in leading younger effort into new fields, and not divert it, as they are doing at present, into beaten tracks. Any foreigner would have greatly preferred to have seen Mr Bridgman's studies of Indian subjects than of Arab life, his great ability would here much the one as picturesque and attractive as the other, while his work would have had the additional charm of being original and not hackneyed. While English history and literature are, as it were, a part of our own, yet if Mr Neal and Mr Rosenthal had displayed the same grasp and conscientious study in conceptions more purely American their paintings would have added greatly to the representative character of our exhibit; as it is, they add greatly to its honor and the general estimate of its merit.

Mr Rosenthal's picture is the largest and most important work in our department; it represents the scene in "Marmion" where the recreant nun is brought before a synod of nuns and friars for sentence and imprisonment. Though Mr Rosenthal's forte is more particularly simple and pathetic subjects, he has in this case produced a large composition full of dramatic force and power. The conception of the subject, the arrangement of light and shade, the way the great difficulties of such a picture are overcome, all indicate fine imagination and great artistic ability. Fault, however, may be found with the blackness of the shadows, and the want of that gray, mysterious quality which adds so much to the beauty of Israel's pictures, and with the rather conventional setting of the faces.

Mr Neal's contributions, though smaller in size, about divides the honors with Mr Rosenthal's painting. The title, "Oliver Cromwell visits John Milton of Eis," explains to a certain extent the action or idea of the work, though not wholly, for Cromwell, coming in unperceived, stops to listen to Milton, who is playing the organ in an alcove concealed from Cromwell's view. The intent listening attitude of Cromwell is admirably expressed, and there is, besides, a great deal of rugged strength and character to the face and figure: the contrasting figure of the poetic Milton is also conceived with delicacy and refinement. Altogether it is a work of originality and excellence, the color especially being exceedingly good.

Other work on the way of portraiture also stands out conspicuously, especially the counterpoints of Mr Chase, Mr Wier, and Mr. Beckwith of the productions mentioned. Mr Chase's portrait of Mr Darneck (painted before the artist left Munich) is a very fine specimen of tone effect in color. This work would of itself be sufficient to establish Mr Chase's reputation in any community of artists. Mr Wier's portrait of Professor Wier is a strong, excellent piece of work, and evinces marked improvement over his head of a peasant girl, which is evidently an earlier effort, however, with the portrait the fault must be found that it is too sketchy, and not studied with sufficient care, in comparison with the portraits of Professor Casson, of Vienna, it looks like the commencement of a powerful composition, and one regrets it is not carried further.

In landscapes several fine examples present themselves. Mr Quartley's marine is a fresh, vigorous, thoroughly American picture, fit to rank with any work of a like nature in the entire Exhibition. Mr Quartley is to be heartily congratulated for having so well sustained the honor of his country. Mr Inness's landscape with cattle is also the production of a ripe artist, it has greens more on true to nature in his drawing of animals and trees and the general composition of the peaceful scene submitted, it would match with greater admiration than it at present excites. When a landscape of this description is compared with the cattle pictures of Hermann Baisch, it fails in strength and out-door effect. Mr Fisher's "Spring" represents an orchard decked with blossoms, a few graceful trees forms rising above the general outline, in the foreground cattle and sheep. This landscape is thoroughly studied and admirably painted, though a trifle heavy.

The black and white collection can not be too highly commended, the artists being remarkably excellent in originality, imagination, and all those qualities which make such work interesting and valuable. Among so many almost perfect in their way and peculiar style it is hard to discriminate. The wood-cuts are simply unsurpassable, and the illustrated books exhibited in taste and execution can not be surpassed by anything on this side of the water.

LOVE'S SWEET RED ROSE.

No wind that blows can ever harm
Love's sweet red rose.
The north wind will not it molest,
The south wind roche it on its breast,
And east or west all winds are best.
Love's sweet red rose
From every wind receives some charm,
Takes richer scent, or tint more warm,
And fairer grows.

No frost love's splendid flower can blight,
No cold can kill,
Its roots are far away from here,
Deep in the heart all safe and warm—
The tender heart that has a charm
For every ill.
And to the flower in crimson bright,
And sweetest perfume day and night
The rose leaves fill.

No storm that blows can hurt the rose—
The rose love plants.
If skies be black and overcast,
It bravely stands through rain and blast,
And fairer shows when storms are past.
The rose love plants
Through every tempest stronger grows,
In coldest seasons sweetly blows,
And perfume grants.

Thus plant the tiny crimson bloom
Of love's sweet rose.
If skies are blue, if tempests lower,
'Twill sweeter be from hour to hour.
Till life and love are but one flower
That grows, and grows,
Deep in the heart's most tender gloom,
Till all is lovely and perfume
With love's sweet rose.

A DISH OF NUTS.

I.—IN WHICH THE NUTS ARE REMEMBERED.

"The train must be late."

"Trains always appear to be late to impatient lovers."

"Am I so impatient a lover, then?"

"You know best."

"I know nothing, except—"

"Except what?"

"That it is five o'clock, and the pony may bolt when he hears the shriek of the locomotive."

"Good gracious, Iris! Let me get down."

Iris laughed, and Mrs. Bemrose descended to the ground with all the haste possible to her middle-aged ankles.

"You do not mind my waiting on the platform for the dear boy instead?" she inquired, with one of her vague glances around, while rearranging her mourning garments of widowhood on her plump person.

"Not in the least," rejoined Iris, in reckless mood. "If the pony leaps a ditch or a louse at sight of the train, we will go together."

"Iris, how can you say such wild and horrible things! I will get a man to stand beside the phaeton."

Then Mrs. Bemrose gained the platform, her gait a saddle peculiar to fat ladies, and she forgot to summon "a man" in conversation with a neighbor.

The girl remained alone in the phaeton, a smile on her lips, and a curious sensation of pain in her heart. She looked straight before her at the pony's ears, which were pricked nervously from time to time, and she thought, "I wonder what he would do if we had an upset?" The person thus referred to was Mr. Cowper Debenham, now expected by the train.

A modern railway station is not an effective frame for a heroine, but such romance as is possible to the situation became centred in Iris Gordon by common consent of the manufacturing town where she had been born and still lived. She expected Cowper Debenham, to whom she had been engaged for two years.

"How cool she looks!" I should be all in a flutter," thought the young person in the telegraph office, envious of the phaeton, and keenly observant of the trimming on Miss Gordon's hat, while rebelling at Fate.

"Her beau's comin' home, Tommy, mother says," piped a small boy, kicking his bare feet on the platform with a recreant companion.

"My eye! I should like to scare her beau," retorted Tommy, meditatively.

Mr. Mulcahy lounged over the fence of an adjoining coal-yard, swarthy and grim, a short pipe between his teeth, and paid his tribute to beauty with unusual gallantry.

"She's a fine lump of a girl, anyhow," he soliloquized.

All the world is a stage, and Iris then received her meed of criticism from her little public.

Then the train arrived, the pony shivered but stood firm, and Cowper Debenham appeared, tall, slender, elegant, in a commonplace throng.

"How are you, Iris?"

"Welcome home, Cowper."

Such was the public greeting of tim lovers. A wave of bright color overspread the girl's face, but her words were few, and none of the flutter considered indispensable to the occasion by the youthful person of the telegraph office was perceptible in her manner. The effusive animation of Mrs. Bemrose overwhelmed all minor phases of reticence and embarrassment.

"I must tell them about my luggage," said Cowper, slowly, and with a languid intonation.

"Bless me! are you not well?" cried Mrs. Bemrose.

"He looks pale and thin, Iris."

"Thanks, I am perfectly well," replied the young man, with a faint little laugh. "Rather bored away from home, you know, and a trifle used up with the club life of Paris and London."

"Naughty boy!" exclaimed Mrs. Bemrose, admiringly.

Iris bit her lip and remained silent. The ladies waited while Cowper strolled back along the crowded platform to give those orders concerning his luggage of which he had made mention. To accomplish this duty he was obliged to fit an eyeglass into one eye, which he did with a dexterity revealing long practice, and to unbend toward the porter, who consented to carry the boxes and portmanteaus of the traveller on a hand-cart, after some deliberation.

"I don't mind dow' is to oblige ye, Cowper," said this friendly native, extending a brown hand in greeting. "I guess Iris is mighty glad to see ye back hom again, she's been lookin' kinder down and peaked lately."

Cowper winced, and withdrew his white fingers from the warm grasp of the railway functionary, with some unmerited acknowledgment.

"I wonder if we shall ever understand distinctions of class in America?" he muttered.

The town took keen note of him meanwhile.

"Well, I declare!" said the young person in the telegraph office, thrusting her head through the window to inspect him.

"Hooray!" cried the small boys, with juvenile instinct of enthusiasm and derision blended.

Mr. Mulcahy removed the pipe from his lips, and unable to recognize any reason why a cat may not look at a king, ejaculated, with Celtic humor, a single word—"Redial!"

The train rushed on once more, the phaeton disappeared along the village street, and Gordonville resumed its usual avocations.

Cowper had returned home after his second European tour. That was the note rung through many changes on this eventful day; even the pony's hoofs, trotting soberly homeward, were in unison with the cadence humming in the ears of his young mistress. Cowper had been intensely English on the first occasion, while a few moments in his company now revealed a fine flavor of the Boulevards, the Champs Elysées, and the Bois de Boulogne. The month was June, the meadows were green, and the warm breeze was perfumed by the wild flowers of the hill-side, while the two rows of elm-trees shading the main street, pride of Gordonville, wore a first delicate foliage of early summer. Iris assisted recognition of familiar objects, but none came.

"You drive well," said Cowper, in his languid accents. "Why do we turn to the right instead of to the left? The English always turn to the left, while the Continental races choose the right. Now we are of English descent."

Iris laughed, but her gray eyes grew dim beneath their long and silky lashes.

"Have you forgotten the factory, Cowper?" she inquired, with a certain sharpness in her tone, and indicating a long building with her whip.

"As if we could ever forget it!" retorted Cowper, peevishly, and with undeniable ingratitude, since all the money in his purse had been gleaned from this ignoble source.

He again fitted the glass in his eye, and answered the building with the cool and studied disapproval which was his usual expression, especially in his native land. He belonged to the class of young men which in the fine flower of the century, and may be designated as without nationality, cultivating ennui as a mood, vacuity on an expression, and a general uselessness in existing at all as a profession. Irascible elders are wont to classify this golden youth as "snips," when not resorting to stronger terms of comparison. In the present case the factory stared back at Cowper Debenham with clang of machinery, sharp peal of bells, puffs of steam from pipes, and rows of twinkling little windows, as if rejoicing like a giant in strength and vitality, and with an odor of hot oil inseparable from its activity. Clearly the factory, where were fashioned axes and ploughs, had the best of it on the peaceful June day, for Cowper Debenham could not have existed without it, while the great hive of industry would have hummed and throbbed on just the same without him. Lofty contempt is perceptible in the golden youth returning home to Rowen, to England and Ireland, to Italy, and even to America from foreign parts. The Frenchman alone expands in his beloved Paris, centre of the universe, after exile in other lands, where the pretty French actress pines with hunger on Regent Street, scorning roast beef, according to sympathetic critics, and the Gallic tenor laments his favorite dishes, in the columns of Figaro, in such howling wilderneeses as New York. Cowper Debenham bore such a fresh impress of his breed, as to speak, that Mrs. Bemrose was awed into comparative silence, and Iris found herself indisposed to harmless prattle.

"Where is John?" demanded the new arrival, at the gate.

Why did Iris manifest sudden interest in giving her pony sugar from her pocket?

"John should be here," replied Mrs. Bemrose. "He is such a busy fellow, you know. Iris will make one of her famous strawberry short-cakes for your supper, dear boy."

"Iris is very kind," said Cowper, slowly. "You dine early, of course. I have been dining at eight o'clock recently."

"Eight o'clock in the evening!" cried Mrs. Bemrose.

"Yes, that is rather late," admitted Cowper. "Half past seven is a better hour for the theatre and opera, the Prince of Wales intends to adopt it."

Mrs. Bemrose was stupefied. As for Iris, a sensation of cold pervaded her frame, like the sudden breath of an autumn wind.

"What is that—thing?" exclaimed Cowper, pausing on the gravel path.

Iris raised her head defiantly.

"My fountain, designed by a Gordonville genius, and John had it placed here for me. Is it not pretty—the Cupid holding a shell for the falling water?"

Cowper raised his eyebrows and shoulders.

"A pink monster, a fat baby, my dear Iris. What a horror to have under one's eyes! I rejoice that my rooms are on the other side of the house."

"You must not abuse my Cupid," said Iris, quickly.

"What nonsense are you talking, O returned traveller?" said a clear voice. "The fountain is a very pretty thing. You could not design so good in save your life."

Such was the greeting of John Cleaver, easy, natural, and not devoid of a certain grace of manner, although the speaker wore the striped shirt of a mechanic. Iris darted an oblique glance expressive of dissatisfaction at John's attire. Surely he had brought himself nearer the level of the "hands" than usual, on the day of Cowper's return, in the matter of heavy boots, striped shirt, and black cravat knotted loosely about a massive throat. There was no element of the fine gentleman in him.

"You should have been at the depot," she said, petulantly.

"I could not leave work," he retorted, stiffly.

A close observer might have detected that the eyes of these two met like the swift crossing of weapons. Warmth of liking for a school mate and bosom-friend dawned on Cowper's neutral face.

"How are you, John? Shall we embrace in the German fashion, or rush into each other's arms like Frenchmen?"

"Much obliged, old fellow. I should hate to be hissed—by a man."

"Ely dog!" laughed Cowper.

"Besides, I have not travelled," added John, with a touch of irony in his tone.

"Why do you not travel?"

"I have not the time, and would rather save the money," said John, coolly.

Cowper shrugged his shoulders, and entered the house. He had studied the gesture before the glass. "You always were an incomprehensible fellow, John."

"Commonplace is the term," echoed John, steadily.

Greetings of welcome were over at last. Mrs. Bemrose, Iris Gordon, Cowper Debenham, and John Cleaver had dwelt beneath the same roof in harmony for many years, linked together by circumstances, while claiming no mutual relationship. Their history was not devoid of interest, at least to Gordonville and the surrounding country. Each new comer learned it speedily. The fathers of Iris and Cowper respectively had met on an emigrant ship outward-bound from Liverpool—two shabby young men, with a few shillings in their pockets, and heads full of intelligence. Chance had thrown them together, and mutual sympathy cemented a life long friendship, taking the form of partnership. Gordonville, the busy factory, the large house, built of wood, with a wide piazza in front, were the results of their industry. Henry Gordon and Thomas Debenham bed not lifted their eyes above axes and ploughs in their day, and glad enough they were to be able to fashion them. Cowper wore Poole coats and Paris boots in his time, while Iris had a phaeton, a grand piano, and had learned French at a fashionable boarding school. The wheel of fortune had turned a trifle for these young people in the muscular grasp of their seniors. Both parents had married, and lost their wives. When the cashier, Mrs. Bemrose's husband, was crushed in the fall of the machinery, the widow had become an inmate of the Gordon house, and was given an interest in the manufactory which had so cruelly despoiled her. When John Cleaver's father, the manager, died, he said, "Let my savings remain invested in the business until John is a man, and can choose for himself." The partners had remained, and John joined the family circle. The years had swept away Henry Gordon and Thomas Debenham even as the night wind swept the leaves which fell from the maple-trees planted by their own hands before the door. Faithful to each other in the firm tenacity of an upright and honorable manhood, they had achieved that their kingdom should remain undivided in the marriage of their children. The arrogance of prosperity had characterized their projects.

"We shall never be moved, nor name will endure," they had reasoned, brooding over the fire, two hale old men and the night wind, death, had swept them away. The youth and maiden loved each other, and when the terms of his father's will were fulfilled, in education and foreign travel, Cowper Debenham, whose mother had been an invalid, fond of writing verses, was to become the head of the house, with Iris as his wife.

Mrs. Bemrose presided at the supper table, wearing her best cap, which imparted to her head a curious resemblance to a cauliflower, and surveyed her young companions with maternal benevolence. Mrs. Bemrose, by nature huge, had already evinced extraordinary aptitude in getting all Cowper's descriptions wrong, and hopelessly muddling facts. Opposite sat Iris, slim, erect, her cheeks flushed in proportion as the strawberry short-cake before her had acquired a brown and crisp aspect. She was a girl of nineteen, whose gray eyes, lustrous black hair, and mobile features had gained her readily the reputation of being the beauty of the region. Heiress, leading lady of Gordonville, high-spirited and impulsive, Iris was seldom characterized by that somewhat vague term, "a sweet creature." She wore a white dress and a crimson rose in her corsage. A diamond engagement ring flashed on her well-shaped hand. Cowper sat on the right, tall, slender, pale, with features of a beautiful regularity, save for the defect of small eyes placed too near the bridge of the nose, and a thin voice with languid intonations, which penetrated a listener's ear like steel. On the left was John Cleaver, a square-set young man with a good head, a close-cut brown beard, and a pair of hazel eyes, keen, brilliant, and frank in expression. Mrs. Bemrose placidly contemplated this trio as she poured the tea and ate the short-cake.

"Lucky young people to have such a home," she meditated, little realizing that the hour of each rebelled at the chain which held them.

The room was low, dark, and old-fashioned, the stiff portrait of Thomas Debenham on one wall confronted a stiff portrait of Henry Gordon on the other, a tall clock ticked in one corner, the house cat purred, with a bland expression of countenance, and surveyed the table. The open windows admitted the summer breeze, perfumed by the roses of the garden, and a ray of the setting sun gilded the brass ship on the clock.

The luggage of the traveller afforded much excitement as a Christmas stocking hung on the chimney in anticipation of the gracious visit of Santa Claus. Cowper had brought with the large profundity of a tourist no fresh facts. There were scientific books for John Cleaver, a shawl of Roman silk for Mrs. Bemrose, unutterable trinkets for Iris; pictures, statuettes, bronzes and mosaics for himself. Cowper opened with especial tenderness a case of steel and enamel, of eccentric design, representing spiders, beetles, crabs, hammers, nose climbing ladders, and flies—a harvest gleaned in the shop windows of Paris, Geneva, and Milan.

"Here is a blue jersey for Iris," said Cowper. "I shall be glad to see you dressed a little more like English girls."

"That is cutting humble-pie indeed, if American women are to learn to dress from their English sisters," retorted Iris. "The Jersey is a charming garment—according to Mr Punch—to be sure, at Cowper! I shall have dreadfully short waist, on this model, you know, and wear a sailor cap, and shoes many sizes too large."

"Iris can not be improved," said John Cleaver impatiently.

"Foreign fashions are always wicening," murmured Mrs. Bemrose.

"Yes," assented Cowper. "Our own men do not put on a hat wrong side foremost just because it comes from Paris. I have taken the liberty of ordering a costume for Iris on the Rue de la Paix."

"The toilet of a true Parisienne, quiet and elegant, or an eccentric dress adapted for equestrian?" inquired Iris, mockingly. "Who can make a Viennese, a fashionable lady of Berlin, or Italian, of one?"

"Impossible. There is a finish about these women which can have not yet attained," answered Cowper, piqued by banter.

Iris went to the piano, and soon her sweet voice was heard singing the old ballad,

"Do you know the truth up in heaven, Dogie'- Dogies, tender and true."

John Cleaver stood in the window listening. The moon was full, and made long shadows on the grass.

"The last time I heard 'Dogies,' it was sung by the famous Lady Scrapence—amateur concert for charity at the Albert Hall, and all that," said Cowper.

Iris left the piano abruptly; her fingers had struck discords.

"I have news for you, Iris. The railroad is completed, and another territory opened in the world. My friend Hampton proposes to give a town to the line my name, and I have decided to christen the infant city in the wilderness Gordonville." John was speaking in the window.

Iris was interested. Cowper was no recent admirer. Mrs. Bemrose on account of dimes, and the means whereby one may degree American individuality as much as possible.

"I intend to go out there, Iris. Why not? I do not wish to remain here—always."

"Going away to live, John?" Iris crossed forward, and a cloud seemed to pass before her eyes.

John's arm caught and drew her to him. Surely, in the magic moonlight which rendered the girl as fair and the young man as noble as his profound emotion, their faces touched.

"When shall we learn to call a parlor a drawing-room?" said Cowper, in the background. "The parlor is a room back of a shop, where pilots were sans remorse visitors in company."

An hour later the house was silent. Cowper yawned in his chamber and soliloquized.

"How dull life is here! Of course I am fond of Iris, but I think she had the style of Iris Welch. Heigh-ho!"

Then he slept the sleep of a bored man who is comfortable while rendering others unhappy. Iris sat at her own window for hours, lost in thought. John Cleaver plunged into the woods and rambled about until sunrise.

A month elapsed, during which Cowper made the family uncomfortable by comparisons, criticisms, and improvements. Iris, belle of Gordonville, was forced to tread the red-hot ploughshares of perpetual suggestions in manner, dress, and tone of speech. Cowper found John's ways of rustic ease, and John in turn was hurt by Cowper's change of bearing. Like George Eliot's hero, Cowper's mind "was furnished as lodgings are, with everything for occasional and transient use," and a European tour had included on only Gordonville, but the whole American continent.

"Shall we ever come to oblige ourselves with ice water?" he mused at the breakfast table one morning. "I wish you would not eat hot cakes, Iris. I fancy your complexion suffers."

The girl's eyes flashed. She went to the bookcase and took down a volume. Cowper laughed softly. One would have inferred that he enjoyed irritating another, such was his own discomfort.

"What book have you there?" he drawled.

"Edmond About's Maître Pierre."

"Ah, and what interests you in it?"

"A dish of nuts," said Iris.

II.—IN WHICH THE NUTS ARE PRESENTED.

Two young men crossed the meadow, with guns over their shoulders, in pursuit of squirrels. October sunshine bathed the land, and October frosts had scared the foliage. Iris, carrying a feather dinner, sought Cowper's apartment, where Mrs. Bemrose permitted no clumsy menial to enter. On the threshold she paused and blushed vividly. John Cleaver's Spartan chamber, with its books, riding whips, and guns, should be first arranged, she decided. John was soon to leave home. This duty fulfilled, she returned to the sybaritic retreat of Cowper, hung with blue silk curtains, redolent of perfume sachets, and crowded with exquisite trifles. A Turkish dressing gown was thrown carelessly over a chair, and the contents of a pocket had fallen on the floor. Iris stooped and picked up an envelope, from which the letter had slid out, and a photograph. The written page, of recent date, clearly verged on a love-letter, while the photograph, taken by electric light, was the portrait of a young lady in a ball dress worthy of Worth.

"Lydia Welch," Iris read. Surprise, humiliation, rage, and a great joy filled her soul.

That night the moon was again full. Iris had been undisposed all day. At nine o'clock a radiant form dawned upon the young men, smoking on the piazza in the moonlight, and dazzled them. Iris stood there, clad in a white silk and lace, pearls in her ears and hair—quaint ornaments worn by her mother at her own bridal.

"A whim," she explained, airily. "It is my birthday, you know, and I have prepared a little supper. Come."

Cowper, spurred to gallantry by her brilliant beauty, kissed her hand. John Cleaver turned away his head in silence.

In the dining-room a true feast was spread—salad, sandwiches, cakes, fruit, and ice-cream. A large covered dish, like a soup tureen, occupied the centre. Candles in candelabra not only lighted the delicacies prepared, but illuminated the face and graceful form of the hostess.

"I am to serve everybody, and the dish in the centre must remain covered until the last," said Iris, gayly.

Mrs. Bemrose and Cowper ate their salad placidly. John Cleaver, pale as the lips, watched Iris, detecting feverish unrest beneath assumed hilarity.

"Cowper approves of foreign customs," said Iris. "There is one I greatly admire. Yes, I found it described in Edmond About's Maître Pierre. Listen. In the Landes a suitor protests himself before the peasant girl he wishes to marry. Her parents understand the object of his visit without any lukewarm discussions about marriage settlements and a mutual adoration. He does not criticise the bride-elect, nor seek to remodel her on the pattern of the women of other countries, because he finds her perfect. There is reason to believe he never alludes to Paris toilets and the manners of London society. The suitor and his friends are politely received, and invited to remain to supper. The bride-elect has the right to place a covered dish in the centre of the table. At the close of supper she reveals the contents to all the world. If the dish contains nuts, and she offers them to the suitor, she rejects him, and he departs. What a charming form of congé, giving the mitten! All explanations are avoided. You are right, Cowper; some foreign fashions are worthy of imitation."

Iris uncovered the dish in the middle of the table. It was filled with nuts. A sudden stillness pervaded the room.

"Cowper, I offer you some nuts, after the custom of Les Landes," she said, and her face grew cold, severe.

Cowper stared in stupefaction. Iris heaped his plate with the nuts by a quick movement.

"My dear girl, I do not wish it," he finally expostulated.

"But I wish it!" she retorted, imperiously.

"You mean to throw me over, Iris?"

"Now you are a mere commonplace American, Cowper. I offer you a dish of nuts in the fashion of Les Landes."

Cowper reddened; he understood even in his bewilderment. "Our parents desired our marriage," said he.

"Our parents did not require us to be unhappy. Marry Lydia Welch, whose photograph and letter, dated last week, I found on the floor in your room this morning."

She would not have me," he exclaimed. "She is a tremendous heiress and an awful coquette. I travelled with her party. You are jealous, that is all. I much prefer you."

"Thank you," said Iris, haughtily.

Mrs. Bemrose sat blinking like an owl in direct consternation. John had escaped by the window. Half an hour later a white-robed form glided to his side, and a tender face looked up into his.

"Was the farce well played? Cowper was even unfaithful to me; but I forgive him because—"

"In Heaven's name, what does it all mean?" cried John, hoarse with passion and doubt.

"Are you going alone to the infate city in the wilderness, John?" she whispered, tremulously.

"Will you go with her"—share my fate? Oh, my love, what have I done to deserve such joy? Now I know why you were named Iris in your cradle," replied the young man, in a vibrating tone, full of tenderness.

Mrs. Bemrose and Cowper appeared in the open doorway.

"Dear friends, we have decided to desert the old nest, and found a new Gordonville in the far West," said Iris, placing her hand within the arm of John Cleaver, and always with that tinge of mockery in her voice. "We were made for pioneers, and not to adorn society, perhaps."

A flood of exclamations, questions, and tears on the part of Mrs Bemrose. A hand-shake, intended to be magnanimous, on the part of Cowper Debenham, who felt the breath of that cold night wind which had chilled the heart of Iris Gordon on the day of his return home, and earlier had swept the parents away. What was the latest wrought by Thomas Debenham and Henry Gordon but a rope of sand, after all? Mrs. Bemrose, shorn lamb, otherwise comfortable widow, alone beheld the solace of the situation as guardian of the old house in the future.

THE BOSTON FOREIGN EXHIBITION.

SOME OF THE ART OBJECTS.

The Benaparte Sarcophagus.—The Etruscan sarcophagus is eight feet long by four wide and four high, and is made of the rare and costly material, Oriental alabaster, with also-relievos on the ends and sides, and two full-length recumbent figures on the cover—husband and wife embracing each other in the still sleep of death. The sides represent battle scenes, one being a fight between Amazons and male warriors, which I trust is an allusion to any domestic strife of the married couple now reposing in such affectionate embrace on top, forming a souvenir of domestic happiness, which is the greatest of human blessings in any age. They had died, probably about the same period, in the full maturity of years, and there they still be, after their rest of twenty-five centuries, more or less, unobserved of any outer world, regarding each other with steadfast love and a look of vitality that prompts the spectator to gently waken them and ask for the story of their lives. If the alabaster tell the truth, it would prove an edifying tale, doubtless, for husbands and wives of every race and age, confirming the sculptor's motive as admirably rendered, and proving the kinship of all humanity by a touch of nature's eternal truth.

The sculpture is of the Graco-Etruscan order, of the period when there was a combination of the elements of both styles of art. What can be the meaning of the griffins and lions rearing to pieces a bull at each end, with Etruscan inscriptions over and at the sides of the griffins, it is more conjecture to try to interpret, but probably has some reference to incidents in the life of the Lars, or lord, whose riches, or the gratitude of fellow-citizens for services rendered, enabled him to be buried with his wife in so magnificent a sarcophagus.

The other sarcophagus is of the highest and purest order of native Etruscan art, of perhaps greater antiquity than the other, on side only and the ends and top being richly sculptured. The procession of figures of both sexes, with the central couple in the prime of life grasping hands, would seem to indicate the contemporary departure of a distinguished citizen and his wife for the bourn world by sudden death, and their attendants with chant and music bearing to the tomb the usual furniture, provisions, and gifts for those left in their new home. On the cover of the sarcophagus, which unfortunately is commencing was broken in two, is more graceful and equally loving attitude as the other, intensely gazing into each other's eyes, we see the effigies of those whose bodies long ago moldered into dust within the sarcophagus.

"Love's First Dream," a Group in Carrara Marble by the late Edward Thatter, of Portland, Maine.—This work was modelled in clay in Florence in 1880 by the author, and executed after his death by Italian workmen in a remarkably pure block of marble. It represents the first dream of love of a young maiden—a true subject in itself, but on treated as to be fresh and interesting, from the gracefulness of the pose, the delicacy fancy of the thought, the purity of its sentiment, finesse of modelling, and, above all, from its perfect sympathy with the taste and feeling of our own time in sculpture. About it there is the hazed atmosphere of the natural world of today, refined and made poetical, genuinely human, yet carrying with it enough of the æsthetic symbolism of classical art to make clear at first glance its exceptional loveliness of form and idea. A young girl just budding into ripe womanhood, of that delicate type and conformation that distinguish America above all other countries, with closed dreamy eyes, and limbs relaxed in gentle slumber, is having her first sensations of love's bewitching power, unconscious whence they come. She is slowly rising and floating like a bubble upward from a bed of roses, which unseenly cling to her soaring form and partially hide one foot, her lovely head bent forward and downward, encircled by her graceful arms, which form a frame-work for it, like a bird's nest in a sheltered niche, with her rich tresses, agitated by the upward motion, tossing and rippling over her virgin breast and shoulders. Resting on the back of his head in a perfect sprite of a baby Cupid, with shrewdness, brightest features, in which innocence and mischief are equally intanced, and sparkling joy predominating. He has entangled his prey to the meshes of his net, which drapes itself like a running stream around her exquisite form, and with one hand lifting up the end of the net, and the other dimpled arm pressing it to his breast, he is soaring up, up, to the visionary land of fanced mortal bliss. The lines and gradations of curves are skillfully felt and carried out, producing an undulating, ascending action, alive with sensuous repose, as the girl, intoxicated with sweet contents, mounts upward, drawn by the irresistible beguiling power of the pretty sprite of Venus. As a work of art of our own school it is of highest excellence in its line of facts and makes us regret profoundly the sudden extinction of a youthful genius—for Mr THAYER was only twenty-four when he died—which had so much promise for his reputation. Mr T. was then thinking out a companion group to represent the reverse of this motive—the catching of Cupid by a wide-awake maiden and imprisoning him in his own devices. Italy has sent the Boston Exhibition some creditable native sculpture of a similar character, as, for instance, BARCAGLIA'S "Love Blindeth," and the Girl and Butterfly; but there do not quite come up to THAYER'S work, although very spirited and beautiful.

Bronze Bust of Cicero, Life Size, Mounted on Antique Porphyritic Marble.—This portrait of the great Roman orator, which is vigorously and broadly modelled, seemingly after nature, comes from a noble family in North Italy, who kept it in a niche in their villa near Chiari from a remote time. Nothing more is definitely known of its history, and opinions of experts are divided as to its date. Some, including the eminent sculptor ARNAUD, of Florence, and Professor CAVE, Inspector of the Uffizi Gallery, consider it to be "sculpture della migliore epoca Romana," which, if correct, would make it contemporary with CICERO himself. Others believe it to be the work of some distinguished sculptor of the fifteenth century. All agree, however, in pronouncing it to be a genuine powerful likeness of CICERO, worthy of the best Roman period.

Especially worthy of mention was a German hunting cup in silver, partially gilt, of the seventeenth or eighteenth century style of workmanship, elegant and graceful in form, and a specimen of Italian tool book-binding of the best Renaissance period, in red morocco and gold—a very beautiful specimen of an art much in repute among book collectors.

JAMES JACKSON JARVES.

CANOEING AMONG THE KANUCKS.

Among the middle of last month the steamer Norwester carried a novel cargo across Lake Ontario from Charlotte, at the mouth of the Genesee River, to Port Hope, in Canada. It was a cargo of canoes and their paraphernalia, canoeists, and an infinite variety of camp equipage, all consigned to Stony Lake, in the province of Ontario, Canada. A journey of several hours by rail directly north from Port Hope, and a short cruise of fifteen miles across the island-dotted waters of Stony Lake, brought the canoeists to the bold, rocky, and forest-crowned promontory that had been selected as the scene of the Fourth Annual Encampment of the American Canoe Association. White tents, already erected, gleamed among the trees, and high above them floated the blood red flag of Great Britain and the Stars and Stripes side by side. A little higher than either of these waved the banner of the association, a triangular burgee of three bars, red, white, and red, bearing the letters A. C. A.

Soon after the arrival of the Americans from the south side of Lake Ontario new clusters of snowy tents dotted the rugged promontory, and many more bits of gay bunting were fluttering in the evening breeze. Among them was the red, white, and red flag of the New York, the oldest of the canoe clubs; the crimson field and blue diamond of the Knickerbockers, the great blue banner, bearing the word "Mohican" in white letters, of the Albany men; the single white star on a red and blue field of the Springfield (Massachusetts) Club, the colors of the L. G. C. C., blue as the waters of their own Lake George; the flags of the Philadelphia, Rochester, and Saratoga clubs, and many other club and private signals, contrasting vividly with the white tents, the blue waters of the lake, and the dark green of the forest, and forming a brilliant combination of colors such as has been unknown in the Canadian wilderness since when, more than a century ago, it was traversed by the gayly caparisoned troops of France and England.

As the shades of evening fell, camp fires blazed from every island and jutting point as far as the eye could see, and rest their long tremulous reflections of ruddy light across the dark waters; for the great A. C. A. camp was the centre of attraction for many smaller groups, of from one to half a dozen tents, in which whole families and scores of invited guests were making merry holiday. After supper the sounds of music were borne on the heavy night air from the several camps, and soon twinkling lights of many colors began to dart back and forth among the islands and across the bosom of the lake.

For a paddling race there is certainly very little to be done after the long days of practice, that have hardened the muscles to the consistency of steel, and given their owner the wind of a pair of bellows, have passed; but for a sailing race the preparations seem never to be completed, or, matter how much time is allowed. No sailing in the world is so delicate, nor requires such a quick eye, perfect self-control, and good judgment, as that of a canoe. The little craft, of two feet and a half beam, and perhaps nine or ten inches depth of hold, often carries a hundred feet of canvas in her mainsail and half as much more in her mizzen. To give her stability under this great spread of sail, she must be ballasted by a hundred or more pounds of shot in twenty five pound bags. In coming about, if this weight is not instantly shifted to the other side to the mainsail swings over, a capsize is certain. The crew, who must attend to the steering, the sheets and halyards, the shifting of ballast, the reefing of sails when this becomes necessary, and many other details of sailing which occur during a race, is like the famous crew of the "Nancy, brig," and is swamped of how one man. In a blow it often occurs that he must brace his feet under the lee cunnings and throw the whole weight of his body outside of his boat to windward to aid his ballast in keeping her right side up. At the same time he must steer and trim sheets, with spray in clouds flying over him and drenching him to the skin. If at such a critical moment a sheet or halyard, or his steering gear or almost any bit of his rigging, should part, he would probably capsize, and at any rate stand a good chance of losing his race. Therefore it behooves him to know his boat and her capabilities thoroughly before entering the race, to shift her sails until they exactly balance and she will almost steer herself, to know to an ounce how much ballast she needs, to have every rope in the most convenient possible position, and to test every inch of his spars and rigging. No species of sailing craft so shares the personality of its owner as the canoe. Timidity and want of practice, or lack of confidence in his boat, are shown by the frequent taking in and shaking out of reefs, repeated luffings, and on nearer shifting of the owner's position with every movement of the canoe. The bold and skilful canoeist, on the other hand, makes up his mind before starting what sail his boat can stand during each particular race, directs her course with unerring certainty from point to point, and marvelous from start to finish the position that experience has taught him is most likely to insure her safety.

A beautiful example of this complete sympathy between canoe and master was shown in the first sailing race of the regatta, which was managed admirably by the Scalp, of the Mohican Club, of Albany. She is a new and very beautiful boat, and differed in rig from all others in the must by carrying a jib in addition to two lateen sails. It was not her jib, however, nor her lines, that won for her this as well as several other races, but the superb manner in which she was handled. At the finish of the first race, which moment our artist has happily illustrated on page 564, she was headed over before a beam wind that blew half a canoe gale, carrying everything that could be crowded on her. Her master, lying far out to windward, refused to yield an inch to the main sheet that tugged and strained in his hand, and she rounded the home stake in a smother of foam and spray, amid the enthusiastic cheers of the spectators, winner by half a mile of her maiden race.

The last night of camp life, like the first, was one of unrestrained jollity and fun. An audience of six hundred staid and sober Canadians were convulsed with laughter by the performances and songs of the "Centipede Minstrels"—a camp organization composed entirely of Americans. The camp dude was paraded in feminine garb, a fair Canadienne distributed the prizes won in the races to the victors, and at last, standing with uncovered heads, the whole assembly made the forest ashes ring with a grand chorus of "America" and "God Save the Queen."

DEFECTIVE INSPECTION.

It is a perfectly laudable and legitimate object for the government of the United States to pursue to secure the safety of passengers on steam vessels. It ought to be an object that can be attained, and if the government were to go about it in the right way, there is no doubt that it could be obtained. But the explosion of the boiler or boilers of the steamboat Riverdale is a perfectly conclusive proof that the present methods do not work. The Riverdale was an old vessel, and had been lengthened once, and repaired several times, and had borne natural marks. All this threw some suspicion on the condition of the boat, but, so far as appears, she was as safe as government inspection could make her, nor is there any reason to suppose that the inspection was not made thoroughly in accordance with law. The boilers of the Riverdale were only four years old. They were examined in June, and a certificate of soundness, both as to them and as to the hull, was given in July. In short, everything that the government can do was done to secure the safety of the passengers.

It amounted to nothing. When the steamboat was pushing slowly up stream, having slackened speed to allow another boat to get away from the dock where she expected to get most of her passengers, and when there was only twenty-two pounds of steam on boilers guaranteed to carry forty-five pounds with entire safety, one boiler in both exploded. The hull was torn to pieces mid-ships. The bottom appears to have been blown out, and in from three to five minutes she sank. Five persons lost their lives in various ways, mostly by drowning, after being injured by flying timbers, and several were badly wounded. It was about 3 P.M. of August 28, the river was thronged with steam tugs in the vicinity of Sixteenth Street, where the explosion occurred; there were but few passengers aboard, and so, thanks to prompt rescuers, the loss of life was relatively small. Had the accident occurred later, when the passengers had come aboard from Twenty-second Street, where most of them take the boat, which can to the river towns as far as Newburgh, or had the accident taken place on a holiday, or even on a Saturday, it is probable that the loss of life would have been many. They might easily have made the disaster one of the most terrible that the waters around New York have ever witnessed.

As it is, the occurrence was bad enough to attract very serious attention to the condition of the law regulating the inspection of steam boilers. It shows that in this case at least the inspection was absolutely worthless, and that it may be so in a great many, perhaps in a majority of cases. It appears to show, too, the defective administration of the law, but a substantial defect in the law itself. The law was apparently strictly observed, and its requirements proved of no avail. To this extent the law is useless. It awakens false confidence, and until it can be made efficient it is obviously worse than no law at all. The only suggestion as to the cause of the disaster which is plausible is that the Riverdale used both salt and fresh water in her boilers, and perhaps both at once, and it is claimed that if this were done the bottom of the boilers would become corroded and weakened in such a fashion that the injury could not be discovered by inspection. This is a suggestion that should be carefully examined, to indeed should every other conceivable, when the boilers of the wrecked boat are raised and there is a chance for a thorough investigation. But it is greatly to be feared that an investigation will bring to light clearly the cause of the accident. The facts in the case, however, should call the attention of Congress to the necessity of strengthening the law, and this can not be done by simply rushing it more severe. It must be done by making the destruction of life and limb more costly to the owners of steamboats.

Rises at 5 A.M., and rushes down to the pier only to wait four hours in a broiling sun for the boat, which is, as usual, delayed. Discovers that that odious Jones man is going too.

Gets a seat in the boat between two old women, who discourse all the way down the bayou on the "misfortunes" of men in general and their own husbands in particular—while that long Jones man is making himself agreeable to Arabella in the bow of the boat.

Arrived at the landing, the party take wagons for the picnic grounds. Just enough seats for all but one. Tupe is relegated to a seat in the tail of a wagon, because he is so good-natured. Swallows his feeling with a lot of dust.

Walks for half a mile across a stubble field, looking like a porter, because he is so obliging. Jones said, "Let's each take something." He took Arabella and a pint can of milk.

Tupe is sent to a spring half a mile off with small boy to fetch water. Carries both buckets back because the boy said he was sick and had a sore foot. Tupe said afterward he didn't believe that boy was sick at all.

Being so obliging, is requested to make the lemonade. Tupe wanted to know if they really expected him to make it with one lemon.

Climbs a tree to fix the swing. Gets into difficulties. While it is all he can do to hold on at all, that beast Jones stands below and shouts to him to "makin it great and strong, Tupe."

Gets a few moments alone with Arabella, and was just about to recommence with her on her court treatment of him, when the comic man of the party has to have his turn.

It was mean of Jones to yell "Snake!" when Tupe was in the middle of a blackberry thicket.

The elderly and serious members of the party, accompanied by the accordion fiend, insist on Tupe joining in a little singing. Tupe hates singing.

Gets a chance to take Arabella for a row on the lake, and thought everything was lovely at last, when that brute Jones came along, and, Arabella displaying some timidity, volunteers to go along and hold her in the boat.

Tupe, tired out and disgusted, makes confession, and just as he finds a retired nook is startled by the voice of Jones, saying: "Hallo, Tupey, old boy! is that you? Come in! it's all right; we've engaged it" just in time to avoid the mental plaudits thrown. It is suggested that the band play a few lively tunes to raise the spirits of the party.

Tupe goes home—

Tupe said afterward the only part of the day he really enjoyed was when he was seated dry and comfortable on the boat, and saw the above procession file down the road.

THE OCEAN VOYAGE OF A LUMBER RAFT.—Drawn by Schell and Hogan.—[See Page 574.]

TOWING THE BIG RAFT.

The experiment of towing a monster timber raft from St. John, New Brunswick, to New York, by way of the sea, has been safely accomplished. Two tugs were employed in the operation, and the voyage of 600 miles occupied about eighteen days. The course lay directly across from Cape Elizabeth to Cape Cod. Early in the voyage the tow-boats encountered a heavy northeast gale off Cape Elizabeth, and the hawser with a hitch they were towing the raft parted. This caused delay until they could pick up the parted line and pass to the tow two hawsers, one leading to each tug-boat. Several times the boats were obliged to put into ports, owing to the rough weather. During the running time on average of sixty miles a day was made until the Sound was reached, when the adverse tides lessened the speed.

The raft is 600 feet long and 50 feet wide, and draws over eight feet of water. It is divided into eleven cargoes, or sections, of about 300 65-foot spruce logs each. The cargoes are cribs, into which the logs were rolled and stored. Over and around the sections great chains were wound. Between each cargo there is a wide space to allow free working of the raft in a rough sea. The cargoes each about 250 tons each, and it would have cost about $25,000 to bring them here by sailing vessels, as the boats engaged in this kind of transportation demanded extra pay on account of the size of the raft. Captain ELLIS said that the plan of tug-towing would be generally employed next season, and would eventually succeed the sailing vessels' trade.

AUTUMN AND WINTER CYCLONES.

The genesis of the brief Western hurricane and the cyclonic storm of our coast is the same. In the first the barometric depression is abrupt and precipitous, while in the other the gradients are longer and of a more gentle slope. The inrush of the moist warm air of the Gulf of Mexico and a cold current from the north into a centre of precipitous barometric depression sets in motion the fierce and destructive whirlwinds which in a moment level to the ground solidly built towns. Witnesses of these phenomenal tempests have observed that within the focus of the funnel-shaped cloud which is an invariable accompaniment of these whirlwinds the attraction of gravitation has for the moment appeared to be suspended. Objects which it touched or it bounded along the earth were not leveled or swept along with it in its course, but flew upward into the vortex of gyratory meteor.

The autumn and winter cyclones are accompanied by no such violent commotions of the atmosphere. While a funnel-shaped cloud frequently precedes these gales, it flies at a considerable altitude, and rolls majestically on in the face of the advancing gale. While the winds are violent they increase gradually in force and shift slowly, unless it be immediately at the centre of the gale.

The cyclonic storms which sweep our coast usually have their origin in the Caribbean Sea. Those which come from the regions of the Rocky Mountains and the Pacific generally make a course across the lakes and through the valley of the St. Lawrence. It sometimes occurs, however, that the southern hurricane, instead of maintaining a northeast course along the South Atlantic and Middle States, is deflected by or area of high barometer, and sweeps up the Mississippi Valley toward the lakes and the St. Lawrence. Now and again it happens that a storm centre advancing along the coast and one from the West unite near or about Cape Henry. Then it is that a redoubled fury and impetus are given to the gale, and the Jersey shore is strewn with wreckage from stranded ships.

It will be understood that what is meant by the direction of a storm is not the direction of the wind, but the course followed by the centre of the disturbance. Hence a cyclonic storm advancing up our coast on a northeast direction does so in face of northeast or opposing wind. The wind may continue in this direction, hourly increasing in force, for two or three days, and a shift will not occur until the centre of the gale has passed, when the wind will change to south and west, if the centre has passed to the north and east as to the east, and north as northwest, if the centre has passed to the south and southeast. The barometer is a tolerably accurate guide in this matter; for if the fall is deep and rapid, the chances are that the storm centre will pass near by to the north, but if the fall of the mercury is but a trifling and slow one, the chances are that the storm centre will pass to the south. There are exceptions to this, however, or was shown in the gale which visited the Middle Atlantic coast in March last, the one coincident with the prophecy of the Guardian WHOOPS. On this occasion the storm commenced with great violence at southeast, accompanied by a phenomenal and rapid fall of the barometer, from 30 10 to 28 85. The steady and hurried drop of the mercury indicated a violent shift of wind into south and west. Had this occurred, and the reacting winds been of corresponding force, the destruction of property would doubtless have been very great, particularly on Long Island. Instead of this, the wind suddenly shifted to the north. As a rule, when the wind backs into this quarter, there is a correspondingly rapid rise of the barometer, but on this occasion, to make it the more exceptional, the barometer continued low for several days, with moderate winds.

As another proof of how, on occasions, the indications of the barometer will be entirely at fault, the recent great tidal wave on the Middle Atlantic coast affords a notable instance. As a rule, a high barometer is accompanied by low tides, and the contrary by tides exceptionally full. In accordance with that which usually prevails, the barometer being considerably above the normal, the great tidal wave of August 29 had no right to be. It should have been accompanied by a severe barometric depression. As stated, the contrary was the case. In fact, the tide on our coast on the day specified attained a height as great or that of which we have any record.

The relation of one autumn and winter storms to those which assail the European coast has not until a little a brief period been determined. By close, patient, and intelligent research the Meteorological Bureau of the New York Herald, in the face of the ridicule of foreign meteorologists, has conclusively established the fact that the cyclonic gales which leave one shores are identical with those which devastate the European seaboard. The forecasts from observations carried on by private enterprise are so accurate that seven days in advance the date of the arrival of one of our cyclonic gales on the English or French coast is foretold almost to an hour. With all the vast machinery at its command the government observers and forecasters can not supply or accurate data as to the possible arrival of a storm at a given point in our new territory so that given by the compact and thoroughly equipped Meteorological Bureau of a daily metropolitan journal.

GARDEN FAY.

POLO ON SKATES.

POLO on roller skates, instead of ponies, has become a favorite pastime in Boston, Newport, and other cities where commodious rinks afford facilities for the game. It is played subject to the usual rules, and offers the same opportunities for excitement and the display of pluck and skill.

The game shown in our picture was played in the Olympian Club rink at Newport, Rhode Island, and resulted in the victory of the Alphas. Their play was throughout steady and fine, though now and then inferior to that of the Sawpots. This is the first defeat which the Newports have experienced at home.

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

ACCORDING to a writer in Saratoga, one of the most notable visitors at that resort this season was a bride, who was accompanied in her walks for exercise on the hotel piazza by a black-and-tan dog that were two-thousand-dollar diamond rings in its precious ears.

The Democrats of Massachusetts will be the first in the Union to choose delegates to a National Convention in 1884. They will be about the last in the Union to choose delegates to an Electoral College.

A scalp war opened recently in Manitoba which had been known for many years to the Indians, but they believed that the Great Spirit would kill any one who should reveal its location to a white man. At last a Frenchman married one of the daughters of the tribe, and in time she told him where the treasure was hidden. Nothing could be more natural than the way the golden secret leaked out.

Brazilians who are not intimately acquainted with the idioms of the United States will be puzzled when they read in a Western paper that an attaché of their legation recently "made Washington howl," and that, "or fact, he tried to paint the town red."

A writer in an English paper tells how collectors of postage stamps have been cheated by an ingenious swindler. The dealer in bogus postal relics gave his attention to making imitations of the "Railroady" envelope, genuine specimens of which find purchasers at about thirty dollars each. His method was to affix an ordinary postage stamp to the forged envelope, address it to a confederate at another office, and commit it to the mail. When it arrived at its destination it had the official stamps of "date" and "place of postage" thereon. With these evidences of genuineness, and with the ordinary postage stamp ingeniously removed, the bogus envelopes easily found buyers.

In Cincinnati, a few days ago, Mr Barnum's elephant Queen, the mother of the youngest baby captive elephants, killed a man by crushing him against a wagon as he was passing her. Her keeper gives her a reputation for noteworthy cunning when he says he is almost positive that Queen killed the man purposely, and that she is capable of doing so in a manner calculated to leave the impression that it was only clumsiness on her part.

A Canadian writer makes the somewhat alarming statement that at the present rate of consumption the supply of pine and spruce in the United States will be exhausted in less than seven years. He says that the amount of pine alone cut in this country annually is ten billion feet, and that the entire supply uncut is not more than eighty billion feet.

A dispatch chronicling the death of a priest named Cavithovics says that he was better known as Father Alexander. The good man could have been better known by almost any other name than Cavithovics.

The milk of the three cows in Sitka, Alaska, is sold at eighty cents a quart. Sitka seems to be a promising field for men with patents for sinking Artesian wells.

The first person appointed to a clerkship in the Treasury Department under the operation of the new civil service rules was a Connecticut girl. Her standing in the recent examination was 99 96. Next to her was a young woman candidate from Indiana, with a standing of 88 75. The second and third in respect to standing were candidates from Virginia and Louisiana, whose markings were 74 75 and 73 75 respectively. The successful competitor is twenty-four years old, and was graduated at Vassar College.

The Queen of England is criticised somewhat sharply in some quarters because she has offered pardon and a reward of twenty-five hundred dollars to the thieves for the return of jewels valued at one hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars, recently stolen from among the treasures of Lady Trevor. The critics hold that her Majesty's offer is an overture for the compounding of felony.

I.
THICKER THAN WATER.
A Novel. By JAMES PAYN, Author of "By Proxy," "High Spirits," "A Beggar on Horseback," "Gwendoline's Harvest," "For Cash Only," "The Best of Husbands," "What He Cost Her," &c. 18mo, Cloth, $1 00. Also, 4to, Paper, 20 cents.

Those who are familiar with the writings of this author will, we fancy, agree with us that it is rather difficult to give any adequate notion of the contents in the sort of sketch and comment combined which is commonly known as a "review," the reason being that as great is the containment of his tales, as completely does almost every page contain something of incident, or illustration, as whatever is necessary to keep them going, that it is hardly possible to deal with them in mere outline.—Morning Post, London.

BY THE GATE OF THE SEA.
A Novel. By DAVID CHRISTIE MURRAY, Author of "A Life's Atonement," "A Model Father," &c. "Duodecimo Edition," Paper, 15 cents. Also, 4to, Paper, 15 cents.

"This is a novel of thrilling interest. Besides the hero and the heroine, who are well drawn and original characters, the personages of the story comprise one or two individuals who command the attention and pique the curiosity of the reader, notably an esthetic poet, who at length casts his glowing locks and whose native powers find worthy expression only after he has learned to bring them under rigorous discipline."

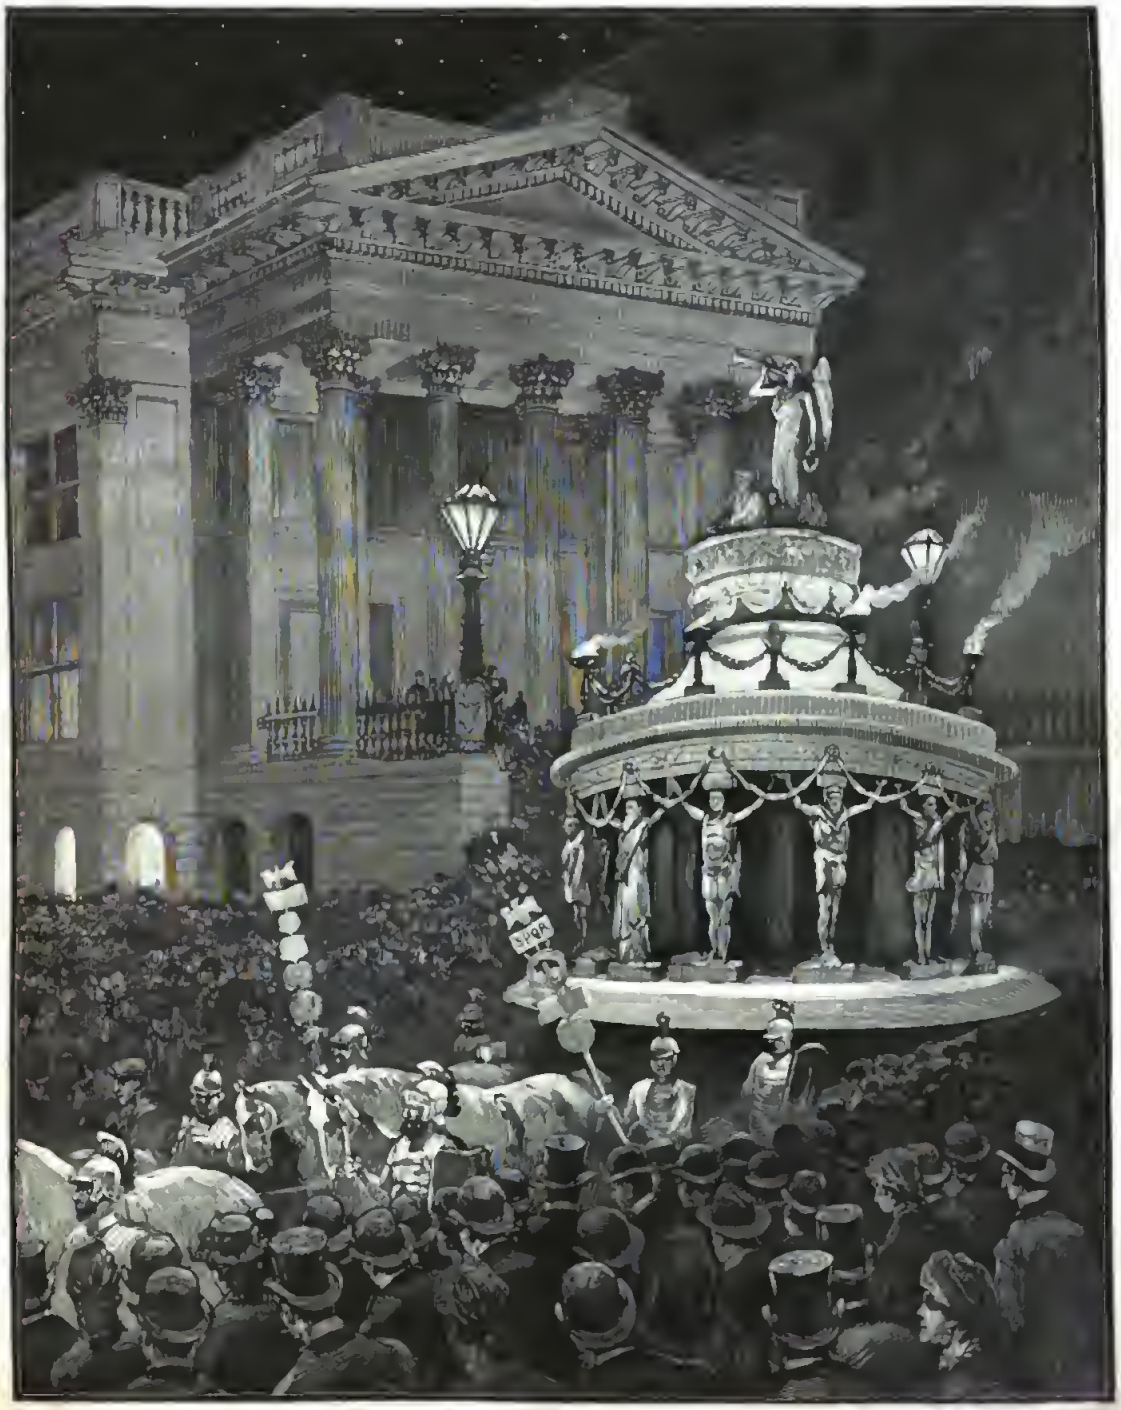
Copyright, 1883, by Harper & Brothers.



THE CINCINNATI FÊTE—THE GRAND PROCESSION OF THE ORDER OF CINCINNATUS.—DRAWN BY H. F. FARNY.—[SEE PAGE 563.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 15, 1883.

RE-OPENING OF THE ART COMPETITION.

The judges appointed to award the prizes in the Art Competition for the illustration of ALFRED DOMETT'S "Christmas Hymn" have reported [see HARPER'S WEEKLY dated September 1] that they "are not justified by the conditions of the competition in awarding any prize whatsoever." Three hundred and thirty-eight drawings entered into the competition, and twenty-three were received after the 1st of August—too late to be considered.

Pursuant to the intimation given in their original "offer to young American artists," the MESSRS. HARPER have determined to re-open the competition, enlarging its scope and modifying the limitation as to age, in accordance with suggestions made by the judges.

For the best original illustration appropriate to Christmas—the drawing to be suitable for publication in HARPER'S MAGAZINE, *to be made especially for this competition, and to be the exclusive work of an American artist not over twenty-seven years of age—*MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS offer an award of THREE THOUSAND DOLLARS, upon the honorable understanding that the successful competitor shall use the same for the prosecution of art study in one or more of the best American schools, including also a sojourn abroad of at least six months for the study of the old masters. The award will be paid in such installments and at such times as shall best suit the convenience of the recipient for the purposes specified.

The drawings must be received by MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS, *at Franklin Square, New York, not later than March 1, 1884, addressed "Art Competition, Harper's Magazine", and each must be designated by an assumed name or motto, which should also be given, together with the real name, age, and residence of the artist, in a sealed envelope securely attached to the drawing, and not to be opened until the result of the competition shall have been determined. The name of the successful competitor will not be publicly announced until the publication of the drawing.*

MR. R. SWAIN GIFFORD, N.A., MR. F. D. MILLET, A.N.A., and MR. CHARLES PARSONS, A.N.A., Superintendent of the Art Department of HARPER & BROTHERS, will act as judges of the competition.

The treatment of the subject is left to the artist, limited only by the special reference to Christmas. Either the Bible story of the Nativity, or the social features of Christmas, past or present, may be chosen for illustration. The judges, in making the award, will take into consideration not only the technical art value of each drawing, but also the appropriateness of the subject selected, the sufficiency of the illustration, and especially the originality of conception and treatment. The combination of different designs in a single picture should be avoided.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK, September 8, 1883.

REPUBLICAN DUTY.

AS Mr. SHERMAN S. ROGERS well suggests in his admirable letter upon the Republican situation, the protest of last year was not a riot, it was a revolution. The Republicans who would not vote for Mr. FOLGER, or who voted for Mr. CLEVELAND, have not joined the Democratic party, nor have they any admiration for Democratic traditions or faith in Democratic reform. But they do not therefore propose to sustain everything that is called Republican, nor to hold themselves bound by the action of an illegitimate majority. The methods which have enabled the late bosses to control the party in this State have been those of disfranchisement and fraud. How completely they belied the party was shown by the defeat of Messrs. CONKLING and PLATT in the same Legislature which in the very height of the boss supremacy had made Mr. PLATT the colleague of Mr. CONKLING. The sentiment of the party hostile to the debased and debasing politics represented by those Senators expressed itself so emphatically and sternly that a machine majority did not dare to defy it, and many an unwilling slave of the machine was delighted to be emancipated from its degrading control. As Mr. ROGERS plainly and quietly says, if the condition of Republican success is boss supremacy and methods, that success is highly improbable. If, on the contrary, the Republican party shows itself to be as firmly resolved to abolish machine politics and methods as it was to exclude slavery from the Territories and to maintain the Union unconditionally, its success is assured.

The Democratic party counts for success upon the discredit of those methods and men in the Republican party which the Republican party has in great part discarded. The Democratic press gratefully extols Mr. CONKLING as the greatest and best of Republicans because it knows that it was what Mr. CONKLING represented which weakened the Republican party, and made Democratic success probable. The overthrow and repudiation by the party of that kind of management, the independence of the caucus, the submission of the machine in New York to the free primary, the enforced retirement of Mr. JOHN F. SMYTH from the chairmanship of the State Committee, the establishment of the reformed civil service system, the prohibition of political assessments, and the prodigious protest of last year's election, in which Republicans by inaction permitted an unprecedented Democratic victory, are all signs of a Republican revival which has only to be developed to restore to the party its old prestige, and its hold of the heart of the intelligent and industrious "plain people," as Mr. LINCOLN used to call the great mass of citizens who make this country what it is. It is only necessary that the feeling and purpose shown during the last year or two should be allowed to mould the action of the party. The history of that time shows that passivity and evasion will not secure victory. The country has reached a point where the Republican party need not tell what it has done, but say what it means to do. The Democratic party does not profess to have a policy. Its plan is to keep silence. It fears that a declaration of principles and a policy upon actual questions would breed factions and imperil a success desirable for the plunder of place, and nothing more. It takes no ground upon the tariff, none upon civil service reform. It skulks and shuffles, and hopes to slip into power unobserved, under cover of a cry of Republican rascality.

The way to meet this conduct is to show to the country that the courage and independence which have grappled with boss rule and doubled it are but earnests of a party purpose. To the Democratic negative campaign the Republicans must oppose a positive campaign of reform. If there are no other great questions upon which parties may divide in their appeal to the country, let the Republicans make reform of administrative and political and party methods their battle-cry. Let them rely in their platform declarations and in their measures and nominations upon the popular intelligence and courage, as they have shown themselves during the last two years. Professional politicians, and especially bosses, despise the people. They believe in bribery and selfishness and ignorance, but they are utterly incredulous of public spirit and independent intelligence as springs of political action. They are constantly put in the wrong by experience. But they do not heed. They offer any excuse, any explanation, but the true one, which is self-respect and patriotism. The record of the Republican party shows that it has always been strong when it had a high purpose and confidence in the people. When it became the prey of tricks, and "regularity," and hurrahs for the grand old party without the spirit to keep it grand, it began to decline. But it has shown the will and the power of recuperation. Let the Convention of this year prove to the State and to the country that it as again, as in its earlier day, and under the new conditions, the party of political progress and reform.

MONEY AT ELECTIONS.

THE letters recently published requesting money from the Republican National Committee during the campaign of 1880 are such as the records of all parties would supply, and they have furnished a text for many excellent articles upon the use of money at elections. There is nothing in the letters which suggests an illegitimate use of money. But such misuse is always suspected. The story of Mr. TILDEN'S "barl" is notorious, and while the sums that he contributed toward the expenses of his own campaign have been doubtless exaggerated, the story of the "barl" was believed, because there is no question that there is an increasing tendency to nominate candidates who are "able to contribute liberally to the expenses of the election," and to use the money corruptly. In New York, Democratic candidates for the bench are reported, and are universally believed, to have been assessed enormous sums by the Democratic party managers, and to have paid them. That the money was honestly devoted to the honest expenses of the election, nobody believes. Great sums have been collected by both parties from their office-holders. In the Life of General DIX, just published, are letters written by him, when he was Postmaster of New York, protesting against the Democratic assessment levied upon his clerks and we have seen similar letters written under the Whig régime, when HUGH MAXWELL was Collector of the Port. In the autobiography of THURLOW WEED there is an extraordinary story of the dispatch of money to Albany to affect an election forty years ago; and such a statement as the following, which we take from a recently published letter, is so familiar as not to be in the least surprising, and is, indeed, accepted as a recognized method in politics. The writer is speaking of the factional fight in the Democratic party:

"Mr. FLOWER will, it is said, furnish any funds which may be necessary for the success of the movement at the primary meetings, and in securing delegates of the right stamp. The freedom with which the barrel was tapped at Syracuse may be taken as an indication of the way this campaign will be conducted, if a triumph seems likely to be won. It is rumored that money has already been sent into two counties, to assist in procuring the election of anti-MAGUIRE delegates."

The corruption here suggested has been the practice of all parties, and happily public opinion is beginning to correct it. The stringent legal prohibition of political assessments upon office-holders is largely due to the exposure of Mr. JAY HUBBELL'S performances two years ago. Yet Mr. HUBBELL merely did more efficiently what all parties authorized and approved. The press everywhere took the matter up, and no journals were more emphatic in their denunciations than the Republican. The country, upon the plain presentation of the outrageous practice, resolved that that particular abuse should cease, and it has been effectually checked. Nowhere was it more vicious than in Pennsylvania. Within two years we published in these columns the insolent letter of the chairman of the State Committee of Pennsylvania to a postmaster, threatening to report him to his superior officer if he did not instantly pay the sum demanded. The Committee's circular this year states that the Committee is compelled to call upon the friends of the Republican cause for the necessary funds, that the laws of the State and of the United States prohibiting assessments shall be faithfully observed, and that it asks of the recipient of the circular as a Republican citizen for such contribution only as he feels that he can and ought to make.

Here is one of the most monstrous abuses of political politics, the correction of which has been begun by its exposure and the consequent demand of party sentiment, and all within two years. This single fact should show the most skeptical that every reasonable reform of the kind is possible, and that there is nothing more contemptible than the "pooh" pooh" of what are called practical politicians. But it should do much more than this, and it will do more. The same public sentiment which has effectually demanded the prohibition of political assessments will now require a plain statement of the objects to which the money raised for "campaigns" is devoted. There are many necessary expenses of elections. But there are of a kind which are familiar and readily computed. In every county there are plenty of persons who know how much money can be honestly spent for printing, for carriage hire, for meetings, etc., and who will not be deceived by false charges. Cheating, indeed, can not be abolished by law, but in this case it can be reduced to its lowest terms. It is stated that Mr. TILDEN gave a check for $80,000 as his contribution to the National Committee of his party at its Presidential campaign, and that General BUTLER paid largely in Massachusetts last year. It is desirable upon the highest public grounds that it should be known whether such sums are used to corrupt voters, and when the whole amount collected is ten or twenty times twenty thousand dollars, the desirability of publicity is increased. The time has arrived for knowing the manner in which election moneys are expended.

REPUBLICAN PRIMARIES IN NEW YORK.

THE new plan for the Republican primaries made by the Committee of Eighteen was found, in the light of the new law regulating primaries, to leave the old situation absolutely unchanged. The new plan contemplated the voting at the primary of any Republican who was entitled to be enrolled after the November election. But it left the old machine otherwise untouched. It now appears that under the new act nobody but the members of an association can be fully vote at a primary. As this exclusion was one of the chief abuses to be reformed, the discovery that the new arrangement did not reform it was very amusing. For a moment it seemed that the old machine would be obliged to resume its coarse, and present the same old gang of delegates. As such a result under all the circumstances, was equivalent to defeat at the polls, the situation was perplexing. But the machine leaders or lieutenants hastened to the rescue. Mr. O'BRIEN proposed that the associations should unanimously amend their constitution to the effect that all Republicans who voted the Republican ticket at the last Presidential election, whether they are enrolled in the associations or not, should be permitted to vote at the primaries.

This amendment will probably be adopted by the necessary number of associations, so that every voter who in 1880 voted for the Republican electors, and then absent or too young, who intends to act with the party at the election of this year, and who will engage not to take part during the year to the primaries or caucuses of any other organization, may vote at the Republican primaries in the city this year. That is as liberal a provision as is now possible. But the original error lay in the failure to provide for the immediate disbanding of the associations. The machine system rests in great part upon them. While they exist in their present form they discredit and obstruct all action, and as their dissolution is necessary to reorganization, which has been plainly indispensable ever since the catastrophe of last autumn, should have been effected in time to permit the dissolution. The omission, however, can not now be repaired, and although it is not evident that many Republicans who have been hitherto disfranchised at the primaries will now vote, the barrier has been removed so far as voting is concerned.

The action of the late machine in removing the barrier, like the reported remarks of Mr. JOHN F. SMYTH in declining to be a candidate for the chairmanship of the State Committee, shows that the results of the last year's election have been blessed to the machine. It has discovered that Republican voters are not "dead" to be driven, and although the chastened machine may secretly doubt whether the new organization and its leaders will carry the State, it must be sure that they can not lose it as overwhelmingly as the machine lost it in 1882. Meanwhile, the machine must be aware that if the primaries turn out the old machine men, it will be evident that harmony is in great danger of postponement.

PROMOTION IN THE CIVIL SERVICE.

THE question of competitive examinations for promotion in the civil service is now under consideration by the Commission, and it is one of the most important of their inquiries. It is stated that Mr. EATON and Postmaster-General ORTHAM have no doubt that the reform bill provides for promotion by such examination. The national bill, however, is not explicit upon the subject. But the New York State bill says, plainly, "Promotions from the lower grades to the higher shall be on the basis of merit and competition," and the context shows that the word "competition" is intended to mean competitive examination. The provison, however, of "merit and competition" as plainly intends that merit, or the record of actual service, shall be taken equally into the account. This, indeed, is only reasonable, because the object of the competitive examination for admission to the service is to frustrate mere favoritism as well as to ascertain comparative fitness, while actual fitness is ascertained by probation. Once admitted to the service, the daily discharge of duty by an employé is a constant competition and probation; and the superior officer, it is assumed, in an office from which political influence over appointment is excluded, will naturally desire to place the best and most efficient men in the higher and more important positions.

It is, however, urged, and not without reason, that as the superior officers are appointed at pleasure, they may promote by favor, and that at present, when the service has been filled by favor, there could be no guarantee that unfit men would not be promoted, and for unworthy reasons. This was doubtless the consideration which led the framers of the bill to provide for competition. But this does not affect the important fact that the peculiar kind of merit which should insure promotion in the grades of the same class of employment is determined by actual service or probation rather than by a fixed examination, and this fact requires that in computing the results of examination very great weight should be given to the record of service. Indeed, a daily register or record of service in every office would be of the utmost value in settling relative claims to promotion upon the ground of merit.

The remarks upon promotion made by the Commission appointed two or three years ago to inquire into the operation of the reformed system in England are very sensible, and well worthy consideration as the result of great experience. It is unquestionable that in the English service incompetent men have been promoted, upon what Mr. EWALD calls "the sickening claims of seniority," simply to the display of their own inefficiency, and the discouragement of all below them. In the English service the alternative for promotion to seniority or merit, and the Commission emphatically prefer merit:

"We think [they say] that in the public service promotion should depend solely upon merit. The public offices are now divided into classes, and promotion extends in the removal from an inferior to a superior class as vacancies arise in the latter. It is the practice in several public offices to take the list of clerks in order of seniority, and to promote the first man who is stated to be not unfit for promotion. Although this plan is undoubtedly an improvement upon promotion by mere seniority, it is nevertheless, to our opinion, open to serious objection. Promotion should be a stimulus to merit. A man should be promoted, not because those above him are unfit, but because he is the best man for the place. If this course is pursued, no man is branded as unfit, and it would not at all follow that the senior man passed over for one promotion might not be the fittest man for the next. It is urged, however, by many that promotion by merit would in many cases degenerate into promotion by favoritism. No doubt this is possible if heads of departments, acting unfairly, are so foolish as to prefer comparative inefficiency to the best service and assistance they can get. But the alternative lies between seniority and selection, and we have no hesitation, both in the interest of the public service and of the public servants themselves, in strongly recommending that the latter system should be followed. The greatest possible publicity should be given to all promotions, and the particulars of individual judgment should be guarded against by the heads of departments calling into council the officers responsible for the work of the clerks from among whom promotion is to be made."

THE VIOLATION OF SHAKESPEARE'S GRAVE.

It is to be hoped that something soon is necessary to warrant the desecration of SHAKESPEARE'S grave than the consent of the vicar of Stratford. That extraordinary personage, according to the telegraphic report, has authorized the exhumation of the dust of the poet in order to compare the bust that stands above the grave with the skull. The suggestion was made by Dr. DOLBEAR, of London, who is a life trustee of the Shakespeare Museum at Stratford-upon-Avon, who wished to photograph his face and to take a cast of his skull.

There is a grotesque absurdity to the proposition which makes it almost incredible, and ought to be conclusive to prevent the desecration. It is hardly possible that an intelligent man, such as the vicar of Stratford must be presumed to be, would wish to be branded with everlasting contempt as the man who not only defied the orthodox curse of SHAKESPEARE, but outraged the enlightened taste and feeling of the English-speaking race, and it is not surprising that the bishop and the local authorities have protested.

The alleged object of the proposed removal is ludicrous. SHAKESPEARE has been buried for 287 years. There is a type of head and face which, in all its diversity, is universally accepted as his. The authentic correction of any faults in that likeness is now impossible, and even if the skull exists unchanged, any variation of form from the received head would be unimportant. Nothing but a most morbid curiosity could be gratified by the violation of the grave, and the good sense of England should prevent such an outrage.

Meanwhile it is but fair to believe that the virar of Stratford has been negligent, or, if not, to await his own defense of his remarkable conduct in granting a permission which was refused with emphasis by the authorities of the Church to Miss DELIA BACON some years ago when she sought to "dig the dust mentioned here" in order to aid, by possible discoveries, her famous contention that BACON was SHAKESPEARE.

THE CROWN OF FRANCE.

THE tenacity of the old BOURBON royal claim to France is not greater than that of the STUARTS in England. King CHARLES I. was beheaded in 1649, and a century later, in 1745, the rising for the Pretender took place in Scotland, which was finally defeated at Culloden in 1746. It was in 1793 that King LOUIS XVI. was executed in France, and it was only in 1830 that his brother CHARLES X. ceased to reign. Since then the empire of the second NAPOLEON has risen and vanished. France has not lost the habit of monarchy, even if it has lost the taste for it, and the union of the elder and younger royal line in the grandson of LOUIS PHILIPPE brings forward some of the ablest and most sagacious of French politicians. The legitimist or royal party is, from being the most feeble and chimerical of all parties in France, has now become one of the most intelligent, practical, and powerful.

The claim of the united French BOURBON line, however, can be attached at one point. The Spanish BOURBON may make trouble. The ORLEANS family descends from a younger brother of LOUIS XIV., but the Spanish BOURBONS spring from LOUIS XIV. himself. This direct line, however, upon obtaining the Spanish crown in 1713, absolutely and forever renounced all claim whatever to the French throne. But as the direct line, by the abrogation of the salic law, has been deprived of the Spanish crown, which was the consideration of the renunciation, it is supposed that Don CARLOS, its representative, may yet pretend to the French sceptre.

This is the fly in the ointment of the grandson of LOUIS PHILIPPE, because a certain member of the French legitimists do not forget that he is also the great-grandson of the Duke of Orleans who voted for the execution of his cousin, LOUIS XVI. No crime could be more dreadful, no stain upon a royal hand more indelible, and this party would favor the claim of Don CARLOS. But the Orleanists have proved themselves to be patriots, and there is little probability of a revolutionary plot or manifesto from them. They will doubtless hold themselves in reserve on a possible resources in a day of trouble.

PERSONAL.

APPRECIATION of Miss CONSTANCE FENIMORE WOOLSON'S Anne does not seem to diminish with the lapse of weeks. Our latest foreign mail brings us a long review in the London Life, which nevertheless regrets that it has not room "to vindicate the high opinion which we have formed of this novel by copious extracts and comments. To say that Miss WOOLSON is never incoherent, never obscure, and, with all her uncommon power of producing highly finished pictures of persons and of things, never tedious, would be to give her only half her due. Her pages teem with ripe wisdom and with ready wit. All her characters, down even to the most subordinate, have a distinct individuality. Style, that excellent quality for which English readers in general care so little that it is neglected with impunity by the modern English novelist—style, the passport to immortality, is among the striking merits of Miss WOOLSON'S latest work." So great is the popularity of this novel in England that several editions of it have been sold, and a new one is about to be issued by the London publishers.

—Mr. HUBERT HOWE BANCROFT, the distinguished historian of the Pacific States, has issued an interesting souvenir of the recent Bancroft Triennial Conclave of Knights Templar to San Francisco. Its handsome title-page is engraved on steel to show a gallant knight in suit of mail and fully armed riding a magnificent charger, and its contents are photographs of the building that holds Mr. HUBERT HOWE BANCROFT'S vast historical library, and of the publishing house of A. L. BANCROFT & Co., the façade almost entirely covered by picturesque decorations representing the doings and the insignia of the knights.

—The Young Ladies' Missionary Society of the Congregational church in Montclair, New Jersey, has issued a circular with the following announcement: "It has been thought advisable by the many friends of our pastor to purchase for him a tricycle, and the Young Ladies' Missionary Society has been requested to take the matter in charge, and have the machine in readiness for him upon his return." The price of the tricycle will be $160, and its object is "to enable the pastor to reach his widely scattered parishioners more easily."

—MARY ANDERSON'S opinions about some well-known actors have been considered worthy of a cable dispatch from London. IRVING, she says, is a great artist, but his drawl jars on an American; Miss TERRY will surely please "our people"; EDWIN BOOTH stands alone, and is above criticism; JOSEPH JEFFERSON is another incomparable. As to Miss ANDERSON herself the London critics exhibit commendable discrimination. They seem to recognize the facts that she is a bright, ambitious, and prepossessing young woman, of excellent reputation and moderate educational advantages, who means well, and who may become an interesting actress, but is not a dramatic genius.

—MONCURE D. CONWAY has been travelling in a Pullman car across this continent. "I entered upon the long journey," he says, "with dismal forebodings. I had just listened to OSCAR WILDE, who spoke of the dusty desolations of this journey of days and nights, of the monotony of the scenery, of the roads, so veiled I am bound to say I never had a pleasanter journey. Everybody becomes harmonized here. Even the conductors look on in the chief-players, and flirt a little with the ladies entrusted to their care. The officials become communicative, the children make friends all around, and by the second evening each sleeping-car has become, as it were, a little hotel parlor filled with friends apparently on a picnic."

—Mr. GEORGE TICKNOR CURTIS writes: "The publication of the Life of James Buchanan was followed within a week by an amount of criticism such as I do not remember to have seen bestowed on any similar book in the same space of time. I was much gratified by the extent of the interest that appears to be taken in the work and its subject. For what was complementary to the author I feel grateful; to what imputed literary fault or short-coming I trust I have been sensitively attentive; for what assailed me in a bad spirit no one will expect me to care."

—The portrait of Mr. TILDEN, lent by himself to the Louisville Exhibition, is described by a correspondent as representing "that venerable statesman in the full glow of health and spirits. His cheeks are ruddy and rounded, his figure is upright, his eye is shining with youthful hope and innovation, and altogether it is the perfect picture of the muscular and cheerful TILDEN recently made known by the graphic pen of Mr. WATTERSON. It was through the persuasion of that editor that the sage of Greystone at last consented to send him likeness, and it is in this shrine that the loyal Kentuckian first pays his devotion."

—A writer in the Contemporary Review speaks of the Wellington Memorial to St. Paul's Cathedral on the finest piece of commemorative sculpture which has ever been done by an Englishman. It is unfinished, because the money to cast its chief figure is begrudged by the nation. Accordingly it lies in a side chapel, though designed to stand in the middle of the nave. "The truth is, we don't know an artist when we have got one; we let him wake fire-places for a living, and die a broken-hearted bankrupt, and when he is dead we grudge to his memory even that poor justice which would complete the work of his genius; and whilst we jingle in our pockets the few pounds which our stinginess has saved us, we think we are an artistic nation and a pattern to mankind." The artist was ALFRED STEVENS.

—It can appears that during the late war in the Transvaal the leaders of the Boers detested Lord WOLSELEY and Sir REDVERS BULLER, but fell in love with Sir EVELYN WOOD from the very first, and did not conceal their admiration for him. Sir EVELYN has long had the credit of being in the good graces of Queen VICTORIA and the Empress EUGÉNIE, and at present his cup must be full.

—One of EDGAR ALLAN POE'S French critics has traced a resemblance between the poet and some of his creations, similar to that usually supposed to exist between Lord BYRON and such characters as Childe Harold and Manfred, and notes especially POE'S resemblance to his "Man of the Crowd," whose peculiarity was that he could not remain alone, but must have somebody to talk to.

—The father of FRANZ LISZT, the pianist, was a steward to Prince ESTERHAZY in a small village of Hungary; his mother was the daughter of an artisan, and possessed a kind heart and a pious soul. Her early religious teachings are said to have greatly influenced her son, even to the present time. At six years of age the boy FRANZ was taught by his father to play on the piano, and was seen to point with admiration to a picture of BEETHOVEN which hung on the wall, and to express a desire to be like him. At the age of nine years he played in public, and was pronounced a wonder.

—"The games of children," says the Pall Mall Gazette, "are handed on by a private and unbroken tradition of their own. A very interesting book, Games and Songs of American Children, by Mr. W. W. NEWELL (HARPER, New York) proves not only that American children inherit old English rhymes and rounds, but that the old English rhymes are practically European, and have their parallels among most nations on the Continent. Mr. NEWELL'S book is full of the blossoms of legends."

—The American school-boy sees no objection whatever to the course of the Paris Municipal Council in making a grant of $7000 for the purpose of sending a certain number of pupils from each high school on a foreign tour for the improvement of their minds.

—The latest infant prince of the German royal family having been baptized in water brought directly from the Jordan by his papa, has the satisfaction of squalling in a cradle of carved oak one hundred and six years old. Most mothers would prefer a fresher bed for their darlings.

—WAGNER'S wife still refuses to see visitors, and the house where she lives, and where WAGNER used to entertain his friends, has the appearance of being closed, although the great composer's grave in the garden close by has become a place of public resort. The grand theatre which he built is situated on a hill in the outskirts of Baireuth, and surrounded by well-kept lawns and by secluded groves of fir trees.

—It is claimed that Queen VICTORIA has not forgotten the exhortation of the Duke of Wellington, "Never let the command of the army out of your family, madam, if there is one man of age to hold it." But the old soldier's caution does not seem to be much in a country ruled by a House of Commons.

—The art of translation, observes a reviewer, has become very fashionable in our generation. Instead of the old school rules, done in the slubbiest way, and with the lowest views, by ignorant or unsuccessful creatures on the outskirts of scholardom, we have now the most prominent professors and fellows of colleges and school-masters essaying themselves in this field. Some content themselves with turning classical prose authors into idiomatic and lucid English; others are more ambitious, and appear as poets for the purpose of reproducing the poetry of another age and tongue. Mr. WHITELAW, the most recent translator of SOPHOCLES, says, "It is, I believe, increasingly felt that a good translation is a commentary of the best kind."

—The feeling against the Jesuits in England in the early part of the seventeenth century has been not in a fresh light by many curious details collected by Mr. HENRY FOLEY. He has found a certain caricature in which the King of England is represented as holding the Pope's nose to a grindstone, while the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of London turn the handle rapidly, to the quick lessening of that facial feature. He mentions a bill brought into Parliament to compel the Catholics to wear a red hat or party-colored stockings, so as to be hooted at whenever they appeared in public.

—A clergyman salutes that a lady recently told him that honey was good for stings, and, in fact, "for most things, because it is extracted from all the different kinds of herbs," and so must contain all the virtues of the same.

—A new Complete Letter-Writer, in which occur models of all sorts of possible epistolary communications, has been given to the public. Two of the models concern the needs of a young lady who has received a proposal of marriage from a widower. If she has decided to accept his proposal, she answers how that he was entirely correct in supposing that "I have been very much interested in you and in your sweet children"; but if she has determined to refuse him, she expresses her sorrow "that the friendly interest I have taken in you and in your dear little children" should have been misconstrued as something tenderer.

—The African slave-trade is still active in Mozambique Channel. The British vessel which has gone thither to suppress it captured recently a small craft of sixty-three tons, on board of which one hundred and three miserable, half-starved wretches, eighty of them women and children, were packed like sardines. One old woman, who had a baby with her, became insane after her removal. The British officers ordered the five-hose to be played indiscriminately on them all every morning in the interest of cleanliness. One hundred and twenty pounds of rice, tomtoms, and sweet-potatoes were cooked together. When the poor creatures saw the food, they went into it hands and feet, each fighting and biting another in the struggle to get as much as possible.

CHAPTER XIII.

TAORMINA.

A WORLDLY-WISE old lady, who deals in epigrammatic axioms, said to me, the other day, "A woman who wants to have admirers, and keep them, should take care never to finish her sentences." This art—if art it be—was undoubtedly one of which Lady Constance Milner possessed the secret. In her words and actions there was a dash of the mysterious, an apparent inconsequence, which stimulated curiosity, and led people who might not otherwise have felt any absorbing interest in her to dog her footsteps in a somewhat undignified manner. When a lady is your intimate friend one day, turns you away from her door the next, and crosses the street on the third to make a rendezvous with you, she naturally presents herself to you in the light of a problem, and if you are a person of orderly mind, you do not like to pass problems by without making at least an attempt to solve them.

This was what I said to myself as I rode through the gates of Catania on the early morning. I wanted to know what it all meant; I had a perfectly legitimate desire to have the answer to the riddle. The simple explanation that Lady Constance liked admirers, and knew how to secure them, was not one that recommended itself to me at that unsuspecting age. Only I felt it necessary to my mental satisfaction that I should be able to give myself a distinct reason for what I was doing, because, upon the face of it, it did seem rather absurd that I should have risen from my bed with the lark and set off on a twenty mile ride in order to keep an appointment which, as I very well knew, Lady Constance, for her part, was quite capable of forgetting.

I would not, however, allow my mind to dwell on the latter painful possibility; I preferred to take it for granted that all would happen for the best in the best of worlds. The small patch of the world over which I was riding on that clear spring morning was, indeed, lovely enough to put the most relentless pessimist to shame. The sun's rays fell aslant upon the white high road, upon the ripening corn fields, upon the dark green glossy leaves and golden fruit of the orange groves; but in the folds of the hills the morning mists still lingered, drawing a pale blue gauze over the chestnut woods, above which towered the shaggy shoulders and glistening snows of Etna. The black-browed Sicilian peasants—a merry, stunted, half-starved race, bearing in their persons the mark of centuries of misrule, and upon their faces no symptom of any discontent therewith—threw me a familiar buon giorno as I jogged along; every now and again one of the gayly painted carts peculiar to the island rattled past me, or a bare-legged boy, driving his herd of goats before him and blowing his shrill pipe, as in the days of old Theocritus, paused to lift a pair of startled brown eyes upon the stranger. The azure Mediterranean, heaving sleepily, made murmurings among the rocks and headlands where Acis kissed Galatea, where Polyphemus pastured his flocks, and where, as I am told, the shriek of the railway engine is now to be heard several times a day. At that time there was no talk of railways, nor perhaps much knowledge of their existence, in Sicily. The ancient classic island seemed to have been forgotten by our bustling century; and in the soft, sentuous repose of those early hours one could almost expect to > Hear sight of Proteus rising from the sea,

> Or hear old Triton blow his wreathed horn.

My route lay along the highway to Messina, which skirted the coast, and which would have been a pleasanter road to travel if it had not been quite so stony and dusty. I was only able to quit it when my journey was nearly at an end, and when I turned aside to scale the heights upon which the village of Taormina stands. My rough little pony had not struck me as a very promising mount when I hired him; but he accomplished his six or seven miles an hour without inconveniencing himself, and the consequence was that I reached my destination long before noon. I stabled my horse, and, seating myself under the veranda of the inn, looked out upon a view of which readers shall be spared any detailed description. Taormina, with its red-roofed houses, its tall campanile, and its ruined Saracenic keep in the foreground, the blue sea and the silvery fringe of the bay far beneath, the shadowy lines of the woods and hills in the middle distance, and, far away, Aetna rising snow-crowned against the sky, a white plume of smoke drifting from his cone—many readers, doubtless, have seen these things for themselves. Others, who have not seen them, would perhaps prefer to get on with the story, and take their vicarious enjoyment of scenery from more skilful pens than mine. I suppose that the view from the terrace at Taormina is the most beautiful view in the world. It is, at all events, the most beautiful that has come within the range of my experience, which has not been a limited one.

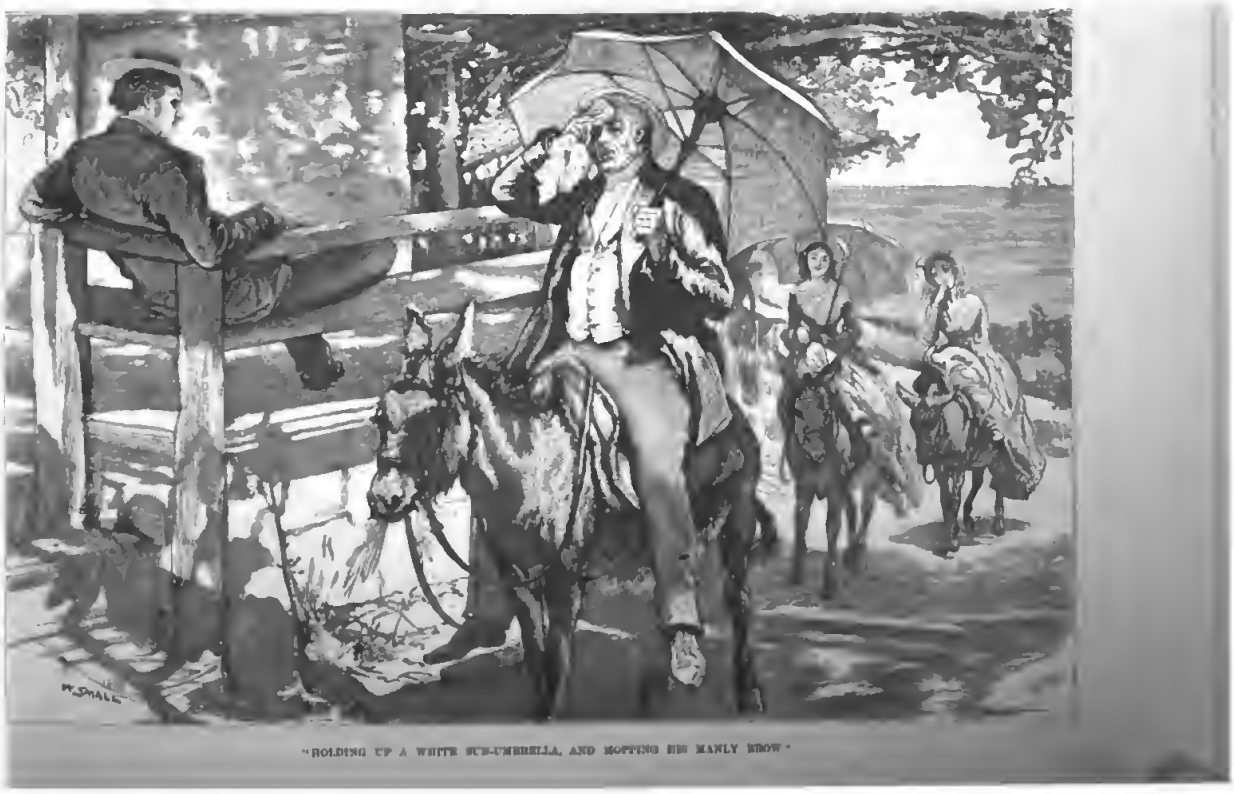
I sat gazing at this marvellous prospect for an hour or so, and then, I regret to say that it began to pall upon me. I was hot, I was tired, I was hungry, and when the sun had reached a point directly above my head I became wrathful into the bargain. In vain I strained my ears and my eyes, there was not the faintest indication of approaching travellers, and the only crumb of consolation that I could discover to set against the bitterness of my disappointment was in the thought that at least George Warren need never know what an ass I had made of myself. However, just as I had given up all hope, and had made up my mind to go in-doors and devour my food (for I could lay hands upon, a scrambling posse as of hoofs made me aware), and immediately the imposing figure of Antonio, astride upon a donkey, appeared on the stony track beneath me. Behind him three more figures, similarly mounted, came into view, one by one. First Mr Sotheran, holding up a white sun-umbrella, and mopping his manly brow; then Mrs. Gilbert, a pretty little brunette, who was believed to have a husband in India, or some other remote spot; finally, Lady Constance herself, yawning as usual.

Mr Sotheran dismounted slowly, shook hands with me, and then directed attention to the landscape before him with a circular sweep of his arm, as who should say, "Very creditable indeed." If he had not been rather out of breath, he might even have put this sentiment into words, for it was his conviction that the entire continent of Europe was a sort of show got up, with more or less of success, for the benefit of British tourists. He was a large, hurry man of about fifty, with a broad, ruminating countenance, iron-gray whiskers, a pompous manner, and a white waistcoat. At that moment he was suffering a good deal from the heat.

Mrs. Gilbert, who affected a childish vivacity of manner which, if I remember rightly, went out of fashion at about the same time as ringlets, clapped her hands, and informed me that she felt as if she were in heaven. She really must get out her sketch-book at once. "Now, Mr. Maxwell, will you find me some nice shady place from which I shall be able to see everything?"

"I don't know what other people may be going to do," Lady Constance said, "but I don't mean to stir from this spot until I have had something to eat."

To which Mr Sotheran replied, cordially: "Just so, Lady Constance, just so. I quite agree with you."



"HOLDING UP A WHITE SUN-UMBRELLA, AND MOPPING HIS MANLY BROW."

So Antonio unpacked the luncheon-baskets, and the people from the inn brought us hot wine and salad and a pair of skinny chickens, and soon a restful calm descended upon the souls of us all. The only thing that disturbed me a little was that I could not see how I was to get Lady Constance away from her companions, in whose presence it was impossible to say all that I wanted to say; nor was she apparently disposed to give me the desired opportunity. When, after luncheon, we climbed up to the ruins of the Greek theatre above the village, she chose to walk on in front with Mrs Gilbert, leaving Mr Sotheran and me to entertain one another, which we did with mutual ill-will. I don't think Mr Sotheran honored me as far as to consider me a possible rival; but he must often have found me very much in the way at Naples, and I am bound to confess that I had neglected an chance of making myself disagreeable to him.

The half forgotten race which once colonized the hill-promontory of Taormínium were surely the envy of their more famous and wealthy neighbors on the sea-board. Dwelling no those serene heights, secured by nature against attack, and removed from the din and bustle of commerce, what can they have had to do through all their sunny days but to cultivate refinement and enjoy the good things so lavishly provided for them by the gods? There are gone into infinite space—they and their history; but their great open-air theatre is hardly to be called a ruin even now. Many of the slender columns are broken, it is true, and the semicircular tiers of seats are overgrown with grass and wild flowers and brushwood; but that clear, dry atmosphere has preserved the brick work and the chiselling of the capitals almost intact, and imagination is called upon for no great effort to see the building as it used to be before Vandal, Saracen, and Norman came to disturb the old world's peace.

Standing upon what had been the topmost row of places, with the glittering Straits of Messina at his back, and the panorama of sea, plain, and mountain, closed in by Ætna, before him, Mr. Sotheran cleared his voice, referred to his guide-book, and said what the occasion appeared to call for. Nobody paid much attention to the historical sketch with which he was so kind as to favor us; but when he wound up by observing, "These constructions must have possessed remarkable acoustic properties, it is difficult to understand how an audience seated where we are now can have heard the voices of the actors on the stage—" when, I say, he reached this point in his discourse, Lady Constance broke in upon him with a certain animation.

"Very difficult indeed," she said. "In fact, I can hardly believe such a thing possible. Suppose we were to test it? Was't one just go down to the stage, Mr Sotheran, and recite something? And then, when you have done, we can tell you whether you were audible or not."

Mr. Sotheran made an ugly face. "I should be delighted," he said; "but—well, the distance is considerable, and after having climbed up here once—"

"But nothing obliges you to climb up here again."

"No, no; of course not; very true. I was only going to suggest that Mr Maxwell is a younger man."

"Mr Maxwell," answered Lady Constance, gravely, "is quite incapable of recitation. Probably he has never made as much as no after-dinner speech in his life; whereas you, who are in the habit of addressing large bodies of your constituents, must understand perfectly well how to manage your voice in the open air. And surely, Mr Sotheran," she added, raising her eyes and surveying him with a look of innocent wonder, "you can not be so old as you make yourself out. At least, not infirm."

This naked thrust touched the poor man in a tender place. He answered, in a tone of some displeasure, that he had not intended to imply anything of that sort, and set off, without making any further objections, to obey orders. We heard him scrambling down from ledge to ledge; presently he emerged upon the grass-grown stage, struck an attitude, and in a stentorine bellow began Hamlet's soliloquy.

"To be, or not to be?" he shouted. I don't know that he can more ridiculous than any other man, with a tall white hat in one hand and a nondescript umbrella in the other, would have been in such a situation, but it must be supposed that the incongruity of the spectacle was too much for Lady Constance, for she appeared to be quite overcome by it. She allowed him to get through three or four lines, and then broke into peal after peal of the heartiest, most unrestrained laughter—a thing that I had never known her do before in the whole course of our acquaintance. Her merriment infected me so that I too burst into a loud guffaw, while pretty little Mrs. Gilbert lowered her parasol and tittered behind it, without, perhaps, knowing very well what the joke was. The "remarkable acoustic properties" of the ruin did not fail to convey those cheerful sounds to the ears of the unfortunate spouter below. He stopped short, put on his hat, and stalked away with no air of offended majesty.

"Please go after him, Mrs. Gilbert," said Lady Constance, as soon as she had recovered herself sufficiently to speak. "The proper place for you to take your sketch from is the castle, and if you will say something civil to poor Mr Sotheran he will fetch water, and rub your paints, and do anything else that may be required of him. As for me, I think I had better stay where I am for the present, and follow you when he has had time to cool down."

"Oh, Lady Constance, I should never dare!" Mrs. Gilbert protested. "I am sure he is dreadfully angry. And, besides," added the little lady, with an arch look, "I don't think he cares very much about hearing civil words from me."

"That," replied Lady Constance, compotedly, "is a question about which there may be two opinions. My own belief is that Mr Sotheran is one of those deplorably wicked persons who care a great deal about civil words from any pretty woman, married or single."

Mrs. Gilbert, with a little scream, declared that, under these circumstances, she couldn't think of following Mr. Sotheran. Notwithstanding which she made up her mind to run the risk without much additional persuasion, and departed, after protesting as to come and interrupt the tête-à-tête very soon. Mrs. Gilbert considered herself to be no irresistible flirt, and, for anything that I know to the contrary, may have had good grounds for holding that opinion.

"Ah, well!" said Lady Constance, as soon as we were alone, "it was very amusing. Did you ever see a man look such a stupendous fool?"

"Upon my word, I think you were rather hard upon the poor beggar," I could not help saying.

"It is wholesome discipline for him to be laughed at," she answered, calmly. "Also, I wanted to get rid of him, and there was no hope of doing that in any other way than by offending him. I shall make friends with him again this evening."

"You often do want to get rid of people, don't you?" I asked.

"Very often."

"And are they always ready to come back when you want to make friends with them again?"

"Always."

There was a quiet smile upon her lips, as she made this statement, that provoked me into saying, rather rudely, "Well, I know one man who would very soon get tired of being slapped in the face."

"Then why should he expose himself to the risk of such an indignity?"

"If I exposed myself to it, it was not intentionally, I can assure you," cried I. "How could I guess that, after allowing me to spend the best part of every day with you at Naples, you would refuse to receive me at Palermo?"

"Mr Maxwell," said Lady Constance, turning her head toward me and looking at me from beneath her drooped eyelids, "do I owe you any account of my actions?"

"Yes," I answered, boldly; "I think you do. One doesn't pick up friends and throw them away without giving a reason for it. I never asked for your friendship—"

"Indeed?" she interrupted. "I was under the impression that you had asked for it rather imperatively."

"Well, at all events, you gave it to me: and I want to know why you withdrew it as suddenly"

"If there is anything else you would like to know," said Lady Constance, "I hope you will kindly mention it. Once for all, Mr. Maxwell, if you really care about my friendship, you must be content to take me as I am, and not to catechise me. Nothing is so wearisome as explanations; and with the best will in the world, I should often find it difficult to explain my conduct. For the matter of that, I doubt whether you could always give a rational account of your own, if called upon. Now shall I tell you something that will put you in high good-humor? When I found that you had left Palermo in a huff, I organized this expedition for the express purpose of catching you up and obtaining your gracious pardon. Are you pleased?"

Truth compels me to state that I was ridiculously pleased, and doubtless my speaking countenance expressed as much to my companion; for she remarked, with a slight laugh: "Ah, I thought that would be satisfactory. Satisfactory for the moment, I mean; because the day will probably come when you will know me better, and will regret very much that I didn't let you go about your business."

"Do you expect me to believe that?" I asked.

"Should I have said it if I had expected you to believe it? No; I don't expect you to believe it. Who ever believes the truth? It is the one incredible thing—the one mountainable thing—the one thing worth living for! You and I both worship truth in our different fashions, and all they of us will ever do more than catch a glimpse of it; but you are more fortunate than I, because you will probably be satisfied with seeing a part, whereas I want to see the whole. After all, perhaps the best say is not to think about it. We are sitting up here in the sunshine, you and I, and we are alive now, and shall soon be dead. that, at any rate, is a truth that can't be disputed. In a few years we shall have turned to dust, as the people who built this theatre two thousand years ago and more have turned to dust; and then all our thoughts perish. Why can't we take life as I told you just now to take my friendship, without asking tiresome questions about it?"

She had dropped these sentences one by one, with a pause between each, gazing dreamily at the distant hills, and evidently only putting fragments of what was passing in her mind into words. I could not quite follow her; I was unable to fill up the blanks; I certainly was not conscious of having ever asked myself questions, tiresome or otherwise, about the meaning of life. But it was pleasant to lie there in the still, warm air and listen to her.

"Let us enjoy the fleeting hour," she went no; "it won't last long. To descend to details, you will be trotting back to Catania before the sun sets, and I shall be discussing politics with Mr Sotheran, and pretending to believe that he knows what he is talking about."

Her words, and still more her tone, were full of flattering inferences. At times I was a little afraid of Lady Constance; but at this moment I felt that I might say anything to her, and what I said was, "I hope—I do most earnestly hope that you won't marry that man Sotheran."

"I also hope that I shall not," she answered, coolly; "but one can't tell what events the future may bring to pass. If you are going to talk about Mr Sotheran, I am afraid I shall not enjoy the fleeting hour at all."

"I don't want to talk about him," said I. "I don't want to think about him. I would a thousand times rather talk about anybody else. About you, for instance."

"About me?" repeated Lady Constance, abstractedly. "Well, to be sure, it is a subject upon which you haven't acquired much information as yet. I wonder whether it would interest you to hear a little more of what I am and have been?"

"I can't conceive anything that would interest me more," I exclaimed. "You don't mind telling me, do you?"

"No," she answered; "I don't mind telling you."

Was it imagination, or was there an inflection of tenderness in her voice, and the faintest possible emphasis laid upon the last word? To me, at all events, it appeared that I could detect some such change of tone; and the effect of it was to make my heart beat, and my breath come and go more quickly.

It was the story of her life that she began to relate, a story not differing in the main from that with which I was already acquainted, though, as was but natural, somewhat differently told; the story of an eager, enthusiastic girl, with high aspirations, with unsatisfied yearnings, with great powers of which she was conscious, but could find no means of exercising, of a husband who had died young, yet had lived long enough to chill and disappoint her; the story of a restless, half-disenchanted woman, who had tried in various ways to set a crooked world straight, and was trying still, though no longer with much hope of success. She spoke with a good deal of earnestness; sometimes with a touch of emotion. It was a singular autobiography and confession that she unfolded as she sat there among the ruins in the mellow sunlight—an appeal for sympathy, a sort of creed; a vague system of philosophy—I don't know what strange jumble of ambition and benevolence and cynicism and superstition. I can not recall all that she said, probably, if I could, it would not be worth recalling. What I can recall as vividly as though the experience were one of yesterday is the extraordinary impression that it produced upon me. What I can recall is that while she was talking a new Lady Constance seemed to become revealed to me, and that with that revelation came the further, and, as it appeared to me, the terrible one that all my heart and soul had passed into her power. What I do recall with humiliation and shame is, that when she ceased speaking I caught her cool white hand and pressed it fervently to my lips. I knew what I was doing; I knew that I was false to Maud, false to my duty, false to myself; but I did it all the same. And as this day I believe that I did it in obedience to a force which I was powerless to resist.

All this, I have no doubt, sounds sufficiently fanciful and exaggerated. Treacheries such as that to which I have just been obliged to plead guilty are of daily occurrence, and, upon the whole, most people are disposed to contemplate them with a lenient smile. A young fellow who has plighted his troth to a girl hundreds of miles away finds himself, on a sunny afternoon, in the midst of exquisite scenery, alone with a handsome woman who talks a pack of metaphysical rubbish to him, and he forgets himself and kisses her hand. Of course he ought not to do such things, but human nature is human nature, and we were all young once, and what is the use of making mountains out of mole-hills? Nevertheless, I do not pass among my friends for a fanciful man. I say that in making that mute declaration to Lady Constance I felt as morally degraded as if I had forged a check, and when I assert that in thus degrading myself I was moved by no overpowering influence which I can not define, I believe I am keeping strictly within the domain of facts. Mesmerism and electro-biology are facts, I suppose. No one, at this time of day, will dispute the capacity possessed by certain men and women of imposing their will upon others. Whether Lady Constance Milner imposed her will upon me then for voluntarily or involuntarily I can not feel certain, but that some influence not of the common was brought to bear upon me I am firmly convinced.

There was no need for any words to pass between us. I said nothing, and she, for her part, only looked at me—a tender compassionately, as I thought—and remarked, "Ah! I warned you of what would happen." And then Mr. Sotheran, accompanied by Mrs. Gilbert, appeared in the arena beneath us, and shouted out that it was high time to start.

"I suppose you will let me come and see you at Palermo now?" I said, as we rose and prepared to scramble down from that fatal eminence.

Lady Constance had resumed her ordinary demeanor. "Oh yes, if you like," she answered, indifferently. "That is, of course. Why should you not come?" But when we had accomplished about half the descent she paused, and said, in an altered tone. "Blame late; don't blame me. I have done the best I could to keep you from coming to grief like this; but I knew from the first that it would be useless. The very first day that I saw you at Alassio I felt that your life was destined to make a mark upon mine."

So that, if she had electro-biologised me, it appeared that I had unwittingly done something of the same kind as her. I had a dreary little laugh over the absurdity of the notion as I followed her down to the grassy spot where Mrs. Gilbert and her sketch-book were waiting for us. Mr. Sotheran having carried his offended dignity away to the inn.

But when I had said farewell to the company as Giardini, where they had left their carriage, and had driven my horse's head once more toward Catania, I did not feel inclined to laugh at all. Was I in love with Lady Constance? I could not have answered the question any more than I could have said why an insignificant a circumstance as the kissing of a woman's hand should have raised a barrier between me and Maud Dennison which I felt to be insurmountable and eternal. I don't remember to have once considered the possibility of my ever marrying Lady Constance, all that I knew was that I was bound to her, that she would be able to dispose of me thenceforth in any way that she might think fit, that I had destroyed all my old hopes to put in their place something that was not to be called hope as a necessity. In spite of all the remorse that I had received, in spite of all my self-contempt, I had been captured in such a way as Ulysses was captured by Circe. What I thought of this I almost hated Lady Constance from the next moment I reflected that, after all, it was no fault of hers. Soon I had parted with my self-respect for her sake, surely she had I could do was to try and preserve my respect for her and, indeed, she had given me to know in a course her of having made no her slave out of an unconscious.

I rode back to Catania in such a condition of bewilderment that there were moments when I almost doubted my own identity, and if anything could have added to my wretchedness it would have been the sight of George Warren standing in front of the hotel and anxiously awaiting my arrival. "Gracious goodness!" thought I to myself, "what is to be done now? Shall I not in truth, or let him See it out? Find a not be to tasnle scene before long, his even he won't be able to help noticing that something is the matter"

As it turned out, however, he noticed nothing. He ran down the steps to me with the beaming countenance of one who bears glad tidings, and began to tell me his news before I was out of the saddle. "There's a letter for you from Mr le Marchant; and I have heard too. He wants to go back to England at once. It seems that there are likely to be vacancies in the diplomatic service very soon, and he thinks we ought to be on time in putting yourself in the hands of a crammer. I came no here to tell you about it: as we start to-morrow morning, we shall be in plenty of time to catch the next steamer from Palermo to Marseilles."

George was rudest. I asked the why for sudden curtailment of our journey gave me much pleasure, and in replied that he supposed every body was glad to go home. Then the ward I heard that he had taken upon himself to write to my uncle, advising my removal from the spell of Lady Constance's enchantments, and that this excellent pretext for our recall coming just in the nick of time, had gladdened the honest heart more than any prospect of embracing a multitudinous brothers and sisters upon would have done.

As for me, I was certainly not glad to be going home, for the bare thought of wearing Maud made my heart turn cold; and yet I was by no means sorry to be leaving Sicily. Not that I had the least hope that change of scene would effect any change of mind in me, but I felt that it would be a relief to get away, and occasion myself to the altered order of things. "However dreadful a creature one may be, one can't be of with the old love and no with the new in the course of a few hours," I thought.

George made no inquiries about my excursion to Taormina, nor did I think it necessary to tell him what he had probably divined already, that I had seen Lady Constance there. We had some things to do and talk about, we had our journey to accomplish; and when we reached Palermo there were old examination-papers to be overhauled, and numerous presents to be purchased for the households of Warren and Le Marchant. If any melancholy and even fallen ones did not escape George's observation, he was fortunate enough to ask for no explanation of it.

We had only one clear day at Palermo and in the afternoon I, of course, went down there to say good-by to Lady Constance, whose rooms, as I had heard, had taken place only a few hours before our own on the previous day. I found her drowning room full of visitors, and like master the intelligence which I brought her, as I had known that she would receive it, quite unconcernedly. Before so many strangers nothing but commonplaces could be exchanged, so after I rose to take leave of my hostess, she rose with and with them disregard of mere formality which distinguished her from the rest of the world, accompanied me to the landing, where I found was, as usual, no guard. She sent him away upon I forget what errand, and as soon as he was gone asked, abruptly, "Have you strength of mind enough to retreat, or has your uncle really sent for you?"

"My uncle has really sent for me, and I have no strength of mind at all," I answered, gloomily.

"Well, well," she rejoined, with a short laugh, "strength of mind, or a capital substitute for it, will come to you if you have patience and wait."

"Will you write to me?" I asked, after a momentary hesitation.

"No," answered she, "I never write letters except on matters of business. But we shall meet again before we are much older."

She held out her hand to me as she spoke, and for the second time I raised it to my lips. And without more words we parted. I did not even ask her when or where our next meeting was to take place, as sure as I that there could be no escaping the mysterious fate to which she had made allusion.

While I was standing pensively on the landing-place, George came running down-stairs. "Have you been bidding a fond farewell to our enemy?" he asked, briskly. "I suppose I ought to, friend?" he asked, briskly. "I suppose I ought to, just to look in and pay my respects."

And shortly afterward he came into my room and I heard that he had done his duty, and had found Lady Constance in one of her most sympathetic moods. "There were lots of people in the room; but she didn't introduce me to any of them, or take the trouble to say a word to me herself, as that I spent a very uncomfortable five minutes. However, I was so glad to think that that was the last I should see of her that I didn't care twopence about her incivility."

ANDREW V. STOUT.

By the death of Mr. ANDREW V. STOUT, ex-President of the National Shoe and Leather Bank, the city loses another of those old merchants whose prosperity for more than half a century has been coincident with her own, and whose names represent the qualities that have made New York great. Mr STOUT died at his summer home in Bernardsville, New Jersey, on the 5th of September, of paralysis, after being in feeble health for about a year, and after having tried in vain to renew his energies by a visit to Europe and a sojourn in the South. His age was seventy-one.

Mr STOUT was a native of New York city, and for ten years a teacher in her public schools, where he saved money enough to start himself in business. As a wholesale dealer in boots and shoes, under the firm name of STOUT & WARD, and afterward of A. V. STOUT & Co., he carried on a very successful trade, and in 1853 was elected on the presidency of the Shoe and Leather Bank—an institution which rated its existence and prestige more to him than to any other man, and with which he was associated during an entire generation. To speak of the Shoe and Leather Bank was for many years only another way of mentioning ANDREW V. STOUT. In the popular estimation the bank was the man, and the man was the bank. Many other financial enterprises were glad to enroll his name. He was a director in the Phœnix Fire-Insurance Company, in the Mutual Gas-light Company, in the New York and Brooklyn Ferry Company, in the Loan and Improvement Company, and in the Broadway Insurance Company.

During the Mayoralty of FERNANDO WOOD Mr. STOUT was appointed City Chamberlain, and for six years he received and disbursed $30,000,000 annually, without mistake or loss. But politics, save as a field where the good citizen must sometimes serve the state, had no attractions for him, and after resigning his Chamberlainship he declined to accept public office. The war found him a Democrat, and made him a Republican and an Abolitionist.

Mr STOUT was a trustee of St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal Church, at Fourth Avenue and Twenty-second Street, a trustee of the Drew Theological Seminary, and a trustee of the Wesleyan University. So long ago as 1828 he became a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and a contributor to its interests and charities. Recently he gave $50,000 above to the two educational institutions just mentioned. He leaves a widow, a son (JESSUP S. STOUT), and two daughters, one of whom is the wife of J. N. EWELL, of this city, and the other the wife of A. F. SOUTHERLAND, of Chicago.

THE CINCINNATI FÊTE.

On the evening of September 6 the streets of Cincinnati were thronged with gay crowds, gathered to witness a procession of twenty-five tableau floats, allegorically illustrating as many consecutive periods in the history of Rome. Although this pageant, conducted under the auspices of the Order of Cincinnatus, was not a part of the Exposition, it had the sanction and co-operation of the Commissioners. The floats were prepared at great expense by the same artisans who made the properties for the late Mardi Gras festivities at New Orleans.

The line of march was two miles in length, and over its full extent the sidewalks were so densely thronged as to render pedestrian travel impossible. Long before the procession began to move, every window on the line of march was filled. Platforms were improvised in front of all business houses. At all the cross streets carriages filled with people were stationed. Gaily colored flags fluttered from nearly every window, and house fronts were profusely hung with Chinese lanterns. It was half past nine when the procession started. The cars, tableaux, and costuming were splendid, and made a fine impression.

RICHFIELD SPRINGS.

Located in the geographical centre of the State of New York, thirty miles south of the city of Utica, is one of the loveliest little valleys in the world. It is but a shallow, hill-surrounded basin, lying at the head of Lake Canadarago, a body of crystal water five miles long by about a mile of average width, which forms one of the sources of the Susquehanna River. The surroundings of this basin are unexcelled for the natural beauty of their scenery in the State; it is 1700 feet above sea-level, and nearly 1200 above the valley of the Mohawk, but all these advantages count for little beside those afforded by its possession of nearly a score of mineral water springs, among which are white sulphur springs that rival in quality those of Virginia. In writing of Richfield Springs, some years ago, Mrs. SIGOURNEY said:

"We visited Richfield, and passed a day very pleasantly. It is a village of hotels and boarding houses, and it was said three thousand visitors were there summering. There is a spring there whose waters we should think would be sufficient to frighten anybody near that ever tasted them, evidently either sulphureted or phosphureted hydrogen. One would think that it must have been buried down into some unearthly laviun menstrum of spoiled eggs. Yet drinking of this spring appears to be one of the things to do in Richfield. We understand that ladies enamelled with bismuth, arsenic, and other mineralic have occasionally been turned all sorts of colors by the vapor of this spring.

"What if there were a moral test of all shams equally searching! For the rest, Richfield has a high, pure air, which is said to be very healthgiving; and it is a fact, we are told, that people who once begin to go there come back year after year with increasing interest."

Mrs. SIGOURNEY was told aright: those who once go to Richfield and place themselves under the spell of its charms never seek to escape from the influence that draws them back year after year to the enchanted abode of health, content, and rest. It is in this way that summer society at Richfield assumes a distinctive character, and is so bound by ties of long acquaintance and sympathy that the stranger outside the circle is apt to characterize it to proud and exclusive. This is true in a sense, though not as those terms are generally understood. Talent, genius, or recognized merit of any kind will afford an entrance into Richfield society that is denied to mere wealth or pretentious display. Of late its members are justly proud, and their exclusiveness is but the desire to bar out from their congenial community the discordant elements that clamorously seek admittance.

The unpleasant odor of the sulphur springs which, as Mr SIGOURNEY truly says, suggests an underground deposit of very badly spoiled eggs, exists at strong to-day as when she wrote, and to it had for centuries before. The first person to take advantage of the medicinal properties of the principal of Richfield's sulphur springs was an Indian doctor, or medicine-man, who lived alone on one of the two islands in Canadarago Lake. Every night he secretly visited the spring which he had discovered on the mainland, and conveyed a portion of its waters to his lodge. Every day during office hours he received patients for whom silurets he prescribed the one all healing remedy. Like many another of his professors before and since, he waxed prosperous and proud, until he audaciously compared his own power to that of the Great Spirit, whereupon the latter hurled a thunder bolt that took the proud doctor, together with his island, to the unfathomable depths of the lake. This is the story that is told to account for the disappearance of one of the Canadarago islands, which did very mysteriously sink to a great depth early in the present century.

During the French and Indian war the commandant of the English troops stationed to Albany ordered a party of sappers and miners to this place to search for sulphur, of which he was greatly in need for the manufacture of gunpowder. They were directed to the spring by an Indian guide, and made a large excavation about ten feet east of it, but failed to reach the coveted deposit.

In 1820 Dr FLORACE MANLEY bought as new of land, from the midst of which flowed the famous waters now known as the "Manley Spring," for $75. He at once proceeded to prepare the spring for public use by excavating to the bedrock and tubing (in order to guide themselves to the spring Dr MANLEY's workmen fastened a white handkerchief to a pole by the road side. A traveller from a distance, who knew nothing of the spring, seeing this signal as he rode that way, supposed it to indicate the presence of small pox, and for self-protection attempted to hold his breath until he had passed the infected locality. His powers of endurance proved insufficient, and directly opposite to the spring he involuntarily drew a breath of the tainted air. Checking his horse, he exclaimed in tones of horror and despair, "O my God!" he cried.

The Richfield Hotel, which was the first to receive visitors at the spring, was opened in 1816. The Spring House of which a view is shown on page 585, was built in 1823 upon ground immediately adjoining the famous Manley spring. The [illegible] which is capable of accommodating at its full guests, is the finest structure of the kind in the village, which was 30 feet by 40 feet and two stories high. The New American, which is the only large rival of the Spring House in the village, stands directly opposite to it, and was built in 1851, upon the site of the Old American, built in 1836, and destroyed by fire in 1850. The hotel could never successfully compete with its rival across the way, because the other possessed a sulphur spring, while, like the poor little pig in Mother Goose, "it had none"; but a propitious fate waited upon its fortunes, and in 1865 according to the local historian, "a rich and copious sulphur spring was discovered in the basement of the hotel, which, upon analysis, was found to be identical with the older company of the Spring House directly opposite. Large and commodious bathing houses were at once constructed, and supplied from this spring, and the latter now offers," etc.

The question naturally suggested is, How did that spring succeed in hiding itself from all observation to a hotel basement for thirty-five years?

The price of board in the first Richfield Springs hotel was $1 25 per week; but, with the discovery of new springs, the price has been raised.

Aside from its springs, Richfield offers more beautiful drives, excursions, pure air, and solid social enjoyment than almost any other resort that can be named. Among its charming excursions is the twelve-mile ride around Canadarago Lake, which lake Miss GREEN has pronounced to be the best stocked with fish of any lake of its size in the State. Wakomita Mountain is, according to a recent writer, "a hill among an ocean of hills." It is but two miles from the Springs, and upon its summit stands an observatory seventy feet high, the view from which the reckless hotel controller declares to be "one hundred miles in extent." The same authority notes the air at this altitude to be "full of electric life and vigor."

Otsego Lake, made famous by the pen of COOPER, and sailed by him "Otsego," is but six miles from Richfield, and is connected with the hotels of the latter place by a tri-daily line of Tally-ho coaches, which add much to the life of the quiet country roads as they dash by.

Two miles from the Springs are the wildly beautiful Van Hornesville caves and water-falls, an idea of which our artists have attempted to convey on page 585.

The pastimes nearer at hand are to be found on the tennis lawn—the coutts of which are always occupied—in the row-boats on the lake, in the dim moon lit aisles of the "Pine Walk," on the hotel piazzas, or at the hops which are given on alternate nights at the rival hotels. These, although aided by excellent music and capital floors, are very select affairs, and more enjoyed by the actors and gazers through the windows from the piazzas than by the performers, who are terribly conscious of the observation and its accompanying criticism.

A gentleman recently returned from Richfield says, "Take it all in all, it is about as pleasant a place in which to spend an idle month as I know of, and there is more going on there than in any quiet place I ever struck."

The latter part of this criticism will probably acquire extra force next week, when the members of the State Republican Convention gather amid the quiet scenes and sylvan beauties of this favored village.

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

The authorities at Port Natal ordered that a vessel be procured which could be used for towing ships into the harbor in all sorts of weather, for throwing water upon fires along the water front, for carrying fresh water in large quantities to ships, for succoring vessels in distress at sea, for dredging along the coast in search of lost anchors and cables, and for blowing up hostile vessels, after the manner of a torpedo-boat. With much labor such a craft has been constructed and launched at Aberdeen. A Yankee builder could have rejoiced to receive such an order, and undoubtedly would have been ready to construct a vessel which could be put not only to all those uses, but in a pinch could be used as a saw-mill, a cheese factory, and a cider-press.

Some flippant persons who were not invited to go to the National Park with Mr Rufus Hatch's party of dukes, reporters, marquises, and other noblemen have been concocting stories of impossible tribulations suffered by Mr HATCH. That gentleman will hardly feel called upon to deny, upon his return, the statement that one of his titled guests purchased necessary and intimate articles of vestment at a store in the picturesque wilderness, and had them charged to the entertainer. The story that another of the noblemen delayed a procession in a Western city by claiming precedence over those of lower rank is equally absurd. The informal associations incident to camp life undoubtedly have heightened the esteem in which Mr HATCH held his guests, as well as that in which they held him, and have added strength to the bonds of friendship between this country and the several monarchies represented in his noteworthy party.

Night sessions of the House of Lords are sometimes characterized by that spirit of rowdyism to appreciate anything in the way of diversion which has become a characteristic of late sessions in Washington. It was in the course of a recent late sitting that Lord FORTESCUE toked the government to introduce into the Agricultural Holdings Bill some provision for alleviating the great hardship now suffered by the family of any clergyman if he died while occupying his glebe, to many clergymen have latterly found themselves reluctantly compelled to do. His lordship's way of putting it produced "roars of laughter."

Not long ago a writer indulged in speculation as to the military strength of China in the event of the full resources of that empire being drawn upon. His conclusion was that China could raise an army large enough to overrun and subdue all Europe by sheer force of numbers. The impending struggle to dislodge the French from Annam will afford an interesting view of what the Flowery Kingdom has learned of the methods of war in the years since its people began to profit by the experience of nations more advanced.

"Is there any one left in America?" asks a correspondent in Paris. Tim says, he says, was never so full of Americans. All the English spoken on the streets, in shops, and to the theatres is the English of Americans. Very few English people are to Paris at this season.

On the centennial of the recognition by Great Britain of the independence of the United States the Toronto Globe recalled the grim jest of George III., who said that England's reason for celebrating the peace was "because things were no worse." The verdict of the world, said the Globe, is that things would have been a great deal worse if the King and his councillors had won a triumph; for "the clock of the universe would have been put indefinitely backward had the American colonists failed in their struggle, and it is difficult to say which of the contestants would have suffered most from such a disastrous ending."

An old post-office employé says that in nearly every instance of the sender writing "In haste" on the envelope the State is omitted from the superscription, and if the sender writes "In haste" in two corners he usually leaves off both the State and the post-office.

Announcement was made in a Roman Catholic church at Atlanta, Georgia, a few Sundays ago, that the male children of Catholic parents should be sent to a school in the basement of the church conducted by the Sisters, and that parents who continued to send children to the city schools would be deprived of the sacraments. About a year ago a similar order affecting the girls of Catholic parents was issued, and was obeyed by all except one family. There is to be no effort on the part of the Catholic Church to secure a division of the money devoted to the public schools in that city.

The three bakers of Cork who were arrested by officers of the Scotch government on the charge of having explosives on their premises were discharged after a brief hearing. It is a scientific fact that yeast and baking powder are among the mildest of explosives.

The American student of the name of Lennig who killed a fellow-student in a duel in Germany and fled to Switzerland has been released from arrest. This action was taken by the government on the ground that duelling is not named in the treaty so as offense for which persons may be subject to extradition.

Members of the President's party in the Yellowstone region were enabled to verify the statement that it is possible to capture a trout in the waters of a lake there, and, without detaching it from the hook, fling it into an adjacent geyser and boil it to suit the angler's taste.

The opening of the Foreign Exhibition in Boston was an auspicious and polyglot occasion. M Duval, of the Paris Municipal Council, spoke in the French tongue, Commissioner HAAS in the German, Commissioner HOOLAGEE in the Japanese, Lee WAN SHIH in the Chinese, and M LABARRIÈRE, representing Spain, in the Spanish. There were also addresses in English. A Boston paper's account of the exercises was printed under the following head lines, which one reproduced literatim: "Vivat Ars et Industria—Eroffnung der Auslandischer Ausstellung—Une Grande Concours Attend les Cérémonies d'Ouverture—Tributes Cordialen al Espirato del Dia." It is presumed that the Latin, in which an address was made, was thrown in in lieu of head-lines in Japanese and Chinese. It would not have been difficult, however, for the writer to prepare lines in those languages which would compare favorably with the others.

THE RAPIDS AT LOW WATER, SHOWING ROCKS.

SHOOTING THE RAPIDS

An enormous crowd of eager spectators gathered last week on the banks of the Niagara River to witness the passage of the new Maid of the Mist through the rapids where the daring Captain Wass was drowned. An old barge was built up to resemble the stout little craft which made the same dangerous trip in 1861. It was, however, an imitation only. There were no wheels in the paddle-boxes, the figure in the wheel-house was made up to resemble a pilot, and the stove-pipe smoke-stack emitted smoke from a cast-off stove. The boat was fifty-two feet long, sixteen wide, and eight in depth.

Soon after two o'clock on the afternoon of September 6 the vessel was towed out from the old Maid of the Mist landing. After some difficulty she was headed down the stream, and soon attained an astonishing rate of speed. She passed under the old railway suspension-bridge in good style, but was whirled stern foremost soon afterward on a tremendous wave. Several revolutions were made before the whirlpool was reached, but never for a moment while in the rapids did the vessel seem in danger of going to pieces, or of being engulfed.

The vessel was headed up-stream when she arrived at the whirlpool. On entering, two revolutions were made in a twinkling, and then the boat shot swiftly to the Canada side, going so far as to be out of the power of the circling waves. It looked for a time as if the vessel would be kept hedged in by the maelstrom. Her revolutions were slow, and she was in sight of the multitude all the time. The water dashed and roared and whirled, seemingly with fury enough to destroy any object coming within the dreadful circle. Finally a number of venturesome spectators climbed down the ledge of rock on the Canada side, and by means of poles pushed the boat off. Then she was taken into the channels, and literally hurled through the water to the open river beyond. She went rapidly with the current to Lewiston, where she was boarded and examined, and was found to be practically uninjured.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF STRIKES.

By PROFESSOR W. G. SUMNER.

THE progress in material comfort which has been made during the last hundred years has not produced content. Quite to the contrary: the men of to-day are not nearly so contented with life on earth as their ancestors were. This observation is easily explainable by familiar facts in human nature. If satisfaction does not reach up the pitch of society, it does not produce content, but discontent. It is therefore a stimulus to more effort, and is essential to growth. If, however, we confine our study of the observation which we have made to its sociological aspects, we perceive that all which we call "progress" is limited by the counter-movements which it creates, and we also see the true meaning of the phenomena which have led some to the crude and silly absurdity that progress makes us worse off. Progress certainly does not make people happier, unless their mental and moral growth corresponds to the greater command of material comfort which they win. All that we call progress is a simple enlargement of chances, and the question of personal happiness is a question how the chances will be used. It follows that if men do not grow in their knowledge of life and in their intelligent judgment of the rules of right living as rapidly as they gain control over physical resources, they still are not happier at all. They still simply accumulate chances which they do not know how to use.

The observation which has just been made about individual happiness also has a public or social aspect which is important. It is essential that the political institutions, the social code, and the accepted notions which constitute public opinion should develop in equal measure with the increase of power over nature. The penalty of failure to maintain due proportion between the popular philosophy of life and the increase of material comfort will be social convulsions which will arrest civilization, and will subject the human race in such a reaction toward barbarism as that which followed the fall of the Roman Empire. It is easy to see that at the present moment our popular philosophy of life is all in confusion. The old codes are breaking down; new ones are not yet made; and even amongst people of standing, to whom we must look to establish the body of public opinion, we hear the most contradictory and heterogeneous doctrines about life and society.

The growth of the United States has done a great deal to break up the traditional codes and creeds which had been adopted in Europe. The civilized world being divided into two parts, one old and densely populated and the other new and thinly populated, social phenomena have been produced which, although completely covered by the same laws of social force, have appeared to be contradictory. The effect has been to disturb and break up the faith of philosophers and students in the laws, and to engender numberless fallacies amongst those who are not careful students. The popular judgment especially has been disordered and misled. The new country has offered such chances to no generation of men has ever had before. It has not, however, enabled any man to live without work, or to heap capital without thrift and prudence. It has not enabled a man to "rise in the world" from a position of ignorance and poverty, and at the same time to marry early, spend freely, and bring up a large family of children.

The men of this generation, therefore, without distinction of class, and with only individual exceptions, suffer from the discontent of an appetite excited by a taste of luxury, but held far below satiety. The power to appreciate a remote future good in comparison with a present one is a distinguishing mark of highly civilized men, but if it is not combined with powers of persevering industry and self-denial, it degenerates into mere day-dreaming and the diseases of an overheated imagination. If any number of persons are of this character, we have morbid discontent and romantic ambition in social traits. Our literature, especially our fiction, bears witness to the existence of classes who are corrupted by these diseases of character. We find classes of persons who are whining and complaining, and who use the organs of public discussion and deliberation in order to put forth childish complaints and impossible demands, while they philosophize about life like the Arabian Nights. Of course this whole tone of thought and mode of behavior is as far as possible from the sturdy manliness which meets the problems of life, and wins victories as much by what it endures as by what it conquers.

Our American life, he its ease, exerts another demoralizing effect on a great many of us. Hundreds of our young people grow up without any real discipline. Life is made easy for them, and their tastes and wishes are consulted too much. They grow to maturity with the notion that they ought to find the world only pleasant and easy. Every one knows this type of young person, who wants to find an occupation which is "not like," and who discusses the drawbacks of difficulty or disagreeableness in anything which offers. The point here referred to is, of course, entirely different from another and still more lamentable fact, that is, the terrible inefficiency and incapability of a great many of the people who are complaining and begging. If any one wants a copy-boy, he will be more saddened than annoyed by the overwhelming applications for the position. The advertisements which are to be found in the canvassing sheets of widest circulation, offering a genteel occupation to be carried on at home, not requiring any previous training, by which two or three dollars a day may be earned, are a proof of the existence of a class to which they appeal. How many thousand people in the United States want just that kind of employment! What a beautiful world this would be if there were any such employment!

Then, again, our social ambition is often silly and mischievous. Our young people despise the occupations which involve physical effort or dirt, and they struggle "up" (as we have agreed to call it) into all the nondescript and irregular employments which are clean and genteel. Our orators and poets talk about the "dignity of labor," and neither they nor we believe in it. Leisure, not labor, is dignified. Nearly all of us, however, have to sacrifice our dignity, and labor, and it would be to the purpose if, instead of declamation about dignity, we should learn to respect, in ourselves and each other, work which is good of its kind, no matter what the kind is. To spoil a good shoemaker in order to make a bad person is surely not going "up," and a man who digs well is by all sound criteria superior to the man who writes ill. Everybody who talks to American school-boys thinks that he does them and his country service if he reminds them that each one of them has a chance to be President of the United States, and our literature with all its times stimulating the same kind of senseless social ambition, instead of inculcating the code and the standards which should be adopted by orderly, sober, and useful citizens.

The consequences of the observations which have now been grouped together are familiar to us all. Population tends from the country to the city. Mechanical and technical occupations are abandoned, and those occupations which are easy and genteel are overcrowded. Of course the persons in question must be allowed to take their own choice, and seek their own happiness in their own way, but it is inevitable that thousands of them should be disappointed and suffer. If the young men abandon farms and trades to become clerks, book-keepers, etc., etc., the consequence will be that the remuneration of the crowded occupations will fall, and that of the neglected occupations will rise. If the young women refuse to do house-work, and go into shops, stores, telegraph offices, schools, etc., the wages of the crowded occupations will fall, while those of domestic servants advance. If women in seeking occupation try to gain admission to some business like telegraphing, in competition with men, they will bid under the men. Similar effects would be produced if a leisure class in an old country should be compelled by some social convulsion to support themselves. They would run down the compensation for labor in the few occupations which they could enter.

Now the question is raised whether there is any remedy for the low wages of the crowded occupations, and the question answers itself. There is no remedy except one to continue the causes of the evil. To strike, that is, to say that the workmen will not work in their chosen line, yet that they will not leave it for some other line, is simply suicide. Neither can any amount of declamation, nor even of law-making, force a man who owns a business to submit the control of it to a man who does not own it. The telegraphers have an occupation which requires training and skill, but it is one which is very attractive in many respects to those who seek manual occupation. It is also an occupation which is very suitable, at least in many of its branches, for women. The occupation is therefore capable of a limited monopoly. The demand that women should be paid equally with men is, on the face of it, just, but its real effect would be to keep women out of the business. It was often said during the telegraphers' strike that the demand of the strikers was just, because their wages were less than those of artisans. The argument had no force at all. The only question was whether the current wages for telegraphing were sufficient to bring out an adequate supply of telegraphers. If the growing boys prefer to be artisans, the wages of telegraphers will rise. If, even at present rates, boys and girls continue to prefer telegraphing to handicraft or housework, the wages of telegraphers will fall. Could, then, a strike advance at a blow the wages of all who are now telegraphers? There was only one reason to hope so, and that was that the monopoly of the trade might prove stringent enough and the public inconvenience great enough to force a concession, which would, however, have been speedily lost again by an increased supply of telegraphers.

Now let us ask what the state of the case would be if it was really possible for the telegraphers to make a successful strike. They have a very close monopoly. Railroad men have a much less effective monopoly. Six years ago they nearly arrested the transportation of the country for a fortnight. They were unable to effect their object. More recently the freight handlers struck against the competition of a new influx of foreign unskilled laborers, and in vain. The printers might make a combination, and try to force an advance in wages by arresting the publication of all the newspapers on a given day, but there are so many persons who could not type, in case of need, that such an attempt would be quite hopeless. In any branch of ordinary handiwork there would be no possibility of creating a working monopoly, or of producing a great public calamity by a strike. If we go on to other occupations we see that housekeepers, clerks, and salesmen could not on a body combine and strike. Much less could coachmen do so. Still less could household servants do so. Finally, farmers and other independent workers could not do it at all. In short, a striker is a man who says, I mean to get my living by doing this thing and no other thing in my share of the social effort, and I do not mean to do this thing except on such and such terms. He therefore proposes to make a contract with his fellow-men, and to dictate the terms of it. Any man who can do this must be in a very exceptional situation. He must have a monopoly of the service in question, and it must be one of which his fellow-men have great need. If, then, the telegraphers could have succeeded in advancing their wages fifteen per cent. simply because they had agreed to ask for the advance, they must have been far better off than any of the rest of their fellow-men.

Our fathers taught us the old maxim, Cut your coat according to your cloth. The popular discussions of social questions seem to be leading up to a new maxim—Demand your cloth according to your coat. The fathers thought that a man in this world must do the best he could with the means he had, and that good training and education consisted in developing skill, sagacity, and thrift to use resources economically. The new doctrine seems to be that if a man has been born into this world he should make up his mind what he needs have, formulate his demands, and present them to "society" or the "state." He wants a congenial and easy occupation, and good pay for it. He does not want to be hampered by any limitations such as come from a world in which wood grows, but not coats; in which iron ore is found, but not weapons and tools, in which the ground will produce wheat, but only after hard labor and self-denial; in which we can eat our cake and keep it; in which two and two only make four. He wants to be guaranteed a "market," so as not to suffer from "overproduction." To private life and in personal relations we already estimate this way of looking at things at its true value, but as soon as we are called upon to deal with a general question, or a phenomenon of industry in which a number of persons are interested, we adopt an entirely conventional and unsound mode of discussion. The sound gospel of industry, prudence, painstaking, and thrift is, of course, unpopular. We all long to be emancipated from worry, anxiety, disappointment, and the whole train of cares which fall upon us as we work our way through the world. Can we really gain anything in that struggle by organizing for a battle with each other? This is the practical question. Is there any ground whatever for believing that we shall come to anything, by pursuing this line of effort, which will be of any benefit to anybody? If a man is dissatisfied with his position, let him strive to better it in one way or another by such chances as he can find or make, and let him inculcate upon his children good habits and sound notions, so that they may live wisely, and not expose themselves to hardship by error or folly; but every experiment only makes it more clear that for men to band together in order to carry on an industrial war, instead of being a remedy for disappointment in the ratio of satisfaction to effort, is only to court new calamity.

JOE BARRETT'S CONFESSION.

By MRS. FRANK McCARTHY.

ONE seventeenth day of August, not many years ago, a party of four, consisting of Joe Barrett and his wife, their most intimate friend Phil Somers, and Miss Maude Mortimer, a young lady they hoped he might be induced to assemble for the future happiness of his existence, stood quite alone upon a narrow strip of sand on the Long Island coast, not far from the great metropolis. Joe Barrett and his wife had long ago been given over by their relatives and friends, and the genial circle of society they adorned, as an old-fashioned couple that prolonged their honey-moon to a most unprecedented and unheard-of period. They had lately celebrated their silver wedding, and for the amusement of others and the romance for themselves would have gone through with the original ceremony again had it not been for a serious obstacle. The clergyman was still alive, and vigorous for his years, and Phil Somers, Joe's best man at his wedding, was yet his best friend, but the pale pretty little bridesmaid had vanished long ago off the face of the earth, and become one of that shadowy band to which "we call, and they answer us again."

There was a rumor that if she had lived she would have become the wife of Phil Somers, thus making the happiness of the four complete. It was currently believed that because of this tender and romantic episode of his life Phil Somers had remained a bachelor. In his younger days the apparent halo of soft regret and compassionate longing lent a melancholy grace to his already pleasing exterior, and many a damsel endeavored to console him; but although he was gentle and even chivalric to all womankind, he remained, to all matrimonial intents and purposes, unconsoled.

And here he was, a bachelor still, fifty years old, getting rather grizzled about the temples and crow-footed about the eyes, bronzed by his partiality for the open air, thin but muscular, tall but straight; while Joe Barrett and his wife might both pass for "fat, fair, and forty," though they were not so many years Phil's juniors.

And here they were, plotting as lively as ever for Phil's connubial bliss. The present victim of their toils, although no longer to her first youth, would have seemed so in any other light but the critical one of sea against sand, and now that thick bands of gray clouds lay heavily across the sky, tempering the brilliancy of the sun's rays, and the young lady had pulled her veil about the coolness of her face, Miss Mortimer seemed at the heyday of her charms.

While waiting for dinner, which was in process of preparation in a long low hostelry a dozen furlongs or so inland, they had strolled down to the water's edge, and, true to the plan in hand, Joe Barrett had pulled his wife's chubby hand through his arm and trotted her away from Phil and the young lady.

"Let's leave them alone together for a while," said Joe. "It seems a propitious time for love-making, and I hope something will come of to-day's trip, Polly; I'm getting awfully tired of working like a pack-horse for Phil's happiness."

While strolling along, they indulged in a spirited conversation about Phil and the matrimonial projects in which they had been engaged on his account. At last Joe remarked, looking fondly at his wife: "I'd be the happiest fellow in the world if Phil could be happy too."

His wife shook her arm impatiently.

"See here, Joe," she said, "I think you are absurd about Phil Somers, and you may as well understand, once for all, that if this thing falls through, I'm not going to bother about him or crying at all. It's none of your business or mine. I don't believe he wants to marry, anyway. Some natures are so constituted that they can only love once, and I believe all the love Phil had to give any one was squandered long ago on our poor little bridesmaid. After all, there's something very sweet and touching in his remaining faithful to the one memory all these years."

Joe shifted uneasily from one foot to the other. He picked up a stone, and sent it tangedly skimming over the water.

"Polly," he said, "I think I'll take a plunge in the sea, it will tone me up, and give me an appetite for dinner. There's a bathing man in one of the little cribs behind us."

"Look at that big black cloud, Joe"

"I won't stay in long, Polly." He gave his wife a tender squeeze, looked down upon her with an expression that seemed to say he'd like her if it wouldn't shock Miss Mortimer's sense of propriety, ran up to the bathing house, and to the surprise of Phil and Miss Mortimer, presently disappeared in a huge green wave that covered them with its spray.

"Joe is a regular water-dog," said Phil.

Miss Mortimer made no reply. She had not come down to the sea-shore that day to listen to lamentations of Joe Barrett and his wife. Miss Mortimer felt that she had no time to lose, and was resolved to waste no words upon Joe Barrett's maritime proclivities.

Phil, however, kept his eyes upon Joe as he swam out to the open sea, and went on talking about him without requiring any special reply.

"Joe is a little impulsive and reckless perhaps," said Phil, "but he's a capital companion"

"It is growing cold," said Miss Mortimer, contracting her shoulders in that graceful way that some women have of making even a shrug attractive.

Phil remembered with remorse that her way was hanging forgotten upon his arm. He hastened to put it about her shoulders, but the wind, which was rising to a gale, made the effort a prolonged one.

"Don't you hate the wind?" said Miss Mortimer, coquettishly

"I am never ungrateful," said Phil, capturing the ends of the shawl again, and holding them fast this time about her slender form. A keen look of inexplicit triumph flashed from Miss Mortimer's eyes. Phil's words always seemed to mean so much more than they said. And she could not, unfortunately, see that his eyes too still looking fixedly over her head upon the water beyond the surf.

A shaft or two of wild light flashed down upon the scene. An enormous rumble from the clouds mingled with the roar of the sea. Suddenly the earth and sky were enveloped in a blinding gust. In the spectral light Phil distinctly saw Joe Barrett fling his arms wildly aloft, and disappear in the darkening waste.

Phil threw off his shoes and his coat and began to run to the sea, and Miss Mortimer had great difficulty in rescuing her coat, which she nearly carried out by a returning wave. He came up drenched with the spray, and the nearly lost her footing, but she saved the waistcoat, which contained Phil's watch and other valuables. Then she hurried to the shelter of the bathing house, for the rain now began to fall heavily. Through the blackness of the storm she saw the white face of a woman. Miss Mortimer knew it was Mrs. Barrett running wildly down to the water, but she attempted no remonstrance. She had made up her mind that of the party of four that went down to the sea that day two would probably never return, perhaps three. It was impossible to say what might happen where such impulsive people were concerned.

Some men from the inn were now running to the scene of peril, and finding it impossible a ladies Mrs. Barrett to seek shelter, had drawn about her a rough tarpaulin, from the harsh folds of which her haggard face and wind-blown hair was a sorry sight to see.

The two bodies were now coming in atop of the foaming surf, with no help or hindrance if their own, and closely locked together, were swept swiftly ashore with other prey of the elements. They were narrowly rescued from the greedy arms of the returning wave, and carried amid all speed to the little inn, where everything was in readiness to restore consciousness in the one, and better it in the other.

The storm passed away as suddenly as it came. The pale glow of twilight deepened into night. There was no moon, but the stars shone over the bay and the harbor and the dusky little promontory. To look at the gentle ripples of water lapping lazily along upon the soft white sand, Phil could hardly believe that so little time ago two men had been done almost to their death. He could scarcely stagger out into the wooden porch of the inn to breathe the cold sea-scented air. And no fear for Joe, God only knew what would befall him. He had been brought back a life, but not to consciousness. Polly had ventured to get word to the town physician, but the way was long, and the sand was heavy.

It must have been about midnight. Phil could not tell the exact time. His watch was in his waistcoat, under Miss Mortimer's head, in the bed of the invalids. Phil had told them not to touch or disturb them. Miss Mortimer; under any circumstances, be possible to say how glad he was. The knock at the door clicked behind him. Phil's heart took

He was afraid Miss Mortimer had, after all, been awakened. But a faltering, uncertain step reached him, and the cold hand of Polly Barrett clutched his arm.

Any one but Phil would never have known her. The last remnant of her soft round comeliness seemed swept away with the storm. All her womanly crimps and fripperies were gone. She wore an ill-fitting gown of the landlady's. Her whole face was of a wan gray pallor, like the waves under the cold light of the stars.

"Is Joe better?" stammered Phil. "Does he know—"

"He knows everything, and perhaps he's better. Oh, Phil! Phil!" Polly repressed her sobs, and motioned Phil to the door. "He is determined I shall try and get some sleep, and that you shall watch with him for a while. As if I could sleep! But go to him, Phil; don't thwart him—go."

Phil went in to Joe. He will never forget the low cabin room, the two wooden chairs, the pine table, thereon a mug of ragged wick floated from a saucer of oil, the bottle of liquor within reach, and the coarse green glass, the grim old clock in the corner ticking off the seconds, and Joe's ghastly face and motionless form upon the camp cot in the corner. Joe tried to stretch out his hand to Phil, but it fell back heavily upon the patchwork quilt of the landlady.

"You did your best, Phil," he said. "you brought me ashore, but the trouble was done out there—something seized me, God knows what—paralysis, cramps, palsy—who can tell? Anyway, I'm done for, old man. I can't move a muscle below. It's a mere question of time, Phil, and we can't afford to lose any."

"I hope you'll be strong, Joe, and I know better than the doctor comes. You were right not to tell Polly. But she must come to you, Joe."

Phil would have gone at once for Polly, but something in Joe's face held him back.

"Hold on a bit, Phil. I didn't send for you and drive Polly away to tell you something that you'll both know soon enough. There's a bullet as my companion, Phil, it's been lying there for a pleasanter of lead all these years. Listen to me, and don't interrupt me if you can help it. Give me some of that stuff from the bottle, and when I grow weaker give me more."

Phil lifted Joe's head and put the glass to his lips, then he sat down upon the edge of the cot, leaving his arm between Joe's neck and the pillow. Joe could feel Phil's pulse now and the loyal heart of his friend beating close to his own.

"It's twenty five years, Phil," said Joe, "since that night we drove down to the shore here and had that talk together. You remember it, Phil?"

"Yes, Joe."

"Ah! you've remembered it too well, Phil. I've tried hard enough, God knows, to make you forget. The sun was sinking over yonder in the west, and sky and sea were all ablaze. Some flower clouds dropped down over the distant shore as we had entered some stanza. I remember it as I see Polly that night. The dress she wore was a little stuff, it was of some soft woolen material that reminded me of the woolly clouds over the old shed. You didn't cut the stanza, Phil. You dallied with the shells, and turned them over with the queer old fork they had given you. And all at once you put them aside, and lighted a cigar and turned your face to the sea, and began to talk of a woman you secretly loved. Now give me some wine, Phil."

Phil put the glass again to Joe's lips. "Don't talk any more, Joe," he said. "Let me go for Polly."

"Not yet," said Joe. "You were a boy then, Phil, twenty-five years ago. As you sat on the bulk of the woman you secretly loved, some sort of a light shone upon your face from the splendor in the west that made it like that of an archangel. It seemed to me that no woman could withstand you. My heart grew like a lump of lead. My first thought was to walk out on the water and strangle myself, me next was worthy of Judas Iscariot. It was a struggle to believe you. I must have been tempted by the devil, for, as God is my judge in the awful moment of my life I never dreamed before that night that you and I were in love with the one woman. I got upon my feet and shouted, 'She is mine!' giving upon you with a dogged, resolute stare. 'Have you, then, asked her to marry you?' you said, and your face still looked like an archangel's, while mine must have been inflamed with the passion that beset a man beyond his strength. As I repeated, 'She is my promised wife,' the words seemed to leap from a threat of fire. It was the first downright, hideous, malicious lie I ever uttered, for I had not yet asked her—I had not yet asked her, but when I did ask her, upon that very night, the next lie slipped easily from my perjured throat, though it was a worse one by far. For I told Polly, Phil—I told her before I asked her to marry me—that you had confessed to me your love for her friend, the poor little girl that afterward became our bridesmaid. Whether it was my guilty conscience, that makes hell enough for any man, I fancied I saw something in Polly's eyes that told me, but it not been for my treachery, your chance would have been better than mine. Now take your arm away from my neck, Phil, and curse me if you will—my story is done."

The pulse at Joe's ear leaped and tugged as if it would burst an artery, but Phil's voice had the old tender ring.

"You might have spared yourself all this," he said. "I think Polly has proved who it was that she loved."

"Ah, after that night, Phil, yes. Polly is not the kind of woman to make the misery of men. But I cheated you of your chance—I cheated you of your chance!"

"So it is, Joe. I forgive you, and I love you all the same. Now throw off the burden, and live for Polly's sake and mine."

"Too late, too late," faltered the failing lips. They refused to touch the glass. The limp body fell back almost lifeless in Phil's arms. Then Joe aroused himself once more, and called for Polly in a harsh, strained voice that reached her despite the roar of the sea. She flew to his side, but was only in time to catch a few indistinct, disjointed sentences. With a last effort the dying man lifted the hands of his wife and his friend, joined them together, clasped his own about them, and as the three remained till the end of Joe Barrett fled.

"And if there could be such a thing as witchcraft," said Miss Mortimer to some friends, the other day, "Joe Barrett's widow would have been burned at the stake long ago. She was pretty well on in years when Joe died, and I'll leave it to anybody if she don't look like a blonde mummy now. Phil Somers has that air of distinction and elegance about him that he might marry almost any body; Joe Barrett's widow is old and ugly and sick and poor, but I shouldn't be at all surprised if Phil Somers would marry her yet."

THE LAWN TENNIS CHAMPION.

MR. RICHARD D. SEARS, whose portrait is given on page 581, enjoys the distinction of being the first and only lawn tennis champion of the United States. The championship was instituted in the summer of 1881, and was won by Mr. Sears, who succeeded in defending his title in the honor in the following year, and again in the National Tournament lately held at Newport. In partnership with Dr. James Dwight he holds also, for the present year, the four handed championship, and while at Harvard, from which university he graduated last June, he won the lawn tennis championship at that place. Mr. Sears has not quite reached manhood for a good tennis player, as he is a temper which is apparently nothing can disturb, and while this has doubtless won him many a hard fought match, it has certainly served for him an undoubted popularity not only among those whom he has met on the tennis field, but also among all who have come within the influence of his sunny disposition. Mr. Sears is destined for the profession of the law.

THE OLD COURTHOUSE, ALBANY.

THE OLD CAPITOL IN ALBANY.

By FREDERIC G. MATHER.

At the [illegible] of the Revolution the old Dutch city of Albany had [illegible] to be the capital of the State, and the [illegible] of the Legislature [illegible] it. [illegible] to the most eligible [illegible] of the period, which was the old Stadt Huis, or City Hall, in Pearl street. Hither had come the Legislature, [illegible] with the exception of [illegible] years, ever since. Hither had come the clergy to call them to order, with prayer, and hither had come the lawyers to argue before them. Hither had come the petty and the gross, while within its walls had been inflicted many a penalty for theft, and a few for murder, even the extreme penalty of death for burglary, and arson or the passing of counterfeit Spanish dollars.

To where a building with such forbidding surroundings and associations was the State of New York in 1797. It was mostly building Lawyers and Lawyers were its officers, Jay, Monroe, Lansing, Lowell and Kent were Chief Justices, and Van Vechten and Metcalf were District Attorneys. Here Alexander Hamilton's eloquent protest against the common law of libel did not save Henry Croswell, but it forced the enactment of the law as it now stands. Here the Sedition laws were abolished, and here Phelps and Spencer had his revenge upon Burr by succeeding him in the United States Senate.

The Albany of that time was solidly built on ground from half way up the State Street hill, and the extent along the river bank was scarcely half a mile. A few of the streets were paved with cobble-stones, while the Rutten Kill and other creeks flowed down through the very heart of the city. The sload and herring fisheries flourished, and transportation was figured by the "skippers" at so much for a barrel of rum as the unit of measurement—a bushel of wheat serving as the unit in those more modern and degenerate days. The battles between the wide and the narrow sidewalks had just been fought, and the community was stirred to its depths by the decree of the Council that gutter spouts should not project over the walks. The old Dutch Church cumbered the ground at the junction of State Street with Broadway, and all about it stood loads of hay waiting for purchasers. Market-houses were then located in Broadway, near Maiden Lane, and in State Street, about half way up the hill. Eliphalet Nott, D.D., was preaching in a new Presbyterian church in South Pearl Street until, in 1804, he accepted the presidency of Union College, with almost the same breath that he delivered an oration upon the life and death of Alexander Hamilton, son in law of the gallant Peter Schuyler, whose death was recorded in the same year. Aaron Burr had already left the more humble abode in James Street to occupy the mansion in Washington Avenue—now the Fort Orange Club—where, in an upper room, he plotted against the life of the individual and the State.

From the first occupancy of the old Stadt Huis by the State it was evident that the quarters were too limited to be shared for State, county, and city purposes. Therefore, in 1804, a law was passed entitled "An act making provisions for improving Hudson River below Albany, and for other purposes." This was a very common form of enrolling the titles of bills in those days, when "an act to supply New York city with pure and wholesome water" meant also the incorporation of the Manhattan Bank in the said city. The bill, among the "other purposes," provided that the State should pay $10,000 toward the erection of a new building, that the Stadt Huis should be sold, and the proceeds applied thereon, that the city and county of Albany might raise $6000 between them to supply deficiencies, and that—as was common at that time as a means of raising money for colleges and schools—certain managers of lotteries should also raise $12,000 for the same general purpose. The Commissioners for the erection of the new building were John Taylor, Daniel Hale, Philip S. Van Rensselaer (then and for several years afterward Mayor of Albany), Simon De Witt, and Nicholas Quackenbush. The old Court-house was sold for $17,200, and matters lind so far progressed that the corner stone of the State house was laid on the 23d of April, 1806. The Albany Register (published by John Barber, printer to the State, at Faust's Statue) has nothing to say about this interesting local event, although one may read with columns very strange things about the Federalists, and also speculations as to the Presidential prospects of De Witt Clinton, of New York, John Langdon, of New Hampshire, and James Madison and James Monroe, of Virginia. The Daily Advertiser of April 25, however, has the brief note

"On Wednesday, the 23d of April, the corner-stone of the State-house was laid by Hon. Philip S. Van Rensselaer, as grand master of the Chancellor, Judges of the Supreme Court, members of the corporation, State officers, [illegible] and other citizens. The stone was laid in the south-east corner of the building, and was let down to its place in the midst of a band of music. The building is one hundred feet by eighty, on an imposing plan uniting both elegance with great convenience and durability."

Of course the new building, like all public buildings, went several times the amount of the original estimate. In 1811 on their final account for the Commissioners [illegible] one per cent of [illegible] which they allowed them to [illegible]. These expenses footed up as follows, according to certain papers accompanying the Message of Governor Lewis in 1819:

Paid by the State	$75,000 43
Paid by the City	34,200 00
Paid by the County	4,000 00
Total	$113,200 43

Then we see that the New Commissioners reported themselves to the interests of the State for a space of ten years, and received therefor the [illegible] sum [illegible] of $1000 each for [illegible] years' service. Verily that was a day of small things as compared with the [illegible] expenditures of our most known as "the New Capitol."

The new structure was called the State house, and [illegible] the Legislature decreed that it shall hereafter be known as the Capitol." Phillips Hall "the town of Arbor Hill," was the name by which the knoll selected for the Capitol had been called for many years. Hither had been sent the stones at every Easter week of merry making to decorate their bonnets and shoes like with wild honeysuckle or May apple a custom that was forbidden by the Council of the city after the Capitol was built. As a preparation for more nightly approaches to the new edifice the State ordered the corporation of Albany to clear the scrubby pine and huckleberries from the hill, and grade the same as the Commissioners of the Capitol should direct. The approaches must have been bare enough for many years—the elm saplings, one giant tree, affording no protection from the scorching rays of the eastern sun.

The building is an oblong—80 feet upon the eastern or main front, and 115 feet on the side. The bare expanse of wall upon the longer sides is broken by no recreating or projecting masses, save the throwing up of a gable in the centre. The skylines is simply interested with a "hip roof," out of the centre of which arises a cupola—Ionic and Doric combined—surmounted by a dome holding a statue of Themis. In front the sombre walls of Nyack freestone are relieved by window trimmings and an Ionic portico, in terra-style, of gray marble from the Berkshire hills. It shakes the observer's faith in the fathers to discover that the forty-foot columns are merely veneers of marble upon piers of brick, and that they have been reeded, instead of fluted, in order to make the deception more easy. The establishers of this portico of great pretensions is of wood, and the pediment (in the tympanum of which the State arms here, very properly, never been placed) is of the same ignoble material. The cornices which seem to promise as much here never held the statues for which they waited so long, while the apex of the pediment supports an urn, also wooden, and totally innocent of decoration.

Whether the architecture is correct or not, let others dispute. It was [illegible] enough when it was built. We may interest ourselves in the quaintly carved doorways upon the north and south sides, the strangely proportioned round-topped windows in the story above, the central ornaments with flowers and fruits still one story higher, and the half moon windows in the gables which overlook all those specimens of stone-work handed down from a day when carving was in its infancy on this side of the Atlantic. The sundial upon the southward corner must claim our notice, the weather-beaten and storm-eaten bequest of a stone-cutter in the State when Simon De Wevc was Surveyor General, in 1823. Nor must we overlook the iron "dogs" that have remained in the opposing Ionic columns of the portico ever since that day in 1835 when they supported a temporary platform on which Lafayette received his numerous visitors. As a whole, the exterior of the building remains precisely as it was originally built, save that the rear, or western, wall was moved outward about twelve feet in 1854. This wall contains a tablet with the following inscription:

ERECTED
Pursuant to a law of the State passed March, 1804.

PHILIP S. VAN RENSSELAER, Mayor,
ABRAHAM VAN VECHTEN, Recorder.

JOHN TAYLOR, P. S. VAN RENSSELAER,
SIMON DE WITT, DANIEL HALE,
Commissioners.

Anno 1806

From the steps of the eastern or main front Governors Seymour and Fenton received regimental after regiment at the mustering out in the stormy days of 1861-5. Covered by that lofty portico, many a political orator has harangued the crowd below, while within the rooms topped doorway was the imposing hall or vestibule who suffered an open space fifty-eight feet long and forty feet wide, before the front corners were taken into two of the adjoining rooms. As it originally stood, this hall—with its squares of Italian pavement and its double row of Etruscan columns—was a noted place for political gatherings. Here a great throng listened to the consequence of Henry Clay, and here, upon the broad landing of the stairway, Jackson took the gallant national oath from Walcott, last of the Chancellors. No room in the State of New York—and perhaps no room in the country—can tell so many and such interesting stories of political adventure and intrigue as the Executive Chamber in the northeast front of the building. A single window of large proportions is all that either of the outer walls can show, while the inner sides are occupied with heavily wood doors. An old fashioned fire-place in the corner is all that remains to relieve the plain surroundings. Set from within these walls Tourgee protested in Legislature lest it should incorporate the Ku Klux of North America. Clinton, criticised for being so many offices in his grasp, fled proclaimed an annual Thanksgiving, fought the "bank interest" of Tammany, sustained himself against Tallmadge and all others who denounced his "personal politics," vindicated his canal policy, refused railroad positions, and died in the [illegible], because his duty was to the people of New York. Yates, with equal honors, divided the terms of Clinton; Van Buren rested but a year on his way to the cabinet, the Vice Presidency and the Presidency. Tilden declared that, of all parties, the Jacksonian Democrats alone conserved the public good. Marcy, bosom friend of Van Buren, protested against the era of speculation which brought on the panic of '37, while he pulled the "Albany Regency" through the prosperous days that carried Buchan into Jackson's cabinet, made Van Buren the successor of Jackson, and, in later years, made himself Polk's Secretary of War and Pierce's Secretary of State. Seward, first triumph of the Whigs, commenced a national career. Bouck, Wright (nominated to pull Polk through), Young, Dix, Hunt, Seward, Flagg, Throop, Wolcott, Morgan ("the great War Governor"), Fenton, Horatio Ely Tilden, Robinson, and Cornell—all of these distinguished Governors occupied the Executive Chamber in turn.

Since 1831—the date when the city and county of Albany sold their rights in the building to the State—the Adjutant-General occupied the corner room directly opposite the Executive Chamber, and from this head-quarters went forth the orders that put New York troops in line for the Mexican war and for the war of 1861-5. Closely connected with this room are the names of Dix, King, Platt, Townsend, Read, Hillhouse, Bradish, Ingham, Arthur, Merritt, and Martin.

The original Senate-chamber was a room in the southwest corner of the building, 80 feet long, 20 feet wide, and 28 feet high, the galleries being lighted by a ran of windows above. In this last-like apartment the Senate of 1823 refused to confirm Governor Yates's nominee for Judge because they were "imposed of political heroism." The Senate, however, did not [illegible] to appoint the State officers after a "Legislative caucus." Here also took place the belt of "the seventeen Senators" in 1824, which resulted, first, in the election of John Quincy Adams to the Presidency, and finally in giving the election of Presidential electors over to the people—a movement that led to the machinery of nominating conventions.

After the removal of the city and county courts and offices to the new City Hall, in 1832, the [illegible] occupied the front room in the [illegible] a chamber 80 feet long, 40 feet [illegible] 20 high to the springing of the [illegible] Palmer Kane, [illegible] and a host of legal lights, and [illegible] name for [illegible] room are their decorations. [illegible] of the successive General Halls have been [illegible] on trial for the [illegible] ider of Dodrich, [illegible] other of the successive the newly [illegible]

OLD SENATE-HOUSE AT KINGSTON.

THE OLD CAPITOL.

Senate stored its library, or prepared the nucleus of the larger library belonging to the State. Within the chamber raised platforms served for galleries. The President's desk was placed against the northern and afterward against the southern wall. The huge wooden columns that supported the shallow dome were removed in time, and the portraits of GEORGE CLINTON and CHANCELLOR LIVINGSTON beamed serenely upon the Senate whether angry, moody, or apathetic.

To relate the anecdotes that might be told of great men—or of little men fancying themselves great—who sat within the Senate-chamber would fill a volume. How TWEEDLE's dark deeds were appropriately compassed in the dark corner of the room; how MACALLISTER spent the major part of the time in pacing the corridors, with a cigar for his companion; how the lights were turned down upon a certain namable Senator while he slept an inebriated sleep in his chair, and on awaking, in the middle of the night, inquired, "Well, Tom, how's this?" and how the stenographer palmed off to a sobered Senator as his own a speech that some one else had delivered, and ordered written out in "long hand," but which had never been called for.

The Assembly-chamber—50 feet broad, 80 feet deep, and 28 feet high—occupies the northwest corner upon the first floor. It was for its day rather above the average of public rooms, with the double rows of windows at the north the longer windows at the west, the high galleries, the Pompeian frescoes, the scarlet canopy over the Speaker's desk, and the mural clock, which showed the time in the Senate-chamber also. The desks of the members were built in sections, like those of back country supervisors—when they have any. Even the Speaker for many years had no office but his hat, and the clock had no secret apartments to hide the person hostile to it. The meetings of committees were held in the private rooms of their chairmen, and those chairmen frequently read their reports from the Clerk's desk. The members then remained over Sunday, and they often met in evening sessions, each with a candle at his desk. No one of them ever thought of [illegible] else than going to the Tompkins Market for his pay, and to the Albany post-office for his mail.

No brief sketch like this can do justice to the many reminiscences that linger around the old Capitol, which looms forth solitary and lonely in its age. It has been on hand to celebrate its centenary with many hands. Whose shall it be to write of the history and ruins of the Capitol which then we place, and what shall he write?

THE LOUISVILLE EXPOSITION.

It is gratifying to learn that the Louisville Exposition is now in the full tide of success. Every available foot of space is occupied with exhibits, and the daily attendance averages more than five thousand visitors. It is really a splendid industrial and art display of the most varied and attractive character, by far the finest and most extensive that was ever organized in a Southern city.

Our sketches on page 589 afford a glimpse of the tastefully arranged art gallery, in which many interesting and valuable works are displayed, of the admirable model farm, a scene in the beautiful park, and a train of the electric railway. The latter is in constant operation, and attracts multitudes of patrons.

THE MULTICHARGE GUN.

Curiosities in ordnance are the rule at the government testing ground at Sandy Hook, New Jersey, and the Lyman Haskell machine rifle is a unique example both in appearance and theory.

The inventor, J. R. Haskell, has labored for twenty years to perfect the piece. His previous experiments with guns of small calibre, were not of an entirely satisfactory character.

The present gun, an admirable example of founder and machine-shop work, was shipped from the Scott Foundry, at Reading, Pennsylvania, in July. Before mounting the gun at Sandy Hook it was found necessary to increase the weight of the breech by means of a re-enforce, in order to obtain a more perfect balance upon the trunnions.

The principle of the gun is to burn an unusual quantity of powder, and by dividing the charge to avoid excessive strain at any single point in the bore of the piece. The steel shot has a length of three diameters, and its base is fitted with brass in which is worked a series of grooves intended to take the riding cleats. This, together with the sabot, of several thicknesses of pole leather, which is used between the shot and the cartridge, will, it is believed, prevent the escape of gas and flame, which would probably ignite the pocket charges in front instead of in the rear of the advancing shot.

Congress has appropriated the liberal sum of $30,000 to defray the expenses of experiment, and Mr Haskell proposes to devote some time to preliminary work before making any special public exhibition of the gun.

At first the eighteen or twenty pound breech charge—varying the size of grain—will be used, and the result noted upon pressure gauges. The breech charge and the first pocket will then be used, and so on until the four accelerating charges are brought into action.

Mr Haskell expresses entire confidence in the ultimate success of his piece, and if his hopes are realized, there can be little question as to the difficulty of constructing a ship that will float the recoil necessary to resist a bolt which strikes at anything less than an acute angle. The service charges for ordnance used during the late war have been doubled and quadrupled for experimental purposes. A shot recently fired from a fifteen inch smooth-bore let daylight through a foot thickness of iron, which was solidly backed by two feet of timber.

Mr. Haskell thinks that he can increase the length of his shot to five diameters, or thirty inches. Urged along by more than a hundred pounds of active powder, such a projectile would be practically irresistible.

In all trials of ordnance at the testing ground great care is taken to prevent accident. The guns are fired by electricity from a convenient one hundred-proof, and a massive screen of timber is rolled between the piece and the building used as offices and laboratory. Frames strung with wires are placed at certain intervals in front of the piece, and an automatic register of rapidity of flight is obtained electrically.

In the abandoned granite fortification near by are antiquated eight-inch Columbiads whose carriages have rotted away and fallen in pieces, as useless as the guns themselves in this day of ponderous rifles. A few 100 pounder Parrott rifles mounted on iron carriages are ready for service, but they are in a masonry work, from which any one who has "been there" during a bombardment would gladly escape to a sand-bank or a gopher hole.

THE NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The 3d of September was a day of festivity in the beautiful city of Minneapolis. The announcement that Mr Villard and his guests would stop there on their way to witness the driving of the golden spike on the Northern Pacific Railroad caused the citizens to make great preparations to give their visitors a hearty welcome and fitting reception.

For several days people were busy fashioning mottoes and designing and executing novelties in the way of decoration; and when the hour of noon arrived all the business houses in the principal thoroughfares were lavishly adorned with emblems, flags, and mottoes. At the intersection of Nicollet Avenue from the First National Bank across to Harrison Hall was a representation of a section of the Northern Pacific Bridge over the Missouri River at Bismarck, with a miniature train of cars upon it. Between the bank block and the Johnson block across the alley, facing the Nicollet House, was an accurate representation of the Minnehaha Falls, the water falling over and through a mass of evergreen. Across Hennepin Avenue, at the intersection of Washington Street, was a representation of a section of the Manitoba viaduct, now being built across the river at Minneapolis, and over which, as leased tracks, the Northern Pacific trains will run from the eastern terminus in this city to connect with the St. Louis boats at the landing down the river. Across the avenue was another magnificent arch, and still another spanned the street in front of the Windom block, while all along the avenue were novel mottoes and decorations. One of the most striking was on the Windom block, where, among other things, were piled a huge stack of four barrels, with the mottoes: "Give us the wheat, and we will feed the world." But it would require more space than we have at command to describe all the decorations that gave the city a holiday appearance.

About half past one carriages containing Mr Villard and his guests, preceded by mounted police, were driven to the Nicollet House. As the company alighted they were greeted with cheers by the thousands who occupied every available inch of space in front of the grand stand erected in front of the hotel, and filled the windows of the adjoining buildings. The appearance of President Arthur on the platform was greeted with round upon round of cheers, and when General Washburn stepped forward and introduced Secretary Lincoln, the vast audience gave him a greeting no less demonstrative than that which followed the appearance of Generals Grant and Sheridan a moment later.

Soon after, the procession, as arranged, began its march past the grand stand. First came wagons containing reminders of the early days of Minnesota, representative Indians, some seated in birch bark canoes, log cabins, early-day stage-coaches, and the inevitable "prairie schooner," containing an immigrant and his family, with their possessions. Then came a wagon filled with baggage, representing the early days of the express business. After these came models, complete to the minutest details, of the Washburn and Pittsburgh mills, and wagons containing machinery from the mills. The lumber interest was represented by a number of wagons, the first containing a large log, anhewn and unsawed, and the last a house in process of erection. Many of the vehicles containing machinery were arranged with leather bands attached to the hubs of the wheels, so that the machinery was kept running during the entire parade.

The festivities of the day were concluded by a very pleasant though harried banquet at the Hotel Lafayette, on the banks of Minnetonka Lake, tendered by the City Council of St Paul. The party had remained but a short time in the latter city in the morning. An immense procession greeted their arrival at the railway station, and cheered the party with great enthusiasm when the train departed for Minneapolis.

FRENCH AND GERMAN SOCIALISM IN MODERN TIMES.

By Richard T. Ely, Ph.D., Associate Professor of Political Economy in the Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, and Lecturer on Political Economy in Cornell University, Ithaca, N.Y. 16mo, Cloth, 75 cents.

Mr. Ely, who has devoted special attention to the study and exposition of economic and social subjects, has contributed in this work a very readable sketch of the various socialist systems, their objects, methods, principles, and history. The outline is in popular form, and affords much information which is not easily accessible. Mr. Ely's style is clear, concise, and forcible, and the temper in which he discusses the doctrines of the various socialistic teachers is calm and philosophical. The book is a valuable addition to the literature of a subject which is of profound and practical interest at the present time. It is destined to have a wide reading, and to serve an excellent purpose in throwing light upon the tendencies of the systems projected by thinkers who would shield mankind, by social or state regulations, from the inexorable operation of economic laws.

NEW YORK AND MASSACHUSETTS.

ON the day that this paper is issued the Republican Conventions of New York and of Massachusetts will assemble, and their action will have a very great influence upon the election of next year. The political situation is very obscure. There is always an impulsive element in political action which can not be foreseen, and which produces results like that of last year. Feelings long and slowly accumulating, distastes and disgusts, sudden perceptions and the revelation of petty trickery, like the forged telegram at Saratoga, lead to what is called a tidal wave, as the slowly gathering snows upon the Alps suddenly sweep down in a resistless avalanche. There is this condition of suspense in the public mind at the present time, a general sentiment of doubt and uncertainty, and the tone and spirit of the two Conventions will go very far to prove either that the Republican party responds to the popular desire and feeling, or that it does not understand them. In Massachusetts the issue is well defined by ex-Governor TALBOT in his letter declining to be a candidate for the nomination. "The great duty of the hour," he says, is "to overthrow Butlerism and what it stands for in the State and nation." This is a terse and complete statement. Butlerism is a word describing the mean, personal, unmanly, corrupt, degrading system of mercenary politics, the spirit which sneers at political honesty and decency as womanish and Sunday schoolish, and extols corruption, dishonesty, and contemptible trickery as masculine and stalwart politics. This is the very spirit which the history of the last year shows that the people are determined to overthrow. They may have to fight hard for victory, and in Massachusetts they certainly will.

This is not surprising. It is because this spirit, when once intrenched, is so powerful and not easily subdued that it is so dangerous. But it is the perception of this fact that produced the popular uprising last year, and extorted from an unwilling and incredulous Congress the passage of the reform bill. Our politics to-day are the contest with that spirit, the endeavor to take the complete political supremacy out of the hands of a squad of political leaders, and restore it to the people. If in New York the action of the Republican Convention shall show that the Republican party intends honestly to lead this movement, the party will touch shoulders with the Massachusetts brethren, and prepare for national victory next year. Its success in the State and in the country will depend upon its true estimate of the situation, its faith in the people, and its courage. The true estimate of the situation includes a clear conception of the nature of the independent vote. In 1879, when we replied to a correspondent that if a Republican was resolved not to support certain candidates, and yet did not wish to record himself against the party, he must scratch the offensive names, there was a tremendous uproar, and the scratchers were denounced and ridiculed with the whole vituperative force of the language. But they defeated the party, and the scratched candidates succeeded only by the Democratic division. In 1881 the same spirit overthrew Mr. CONKLING; and in 1882 it so fully animated the party that the Republican nominations in New York were overwhelmed by Republicans.

In 1883 that spirit is still stronger, and it must be heeded. The address of the Independent Conference in Massachusetts, which represents the conviction of those who will decide the election in both States, can not be too deeply pondered by the Republican Convention in New York. The address says:

"Office as a public trust to be administered for the benefit of the people and not of the party is what the people rightfully demand, and any party that would replace the present administration must be pledged to something purer and better. The time has passed when a nomination means an election, and the people are more critical than ever before of the men and the principles offered to their choice. As Independents, we rejoice at this, and no desire for temporary success will lead us to the support of weak or untrustworthy men. Party platforms have become traps for the unwary, and party professions are to be trusted only so far as the character of the nominations affords a guarantee of earnest devotion to the reforms needed in State and nation. Anxious as we are to defeat the present Executive, we yet remember that while the person is but a temporary humiliation, the system he represents is more dangerous and insidious than the man, and calls for our emphatic and lasting condemnation."

There is no threat and no boast in these words. They are spoken by men of both parties, and they express a quiet and earnest determination which can not be disregarded, by Republicans at least, without disaster. It may be, indeed, that the mischief wrought by the late Republican leadership is irreparable, and there is no doubt that, if the will of the party and of the country should be heeded, and the party, notwithstanding, be defeated, the Republican Bourbons would attribute defeat to the new spirit. This, however, would be merely the deceleration of a captain who had been superseded for scuttling the ship, which could not be saved by the utmost effort of the crew, that she sank because he was not left in command. The New York Convention will doubtless be aware that if its action should indicate an indisposition to satisfy the reasonable demand of independent Republicans, who hold the balance of power in the State, the vote that staid at home last year can not be expected to come out this year. The Convention has only to respond to the feeling and purpose which recent experience has shown to be the controlling sentiment of the party to restore the old Republican enthusiasm and vigor.

DEMOCRATS AS REFORMERS.

As the Democratic party, declining to contest the next election upon any distinctive scheme of principles or policy, asks the confidence of the country merely as a reform party, it must show its credentials. Fortunately the country is not obliged to rely upon promises and hopes. The party which proposes to reform administration, to introduce economy, and to purify and elevate politics, is in power in several States, and the intelligent voter can test by its actual performance the probability of reform should it control the national government. There have undoubtedly been great complaints during the long term of Republican ascendency, and if it should appear that reason for such complaints would be removed by Democratic control, a change of party administration might be confidently expected. The Democratic reform credentials may be studied in three very different States, Ohio, Maryland, and Massachusetts, and it is worth while to look at the promise of reform as there presented. In Ohio Judge HOADLY was nominated by the Democrats for the Governorship. He is a man of ability and character, and at once proclaimed a "new Democracy." This, if it meant anything, meant a reform Democracy. Judge HOADLY had strongly affirmed the absolute necessity of civil service reform and of purer politics. He had professed to leave the Republican party because it would not reform its own ways. Had the Democratic party in Ohio responded sincerely to his nomination, he would very probably have been elected, and the election of such a Democrat this year in Ohio would have done more than all the Democratic platforms and newspapers to justify the suspicion that national Democratic success might produce reform.

But from the moment of the nomination the party fell into Kilkenny row. The old Democratic leaders have bitterly sneered at the candidate. They have denounced and objured all reform, except that which consists in putting Democratic hands into the Treasury. Senator PENDLETON, because of the identification of his name with the reform bill, has been defied and defeated in his own county. Judge HOADLY himself has been driven by hostility within his party to evade and conceal his own reform views. To maintain any kind of standing as a Democrat, he has been obliged to exclaim, piteously, with Lady Teazle, "So, then, you would have me sin in my own defense, and part with my virtue to preserve my reputation." He has been apparently entangled in bargains, and the mere fact of his association with reform has rent the party asunder, and revealed a stolid Democratic hatred of honest politics and reform policies.

The Democratic situation in Maryland has been thoroughly exposed by the Democratic Governor, who, for that reason and because he is an honest reformer, is savagely pursued by the party leaders. The Governor states that the party which proposes to reform national extravagance has improperly spent, during the last three years, half a million of dollars of the State money, and that in the same time Democratic officers have withheld from the State more than seven hundred thousand dollars of the public money. The Governor shows further that the Democratic Legislature, in ways which he mentions in careful detail, has been guilty of the most shameful extravagance in its own expenses, while newspapers have been bribed to silence by lavish outlays for the public printing. These statements in authentic detail have not been denied or questioned. They are undeniable. In Massachusetts the politician who for more than ten years was madly denounced by the Democratic press and orators as a thief, and who is notoriously destitute of political principle, has been selected by the Democratic party as its especial representative, and he has introduced a policy of administrative spoils and plunder for party and personal reasons which has not respected the highest official character or the most efficient service. These are the reform credentials of the Democratic party offered simultaneously in different parts of the country. These are the performances of a party which is crying, "Turn out the rascals," and which entreats the country, if it is tired of extravagance and party plunder, and hungry for purer politics and reform, to intrust the government to its honest and economical hands. In New York also, this reform party moves wholly at the will of JOHN KELLY and Tammany Hall. Tammany Hall therefore, and General BUTLER, and the Maryland Democracy, and the Ohio Democracy, represent the Democratic reform party, and it is to such influences and agencies that the Democratic press and speakers invite the country to look for correction of the abuses which are alleged against the Republicans. Yet despite the absurdity of such a situation, and although reform can not be reasonably expected from a change to Democratic control, it is not safe for Republicans to trust that such a change will not be made. The way to deal with the situation is to prove that reform may be more reasonably expected from Republican success.

MAYOR LOW.

THERE can hardly be a reasonable doubt of the renomination of Mayor LOW in Brooklyn. His administration in that city has been a subject of national attention and interest, because he has shown the perfect feasibility and success of municipal government upon non-partisan principles. Such government is a great business which involves no political doctrine whatever. Questions of tariff, international commerce, foreign affairs, Indians, public lands upon which there may be political divisions, are unknown in a city government.

That concerns itself with the police, with lighting and paving, and laying out streets, with drainage and charities. It is a business which is to be transacted upon business principles, and the charter of Brooklyn luckily allows this to be done under a Mayor who desires to do it, and has the necessary ability and courage. Those have been proved in the term of Mayor LOW. Sagacious, intelligent, fertile in resource, willing to take necessary responsibility, industrious devoted, and of the highest public spirit, he has discharged his duties so admirably that his retirement would be a public misfortune.

The renomination of such a public officer by the Republicans would commend the party to public confidence. It would show that regard for official independence and capacity and for political honesty and purity which are the especial demand of the time and without which no party can now hope to carry the country. A party which should show the same comprehension of the general situation that the Republican party would show of the municipal situation in renominating Mayor LOW would be resistless.

DRIVING THE GOLDEN SPIKE.

THE excursion and ceremonies in commemoration of the completion of the Northern Pacific Railroad were evidently most imposing, delightful, and satisfactory. Four trains with forty-five Pullman, baggage, and dining cars, have been drawn from the Atlantic coast for two thousand miles over the continent, and across three mountain ranges, as they were met by trains coming from the Pacific, at a point called Bullock, 1198 miles from Lake Superior, 1707 from St. Paul, 847 from Puget Sound, and 700 from Portland in Oregon.

The excursionists were a distinguished company and in the silver hammer drove the last spike—a spike of gold—in the great northern road which binds the two oceans. The addresses were naturally and properly of no exultant tone. The orators recalled JEFFERSON'S endeavors, a hundred years ago, to cause JOHN LEDYARD to explore the Columbia, and his organization, when President, of the LEWIS and CLARK expedition to open a northwest American route to India by the Missouri and Columbia rivers. Less than forty years later the agitation for a Pacific railroad began. Thirty years ago Congress authorized the survey of a route from the Mississippi to the Pacific. The Union and Central road, aided by the government, followed a familiar line across the continent, and ended at the Golden Gate. But the northern route was regarded as lying in an inaccessible and hopeless ice-bound region, and the completed road without national subsidies, except a land grant, which was of possible future value, and in the face of endless obstacle and opposition, is a monument of indomitable American courage, sagacity, and skill.

"So," said Mr. BILLINGS, a former president and enthusiastic friend of the road, "putting all things together who can fail to see that this great new highway is to be marked all along with prosperous communities, with schools and churches and a high civilization? Who can fail to see that it brings permanent peace with the Indians; that no more CUSTERS are to be killed, no more regiments to be equipped; that new States are to come here, new powers and not one; that new States are to be added to our greatness, wealth, and a new bond of unity to the world's commerce?" Mr. EVARTS, also, the chosen orator of the day, told the splendid story, and rejoiced in the clear and independent methods by which the work had been prosecuted, and accomplished; and Secretary TELLER wisely did not seek to emphasize the duties of so great and powerful a company to the public. Nothing marred the felicity of the occasion, the happy management of a whole, with all its infinite details, was an illustration of the ability and skill which have presided, through good report and evil report, over this imperial enterprise.

THE FREE PRIMARY.

As the amendment to the constitution of the Republican association in the city of New York has been adopted, every Republican voter can now vote at the primary elections. The counting and general control are still in the hands of the old managers, but there is no reason to suppose that they will abuse this power, and no Republican citizen can justly excuse himself for neglecting the opportunity which is now secured to him.

The rapidity and unanimity with which this radical change in primary political methods has been effected is another striking illustration of the readiness of the Republican party to respond to an emphatic expression of public opinion. The old system of primaries was borrowed from Tammany Hall. But neither that nor any other Democratic organization reforms itself in obedience to the popular demand, or to promote the actual participation of the people in the government.

The apprehension sometimes expressed, that in overthrowing the party machine there was be forgetfulness of the necessary machinery, is unnecessary. Nobody has a clearer conception of the essential value of organization, of concert and co-operation, than the strongest anti-machine men. But nobody understands as well as they the nuisance that is made of that necessity, and which is the real enemy of actual organization, because it produces distrust and contempt and open defiance. The more thoroughly persuaded a man is of the necessity of government, the more strenuously will he resist despotism, which leads straight to anarchy. This is a truth which has been equally illustrated in the history of the machine, and the overthrow of the party machine was indispensable to the smooth working of the party machinery.

THE SHARPLESS WASHINGTON.

THE interesting miniature of WASHINGTON by SHARPLESS, an English artist, which has naturally attracted a great deal of attention, has now been most successfully and beautifully reproduced in photo-gravure by GOUPIL from a negative taken by AUGUSTUS MORAND. This likeness, which is somewhat different from the familiar portraits of WASHINGTON, was painted in 1795 for WASHINGTON himself, who was then sixty-three years old, and it was given by him to the wife of Mrs. WASHINGTON'S son, JOHN CUSTIS, the father of G. W. P. CUSTIS, the former owner of Arlington House, near Washington.

Mrs. CUSTIS was ELEANOR CALVERT, granddaughter of Lord BALTIMORE, who after a ard married DR. STUART. She gave the picture to her youngest daughter, who married Mr. WILLIAM G. WEBSTER, in whose possession it remains. He has refused for it an offer of fifty thousand dollars, and declined for a long time to permit any copy to be made. When at length he authorized Mr. MORAND to photograph it he required him to carry the original constantly upon his person, and to place it under his pillow at night. In order that his copy might exactly reproduce the original, Mr. MORAND made a lens especially for the purpose, and took the negative to Paris, where it was engraved by GOUPIL. He has also produced a sheet of the coat of arms of the WASHINGTON family, copied by himself from tombs in various churches in England, making in each case a fac-simile.

The face of WASHINGTON in the miniature is, in general, the familiar face, and has the beautiful benignity which all contemporary observers remarked. It is an exceedingly interesting addition to the WASHINGTON portraits.

MODERN SOCIALISM AND COMMUNISM

A LITTLE work just published by the HARPERS, French and German Socialism in Modern Times, by Professor RICHARD T. ELY, of Johns Hopkins University, supplies the most complete and handy information upon one of the vitally important questions of modern times. It is a brief and clear history, by a peculiarly accomplished student of the subject, of the doctrines and schemes of the most eminent and able Socialist and Communist leaders of the century—leaders who have a constantly increasing following, whose views and purposes become more significant with every new invention, and with every fresh step in the aggregation and power of capital.

The book is admirable for its humane and generous temper. Professor ELY is much too wise a man not to know that the question of Socialism is not to be dismissed with an impatient sneer or with angry ridicule. It is the riddle of the Sphinx, and society must solve it or suffer. The reader who is accustomed to the shallow and stupid treatment which the subject usually receives, and who dismisses it with a half-shudder, as a nonsensical anarchical movement aiming at the overthrow of civilized society, will be surprised to learn from this faithful guide that its leaders are recognized as among the ablest of men and the profoundest masters of political economy. BISMARCK spoke of LASSALLE with the warmest praise, and few leaders of men have a larger and more determined support than the Socialist chiefs.

Their followers, however, the mass of those who are called Socialists, do not comprehend the scientific treatment of the question, which is the work of the leaders. Professor ELY, himself a most accomplished student of political economy, says of KARL MARX'S Capital that it is one of the ablest politico-economic treatises ever written, and that it is difficult reading only because it is deep. The rash and the shallow, however, are mainly interested in the general conclusions and schemes of reform proposed by the chiefs—schemes which are radical and often revolutionary. The Socialists make common cause with all who live by daily wages, and so it seems to them that the wealth of the world is produced only by their daily toil, and they are the overwhelming majority, the magnitude of the question is obvious. Professor ELY'S purpose is not to express opinions nor to advocate views, but to give a perfectly fair statement of the tenets and tendency of modern Socialism and Communism in their chief seats. He has been entirely successful. Nowhere else can so simple, compact, extensive, and satisfactory a presentation both of the scope and the significance of the subject be found, and no work recently issued deserves more thoughtful consideration.

FRIENDS OF THE WHITE MAN.

IT is the happy fortune of Rhode Island not only to trace its settlement to the great apostle of soul liberty, but to point to the humane Indian policy which he enforced and inculcated, and which ranks the name of ROGER WILLIAMS in Rhode Island with that of WILLIAM PENN in Pennsylvania and AUKET VAN CORTLANDT in New York.

A few days since a unique and interesting event was celebrated in a lovely country region in the southern part of the State, not very far from Narragansett Pier. A huge boulder has been placed upon the site of an old Indian fort, upon which is engraved this inscription: "Fort Neutgret: Memorial of the Narragansett and Niantic Indians, the unwavering friends and allies of our fathers. Erected by the State of Rhode Island." The names of the Commissioners and the year are added. The celebration consisted of appropriate historical and suggestive addresses by distinguished Rhode-Islanders.

But the erection of the stone commemorated not only the ancient friendship of the Niantic Indians for the white people, but the final incorporation of the surviving descendants into the great mass of citizens of the State. The territory originally occupied by the tribe had dwindled, but a large tract of land has been always held by them, part of which the Indians cultivated, and other parts of which they sold, giving deeds signed by their Council. But as lost the State bought the reservation, and divided the money paid for it among the 343 surviving members of the tribe. The Niantic dynasty has not even a Count of Paris left to represent it, and the subjects of dunky royalty and of the Indian Council are only citizens of Rhode Island.

The Niantics were, indeed, unswerving friends of the English colonists. They refused to join the Pequot alliance, or to take part in King Philip's war, although he was their out distant neighbor across the bay at Mount Hope. They resisted the Narragansetts, with whom they subsequently united in peace, and the Nimigret memorial will long recall the wisdom of the policy which holds that Indians have rights which white men are bound to respect.

PERSONAL.

A New York sculptor declares that the American Indian, as he actually exists, has never been treated in plastic art. CRAWFORD'S "Indian" in the library of the Historical Society, he says, has the limbs of a white man, WARD'S "Indian Hunter" in the Central Park has the limbs of a classic Greek; but the limbs of the real American Indian have been somewhat developed from those of the Greek or the Caucasian, his arms being destitute of the biceps, and his legs thin and wiry.

—A Scottish exhibit of unpretentious pedigree was slightly wounded in the late war, a bullet having grazed the top of his head. "You may thank your stars," said the surgeon, "that matters are no worse. If this sound were a quarter of an inch deeper, you would be a dead man." "Great heavens! doctor," replied the terrified patient, "one if it isn't a quarter of an inch deeper!"

—A photographic apparatus is now considered a part of a city surgeon's mechanical equipment. Instead of taking casts of the various corporeal monstrosities or deformities with which he is called to deal, he brings his camera into the sick room and takes a photograph of "the subject." A series of such photographs constitutes not only a valuable history of the case, but often a trustworthy, clear-spoken, and present witness in the surgeon's professional skill.

—The trustees of the Mercantile Library have greatly convenienced many members of that institution by opening a branch office at No. 451 Fifth Avenue, between Thirty-eighth and Thirty-ninth streets; and the value of real estate in that region is indicated by the fact that although the office occupies only what was once the basement of a private house on a single lot, the rent paid is twenty-five hundred dollars a year.

—The gentlemen of the Congressional committee who twelve years ago predicted that the time was not distant when the region now known as the Yellowstone Park would be "a place of resort for all classes of people from all portions of the globe" seem to have done something toward establishing the American Congressman's reputation for trustworthiness.

—A New York merchant was speaking of a gray-haired comrade who had just married a third wife. "I can't understand it," he said. "I am a widower myself, but my wives has always been that if a man's first wife suited him, he wouldn't expect that another could fill her place, and if she did not suit him, he wouldn't want another to fill it."

—Mr. TONY E. ROSENTHAL, whose pictorial contribution to the Munich Art Exhibition was the most successful American painting there, has been sketching with a party of friends in the quaint Bavarian town of Sarzing, where most of the buildings are at least three hundred years old. He expects to return to Munich for the winter.

—A correspondent writes to ask us if NORDENSKJÖLD, the explorer, ever went around the north pole. NORDENSKJÖLD'S first arctic expedition was in 1859, under the command of TORELL. In 1861 he made a similar trip, and in 1864, 1868, and 1872 he led arctic expeditions of his own. In 1875 he sailed through the Sea of Kara, and very recently he has been making observations in Greenland. The trip around the north pole, in the immediate neighborhood of it, has yet to be made.

—An entertainment given recently by Mrs GLADSTONE in London was enlivened by the presence of Miss JESSIE YORKE, of this city, who read before a fashionable audience her interesting lecture on LONGFELLOW, and sang several of his poems, instead of merely giving them to illustrate her points.

—A mass of letters suggests that the most eminent and in attractive array of specimens specimens of modern English to be gathered anywhere might be made of the various public notices that adorn the rabbis of our steamboats and the interiors of our railroad cars, and that a good, sound specimen to lead off with would be the well-known placard in the Hoboken ferry boats: "The seats in this cabin are reserved for ladies. Gentlemen are requested not to occupy them until the ladies are seated."

—Mr. ANDREW CARNEGIE, of New York, having presented a free library to the town of Dunfermline, Scotland, a speech in honor of the event was delivered by Lord ROSEBERY, who said, among other things: "We all of us, in whatever position we may be placed, have occasion to find life irksome and almost intolerable. I have always found two aids or assistances to overcome that sense of irksomeness, which are within the reach of the poorest of us, and which are the most efficient for the purpose. The first is the sense of humor, and the second the love of books."

—The College of France, where RENAN delivers his professional lectures on Hebrew literature, is a building of extreme modesty, and might be mistaken for a Friends' meeting house. The room occupied by M. RENAN is plain and almost bare. Its chief article of furniture being a long table on which are strewn old folios and manuscripts. The audience is small and consists chiefly of aged old men with long hair, noses racing men of defective vision, dilapidated old women, and bright-eyed rabbis.

—The cordial relations between France and Germany are now and then illustrated by paragraphs like this in the foreign correspondence of the German papers: "We arrive in Paris, in the Paris of VICTOR HUGO, the capital of the world, etc., etc. As we step on to hear the German language. And the French—where are they? what are they doing? There they are, musing on the terraces of the cafés, begging and lunging and scolding at the shrewish Germans and their spectacles. They still hope to conquer Alsace and Lorraine. But where are the soldiers who are to take revenge? There they are, on the rails. The officers, ashamed of their uniform, are in citizen's clothes. The soldiers have pipes in their mouths, and their hands in the ridiculously deep pockets of their short trousers. Let the Frenchmen come to Berlin, there we will show them men, Prussians, vigorous, muscular, knowing how to stand up for themselves, and how to love their Emperor."

—The Comte de Paris, at present heir to the French monarchy (or what is left of it), is rich, tall, slender, hi delicate health, and forty-six years old. His wife is ambitious, and an intrepid horsewoman.

—Canon FARRAR, of Westminster Abbey, has become a total abstainer from alcohol. His friends say that his capacity for work is greatly increased thereby. He can now push along without any intermission, except for meals, from morning to night.

—NAPOLEON BONAPARTE'S conversational gifts, during his First Consulship, made a deep impression upon Madame JUNOT. "His talk was always attractive by its depth of thought and that air of originality which reflected from his rich and brilliant imagination, the most profound civilians, the ablest financiers, the most subtle diplomatists, thronged around to hear him, and appeared to be rather taking lessons from him than imparting their knowledge to a young man whose pale complexion bore witness to watchings and fatigues far exceeding theirs, although the superiority of years was greatly on their side." But at that time NAPOLEON BONAPARTE was the most powerful man in his land, and everybody knows how attentively "the most profound civilians, the ablest financiers, and the most subtle diplomatists" listen to such men.

—The Saturday Review remarks that LONGFELLOW'S relations with HAWTHORNE, AGASSIZ, EMERSON, the CHANNINGS, DANA, and many other men of science and letters throw a pleasant light on his disposition and circumstances, and exhibit him as "the central figure of a society of which Oxford or Weimar might well have been proud."

—The American girl (observes a late writer) has passions, is too often indiscreet and wayward, and can love with all the intensity and constancy of a Rebecca, but she is made of different stuff from the artificial hussies of French standards. That peculiarity of social custom which allows her so much more freedom than her transatlantic sisters, and which conduces to a freer development of healthier and more natural affection, has also given her a greater strength of character to defend her heart from shrewish passions, and a sturdier common-sense by which she is abundantly capable of taking care of herself.

—Mr WILL CARLETON, author of the Farm Ballads and other popular verses, has been lecturing successfully in the far West. His subject was, "The Golden Horse"—an imaginary animal not of which, as not of the wooden horse at Troy, are supposed to come the various vices that threaten the destruction of modern civilization, and in the treatment of it he recites the best of his metrical compositions.

—In an instance, says Dr. H. GRADLE, has the benefit derived from a knowledge of the germ theory of disease been more brilliantly exemplified than in the principles of antiseptic surgery discovered by LISTER. This benefactor of mankind recognized that the great disturbing influence in the healing of wounds is the admission of germs. It had been well known prior to his day that wounds heal kindly if undisturbed, and that the fever and other dangers to life are an accidental, not an inevitable, consequence of wounds. But LISTER was the first to point out that these accidents were due to the entrance of germs into the wound, and that such entrance could be prevented.

—English rowdyism (observes the London World) has taken a new departure, as far as externals are concerned, and in doing so has rendered itself a social necessity, and for this reason has disarmed its political opponents. If there is a charitable establishment to be opened, or the exchequer of an institution which exists for any good purpose to be replenished, the ceremony which accomplishes the one or contributes to the other is always graced by the presence of a prince or princess, or of both combined. Imagine what would have been the condition of public sentiment in England were the Queen's eldest son to have shaped his social demeanor after the pedantic and petty pomposities of his illustrious and lamented father!

—Mr FISCHEL closes his monograph on LUTHER as follows: "Philosophic historians tell us that LUTHER succeeded because he came in the fullness of time, because the age was ripe for him, because forces were at work which would have brought about the same changes if he had never been born. Some changes there might have been, but not the same. The forces computable by philosophy can destroy, but they can not create. The false spiritual despotism which dominated Europe would have fallen from its own hollowness. But a lie may perish, and no living belief may rise again out of the ruins. A living belief can rise only out of a believing soul, and that any faith, any piety, is now alive in Europe, even in the Roman Church itself, whose insolent hypocrisy he humbled into shame, is due in large measure to the poor miner's son who was born in a Saxon village four hundred years ago."

—The city of Florence in Italy has become unhealthful by reason of inadequate drainage. Almost every house has its own cesspool, and the waste-pipes are not trapped, nor is the well water always uncontaminated. A correspondent residing there expresses his belief that the authorities will make an improvements until the desertion of the city by Americans and Englishmen forces them to do so.

—A Scottish photographer has photographed the impression made upon the arm of a person who had been struck by lightning. A series of delicately traced figures, very like fern fronds or coralline branches of trees, appears just above the elbow, and extends nearly to the shoulder. It is believed that the phenomena were caused by congestion in the capillary vessels, which had been paralyzed through the action of the electric current.

—From Punch:

"Fox-hunting cruel? Rot! What part of hounds
Equals the pony's loving social ways,
Who break into our ride's dramatic bounds,
And hunt us all their jolting pack—at
The tenderest of friendship
To hunt those leaders recklessly—as rewards.

THIRLBY HALL.

By W. E. NORRIS,

AUTHOR OF "MATRIMONY," "MARIE DE MAINON," "NO NEW TOWN," "HEADS OR TAILS," ETC.

CHAPTER XIV.—THE GENERAL IS FACETIOUS.

"WHENEVER I have loved a woman," says Alfred de Musset somewhere, "I have told her of it; whenever I have ceased to love her, I have also told her of it, believing that in such matters there is nothing to be ashamed of, except falsehood." Perhaps it is just as well for the peace of society that not many people have sufficient audacity to adopt the poet's system, although there is an irresponsible simplicity about it which is not without attraction. I debated earnestly with myself during the journey home whether I ought not to inform Maud of my perfidy; and I believe that the conclusion I came to was that such was indeed my duty, being at the same time perfectly well aware that I lacked the requisite courage for its performance. It was true that I had been forbidden to speak to her of love at all, but there was little comfort to be got out of that recollection. I was a poor hand at acting a lie, and I was unable to devise any means of even hinting at the truth.

Under these circumstances I could not but rejoice to hear, on my arrival at Thirlby, that Maud and her father were away from home.

"The Rector has been persuaded to give himself a short leave of absence," my uncle, who had come to meet me at the station, informed me, as we drove homeward. "You need not allude to this before my mother, because it is rather a sore subject with her. I am afraid it was she who induced Jenkins, the Ebenezer man, to go down to the Rectory and challenge Dennison to a controversy about infant baptism. Dennison recovered him very well, got down his theological books, and they had a great palaver, each, of course, claiming to have put the other to silence. So far so good; but unluckily Jenkins returned to the charge, bringing three influential Nonconformists from Yarmouth with him, and in the presence of all four of them poor Dennison was betrayed into declaring that he considered an unbaptized infant had just as good a chance of going to Heaven as he or Jenkins had, not to say a better one. After that, one can't be surprised that Jenkins should have written a powerful treatise entitled, 'Total Immersion versus Super-sitions, or the Red Rush of the State Clergy Unmasked;' but I don't think he ought to have mentioned Dennison to it by name, and then sent a copy of the thing to the Rectory. Anyhow, Dennison lost his temper, and, meeting Jenkins the next day, threatened to totally immerse him in the nearest horse-pond. Up came Jenkins, very eager, to ask for a summons, which of course I declined to grant, and things were smoothed over after a fashion. But I had a great deal of trouble about it," added my uncle, with a sigh, "and some bad feeling was stirred up in the parish; and the upshot of it was that Dennison was prevailed upon to go to Lowestoft for change of air, leaving the curate to reign in his stead until all these winds of doctrine should have time to blow themselves out."

"The parish will never want bracing breezes so long as Mrs. Farquhar is at hand to stir them up," I remarked. "Is there no chance of her going away anywhere for a change of air?"

My uncle smiled and shook his head. "She does a great deal of good in the parish, after her own fashion," said he; "and she and Dennison are becoming accustomed to one another. They wrangle, of course, but I think they rather like that."

WE HAD A VERY GOOD AFTERNOON AMONG THE TURNIPS AND THE [illegible]

Thirlby was no longer the hermitage that it had once been. Mrs. Farquhar generally had a few, and sometimes a good many, friends staying in the house, besides entertaining the neighborhood pretty frequently at dinners and garden parties. This she called "taking an interest in her fellow-creatures," and inculcated as a Christian duty upon certain persons who were too apt to take an interest in nothing but themselves and their books. Mr. uncle accepted it all in good part, only stipulating that he should be left in undisturbed possession of the library—a point which I believe that he did not carry without opposition.

To the library he generally betook himself after breakfast; and thither I followed him, glad to hear his quiet, kindly voice again, and to listen to his talk, which was full of the wisdom that comes of much reading, and curiously deficient in that which comes from mingling with the world. I was quite at my ease with him after the first day. He alluded neither to Maud nor to Lady Constance, and I was sure that he had no suspicion of what had happened during my absence. I don't feel quite so sure of this now; but whether he had suspicions or not, he abstained from giving utterance to them, being too thorough a gentleman and too good a friend to force confidences. As far as anything could smile on me happy at that time, the companionship of my old mon did so; and I think it was a pleasure to him, too, to have me with him once more.

"Sixties he've picked up wonderful since you come back, Mr. Charls," said Rome. "Come down to my place this momin' he did, and axed to see the ferrets—a thing he ain't done, dear tee! not this twelvemonth. I don't think you ont to leave him agin, no, that I don't!"

I had to leave him, nevertheless, and in truth I was only half sorry to go. Every nook and corner in Thirlby, the woods in which I had so often walked with Maud, the Broads where I had sailed and fished and skated with her, were so many acute accusers. I breathed more freely when I was away from them all and settled in London with the coach who had undertaken to prepare me for my impending examination. I was made to work tolerably hard during the four or five months that I spent under his roof, and was forbidden to take any part in the gayeties of the London season. For those, however, I had no sort of inclination. I sometimes wondered whether Lady Constance was one of the riders or of the gayly dressed pedestrians whom I used to see in the distance as I took my daily morning walk through the Park; but, oddly enough, I experienced no longing to see her at this time. I was confident that, as she had said, we should meet again before we were much older, and I was content to await the approach of destiny.

I don't know whether the dreadful hobgoblin of Competition, which has been raised in these later times by well meaning persons, and which to an old fogy like myself seems in a fair way to put an end to all thorough education, has yet cast its ashuals shade upon the sacred precincts of the Foreign Office, but in my young days our nerves were harassed by no haunting dread of a pourmi decrout. We were asked to show a certain degree of proficiency in the subjects required by our profession, and having done that, received our appointments in due course. When my time came I had no difficulty in satisfying the examiners, and the only penalty I had to pay for my success was that of spending an entire summer in the smoky atmosphere of London. At any other time I might have considered this a genuine grievance enough, but, things being as they were, I did not complain of it. No prisoner was ever less eager to regain his freedom, or more puzzled to know what to do with it after he had got it, than I was. I lingered on in London for some days longer than was necessary, explaining in a letter to my uncle what, indeed, was the truth, that I was anxious to be upon the spot in order to find out whether I had any chance of obtaining speedy employment.

The wished for information reached me promptly and unexpectedly. I was strolling down deserted Pall Mall, one warm September morning, when I was almost knocked off my legs by a tremendous slap on the back, and the General's jovial voice called out: "Hullo, Charley, my boy! you're the very fellow I wanted to see. Let me be the first to congratulate you upon your appointment."

"I've passed my examination all right," answered I, after shaking hands with my old friend; "I haven't got my appointment yet."

"Oh yes, you have; you'll hear of it officially in a day or two. Come into the Club and have some lunch, and I'll tell you all about it."

The General was in the best of good spirits. He had just returned from the moors, where he had had capital sport, and had been shooting above his average, so he said. Having to spend a day in London, he had made a point of calling at the Foreign office, in order to put in a word for me with those in authority before proceeding to Canterbury, where he was about to hold an inspection of cavalry. "When that's over, we'll hold an inspection of the partridges, eh, Charley?" said he, giving me a nudge with his elbow as we mounted the steps of the military club to which he belonged.

"Well," he continued, when he had ordered luncheon, and we had seated ourselves at a table beside the open window, "I'm glad to say that you have dropped into a good berth as a young fellow could wish to start with. Frauenschlohe is a lively place in its way, they tell me, and your chief is the best fellow that ever stepped. Rosen—Paddy Rosen, you used to call him at school—a first-rate fellow! I looked in on my Drumcondra—the permanent man at the F. O., you know—this morning, thinking that I might be able to be of some use to you; but, gad, sir! I found I had been forestalled. The ladies—ah, you young rascal, you've found out already what the ladies can do for us! And I dare say you know previous well whom you have to thank for your appointment."

I did indeed know, and the knowledge agitated me more than I cared to show. "I suppose it must be Lady Constance Milner, whom I met at Naples last winter," said I, as indifferently as I could. "Isn't she a sister of Lord Rossan's?"

"A half-sister. Rossan is old enough to be her father—a contemporary of my own. I'm sorry to say. Dear, dear! how time does go on! Lady Constance is a deuced agreeable woman and a great friend of mine," continued the General, twirling his mustache. "Some people are pleased to say ill-natured things about her, but I take it that some people's ill natured things are as good as a compliment, eh?"

"I thought Lady Constance very pleasant," said I, not venturing to change the subject at once.

"Devil doubt you! You've made an impression in that quarter, my boy, and upon my word, without meaning to flatter you too much, I don't wonder at it!" cried the General, beaming at me over his glass of sherry. "Ah, dear me! I wish I could change places with you!"

"I wish you could, with all my heart!" thought I to myself, but I merely remarked aloud that I was not so sure that young men had the best of it in everything.

"God bless my soul!" called out the General, swallowing the bait, "do you mean to tell me you don't hold the best cards? If we old fellows cut you out every now and then, it's because we know how to play the game, let me tell you, and because you don't take advantage of your opportunities. Now I'll tell you a curious thing that happened to me when I was aide-de-camp to Lord Beresford at Lisbon in the year twenty."

Once embarked upon the fruitful theme of his exploits in love and war, the General forgot all about Lady Constance, and I was spared any repetition of painful reminiscences. "My respects to Bernard" he said, as we parted, "and tell old Binny I'm game to walk him off his legs yet. You may expect me down at Thirlby in a day or two."

He took it for granted that I was going to Thirlby; and indeed I could scarcely do otherwise then return home, though it was with some reluctance and trepidation that I took my railway ticket. Nevertheless, them had prudence the effect upon me that it usually does produce upon every one. I had become accustomed to the situation, I had even begun to make some excuses for myself. Taking the worst possible view of my conduct, it could not be said that I had broken any engagement. Maud had refused to hear of me love, and had given me no sort of hint that it was returned; my uncle had said, in so many words, that only time and absence would prove the sincerity of my feelings. These pleas did not satisfy me, but I made use of them in default of better ones, and the mere reiteration of them gave me a kind of confidence.

The dreaded meeting, which took place the day after my return home, proved, like the generality of dreaded events, much less formidable than I had expected. Maud and the Rector came up to the Hall to welcome and congratulate me, and the former was so self possessed, so friendly, or apparently oblivious of the circumstances under which we had parted, that—unreasonable as it may seem—I was a little disappointed in her. I myself was anything but self possessed; but I remembered that she would naturally set down my embarrassment to any cause rather than the right one, and her determination to put me at my ease was successful after a time. What gave me a sharp pang of remorse was the absurd behavior of Swamp, whom she had brought with her, and who greeted me with the most extravagant demonstrations of delight, tearing round and round the room till all the breath was out of his body, and finally prostrating himself before me with all four legs in the air, as he had been wont to do in old days when he wanted his breast bone rubbed with my foot—a form of attention which, for some reason or other, was especially grateful to his feelings. The contrast between his fidelity and my own inconstancy struck me so forcibly that I bent over him a great deal longer than was necessary, for I felt as if Maud must discover the truth if I raised my eyes.

"I hope you don't want your dog back, Charley," she said, "because I gave you fair warning that I don't mean to surrender him now. Mr. Le Marchant formally made him over to me in your name, and he really has a genuine regard for me, though you might not suppose it from the way he is going on at this moment."

"He has always been your property," said I, "you know I brought him for you."

She was looking more lovely than ever, I noticed—if that had any longer been any business of mine. It was dreadful to me to think that I had renounced her, and yet I never for one moment felt it possible that that mute renunciation could be recalled.

I was glad when she went away. The Rector had half an hour's argument with Mr. Farquhar, in the course of which I overheard her telling him that he was "just like the horse and mule, which gave no understanding;" and then the visit came to an end. I did not offer to walk back with my friends, as I should certainly have done a year before.

After a day or two the General arrived in full effluence of his promise, and George Warren coming over with his gun, we had a very good afternoon among the turnips and the stubble. A good afternoon, that it is to say, for my fellow sportsmen, myself, being out of sorts, shot badly, and incurred the serious displeasure of Rumor, who observed that he didn't think now to them furrin-cerin' trips, any yet of kicking your heels in London all the blessed summer through. "I don't see no call for it," he concluded, decisively. The truth was that Rumor was not the only person present who was displeased with me, and I was uncomfortably aware of the fact. George Warren, on being informed of my intended destination, had put on a very grave face, and when I tried to turn the matter off by remarking that I believed Frauenschlohe was not half a bad sort of place, and that I hoped to get some shooting there, and so forth, he only looked me full in the eyes for a moment, and, "Ah! I don't know, I'm sure," and changed the subject. I had not cared much about George's censures a few months back; but times were changed now, and his very presence made me ashamed.

Nor was the day to close without shame of a still worse kind falling upon me. As we were drawing near home in the evening, we were met by my uncle and the Rector and Maud, who had walked out to inquire what sport we had had; and after the bag had been inspected, and we had all resumed our march in a body, the Rector took it into his head to ask when I was to proceed to my post, innocently remarking that I was a lucky fellow to be sent to one of the European courts, instead of to Persia, or Peru, or some such outlandish country. Up to that time the General had made no allusion to my future career, but the Rector's observation put him in mind of what I had fondly hoped he had forgotten, and he most unwisely chose this most inopportune moment for informing the company, with a knowing wink, that I had powerful allies at my back.

"Upon my life, Bernard, you must look after this fellow, he's a sad dog, I can tell you! I thought I might be able to give him a lift by using precious civil at the people at the Foreign Office, from the Secretary of State downward, but he knew a trick worth two of that, by George! Has he told you about his friend Lady Constance Milner yet? Look at him blushing, Miss Dennison! Never mind, Charley, don't be angry. Many an older and wiser man than you has found her ladyship irresistible."

I had a sincere affection for the General, who had always been my friend, but if wishes could kill, I really think he would have ceased to breathe the air and there to begin unconsciousness of the murderous passion that he was arousing, he went on with his cruel jocularities, only desisting when George mercifully came to the rescue with the lucid assertion that Lady Constance was a good natured person of whom we had happened to see a good deal on our travels, but that he didn't, for his part, think her at all likely to remember acquaintances who were out of sight.

When I raised my eyes, I found that both George and Maud were looking at me, and I saw, or thought I saw, upon the face of each of them the same expression of mingled compassion and contempt. It was a miserable moment. If I had had my presence of mind at all, I should have pursued the subject, or at all events said something, no matter what, but the sense of my guilt overpowered me, and I maintained a dismal silence, thereby making it perfectly clear to everybody that there was some ground for the General's insinuations than he himself supposed.

After that day Lady Constance was no more spoken of in my presence. What my uncle thought about her, or whether he thought about her at all, I could not guess; but he asked no question, and was to all outward appearance quite easy in his mind with regard to my future. Maud, on her side, was scarcely less reticent, and seemed, when we met, that friendly, elder-sisterly demeanor which I had so greatly resented in days gone by, but of which I no longer felt entitled to complain.

An official command to take up my new duties without delay came ere long to put an end to a situation which was fast becoming unbearable; and I left Thirlby, glad, indeed, that the painful disclosure had been as good as made, yet half sorry that its unfulness should have been so imperfectly appreciated.

CHAPTER XV.

FRAUENSCHLOHE.

The ancient Duchy of Sinshis, raised to the rank of a kingdom by the first Napoleon, and confirmed in that dignity at the Congress of Vienna, was one of the most smiling, prosperous, and contented of the secondary German States. Its low vine clad hills, its pine woods, and rocky heights, among which the river Schlummerbach hails meandered on its way to join the Rhine, its high-roofed villages, overtopped by the Gothic spires of a less material age, were the pride of the broad-shouldered, broad-faced folks who called all strangers with a bow and a friendly Guten Morgen—a race whose grievances were few, and whose placid enjoyment of existence required nothing beyond a sufficiency of beer and an occasional Kirmess to keep it going.

Frauenschlohe, the capital, had a European celebrity as the chosen home of many musicians, artists, authors, and philosophers, all of whom flourished under the aegis of King Rudolf II., a monarch of refined and literary tastes, whose ancestors had ruled in the land since the thirteenth century, and from whom he had inherited a private fortune large enough to justify him in liberally subsidizing the Hof-theater, building a fine new picture-gallery, and otherwise embellishing his modest metropolis.

The British Minister was rather an ornamental than a useful personage. It would be unjust alike to the Foreign Office and to Lord Rossan to say that his appointment to or unimportant a post was the measure of his abilities. The Foreign Office, as everybody knows, rises above mere considerations of ability in its selection of its persons to represent her Majesty abroad, and Lord Rossan was universally admitted to possess all the claims to promotion that experience, good sense, and manners of an unexceptionable kind can furnish. He, after upward of a quarter of a century spent in the service, had had obtained no higher prize than a second-class Legation, it was probably because he lacked brain and energy, and also because he was singularly deficient in that ambition which was most, drink, and sustenance to his half-sister. His estates in Ireland, which he never visited, were sent to be heavily mortgaged, his carelessness and liberality never ceased to bear an inverse relation to the length of his purse; perhaps he preferred the repose and economy of Frauenschlohe, where nobody cared if the King was rich, to the chances of distinction attended by more brilliant and expensive capitals. At Frauenschlohe he lived, to use his own expression, like a fighting-cock. He had a house as big as a palace (indeed, it was generally spoken of by the ostiver as the Englische Palais), he had an excellent cook and a cosmopolitan circle of friends and acquaintances. "And what more would you have?" as he himself was wont to inquire. "Hasn't the Queen given me all I ever asked for?—not to mention my Blue Ribbon of St. Patrick, which I didn't ask for, and which cost me more than it was worth, between ourselves."

At the time when I was privileged to make his acquaintance he was an elderly gentleman, with an erect figure, a close-shaven, good humored face, and a Celtic twinkle about the corners of his gray eyes. He was popular with all classes of society, and especially so with his colleagues, in whose company he was fond of relating good stories, to which a suspicion of a brogue but additional humor. The brogue disappeared together with the shooting coat of every day life, when he assumed his Ministerial functions, and in such dinners Lord Rossan displayed a dignity, a courtesy, and an acquaintance with the minor points of etiquette which had won him golden opinions at the somewhat punctilious Court to which he was accredited. His wife, a gentle, delicate lady, who had the appearance of being constantly ailing, but who, and upon whose life the life of an only son had many years back, cast a permanent gloom, he was adored as the best and most of womankind. Lady Rossan was not less kind hearted, though she was a good deal less popular than the sprightly Minister. She performed her duties well and easily, but without enthusiasm; she was much given to works of charity, but one not very enthusiastic about them either. The two strongest feelings in her nature were a profound admiration for her husband, and an almost equally profound horror of her husband's cooking.

All the above details became known to me before I had been long domiciled with this amiable and unaffected couple. They received me with the utmost kindness, bright and spacious rooms were provided for me in a corner of their big house, and I soon found myself as much at home with them as if I had known them all my life. The other members of the Legation happened to be married men, with the exception of one, who was away on leave, and thus I was many times more constant and familiar intercourse with my chief than I might otherwise have been. By the end of his friendly hints and introductions I made friends in a very short time with all the pleasantest people in Frauenschlohe. I accompanied him to several shooting parties in the neighborhood, and altogether I should have found my new fashion of life thoroughly enjoyable if I had not been firmly convinced that enjoyment was no longer among my objects. Of Lady Constance Lord Rossan did not say much, beyond confirming the General's report that she had specially recommended me to him, and I was too timid to do more than ask where she was, to which he replied that he believed she was paying visits in England, but that her movements were so erratic that it was difficult to say where she might be at any given moment.

One morning, however, he came to it boldly, first with an open letter in his hand, and next out across the table. "Elizabeth, can we find room in our hovrach for a lady six inches in drawing-room to herself, and brings a courier and a maid with her? Can anyone in me that she intends spending the winter here?"

Dismay was visibly depicted upon Lady Rossan's features, but she answered obediently: "Certainly, dear; there is no difficulty about rooms. But I am afraid Constance will find a winter at Frauenschlohe very dull."

"Not she," returned Lord Rossan. "I will say for her that, if she knows anything at all, she knows how to make the most of her resources to fall to her hand. See Con down at Tullochtoo to-morrow, and I'll answer for it that before a month is out she'll have wormed herself into the confidence of the King, turned a plot or two him off his throne, struck up a hard friendship with the Prime Minister, and made a pot of money by degenerating liver in the market, and then burying it all up. Now am't that true, Maxwell?"

I laughed, and said I hoped not.

"I am sure Mr Maxwell thinks much more highly of Lady Constance than you do, dear," said Lady Rossan, quietly.

I glanced apprehensively at her, but could not discover any sign of latent irony upon her pale, grave face. Perhaps she only intended to convey a deferential note of warning to her husband, who was apt to be a little incautious in his remarks sometimes. I was not unprepared for the news of Lady Constance's proposed visit. For some time past I had felt sure that she would come; and for some time, too, I had been conscious of a great desire to see her once more. The first feeling of anger and irritation with which I had found myself enrolled in the ranks of her numerous worshippers had passed away, and had given place—I won't say to the enthusiasm of a forsaken lover, but rather to the curiosity of an opium-eater for the drug which has grown into a necessity of life for him. The poppy-fed is not a pretty one, but it serves as well as another to express the peculiar fascination which Lady Constance exercised over me. I should have been very glad to be able to live without her, but I was certain that I couldn't live without her.

As the time fixed for her arrival drew near, I became sensible of a nervous disquietude and curiosity, mingled with indefinite hopes. Upon what footing ought I to consider myself as standing with regard to her? Would she acknowledge that she had come to Framerschulm because I was there? and had that in reality anything to do with her unexpected descent upon her relatives? How and where would our first meeting take place?

My mind was set at rest as to the last of these queries by Lord Ronsan, who, having other engagements, requested me to await his sister's arrival at the station, the commander were speedily responded to by Lady Constance herself. Most people use tired, grimy, and worse after a long railway journey; Lady Constance stepped out on to the platform looking as fresh and neat as if she had just left her dressing-room, and in reply to my inquiry, told me that she didn't know what it was to be physically fatigued. Then, as we had a few minutes to wait while Autumn was collecting her trunks, she looked me all over from head to foot, and remarked,

"I suppose you would be desperately offended if one said that you had grown?"

"I shouldn't be affronted if it were true," I answered; "but it isn't. I have always understood that human growth stops at the age of twenty-one, and I are past that age."

"Well, you will allow me to say that you have developed. Particularly if I add that you have improved."

I answered, perhaps a little coldly, that I was glad she thought so. I did not quite like the men that the conversation was taking, and broke it off to suggest that we should drive on to the Legation, and let the servants follow with the luggage. But she took it up again as soon as we were seated in the open carriage which was waiting for us.

"Yes," she said, "you have improved. You are less of a hobbledehoy than you were, and you have already put on a certain professional swagger which is not unbecoming. I am sorry, however, to detect traces of care upon your countenance. Would it be presuming too far to ask whether you have been crossed in love?"

This was a little too bad. "Really," I exclaimed, "if you can't answer that question I don't know who can."

"Ah," she said, "I think I do. Your unwillingness to tell me something about so engaging young creature in the country to whom you have attached. I trust you didn't find that your Phillis had taken up with another Corydon during your absence?"

"I don't know," said I, coldly, "what you expect us to put me off like this, but it seems to me that you are rather overreaching your just. You will hardly persuade me that you have forgotten Tacormina so soon."

She laughed a little. "It is more than a few months since we were in Tacormina. Still, I don't forget what I said to you that afternoon. I remember, among other things, telling you that if you cared about keeping my friendship you must be content to accept me for what I am. I am in one frame of mind at Tacormina, I am in quite another to-day. You strike me as being wanting in quickness of perception, which is a great defect in a diplomatist."

There were few evenings in the week on which a friend or two did not come with the hospitable Lord Ronsan, and on the particular evening we had a somewhat larger number of guests than usual. Directly after dinner, however, the whole party adjourned to the opera, as the custom of Framershulm was, and Lady Constance arranged herself on the plan of lodging after her journey. Now, as she had already told me that she was not tired, and as she certainly presented no appearance of being so, it looked very much as though an opportunity were being offered to me, which I might avail myself upon myself to take advantage. With this impression upon my mind, therefore, I saw the others into their carriages, and then, instead of walking across to the theatre after them, as I was expected to do, ran upstairs again to the drawing-room, where Lady Constance was sitting upon an ottoman, perusing the Schoolmaster Journal.

"At last!" I exclaimed, throwing myself boldly down beside her.

She did not move; but she looked at me from beneath her lowered eyelids with a slight air of surprise, which did not fail to have the effect—that it was probably intended to have—of making me rather uncomfortable. She broke the short pause that ensued by asking, in her brusque way,

"Well, does Framershulm please you?"

"It does, now that you are here," I answered.

"I should not be here myself but for you, should I? They told me in London that I had to thank you for my appointment."

"Yes, I believe so," said she. "I always like to do my friends a good turn when it is not too much trouble."

"You did mean to do me a good turn, then?"

"Perhaps I ought not to have called it by that name. I wished you to be sent here."

"Why did you wish that? Was it—I know it sounds rather presumptuous to ask—but was it at all because you wanted me to be in the same place as you?"

She shrugged her shoulders and laughed. "Perhaps," she said.

That was quite enough for me. All the pent-up emotions of six months rushed from my heart to my lips, and poured themselves forth in a rhapsody which I do not now feel called upon to put into print. In the course of it I told her the whole history of my love for Maud [illegible] and greatly against my will, I had been forced to admit that that love was not what I had supposed it to be. I made no secret of the fact that my passion for herself had brought me a great deal more pain than happiness, but added that, after what I had told her, she would at least not doubt its sincerity. She heard me out without interruption. Once or twice she seemed to be touched, and even—as I fancied—a little bit remorseful. But when I wound up by seizing her hand hopelessness, her face changed, and she drew back with a look of cold displeasure.

"Ah?" she said; "let us understand one another, if you please. What does all this mean?"

"What does it mean?" I echoed, stupidly. "It means that I love you—that I would die for you—that—"

"Yes, yes," she interrupted, impatiently: "that is understood; we know all that. The question is, what do you expect?" Because your way of manœuvring yourself leads one to suppose that you expect something."

I shook my head. "I know it's hopeless," I said; and in truth the hopeless nature of my adoration was not the least of its attractions for me. At a certain age the prospect of a blighted life and an early demise possesses charms at which we smile in after years, though I are not sure that there is much to laugh at in "feeling a dull decay," or that one is any the better for knowing that nothing signifies particularly.

"I know it's hopeless," I repeated; "but I had to tell you."

Upon this she ceased to frown. "Don't despair," said she; "you will get over this attack all in good time, and marry your Miss Donelson—or somebody else, perhaps, and be on happy as other people."

I shook my head again.

"Oh yes, you will," she declared, encouragingly; "and, if you are disposed to give the devil his due, you may recollect that I took some trouble to drive you away from my perilous neighborhood."

Soon after this she dismissed me, and I thought it as well to proceed to the theatre, where I arrived in time to see the last act of the Prophète from Lord Ronsan's box. Nobody asked me where I had been, but Lord Ronsan, who had implicit confidence in his doubts upon past experience formed a favorable moment to whisper a few words of good advice to me.

"I have no son of my own," she said, in her clumsy, "and sometimes take the liberty to interfere with [illegible] who have no mother. I am afraid [illegible] is not one of the ladies whom [illegible] of, if she were still alive, would like to see [illegible]."

I thank [illegible] you are so [illegible]. Her [illegible] was well meant, but I cause for her late to be of any [illegible] what little effect it might have had was [illegible] been quite entirely [illegible] The next day, and it never troubled the [illegible] upon disagreement. She other lady persisted only ignored the youngster, to whom in fact [illegible] was as [illegible] ignored.

"Lady Ronsan," said the Minister to me one day in a moment of confidence, "is one of the best women, and, unexceptionally the best hater, I have ever known."

THE LATE HUGH J. HASTINGS.

THE editor and proprietor of the New York Commercial Advertiser, the oldest newspaper in the city, died in his cottage at Monumental Beach, near Long Branch, New Jersey, at seven o'clock on the morning of the 12th of September, in the sixty-fifth year of his age after an illness caused by injuries received [illegible] when an express wagon was driven against his carriage and overturned it. Mr. Hastings's death was entirely unexpected by the public, as the daily bulletins issued after the accident indicated a gradual progress in his condition. When the end came, it was comparatively peaceful.

Hugh J. Hastings was one of those sturdy men of Ireland [illegible] who are quick to seize and strong to hold the [illegible] offered by this republic to noble ambition and [illegible] pluck. He came hither a child of eight years, without friends, save his father and mother and seven brothers and sisters, all of them in very modest circumstances, he chose his career rich, prosperous, and with troops of friends. Enemies he had, too, but those were the natural result of the success of those very qualities that inspire and foster the most enduring friendships. Frankness, courage, perseverance, the recognition of an oath word as full, singleness of purpose, uncompromising partisanship, combativeness, and self-confidence are traits that overcome obstacles, and enable their possessor to choose and occupy the vantage-ground. These traits were his, and to their company were generosity, genial humor, and bluff and unaffected manners, so that those who liked Mr Hastings liked him very much, and those who disliked him hated him. From the time when, a lad of ten years, he ran out errands for a dry-goods dealer in Williams Street, his one ambition was to become a journalist, and to have a journal of his own. With seven dollars and fifty cents in capital—good old days were those—he started the Albany Knickerbocker, and rode on that successful venture into the arena of politics, where for forty years he felt himself at home, because he knew how to win. The Commercial Advertiser, which he took from the hands of Thurlow Weed in 1868, which Noah Webster, the lexicographer, had brought into existence as a Federalist of the Federalists, and which, whether Federalist, National Republican, Whig, or Republican, had always been first and foremost a [illegible] newspaper was at [illegible] pride. He would have sold home if sooner than have sold it. The most lucrative offers to part with it did not even tempt him, and it was his delight and his business to cherish its political traditions, and to make it a power in the Republican party. Like a true editor of the old régime, he never failed to attend a convention of his party, and to become personally acquainted with its leading spirits; and if the name was one of Saltzarelian or Half-Breedism, who was more apt in terrorizing such designative terms, or more skillful in ringing the changes on them?

Mr Hastings will long be missed, even in this busy and forgetful metropolis. Those who knew him best were not surprised that his name journal said of him on the evening after his death: "Every man whose duties connect him with the Commercial Advertiser feels that he has experienced a personal loss. There was about Hugh J. Hastings a geniality, a sincerity, no appreciation of his co-laborers, which endeared him to all who held business relations with him, or served under his direction."

THE GARFIELD MONUMENT, SAN FRANCISCO.

On page 597 we give a picture of the Garfield statue to be erected in Golden Gate Park, San Francisco, California. The corner-stone of the foundation on which the statue will rest was laid on the 24th of August, under the auspices of the Grand Lodge of Masons in California, assisted by the Grand Encampment of Knights Templar of the United States. More than 100,000 people witnessed the ceremonies.

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

A woman who, because of his prominence in the National Labor Party, may be presumed to see the problems of life from the laboring man's point of view, testified recently before the Senate Committee on Education and Labor in this city that he maintained that a person could "go through life very comfortably on an income of twenty-five thousand dollars a year." In this cautious statement his disciples who are working the treadmill for a dollar or two a day will doubtless concede

A number of cow boys, wearing sombreros, buckskin garments, and big revolvers as evidences of their gentlemanly, warm arrested in Chicago not along ago. They explained that they had not come to capture the town, but to bring a lot of cattle, and the police let them go, after taking the precaution to disarm them of their weapons.

In an appeal to the Secretary of the Interior for a new suit of clothes Little Chief a Cheyenne Indian, says: "I don't care much for gray, but I do like to dress in proper style. I want the best white hat you can purchase in the market. There are a good many people who live much nearer New York than does the chief of the Western tribe who may dress the preference when compelled to choose between it and a good suit. They are less frank than he is, however.

A committee acting for the National Red and Red Lemonade has given an opinion as to the difference between an amateur and a professional oarsman. An amateur is defined as one who [illegible] for a living, has never been a [illegible] and has never been engaged in the sale or manufacture of [illegible] like. In the fly-casting contests at Hudson River, at Central Park, last fall, one of the most expert of the contestants was an angler of whom it was said that he had never caught a fish. He was in the employment of a firm that dealt in anglers' materials, and had cast lines in limited waters till he had attained almost absolute perfection.

A firm of lawyers on London advertises to this city the proposed sale in England of as "old and [illegible] estate" which has been owned by the family of the present holders for more than four centuries. It is set forth that the estate includes no [illegible] entire village, of which the lower will be the absolute owner, and that he "must necessarily take a high social position in the county" because he will find himself surrounded by the family properties of neighboring noblemen and gentlemen. If the purchaser should happen to be skewed in driving a bargain, perhaps he could get some ancestors thrown in, as that, like the Major-General in the Pirates of Penzance, he could enjoy the melancholy pleasure of weeping in the event of his happening to unsaintly disgrace them.

There are two explanations of the fact that the two thousand persons living on Poquonock Island, at the mouth of York River, Virginia, are peculiarly without postal accommodations. One is that the postmaster has been drunk for four months, but because he is the only Mahone man on the island the inhabitants have to choose between being him for their postmaster and having none. The other explanation is that another man has been appointed, but has neglected to qualify, and the islanders have not asked for the appointment of another.

"He will probably be tried by a citizens' jury," is the closing sentence of a story about the capture of a desperado in Arizona. "Citizens' jury" sounds well, but the term is employed to designate the most informal of tribunals known in the West.

Among the foreign actresses who arrived this fall from other lands one one whose chief delight did not arise from the born fact that she was once more in this beautiful land, and in the midst of this kind and appreciative public. She was delighted, to be sure, but the frankly said it was because her previous little dog could now have fresh milk every day.

It is suggested that the reason why our government vessels so often visit the harbor at Newport in the course of the summer is that the people of foreign nations may be impressed with the magnitude of the United States navy.

The story is told of an American lady who at an inn in Normandy was detained, as being the best French scholar on her party to make the arrangements for their accommodation. She did her best—which was a long way short of perfection—but the cook did not catch her meaning, and his remarks were jargon to her. Finally, in desperation, she said, slowly and with awful distinctness, "Do—you—speak—English?"

We al. most can't [illegible] talkin'," shouted the cook. "Guess I'd orter speak English. I was raised ten miles from Bar-gor."

The perils of canoeing in mid-ocean were illustrated a few days ago in New York Bay. Three of the shell-like craft of the New York Canoe Club were dancing on the blue waves, when a squall came across the water. One of the canoeists had a passenger whom he had instructed to sit very quietly in the centre of the boat. The passenger was a heavy man, and in following his instructions so faithfully that when the wind beat the little craft down toward the water the boat's burden was top-heavy. Into the water the two voyagers went, and one of the other boats was upset while hastily putting about to go to the rescue. A ferry boat was near, and the heavy men swam to it. The house ballast in the canoe shifted to the stern when the two men were pulled out, and the boat stood upright in the water. To the upset and the skipper clung, like a pessimist at a mad-head, till a crew of deck hands who came from the ferry boat hoisted upon reaming him despite his declaration that he greatly preferred to stay by his canoe and rake it ashore. The captain of the second canoe that upset was also rescued, and the third canoe—which did not capsize—was brought into service as a washing boat. The canoeists sipped hot coffee that evening to their rich-home, and made merry over their afternoon's experience. In the morning they read the story of their rescue, as it had been graphically told by one of the ferry-boat's deck hands, and they were surprised that they still lived.

THE CHIEF EVENTS OF THE RACING SEASON

"Eole! Eole!" That shout reverberated all through the grand stand at Monmouth Park after the greatest race of the season, and one of the greatest races ever run in this country. A great crowd had gathered to witness it, and the greatest horses in the land, ridden by the finest jockeys, were in it—and this on a Tuesday, which is usually a fight day for any course. But it was an extra race, made up for a special object. This is how it came about:

There are two events in the midsummer season at Monmouth Park which attract national attention. One is the race for the Omnibus Stakes for three-year-olds; the other the race for the Monmouth Stakes. The latter is undoubtedly the more important, but there is often a display of brilliant running and riding in the Omnibus Stakes. At any rate, it deserves mention here, because it had a bearing on the extra race of Tuesday, August 28. It was won in splendid style by Drake Carter, a Western horse, who had come into prominence at Saratoga by defeating the Dwyer Brothers' Barnes. He led in the race for the Omnibus Stakes the veteran Monitor, Pizarro, and other famous racers, all around the course, and near the end drew lengths away from them with a fine burst of speed, winning easily. Although a race so easily won is not nearly so exciting as a close finish, Drake Carter's performance awakened unbounded enthusiasm. Mr Pierre Lorillard, who is every inch a gentleman sportsman, may have felt chagrin at Pizarro's defeat, but he did not show it. He merely asked Mr Morris (Drake Carter's owner) what he would take for his horse, and when the latter mentioned $17,500, drew him a check for that amount.

The race for the Monmouth Stakes was run the Saturday preceding the great race of Tuesday, August 28. It attracted a vast crowd by reason of the importance of the event, and because Mr Lorillard's Iroquois, the winner of the Derby, was to make his American début. He is an American horse, but was taken to England a yearling, and the Monmouth Stakes was his first race in his native country. The public, which always has firm faith in a great horse, backed him with their favorable opinions, and what by some would be considered a highly tribute, with their money. But experienced turfmen showed no such confidence in him. He had won, only in June last, a victory on the English turf, and had since then been subjected to the hardships of a sea-voyage. A racer needs a certain amount of exercise to keep limber, and it was obviously impossible for the Derby winner to take his daily constitutional canter aboard ship. The doubts of the old turfmen were confirmed, for Iroquois was badly beaten, being third at the finish, with the Dwyer Brothers' George Kinney victor, and Eole second.

But neither Mr Lorillard nor the public were willing to attribute the Derby winner's defeat to the fact that he was not thoroughly seasoned. They attributed it rather to a mistake in the policy of Foukes, his rider, who, they thought, held him back too long, so that his splendid burst of speed near the end of the race could not carry him past Eole or George Kinney. So, as Mr Lorillard was anxious to run Iroquois again, and back him with Drake Carter, his recent pet horse, and the owners of the other horses in the struggle seemed willing to enter them for a similar contest, the association made up another race for the following Tuesday. It was officially known as the removal of the Monmouth Stakes for three-year-olds and upward at $500 each, with $2500 added, of which $1000 to the second. The crowd which it attracted was rewarded by a race great in all respects—a race won by a great horse after a grand struggle. There were five entries—Mr. Pierre Lorillard's Iroquois and Drake Carter, Mr Gebhard's Eole, Mr G. L. Lorillard's veteran race-horse Monitor, and the victor of the preceding Saturday, the Dwyer Brothers' George Kinney.

The preliminaries to a great race are usually very interesting. Some twenty minutes before the start the horses appear on the track and try their speed. You can easily tell the favorite by gauging the applause which greets each horse as it sweeps past the grand stand. The great racers of both the Lorillard brothers come on the track with a guard of honor. On the Saturday of the original Monmouth Stakes Iroquois entered the track escorted by Gonfalon. On Tuesday he appeared escorted by Drake Carter. Fankes on Iroquois and Hamer on Drake Carter are, Mr. Lorillard's colors, the famous cherry, black hoops on sleeves, black cap and gold tassels, which have shown first across the line in so many races. Monitor, ridden by Billy Hayward, who showed Mr G. L. Lorillard's striking blue and orange, the favorite colors of the sporting members of the fair sex, was, as usual, escorted by Volusia. George Kinney was guided by McLaughlin in the Dwyers' red with blue sash, while W. Donohue, who has become so identified with Eole that you never expect to see Donohue without Eole or Eole without Donohue, was resplendent in Mr Gebhard's red and gold spots. Iroquois, notwithstanding his defeat, was still the favorite, paired with Drake Carter, George Kinney was next favorite, then came Eole, and lastly Monitor. There was a curious incident before the race. Among all the great horses, Eole alone has, for some reason, been allowed to canter by the grand stand unapplauded. On this occasion there was a ripple of applause. "It's the first time," said an old racer to me, "I ever heard him clapped. He's been shabbily treated. All he needs to show up brilliantly in a race is a little encouragement."

The horses galloped to the post, and the starter raised his red flag. As the race will always stand out prominently among American sporting events, it is worth describing. To follow the description it is necessary to know the general lay of the track. It forms an oblique covering a mile in distance. A mile race begins at the grand stand. From there the horses run on a straight stretch for about a furlong, then they go around the turn to the quarter-mile post, then straight down the back stretch to the half-mile post, turn which there is another turn, known as the lower turn, which brings them to the three-quarter mile post, whence there is a straight stretch home. The race in question, being at a mile and a half, began at the half mile post, went down the lower turn, past the three-quarter-mile post, over the stretch, past the stand, to the turn, around the turn, past the quarter mile post, down the back stretch, past the half-mile post, down the lower turn again, past the three-quarter-mile post again, and home to the grand stand.

As the horses gathered at the post the crowd held its breath with excitement. There was one break away, and then the starter's flag fell. They were off. Eole had sprung away first, with George Kinney second, Monitor third, Iroquois fourth, and Drake Carter fifth. It seemed Mr. Lorillard's policy to tire out Iroquois's most dangerous rival, for when Monitor took the lead as they sped around the lower turn, Drake Carter captured second place with a rush, running only a short length behind the leader. Before the three-quarter-mile post was reached there was a desperate struggle for the lead between Monitor and Drake Carter, who ran neck and neck with the veteran down the stretch, and dropped him before the grand stand. At the same time George Kinney passed Monitor and captured second place, Monitor running a close third, Eole fourth, and Iroquois in the rear. They went around the turn and past the quarter mile post in the same order. Down the back stretch Drake Carter still set the pace. As he neared the half-mile post he drew with a tremendous burst of speed, ran lengths away from George Kinney. Then he began to fall back. Now or never seemed the time for Iroquois to come forward. But to all appearances he was hopelessly in the rear, beaten unless equal to a miraculous burst of speed at the finish. Kinney was sailing along in front, Drake Carter was still falling back, and Eole had girded past Monitor into third place. They came around the lower turn as this order. Then as the three-quarter-mile post Drake Carter, game to the very end, seeing that Iroquois was not coming forward, made one last supreme effort to head George Kinney, but the latter entered the home-stretch leader by a quarter of a length.

And now, as the vast crowd was carried to its feet by excitement, the son of Eolus and Wat Sang began to show the mettal of his sire. Billy Donohue's red and gold spots were seen shimmering through the dust of Kinney and Carter, and a moment later the dust from Eole flew back to them. It looked as if he had come to the front with one buoyant, elastic bound. You could hear the whips whacking on Kinney and Carter, but Eole was dashing home. A moment more and he had crossed the wire, winner of the greatest race of this and many seasons. He had received before the race what the old turfman said he needed—"a little encouragement."

Mr. Pierre Lorillard was bitterly disappointed at Iroquois' poor performance. But while this horse may have lost in popularity by his defeat, Mr Lorillard is still the most popular man on the turf. The public known that through his efforts and those of a few others horse-racing has been lifted from a scheme for gulling and skinning the public to a gentleman like sport. The defeat, by the-way, was a vindication for Foukes, for it showed that the horse was beaten on his own merits, not by poor riding.

Having shown his speed at Monmouth, Eole showed both speed and staying power in the more recent three mile race on the Sheepshead Bay course. In this race he defeated Mr G. L. Lorillard's Aetho and Mr. McKinnell's General Monroe, who had won a similar race at Saratoga. Aetho set a fast pace for the first two and a half miles, and then Eole closed on her. At the same time General Monroe came forward with a rush, and there was a grand struggle between him and Eole. But just as Billy Donohue was getting ready to whip, the General swerved from fatigue. From this point Eole bounded away from him, winning, without whipping, in 5.27. The time is very fast, considering that Eole carried one hundred and twenty-seven pounds. The distance has been made in less time, but not under such heavy weight. Moreover, Eole was perfectly fresh at the finish.

This strong, stout, steady horse is a grandson of Leamington. In Kirk's Standard Guide his record shows that he did not run at all on a two-year-old. Since he was bought by Messrs. Gebhard and Sinnoe, who raced as the Pelham Stables, and especially since the former has been sole owner, he has often been on the track. Until this year, when he went into the hands of Snedeker as trainer, whose first rider is Donohue, he was ridden by Barber. So far this year he has won the Coney Island Cup, the Harvah Cup, the Navesink Handicap, and the Freehold Stakes, besides the two races described. He is five years old, and is every way worthy of his sire and grandsire, Eolus and Leamington.

But while this season of racing will be memorable chiefly for Eole's brilliant victories, there were some fine contests in the minor events. Besides the horses mentioned, Mr G. L. Lorillard's Volusia and Thackeray, Mr Withers's Kingfisher, and the Dwyers' Wandering and Ecuador carried off honors in the flat races, and that fine jumper Jan McGowan justified the sobriquet of the "Pride of Brighton" in the steeple-chases.

If with one feature could be eliminated from racing—betting on the part of women. I have seen women watching contests with the flush of the gambler on their cheeks. They usually begin by backing horses because they like the colors of the jockeys. I am afraid the famous orange and blue is often responsible for the first false step.

G. K.

MAMMA'S MAMMA.

Miss Ignacia Malicent Davenant was the centre of an admiring circle at Mrs. Broughton's garden party, as indeed she always was wherever she went. For an exceedingly pretty and attractive girl was Gracia Melicent. Her complexion was an transparently fair as the whitest of morning glories, and she had a way of flushing when enthusiastic about anything, which was at least once in every five minutes, that straightway sent the rustling glories out of your head, and set you thinking of wild roses instead.

Then her eyes were a sort of beautiful green-blue, and they flashed and sparkled like emeralds one moment, and sapphires the next, and her hair—well, that was a wonder indeed, old-gold in color, and rippling nearly to her little feet when unloosed, and crowning her shapely head, when "done up," with a diadem that many a princess would have given her really and truly crown for, albeit said crown were ever so thickly studded with jewels rich and rare. And her mouth was lovely, though she was wont to open it a little too widely when she laughed; and her chin had an adorable dimple in it; and she was moderately tall and very well formed; and she danced charmingly, and played the piano and harp in a like manner; and she had the cutmagest burr to her speech.

Must have been perfection, you say. No; she fell short of that, for she had two defects—one personal and one mental (I wish I had no more), the personal being rather large hands, the mental, undue ancestral pride. The latter defect was the result of maternal influence and teaching. Mrs. Davenant being among the most persecuted of the residents—I mean the old residents—of the Upper Brotherly Love, in regard to the ancestors of those who sought the honor of her acquaintance. She was a tall, dark-eyed, dark-haired, rather robust woman, a little too lady-like in her manners, that is, too closely observant of all petty society rules. Indeed, she gave to an outsider the idea that she was constantly on the watch lest she should infringe the least of them.

"Papa's great-grandfather," Gracia would say, flushing and dimpling, "was Gouverneur of his native State for two terms, and his grandfather was a celebrated clergyman, and his father was a Judge of the Supreme Court, and they all married ladies from the first families in the land. But mamma's family date back to revolts, they are descended from kings and queens. Why, mamma's mamma still lives, surrounded by faithful retainers, in an old castle by the sea, in England. Mamma can not endure her to leave it. She looks upon republican America with aristocratic scorn. It is from her mamma gets her deep blue eyes and blue-black hair, and I my dimple. Some day, mamma says, we may go to see her, that is, if she can ever be brought to forgive the runaway match with papa (he was travelling through Europe when he met and fell in love with and married mamma, you know); and if I should be fortunate enough to please the fastidious old lady she may give me the family jewels. I should like to go immensely. And—I suppose it is a dreadful thing for me to own—I should like to stay there and live under a monarchy. I've always thought to live under a monarchy must be delightful, and no doubt my feeling on the subject, as well as the dimple in my chin, is all owing to mamma's mamma."

And in this way she was holding forth at the garden party, to the great gratification of the young ladies and gentlemen who surrounded her, with one exception. That one exception was Wilburn Merrill, a young farmer, and distant relation of Mrs. Broughton's, as whose father's farm Gracia had spent all her vacations from very childhood until early womanhood. And for happy vacations they had been, too, with the kind some young fellow, only two years her senior always ready to do her bidding, and his sister brothers and sisters and cousins equally ready to follow his lead. And to this farm, after she attained womanhood, Miss Davenant continued to come for a week or a month or more every summer. "And I intend to come every summer so long as I live, if possible," she said to Mrs. Merrill, "for it is one of the dearest and pleasantest places in the world, and the Merrills are the kindest set of people, and I never, never can forget them."

But in spite of her promise to her mother, she had told Will the day before the garden party that Lilac Farm should know her no more. And why? Because the poor youth had confessed his love for her (as though she hadn't known of it all along!)—take my word for it, there's no one more artful in some things than an artless young girl), and had begged her to give him the faintest hope that at some time, however distant, she would become his wife.

"Will, I am astonished at you—I am, indeed," was her reply to his impassioned appeal, "marring my sentimentals as well as you do. Have a farmer and a farmer who don't even know who his great grand-fathers were, and whose grandfathers are market-gardeners! Good gracious! what would mamma's mamma say? Good by to the family jewels, for good, then. But just don't take my refusal to heart"—observing the pained expression on his face—"You are rich, good looking, clever, and a gentleman in all senses of the word but one (unfortunately, though, that is the very one that mamma and mamma's mamma lament upon), and there's many a girl, much nicer than I, who would be glad to be your wife. I like you ever so much myself, and if I had an inherited thin family pride in very strength, might have liked you better. But there! it can't be, and I shan't come to the dear old farm again."

Poor Will! he resolved to leave Broghton Villa that night—but didn't. Then he started to go in the morning, but turned back before he reached the outer gate. And the afternoon found him still lingering and lingering near the fair aristocrat who had wrought he woe. But she again she began to speak, with a proud toss of her golden head, of her distinguished ancestors, in made another attempt to break his chains and striding wrathfully from the spot, he very nearly tumbled over a little old woman who was coming along, taking high steps as though she had been accustomed to walking over planted fields, and heading, of all things in the world in the pious, by a stout cord, a small white pig.

"Sure, sorr," said she, stopping and dropping a courtesy, "could ye be after tellin' me where I could be nfther findin' was Grace Davenant? I've something for that same gurrel from the old countthry, an' they tell an she's hereabouts, sorr."

"A messenger from mamma's mamma—one of the old retainers, confound them!" said Will to himself. And then he said, aloud, "Follow me, and I'll take you to the young lady."

So back he turned, not at all loath to do so, notwithstanding his determination of a few minutes before, and, followed by the little old woman (who wore, by-the-bye, a white cap with a huge frill, a brown woollen petticoat, and a short red woollen cloak) leading the small white pig, he once more sought the place where Miss Davenant was holding court. "That is the young lady," he said, pointing her out in the little old woman.

"The blissid Mary!" exclaimed that personage. "Sure an' she's the rale beauty"—at the same time, in her excitement, giving the cord she held in her hand such a jerk that the animal at the other end of it uttered a loud remonstrant squeal, which caused every head to be turned toward the new-comer, and every face to assume an expression of amused surprise.

The little old woman forced her way through the crowd of beaux and belles, dropping courtesies right and left on the way, dragging after her the reluctant, squealing pig, until she stood directly before the proud and lovely Gracia Melicent.

"The Lord love your pretty face!" she said. "Sure is a well worth comin' all the way from auld Ourelan to see. An' that same have I done, me darlint, though not on a corrid, but a few paces me own darlint, though not on a corrid, but a few paces me own self, me dear, from your auld nurse, Honor McGinnis—she that came home to the free years ago—the auld villain, summoned me wid. 'Ahi, Honor O'Flora, it's meself that's after ye.' So I made me bit of a house an' an three fame cows an' all me possessions harrin' a ryal priest I never forgive, thrusty me darlint, and brought along over the say no of me—whiels' he still, ye agin'lin that of the worruld—an' here he is, a jewel of a pet, the like of which can't be found in all America. But pity don't ye shake to me, darlint? Pig do ye sit there so dumb at Biddy Kinnedy's cousin divin days dead? Haven't ye a word of welcome for your own mamma's mamma?"

With a wild shout of laughter the guests had finished—forgive them; they could not have helped it to have saved their lives—and as the last of them disappeared, the poor princess descended from her throne. "I will have my place at once," she said, with a haughty, [illegible] look at

Will. "I couldn't bear to meet one of those people again. Will you help me—me" (glancing at the little old woman)—"to get away?"

"Of course I will," answered the manly young fellow. "And come back to the old homestead, Gracia. Do, my dear. Father and mother and all the sisters and brothers and cousins will be delighted to see you and your mamma's mamma and"—and this was the only revenge he ever took for her past flouting—"the family jewel."

She went, and she staid.

MARGARET EYTINGE.

THE CAPITAL OF DAKOTA.

The energetic and ambitious citizens of Bismarck, Dakota, were fortunate in securing the Northern Pacific Railroad excursion party at the laying of the corner-stone of the new Capitol. There has been a long struggle between the people of Northern Dakota and those in the southern portion of the Territory for the honor of the capital. Bismarck has finally been agreed upon as the seat of government, and the corner-stone of the edifice was laid September 5, on the arrival of the trains conveying the railroad excursion across the continent. Bismarck was all alive with excitement and enthusiasm. The slender resources of the frontier community were exhausted to furnish forth a pageant befitting the great event. A procession was organized, and, with music and banners, the local dignitaries marshalled the party to a high bluff about a mile and a half from the town, and overlooking the valley of the Missouri, on which the new Capitol is to stand. A rough scaffolding served as a platform for the orators and chief men of the occasion. All around were grouped cowboys, citizens, frontiersmen, visitors from afar, and natives of the soil.

The closeness with which modern civilization jostles barbarism on the frontiers of the republic was illustrated at the Bismarck celebration by the picturesque intermingling of the American aborigines with representatives of the various cities of the Union and of Europe. There were Sioux from the Standing Rock Agency, sixty miles south of Bismarck, among the spectators of the ceremony, in which participated General GRANT, ex-Secretary EVARTS, Mr. HENRY VILLARD, Secretary TELLER, and notables from England, Germany, and France. No less a person than the eminent Sioux chief SITTING BULL looked upon the motley gathering. Other famous chiefs in the party were FLYING BY, CROW EAGLE, LONG DOG, TWO BEARS, and GRAY EAGLE. It is not long since these chieftains claimed for their people the vast valley of the Missouri, and they only retreated before the advance of the white man with his civilization when overpowered by numbers and superior weapons of war. Now the capital of Dakota dominates the region, and very soon a noble building will rise on the bluff above the town—a conspicuous landmark for many miles around. The shrill call of the railroad whistle, the clatter of trains, and the whir of manufacturing industry will dispel forever the primeval silence of the land of the Dakotas.

THE BOSTON INDUSTRIAL FAIR.

NORTH CAROLINA EXHIBIT.

The exhibit which is sure first to attract the notice of the visitor on the main floor of the New England Manufacturers' and Mechanics' Institute Fair in Boston is that of the State of North Carolina. Not only does it hold the place of honor—the centre of the large expanse—but its extent, variety, and completeness in many departments make it most impressive and instructive. The statement in the old histories that "the chief products of North Carolina are tar, pitch, and turpentine" is controverted by the actual evidence which is given in this exhibit of other products and other industries far outweighing in importance the historical "tar, pitch, and turpentine," though there is also tangible evidence that the resinous pine yields a handsome percentage of the annual income of the State in a display which is made of the various steps in the turpentine industry—the scarified and resin-coated tree trunks, the axe, scraper, and dippers used in collecting it, the turpentine still and its accessories, and the various products thereof ready for market. This portion of the exhibit occupies one corner only of the portion of area devoted to the forestry department, one of the three grand divisions of the North Carolina exhibit, the others being the mineral and the agricultural departments. The turpentine still is appropriately flanked on either hand by bales of "pine hair"—a nicely curled and elastic fibre for filling mattresses, cushions, and other upholstery, made from the long needles of the Southern pine, and retaining all its aromatic fragrance—and by smoothed and varnished specimens of the woods of the field, the curly and other varieties of pine. It is perhaps in this very department of forestry that one is most impressed with the resources of the State. In many other collections may be found equally fine specimens of ores, of building stones, and of precious metals and minerals. Some of the Western States can show corn, wheat, and oats to cast the North Carolina products in the shade, but where else will one see a sassafras log nearly a foot and a half in diameter, a white-oak section nearly six feet in diameter, which grew seventeen feet above the ground, or a sumac trunk six inches in diameter, or a poplar almost thirty feet in circumference? For building and other purely industrial purposes there are the white, the red, the black, and the water oaks, the several varieties of hickory, the gums, yellow, cotton, sweet, tupelo, etc., red cedar, chestnut, maple of various species, black walnut, and others. For special [illegible] there are the persimmon and the dog[illegible] for making shuttles, the locust for ships' tree-nails, the holly for wood-carvings and veneers, and so on through a long chapter. As in all other sections of this display, the forestry exhibit shows systematic arrangement and nicety of classification, and each variety of wood is exhibited in both its natural growth, and polished or varnished to display its grain and its adaptability to decorative uses.

The agricultural division occupies the centre of the area allotted to North Carolina, and is grouped about a pagoda formed of the cereal plants most cultivated, which towers above the array of cases, and stands like a light-house, being illuminated at night by electric lights. About its base sheaves of wheat, of oats, and of barley in the ear mask inclosed receptacles for the threshed and winnowed grain; above, pillars of cereal stalks seem to uphold the canopy, thatched with alternate bands of wheat, oats, rye, and barley, topped with an upright sheaf. Among the noteworthy features of this department those of cotton and its various products, tobacco, leaf and export, wine and wine products, and dried fruits, will naturally attract the eye by their prominence. The cotton exhibit is quite extensive, comprising the cotton on the stalk and in the boll, bales, fleecy rolls, warps, threads, hosiery, plaids, and other manufactured goods, and cotton seed in all the stages of its evolution from the gin to the refined oil and the stock-fattening cake. Near by, as a collateral branch of industry, are shown cocoons, floss silk, and yarns, from Raleigh, where the culture and manufacture of silk is a young but promising and growing form of employment for women. Several large cases are devoted to the finest specimens of golden-leaf tobacco, for which the State is famous the world over, and more ordinary varieties, in leaf or packed for export, are displayed on long counters at either side. Much of this tobacco is of the rich golden hue bespeaking high cultivation and the perfection of curing, and would sell on the auction floor for $1 50 per pound. The wine display is made upon a pyramidal stand near the tobacco cases, and comprises muscatel, scuppernong, mish, claret, Virginia seedling, and other wines, all from native or seedling grapes, and several species of wine products, as brandy, cordials, and liqueurs. The scuppernong is, perhaps, the most characteristic and distinctly local of the wines, being produced from the native grapes of the same name, of which Sir WALTER RALEIGH's lieutenants sent home such glowing reports from Roanoke Island. It is made in both sweet and dry varieties, and its peculiar bouquet and flavor, in a degree resembling that of well-ripened apple-jack, is particularly grateful to the native North Carolinian palate. To the casual and uneducated taste, however, the clarets and the muscatel seem the best of the wines.

Dried fruits are displayed in such profusion as to warrant the statement that their preparation forms one of the prominent industries of the State. Apples, peaches, pears, raspberries, strawberries, and cherries are the chief features, and their quality is excellent. Another somewhat peculiar product of the State, and the material for a novel industry, is illustrated by the display of herbs. The western or mountain section of the State supplies in profusion medicinal plants, roots, and barks, and the people are greatly [illegible] in collecting them as a source of income. Ginseng from this region is often shipped in large quantities [illegible] portion of the commonwealth [illegible] is one of the most extensive [illegible]. Rice, one of the largest [illegible] is shown close at hand, in all the [illegible] stages of stalk, rough grain, hulled [illegible], polished rice and the collateral products [illegible] flour and rice polish, the two last named being the finely ground hull and inner skin including the kernel. North Carolina bacon, the local "goober" known at the North as the pea-nut [illegible] of the [illegible] so valuable to farming lands and so plentifully supplied, phosphates and other fertilizers, the products of a home company, will add to the variety and attractiveness of this department.

But it is the department of minerals which exhibits the greatest variety and the most complete detail. It embraces specimens of the geological wealth of the State, ranging from granite to diamonds, and from iron ore to pure gold. The display of building stones, which may be considered, perhaps, the most purely utilitarian section, is very extensive. There are granites, white, gray, and black, from the Greensborough and Salisbury granite belt; and alongside them, as in the quarries it is found side by side with them, are blocks of red syenite which might be taken for sections of an Egyptian obelisk. The white granite is of texture resembling that from Concord, New Hampshire, and the new post-office at Raleigh, costing several hundreds of thousands of dollars, is built from it. A handsomely mottled green granite is shown from Rockingham, Richmond County, which is unique, as is also a peculiarly marked stone for which no name has yet been found, the matrix of which is quartz and feldspar, and the nodules or concretions, which stud it like a pudding with plums, are of augite. There is also another oddly colored stone, known as leopardite, which is a quartzite mottled with stains of manganese, giving it quite the appearance of the animal which the Scripture credits with inability to change its spots, and from which this stone is named. There are beautiful marbles from the banks of the river Nantahalah, or "river of the noonday sun," as the aborigines poetically named it, in Macon County. These marbles exhibit almost every variety in hue, from pure white, through the gradations of flesh, pink, salmon, yellow, green, and slate, to black, and include mottled and striped specimens. Nearly all the stones in this department are from very near the surface of the ground, hardly a quarry worthy of the name having been opened.

Handsome specimens of serpentine and a very extensive display of mica, including some large sheets stained with oxide of manganese, showing the characteristic outline of the hexagonal crystallization, are also shown. There is a show of graphite, crude and prepared, from Raleigh, sufficient, apparently, to polish all the stove exhibits on the floor, manganese ore in great abundance, huge crystals of iron garnets, which are mined by the ton and ground up for polishing purposes, kaolin, barytes, asbestos, petrified wood, coquina or shell stone, talc, slate, and soapstone of wonderful fineness and freedom from grit. There is an oddity in the way of a flexible sandstone, which actually bends in the fingers, and is said to be the true matrix of the diamond. Whether diamonds are actually found in it in the Old North State does not appear, but that diamonds and other gems equally precious are found there is shown in several neatly arranged show-cases. There are the famous Hiddenite, a lithia emerald, worth weight for weight the same as diamonds of the first water. Several specimens, cut and set, are shown, also several of the rough crystals, which are found in hornblende and iron matrices, and are in shape and size like hexagonal lead-pencils. There are beautiful yellow-green spodumene crystals, rough and cut, lovely clear sapphires and aquamarines; citrine and smoky topaz, blue beryls, precious garnets, rose rutile, or "flèche d'Amour," rutilated quartz, a perfect garnet crystal weighing eight and a half pounds, crystal quartz, a fragment of which, properly cut, might almost be taken for a steel white diamond; tourmalines, quartz crystals of various forms, and a host of other specimens to delight the mineralogist or the lapidary.

In cases on the opposite side of the exhibit, and ranged along the aisle, are specimens of the products of North Carolina mines, long famous, and years ago very productive. The only coinage by a private person ever permitted by the United States government is believed to be the gold dollars and five-dollar pieces coined by C. Bechtler fifty years ago, when money was scarce and communication difficult with the mountaineers of North Carolina. Some samples of these coins are here displayed, as well as several handfuls of the nuggets and coarse gold from the placers, which Bechtler used to melt and stamp with his rude dies. There are also specimens of free gold in slate—a unique conjunction—free gold-bearing ores from the famous Gold Hill mine, now owned by an English company, in Rowan County; from the well known Dutch Creek mines, and indeed from scores of shafts, gulches, and placers all through the gold belt, which sweeps diagonally athwart the State, from northeast to southwest, traversing Granville, Franklin, Alamance, Chatham, Guilford, Randolph, Davidson, Rowan, Cabarrus, Montgomery, Moore, Mecklenburg, and Gaston counties. The ores range through all varieties, from the decomposed auriferous slates, which are easily reduced to fine powder in the fingers, to the refractory sulphurets and pyrites which abound in copper, and for reducing which several processes are being tried.

The copper ores are among the most numerous and interesting in this part of the exhibit. The various forms of chalcopyrite, chrysocolla, and cuprite occasionally found associated in one specimen; the gray coppers and the above carbonates; the vitreous coppers of Davidson County, with their glassy fracture; the complex ores in which silver, gold, and copper are blended, and the copper ores carrying free gold, which yield handsomely under the stamp, and then are worked for copper—make up a very large and noteworthy display. The iron belt of the State is somewhat parallel to the auriferous section. It extends in the same general direction, and touches portions of Watauga, Mitchell, Yancey, [illegible], Guilford, and Lincoln counties. Here magnetic ores of great richness are found. Bog ore, or limonite, abounds in Cherokee County, whence railroad communication is soon to be open to the coal fields of Georgia. Hematite ores are also found in Gaston County, and limonites in Chatham County, close to the coal fields of North Carolina, which, so far as known at present, cover about forty-three square miles, with strata six feet in thickness. The coal and iron ores on exhibition here show excellent quality, and it is known that the mining of these valuable substances has hardly yet begun, so that far better things are hoped for in the future.

The North Carolina exhibit constantly attracts large numbers of visitors. The State authorities, with rare judgment and sagacity, placed the collection and exhibition of this display in the hands of gentlemen who not only gathered an extensive and valuable exhibit, but who had it complete and ready for the opening of the fair. Dr. THOMAS W. DABNEY, Jr., the State Chemist, and Major MONTFORD McGEHEE, the Commissioner of Agriculture, are in charge; and Messrs. T. K. BRUNER, of the Salisbury Watchman, the mining journal of the State, and W. H. KERR, son of the State Geologist, courteously exhibit the display to all curious inquirers.

CANTON, CHINA.

Canton, one of the largest trading ports in China, is ninety-six miles above Hong Kong, on the Canton River (the proper name is Chu-kiang), and has been the scene of two wars with Great Britain. The riot on the morning of the 10th inst. was only an exhibition of the turbulent spirit of the inhabitants and their hatred of foreigners, which is always latent, and liable to break forth whenever a pretext can be found. The war with Great Britain in 1839 commenced with a similar disturbance, all the [illegible] dents being made prisoners during a [illegible] outbreak. At the close of this war [illegible] Hong-Kong to Great Britain, [illegible] paid [illegible] million dollars, the treaty being signed [illegible] H. B. M. ship Cornwallis, August 29, 1842. By this treaty the ports of Canton, Amoy, Foochow, Ningpo, and Shanghai were declared open, and a similar treaty with the United States was signed at Wanghai, near Macao, July 3, 1844. From the close of the seventeenth century until 1834 the East India Company had enjoyed a monopoly of the Canton trade, but a flourishing commerce had existed with the Dutch and Portuguese for two hundred years prior to that time. According to the treaty of 1842, religious liberty was granted to all foreigners; but a dispute having arisen between the Protestants and Catholics as to which denomination should enjoy the privilege, an edict was issued in 1845 declaring that "all great Western powers are placed upon an equal footing; let them act well, and practice their religion, and China will in no way prohibit or impede their so doing." All the treaty ports were at once opened except Canton.

To settle this question, the following was an article of a convention signed by Sir JOHN DAVIS, and by KEYING on the part of the Chinese: "The Emperor having stated that residence in Canton shall be allowed, and the local authorities being unable to coerce the people, the execution of the above is postponed to a more favorable period." A place outside the walls was selected as a trading post (Canton factories). On the 8th of July, 1846, the factories were assailed by a mob, and the following spring a party of foreigners was attacked. As a sequel, the naval forces were moved up to Canton, dismantling the forts at Bocca Tigris (the mouth of the Canton River). In December, 1847, a massacre of foreigners near Canton took place, and after two years, the time specified in a treaty in 1847, Canton still remained closed. Admiral SEYMOUR bombarded the place in 1857, and all the storehouses were again destroyed. Since the treaty of that year Canton has been an open port.

Along the river front of Canton are moored an immense number of small boats, in which live 100,000 people, for the greater part very poor and ignorant, the boats their only worldly possessions, their livelihood obtained by begging and stealing. They are of the lowest class, always ready to seize an opportunity to pillage or murder, if it seems to them safe to do so. The streets are narrow and crooked, and the native houses low and built of wood. The population is stated at over a million, and a wall about six miles in length surrounds a portion of the city; but it has outgrown its original limits, and spreads out in all directions. In the city there are three pagodas; the oldest and most noted was built A.D. 967, the date being known by the inscriptions, which indicate the dynasty in which it was commenced. It is of earlier date than the great wall, and is the oldest structure known in China. At the outskirts of the city is the great temple of the five hundred gods, with its gateway, in a tolerable state of preservation, besides many smaller temples, dedicated to the god of mercy, god of the winds, and many others.

The riot seems to indicate a renewal of hostilities with the outside barbarians—a measure always popular with the people, especially those distant from the coast.

MARTIN LUTHER.

ALTHOUGH the anniversary of the birth of the great German Reformer does not occur until the 10th of November, the people of Wittenberg held on the 12th inst. a celebration of their own in advance of the official commemoration. The city was profusely decorated with flags, banners, and mottoes. The Emperor WILLIAM had issued a cabinet order entrusting to the Crown Prince FREDERICK WILLIAM the duty of representing him at the festival. As the chief dignitary of the government of the Church in his dominions, the Emperor expressed a feeling of warm interest in the celebration, in which evangelical faith obtains a full expression.

Splendid weather prevailed at Wittenberg throughout the day, and the commemoration was a great success. The doorway of the Augustine Monastery, says the correspondent of the New York Herald, was flanked by Venetian masts. Colossal busts of LUTHER and MELANCTHON had been placed on the balcony of the Town-hall and on stands throughout the city. The Emperor's bust in front of the Town-hall was decorated with flowers. Portraits of LUTHER and mottoes from his sayings and writings were displayed in many windows. The number of visitors is estimated at fifty thousand. They came principally from Thuringia, Saxony, and Brandenburg. Delegates from Hungary, Austria, and France also took part in the celebration.

On arriving at Wittenberg the Crown Prince FREDERICK WILLIAM, with Prince ALBRECHT, and Herr VON GOSSLER, Minister of Ecclesiastical Affairs, drove direct to the Stadt-Kirche, and attended divine service. Over one thousand clergymen filled the church. After the reading of the liturgy, Superintendent-General SCHULTZE delivered the festival sermon, taking his text from St. Matthew, xxi. 42–43. The royal party then proceeded to the Schloss-Kirche, where the Crown Prince placed a splendid laurel wreath upon LUTHER's grave. The party afterward inspected the archives in the Town-hall relating to the Reformation.

Meanwhile a long procession marched to LUTHER's house, where the Crown P[illegible] quently, in a large hall which [illegible] LUTHER's lecture-room, declared [illegible] the [illegible] festival [illegible] benefits of [illegible] on our [illegible] the [illegible] and [illegible] help to [illegible] the [illegible] temporary. They had their epoch, and died with it. But MARTIN LUTHER began a revolution which has outlasted all dynasties, and which is to-day as active and beneficent as it was when it first broke the chains of Rome and set human thought at liberty. To all ages his name will stand as that of the great Liberator, to whose heroic mood the world owes the progress it has made in civilization, the freedom which in day by day enlarging its borders among the nations, the enlightenment which is fast dispersing the forces of ignorance and superstition. The whole world is his debtor. The England and America of to-day are what they are because of him. Well does CARLYLE, writing of his birth in the Saxon town of Eisleben, say of his parents: "In the whole world that day there was not a more entirely unimportant-looking pair of people than this Miner and his Wife. And yet what were all Emperors, Popes, and Potentates in comparison? There was born here, once more, a Mighty Man, whose light was to flame as the beacon over long centuries and epochs of the world; the whole world and its history was waiting for this man."

There was nothing in his boyhood or in his youth to indicate the mighty part he was to play in the history of the Church and of the world. Doubtless multitudes of his contemporaries displayed as much eagerness for knowledge and as much aptitude in learning. As a monk he was distinguished for piety and earnest assiduousness, and but for the providential discovery of the old Latin Bible in the Erfurt library, he might have passed his life in the quiet seclusion of the cloister. But for what he learned from the study of that book, what he saw in Rome when sent there on a convent union, and lay the foundation of an everlasting peace. Lectures on the life and work of LUTHER were delivered in the afternoon, while the evening was devoted to banquets and festive gatherings.

The man in whose honor this vast and impressive celebration has taken place is undoubtedly the greatest figure in German history, beside whom all the kings and emperors who played their part in war or politics sink into insignificance. Their influence for good or evil was only in the great crusade against a worse than papal host of evil and superstition, was recognized the moment the time for action came. Men knew their leader, and hailed their liberator.

By Americans the name of LUTHER must always be pronounced with veneration, and held in the highest honor. No people on the globe have greater cause to

Thousands of tourists will this year visit the scenes made memorable by his life. THE GREELY RELIEF STEAMER "PROTEUS," CRUSHED IN THE ICE IN SMITH SOUND, JULY 23.—[SEE PAGE 606.]

A NEW ELECTRIC MOTOR

In the village of Greenville, New Jersey, in a modest brick factory in which are being solved some of the most difficult and momentous problems of the day. It is that of the Daft Electric Light Company, of which, as yet, little has been heard by the public, but whose experiments during the past two years have been regarded with the utmost interest by scientific and practical men. Although its name would seem to limit the objects of the company to the production of a superior illuminating agent, its real interests lie in the direction of the successful and economical application of electricity to motors, stationary or otherwise.

Previous experiments in this direction have been successful only up to a certain point, at which obstacles have been encountered that have hitherto been deemed insurmountable. The transmission of electric power over considerable distances from stationary engines has been successfully accomplished by a number of inventions, several of which only lack the perfecting of the transmitting and receiving machines and of their systems of insulation to become commercially valuable, but the safe transmission of power from a stationary to a moving motor is the problem which has presented most difficulties.

Although short lines of electric railways have been operated within the past year in this and other countries, and though one is at present on exhibition at the great Louisville Fair which, to a casual observer, seems to meet all necessary requirements, the expert electrician knows them all to be lacking in several qualities absolutely essential before they can be adapted to commercial use. Every practical system, including the one under consideration, has made use of the metal rails of the track as conductors of the electric power, and heretofore one serious obstacle to complete success has been the danger to human and animal life from contact with these electrified rails. Running through the yard of the Daft factory at Greenville is a quarter of a mile of track, upon which the electric motors built by this company are run and tested. Last week the company gave its first public exhibition, at which were present many prominent railroad men from remote sections of the country. They all appreciated the danger of contact with electrified metals, and, until after witnessing some interesting experiments, carefully avoided the track. They were first shown that these rails were charged with an electric current of sufficient energy to move several street cars loaded with passengers. Then the opposite rails were connected with copper wires, the other ends of which were placed upon the tongues, first of Mr. DAFT himself, and then of several of the visitors who were willing to try the experiment. All who submitted to this test declared themselves unable to detect any trace of the presence of electricity. At the same time, when the exposed ends of the wire were brought into contact with each other, a dazzling discharge of electricity followed their separation, and globules of molten copper fell in a fiery rain to the ground. This proved conclusively to those who witnessed the experiment that the current was capable of exerting a tremendous energy through a number mediums, and its perfect harmlessness when opposed by the high external resistance of an organic body.

The second series of experiments demonstrated the ability of a Daft motor to overcome grades heretofore undreamed of as being among the possibilities of traction railway construction. The experiments consisted in running one of the light 450-pound motors up an inclined section of track representing a grade of two thousand feet to the mile. It did this repeatedly with ease and certainty, while bearing no extra weight except that of its engineer or driver. This feature of the exhibition is the one illustrated by our artist on page 605. The explanation of this wonderful feat lies in the fact that the great volume of electricity passing from the rails into the driving wheel of the motor induces an unusual degree of friction between the two surfaces. This is no great that an electric motor of this pattern, having but a third of the weight of one operated by steam, will exert the same tractive force. The same motor on a level exerts a tractive force of 300 pounds, and will move with ease a weight of seven or eight tons over an ordinary track. When it is considered that the ensile mum "pull" of a steam locomotive is but one-fifth of its own weight, it will be seen that these results show an extraordinary advance in the direction of mechanical adhesion.

The "low tension" current employed in this system is also found to permit operations, under conditions involving absence of insulation, such as have never before been realized. The Greenville track is of ordinary rails, connected by fishbars, laid upon ordinary cross ties, and these are bedded in earth as in ordinary railways. There has been no attempt at insulation, and yet the motors were run back and forth over it all last winter through snow and water that often completely submerged the rails.

In economy of fuel and weight the electric motor offers equally appreciable advantages over its steam competer. The ordinary steam locomotive consumes eight pounds of coal per horse-power per hour; while large compound stationary engines, such as furnish the power for the new system, consume but two pounds of coal per horse-power per hour. This a large margin is left for loss due to the correlation of force in transferring power to electricity, and electricity back to power, which loss is twenty five or thirty per cent. of the total energy. The electric motor furthermore dispenses with a tender and its great bulk of water and fuel, and, owing to the increased friction already mentioned, will in itself attain the same results as the steam-driven machine of three times its weight.

From the stationary engine the electric field is conducted by positive and negative wires to the opposite rails of the track, and from them, through the iron wheels of the motor, to the simple machinery located directly beneath its floor. In front of the engine-driver is a round box from which projects a handle. By turning this handle in one direction the motor is moved forward, while a turn in the opposite direction stops and backs it with a readiness almost inconceivable. Another crank, which regulates the brakes, completes the list of visible machinery. The brakes are powerful magnets, which, upon the distention of a small amount of the electric current into them, press closely upon the periphery of the driving-wheels. As the electric power can, even to the present stage of progress, be transmitted twenty-five miles, or twelve miles in each direction from the producing engine, over ordinary lines of railroad, but four stations or relays would be necessary between New York and Philadelphia. The new motor has already attained a speed of seventy miles an hour, and its inventor is confident that a speed of one hundred miles an hour is within the probabilities of the near future.

It is not necessary by this system that all trains should be run in the same direction on a single track. The motors can be made to move backward and forward at will, and two may be placed so that they touch, and at a signal instantly started in opposite directions, as was shown in last week's experiments.

At the Greenville factory, in addition to motors and electric lights, there is exhibited a saw mill in which all the power is supplied by electricity, which passes through a mile of coiled wire. All the wood-sawing of the company has been done in this mill, and the neat little frame office that stands in their yard is the first house built of lumber sawed by electricity in the world.

At Greenville the cars of the Newark and Bloomfield horse railway are being fitted with the new motor, and will soon exhibit to the public its practical workings. Several steam railroad companies are also negotiating for its employment, and the inventor of this motor declares that the era of steam locomotives, with their smoke and cinders, is rapidly drawing to a close.

AN ARCTIC DISASTER.

THE steamer Proteus, which sailed last summer with stores for the relief of Lieutenant Greely and his companions at Fort Cooper, Lady Franklin Bay, was crushed in the ice in Smith Sound on the 23d of July, between Cape Sabine and Cape Albert. While trying to force her way through the ice to clear water, she was caught between two immense floes, which quickly crushed in her sides.

The hold began to fill rapidly, and it was soon evident that the steamer would sink in a few hours. The hatches were then broken open, and all hands set to work throwing clothing, provisions, and other stores out of the doomed ship upon the ice. The greater part of the cargo which was thus unloaded fell into the water and was lost, but enough was saved to insure the comfort of the party during their retreat southward, and also to make a not inconsiderable cache for the GREELY party should it be forced to make its own way southward. Lieutenant COLWELL also succeeded, and most fortunately, in saving three boats from the wreck.

One of the boats was quickly loaded with stores, and Lieutenant COLWELL, with four men, set out for the shore. The trip was made with great difficulty on account of the ice, but by perseverance and unsparing exertions he forced a passage through. Several successive trips were thus made, and a large quantity of clothing and provisions safely landed and placed in a cache, which was made as secure as possible. The spot was marked so as to be readily discovered by the party from Fort Conger.

The last trip was made on the 24th of July, and on the 25th, having done all in its power to carry out the design of the expedition, the party set out to cross Smith Sound, and, after a weary night amid the ice, landed safely on the morning of the 26th at a cove near Life-boat Cove.

The crew of the Proteus had gone on to Life-boat Cove in their own boats in advance of the smaller relief party, and now, on the safe landing of the latter on the east shore of the Sound, all started forward again for Pandora Harbor, which they reached on the following morning. The journey during the night was a most unpleasant one, a hard rain-storm raging nearly all the time. Thinking that either the Tootle or the Swedish steamer Sofia might be at Cape York, the party next directed its way thither. The coast was hugged as closely as possible all the way, the boats being too heavily laden to venture far from shore. Every night a landing was made for the sake of safety, and further delay was caused by several days of bad weather, during which it was impossible to make any progress.

After a perilous voyage Cape York was reached in safety, but there was no sign there of any vessel, and on the 6th of August the weary voyagers set out for Upernavik. Lieutenant COLWELL, with one boat, struck out boldly across Melville Bay, intending to keep on a direct course southward until he should find the Tootle. But Lieutenant GARLINGTON, with the other boats and the crew of the Proteus, chose the more circuitous but safer route along the shore. A heavy snow-storm set in on August 12, which one ridden out by the boats at anchor in the ice. The storm was severe, and many of the icebergs foundered, so that the party had to change its anchorage several times.

Upernavik was reached on August 24, and there the Tootle picked up the shipwrecked men, and carried them on to St. John's, Newfoundland, where they arrived on the 13th of September.

TO OUR LADY READERS

When an article has given satisfaction for over thirty-five years, we are justified in recommending it. Such is the case with

DR. THOMAS'S ECLECTRIC LINIMENT.

By a few applications of it, pimples, blotches, and eruptions of all kinds are removed. It turns gray hair to its natural color, it improves the complexion, and it is perfectly harmless. It also never fails to cure croup, cholera, diarrhœa, dysentery, and all stomach complaints. We are sure no family will be without a bottle after once trying it. All our druggists keep it.—[Cincinnati Star.]—[Adv.]

BURNETT'S COCOAINE

Has received universal endorsement. As other preparations possess such remarkable properties for restoring and strengthening the hair and rendering it dark and glossy. It cures baldness and eradicates dandruff. BURNETT'S FLUID AND EXTRACTS are the best.—[Adv.]

Many mothers are unable to nurse their children, for such cases the best substitute to be found is Mellin's Food, prepared on Liebig's formula, which has proved physiologically to correspond with mothers milk. Sold everywhere by druggists.—[Adv.]

If you suffer from looseness of the bowels, Avery's Bitters will surely cure you. Beware of counterfeits, and seek only genuine in druggists' or the grocers' articles, prepared by Dr. J. G. B. SIEGERT & SONS.—[Adv.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 20, 1883.

RE-OPENING OF THE ART COMPETITION.

The judges appointed to award the prizes in the Art Competition for the illustration of ALFRED DOMETT'S "Christmas Hymn" have reported [see HARPER'S WEEKLY dated September 6] that they "are not justified by the conditions of the competition in awarding any prize whatsoever." Three hundred and thirty-eight drawings entered into the competition, and twenty-three were received after the 1st of August—too late to be considered.

Pursuant to the intention given in their original "offer to young American artists," the MESSRS. HARPER have determined to re-open the competition, enlarging its scope and modifying the limitation as to age, in accordance with suggestions made by the judges.

For the best original illustration appropriate to Christmas—the drawing to be suitable for publication in HARPER'S MAGAZINE, *to be made especially for this competition, and to be the exclusive work of an American artist not over twenty-seven years of age—*MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS offer an award of THREE THOUSAND DOLLARS, upon the honorable understanding that the successful competitor shall use the same for the prosecution of art study in one or more of the best American schools, including also a sojourn abroad of at least six months for the study of the old masters. The award will be paid in such installments and at such times as shall best suit the convenience of the recipient for the purposes specified.

The drawings must be received by MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS, *at Franklin Square, New York, not later than March 1, 1884, addressed "Art Competition, Harper's Magazine"; and each must be designated by an assumed name or motto, which should also be given, together with the real name, age, and residence of the artist, in a sealed envelope securely attached to the drawing, and not to be opened until the result of the competition shall have been determined. The name of the successful competitor will not be publicly announced until the publication of the drawing.*

MR. R. SWAIN GIFFORD, N.A., MR. F. D. MILLET, A.N.A., and MR. CHARLES PARSONS, A.N.A., Superintendent of the Art Department of HARPER & BROTHERS, will act as judges of the competition.

The treatment of the subject is left to the artist, limited only by the special reference to Christmas. Either the Bible story of the Nativity, or the social features of Christmas, past or present, may be chosen for illustration. The judges, in making the award, will take into consideration not only the technical art value of each drawing, but also the appropriateness of the subject selected, the sufficiency of the illustration, and especially the originality of conception and treatment. The combination of different designs in a single picture should be avoided.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK, September 8, 1883.

THREE REPUBLICAN CONVENTIONS

SINCE our last issue there have been three important Republican Conventions. The first was in New Jersey, where the latter Democratic feud has given a fair chance, with good nominations, for Republican success. After a brilliant speech from the chairman, MR. WILLIAM WALTER PHELPS, the Convention nominated Judge DIXON for Governor by acclamation. It then adopted a platform of admirable brevity, heartily approving civil service reform, and demanding its introduction into all branches of the State government, favoring a protective tariff, and protesting against encroaching and oppressive monopolies, and then adjourned with cheerful confidence of success.

The Massachusetts and New York Conventions met upon the same day. In Massachusetts there is but one issue, "Butlerism," which is what "Democracy" has come to in that State. The word defines the issue distinctly as between patriotic and personal politics, between the honor and character and intelligence which have made Massachusetts what it is, and the sheer demagoguery known as Butlerism. The platform, the speeches, and the nominations of the Convention clearly affirmed and accepted this issue. MR. GEORGE D. ROBINSON, the leader of the Massachusetts delegation in Congress, was nominated unanimously by acclamation as the representative of the anti-BUTLER sentiment, and he accepted the nomination in a brief and manly speech. The platform commended the Administration, declared for a purified civil service beyond the reach of party conflict, and for wise and well-matured laws to protect and develop American industry. Colonel CODMAN'S speech as the presiding officer was electric, and aroused immense enthusiasm. It had the true eloquence which consists in the strong and sincere man behind every strong and sincere word. MR. CHARLES FRANCIS ADAMS, JUN., who was informally named next to MR. ROBINSON, moved the unanimous nomination of his friend in a few admirable words, and altogether it was one of the most significant and united Conventions ever held in the State.

In New York, also, the Convention was one of the most harmonious and shortest upon record. The present Republican State officers, whose service has been entirely acceptable, were renominated, and MR. PLINY T. SEXTON was selected for State Treasurer. The platform warmly approved the Administration; insisted that reform of the civil service, so auspiciously begun, should be prosecuted to complete success; favored a tariff for revenue and just protection of industry; declared for reform of the primary meeting, and approved the plan of party reorganization already begun in New York; affirmed the free canal policy; denounced the tendency to create monopolies, and called for a national bureau of labor statistics. The new State Committee is strongly Stalwart. Its power of mischief, however, in the selection of delegates to the National Convention has been very much reduced by the adoption of the district system. A State Convention can not now, as heretofore, annul the choice of districts, and assume to bind the seventy votes of New York by an iron unit rule. The factional sympathy of the State Committee, therefore, is in itself of less importance than formerly. The action of the three Conventions is very significant and encouraging. They adopt the reform of the civil service as a fundamental Republican policy, and they thus make the party in the future what it has been in the past, the party of continued progress and reform. It was a good week's work, and has drawn the independent sentiment of the country to the side which never ought to permit itself to forfeit independent confidence and support.

AT BUFFALO.

Now that the Republican Convention has been held, political interest in the State turns to the Democratic Convention, which meets at Buffalo on the 27th inst. The Democratic State Committee has decided that the County Democracy is the only "regular organization" in the city of New York, but Tammany Hall, and Irving Hall, a tender of Tammany, laugh defiance, and there will be apparently three delegations from the city. It is generally understood that the Convention will disregard the action of the Committee, and admit the three delegations, or an equal proportion of them, because it will not dare not to admit them. This will be the recognition by the highest party authority of the "regularity" of bolting.

From the point of view of party "regularity," Tammany Hall is an organized bolt. It is the supreme power in the Democratic party, and its political character and morality are the exact measure of those of "the Democracy." Tammany Hall is also an absolute despotism. Its action is determined wholly by the will of MR. JOHN KELLY, who is by far the most important political potentate in the country. In actual authority MR. TILDEN is a feeble pretender by the side of MR. KELLY. JOHN KELLY will do next year what TWEED was overthrown as he was preparing to do a few years ago. He will nominate the Democratic candidate for the Presidency. He holds in his single hand the unity of the Democratic vote in New York, and if his will should be thwarted, he would destroy the possibility of Democratic success. MR. BAYARD, MR. PENDLETON all the more respectable Democratic leaders, will dance to JOHN KELLY'S music, and perform his will. Democratic papers busily blow the trumpet of this or that small potato candidate. By and by they will receive orders from JOHN KELLY, and pipe accordingly.

This situation is called harmony in the Democratic party, and so far as the action of the party is concerned it is undoubtedly harmony. So long as the will of MR. KELLY is accepted as the supreme party law a solid Democratic vote in the State is assured. The question at the polls this year, therefore, will be that of a choice between JOHN KELLY and the Republican party. Governor CLEVELAND, indeed, has not been a follower of Tammany. But the Governor is not a favorite in his party, and in the Sun's list of possible Presidential candidates he is not even mentioned. Governor CLEVELAND as a public officer has little in common with his party. If he had, if he were a fair representative of the Democratic party, its chances would be deservedly very much more promising than they are. It is MR. KELLY and Tammany Hall that really represent the Democratic spirit and methods. So much reform and economy and honest politics as they favor may be expected from Democratic success, and no more. If the party wished to nominate for the Presidency the most powerful and typical Democrat in the country, whose favor is indispensable to the possibility of its success, it would nominate JOHN KELLY.

REGULATING THE PRIMARIES.

THERE is no pleasanter sign of the times than the general interest in the improvement of political methods. It shows itself not only in hostility to the prostitution of the civil service as mere party spoils, but in suspicion of the caucus, and in the demand for regulation of primary elections. Upon this last point there have been no more valuable suggestions than those which have come from Buffalo. The Buffalo Express is one of the ablest and boldest of independent Republican journals, and it is published and prospers in a community whose sound political thinking and sturdy political courage it well represents. Three or four years ago MR. LARNED of Buffalo published in the Express a scheme for reform of the primaries which commanded a great deal of attention. MR. SHERMAN S. ROGERS of the same city, at the request of the Express, has followed his recent letter, in which he clearly and admirably stated the actual political situation, with a brief detailed method for the same purpose; and MR. HENRY A. RICHMOND, also of Buffalo, and one of the State Civil Service Commissioners, has offered a reward of fifty dollars in each case for evidence which will lead to the conviction of fraudulent voters at the primaries under the new law.

MR. RICHMOND restricts his offer to the Democratic primaries in the Tenth Ward of Buffalo during the present year. This, we presume, is because he is a Democrat living in that ward, and he undoubtedly believes that the money is well spent which properly secures the observance of good laws. The knowledge that it is made the pecuniary interest of every man at the polls to see that the laws for honest voting are enforced will certainly tend to diminish dishonest voting. MR. ROGERS, in his scheme, touches the mainspring of reform in the primaries when he says that the primary election must be brought into the day light. This is the truth in a phrase. Under a system of government by party the primary is the important election. It is that which decides every other step, and usually determines the final result at the polls. It is, indeed, possible for party men to vote against their party. But however they may regret and condemn the preliminary action of their party, they will at the last generally hold that in a choice of evils it is better to stick to the party. This necessarily discredits the party, and throws upon a minority the duty of bolting.

MR. ROGERS would have but two caucuses in the year, one for the State Convention, the other for local conventions to be held in every district in the State upon the same day, and as many primaries as there are polling places. They should be open from sunrise to sunset, and the voting should be from poll lists made at every general election by asking the voter as he withdraws if he wishes to be registered as a Republican or a Democrat. This would be a public record of his party preference, with that of his name and residence, and without any kind of pledge or requisition. If the parties in convention seriously propose such a scheme, it will be easy enough to procure the necessary legislation, and MR. ROGERS wisely says that the only way to determine whether the people would come out to such primaries is to give them the opportunity. The experiment is certainly worth trying. Even the slight increase in the vote at the late Republican primaries in the city of New York, under the circumstances, is hopeful, and a general vote might be fairly expected under a thorough and well-considered system. We shall be much surprised if some vigorous and radical action upon the subject is not taken. It would not be difficult under MR. RICHMOND'S plan to obtain a guarantee fund to pay for the conviction of violators of the present law the necessary rewards and the same spirit would secure a thorough regulation of the primaries.

REFORM IN THE MUNICIPAL SERVICE.

THERE have been many encouraging political events during the last year, but none more significant than the fact that a Democratic Mayor of New York, surrounded by his principal assistants and in the presence of the State Commission, has deliberately pronounced for civil service reform. His power is limited. His chief officers probably do not sympathize with him. The difficulties are many. But there is no reason to doubt Mayor EDSON'S sincerity in saying that he should adopt the reform methods so far as practicable, and that point he will determine upon consultation with the Commission. Nowhere are the abuses at which reform is aimed more flagrant than in the municipal service, and they are even more repulsive in the Department of Charities and Correction than elsewhere. This was pointedly stated by MR. JAY, President of the State Commission, in the interview with the Mayor. In view of the importance of this interview, the reports in the newspapers were singularly meagre. It was plainly of great benefit in clearing the minds of the municipal officers of much confusion in regard to reform. They had probably not studied the bill, and were not accurately informed of the actual principles and purposes of the movement.

They learned, doubtless with surprise, that in the view of the Commission—and their view represents that of the great body of reformers—the power of removal may be left unrestricted, and the safeguards of reform be most wisely applied to the method of original appointment. So, also, the view was probably unexpected that in a reformed system promotion might wisely be left to the head of an office. Some differences of opinion exist as to the immediate desirability of unrestricted promotion. But the subject is under careful consideration. Promotion, like removal, belongs to the question of discipline and efficiency, and the argument for freedom of discretion is applicable to both. In the course of the conference it was suggested that the reformed system could not apply to the vast number of temporary employments. But it was answered that all positions which were permanent, even if only temporarily filled, should be subjected to the rules, because in every employment certain physical, moral, educational, and special or expert qualifications are necessary, and they should be denitely ascertained in a satisfactory manner. This statement was especially timely and cogent, as those temporary appointments are the very ones which are peculiarly abused for political purposes.

Objections were also made to grading the positions in certain departments, and there was the usual disposition upon the part of some of the gentlemen to hold that the absolute discretion of the chief officer is all the reform that is needed. This is a familiar view, and the only difficulty with it is that it is the very one which the country has decided not to tolerate any longer. But as Mayor Edson announced that he should do all in his power to inaugurate the reformed system, as Mayor Low, of Brooklyn, has already matured a practical scheme, and as Mayor Parsons, of Rochester, has appointed an interview with the State Commission on the 4th of October, we may justly expect to see a beginning of municipal reform from which the best results may be anticipated.

RECENT SLAUGHTER OF TRAVELLERS.

The late collisions upon the Long Island Railroad and the explosion upon the steamer Riverdale, with the consequent loss of life, have drawn public attention to the wanton slaughter of human beings which is constantly occurring in and around the city. There have been frightful catastrophes both upon railroads and steamers around the city within the last six years produced by the merest negligence. Yet we believe not a single person has been punished. The companies may have paid some damages, which, of course, they did not feel. But nobody has been made to smart, and the law, or the enforcement of law, has done nothing whatever to insure greater security by warning the employés of every kind that they will be held personally and certainly responsible.

Nothing could be more culpable than the conduct of the inspector of the boiler of the Riverdale, and, according to the evidence, nobody could be worthier of exemplary punishment. The waters about the city swarm at all hours with steamers, large and small, carrying thousands of passengers. Their only guarantee of safety is an inspector's certificate. But here was a steamer whose boiler was so corroded upon the inside that a knife-blade was readily thrust through a piece of iron which was originally an inch and a quarter thick. The boiler exploded, killing and maiming the passengers who had seen the certificate of the good condition of the boilers, and upon inquiry the inspector states that he did not know that the boiler was corroded upon the inside because he had never examined the inside. Yet he certified that it was in good order. There could hardly be a more criminal betrayal of an important public trust, and if such an offender can not be punished, a certificate of safety is worse than nothing.

Upon the Long Island Railroad one train ran into another with the usual murderous consequences, and it is blandly announced by the railroad authorities that the air brakes were out of order. But as air brakes are often out of order, and are very liable to be out of order, when the question is asked where were the brakemen to put down the brakes in case of necessity, it appears that there were two brakemen upon a train of seven passenger cars, and they were employed rather to assist passengers than to control the cars. So a train comes dashing into the station at the rate of twenty five or thirty miles an hour, the air-brakes prove to be out of order, the two brakemen are practically useless, and a frightful collision follows. Whoever is responsible for regulating the running of the cars and for manning the train, or for both, whether president, or directors, or superintendent, or conductor, or engineer, is responsible for the catastrophe, and if there be no possibility of personal punishment, the travellers upon that road may expect another catastrophe at any moment. A more outrageous and inexcusable slaughter never took place than that of Spuyten Duyvil two years ago. If the conductor, or the brakeman, or whoever it may have been who was plainly responsible for that event, had been criminally punished, there would have been fewer similar massacres since that awful night.

LIEUTENANT GREELY AND HIS MEN.

The loss of the Proteus and the peril of Lieutenant Greely and his companions have produced the outcry that follows every arctic disaster, and the demand that governments shall no longer authorize expeditions for polar observation and discovery. But as catastrophe in the frozen seas ever daunts the spirit that is resolved to penetrate the secret of the pole, Lieutenant Danenhower, who has himself been a victim of the search, says that plenty of men have already offered to join an expedition to undertake what the Proteus failed to do.

Lieutenant Greely, also, is not leading an expedition of mere adventure. He is taking part in a connected series of scientific observations, the general nature and purpose of which were recently clearly stated in an interview by Judge Daly, the president of the American Geographical Society. The observations, indeed, did not require an advanced position and one of each portions approach as that upon Lady Franklin Bay, which was allotted to Lieutenant Greely. But he is not to be regarded as an individual explorer, although, if he were, an effort for his rescue would not be less instinctive.

No such effort, however, can be made during the present season, and the brave men must care for themselves. It is supposed that Lieutenant Greely, who is a sagacious and discreet commander, will have promptly decided to leave the station in time to save his retreat if relief did not reach him when due. But his retreat must be in any case daring and perilous. Yet those who are familiar with the story of arctic adventure, and who know what dangers have been surmounted, and what extreme exposure has been safely endured, will not cease to hope that these heroes, like so many others, may emerge unscathed from the icy labyrinth.

AN INTERESTING ANNIVERSARY.

We have space only to call attention to a very interesting anniversary celebration at the Tabernacle Church on the 2d of October. On that day, fifty years ago, the New York City Antislavery Society was formed, and its welcome was a formidable riot. Mr. Albert G. Willcox, the chairman of the Executive Committee of the Young Men's Antislavery Society of New York, wrote the first address that ever issued that advocated antislavery voting. This was the forerunner of the political movements known in our history as the Liberty party, the Free-soil and the Republican parties.

There will be a reunion of this "Old Guard" at the church at two o'clock in the afternoon. Mr. Willcox, Mr. John Jay, Mr. Sydney Howard Gay, Mr. Henry B. Stanton, Mr. Oliver Johnson, and other pioneers are announced as among those who will be present. The conference will be a feast of patriotic and heroic reminiscence, and every body will be cordially welcomed.

THE FISKE WILL LITIGATION.

We have seen with regret the suit brought by Professor Fiske, of Cornell University, to invalidate the bequest of Mrs. Fiske to the University. Whatever the charter may have provided, and however the law may restrict the power of a wife leaving a husband or children or parents living to bequeath her estate, there is no doubt that Professor Fiske had renounced for himself any desire to control the will of his wife. If, therefore, she had honorably exceeded her power under the law, it was for some one else to move in the matter, and if the University with which the Professor has been so honorably identified were prohibited from receiving the benefit which she designed for it, the effort to enforce the prohibition should have come from some other hand.

The proceeding is altogether unfortunate, and we have seen no adequate explanation of an act which is singularly inconsistent with the amiable and generous character of the accomplished Professor. It is true that Mrs. Fiske was building a very costly house, which, had she lived, she doubtless intended to maintain with dignified and profuse hospitality. But had she designed to leave a special sum, or to make any provision whatever for its maintenance after her death, she would unquestionably have done so, and the first thief, with every opportunity, she did not, in conclusive evidence that she deliberately decided not to do so.

Professor Fiske contends that the statute of the charter of the University which forbids it to hold more than a certain amount of property can not be abrogated by ex post facto law; and that, even if it could be, the law of the State does not allow the alienation from the immediate heirs of such an amount of the property. Of course, if he were aware of any secret intrigue upon the part of any body for any purpose to take advantage of his possible ignorance of the law, or to influence his wife improperly in the disposition of her estate, neither of which offenses, so far as we know, has been alleged, he would justly refuse to become the victim of a fraud. But, as the case appears, he freely renounced in the disposition of the estate at his wife's free-will, and his wife having exercised that will, he now contests it. Conduct such as this appears to be in certainly very unlike that of William Fiske.

PERSONAL.

"There are four battles in one business," remarked a dry goods merchant. "The first battle is to secure consignments from dealers and culling houses the second, to provide the money with which to make advances on those consignments; the third, to sell the goods after they have been consigned, and the fourth, to get the pay for them. And the hardest fight of all is the first—to obtain the right consignments. Any fool can sell goods that everybody wants to buy, but it requires a trained judgment to have on sale the goods that the public most wants."

—A mass of letters are tending to a season of letters that entusiastic but little known eulogy of the gentler sex by Daniel Deron in which the latter speaks of woman as, among other things, Heaven's best gift to man. The fair listener warmly objected to this assertion. "Why call a woman a gift to man?" she asked, in a tone of challenge. "Why not call man a gift to woman?"

—Very hard workers were two New York artists on a sketching expedition to the wilds of Singac, New Jersey. From the hill above them several apples mysteriously rolled down, narrowly missing their heads. Hastily assuming a standing posture, they whacked the ascent, and saw in the near distance a pair of farmer's daughters, "whose forms were perfect and whose cheeks were peaches." Dazed by the vision, and, with characteristic modesty, unable to introduce themselves, they sat down upon a rock and meditated. A noisy little dog belonging to the damsels scampered the middle distance, and him they coaxed to their side. Then quickly taking a pencil sketch of the scene, which included a pair of baffled artists standing on a rock, bowing and scraping to the maidens, who would not notice them, they folded the picture and put it under the collar of the dog, who faithfully returned to his mistresses. The next minute the artists were receiving an invitation to go to the farm house and "take tea with grandma."

—A learned bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church one riding horseback in company with a young clergyman who was mounted on a spirited Mexican mustang, which kept the bishop's beast to a trot by his antics, and finally engaging him in a race, was soon easily the victor. "Sir," said the bishop, "I will ask you a conundrum—why are you like a Pharisee?" "I give it up," was the reply. "Because," resumed the prelate, "you are much given to go to fast."

—A veteran American lawkeeper, whose innocence of slumber is but the relief of great insurance of zeal, was telling to some friends the story about the member of the town committee of a New England village who one day, when the subject of road improvements came up, said, "Let's run our heads together and have a wooden pave." As he told it, however, the story went, "Let's lay our heads together and see if we can't have a pavement." Nobody laughed; and after the unsuccessful narrator had left the room a figure painter mildly observed that he had "always remembered that it was not the business of a landscape painter to tell a story."

—Miss Lamb, Charles Lamb's sister, has found a biographer in a Mrs Gairmaer, who describes her work as mainly the story of a brother and sister's love, of how it sustained them under the shock of a terrible calamity, and made beautiful and even happy a life which must else have sunk into desolation and despair. Mary was a modest soul, and expected little. In one of her letters to a friend she wrote "I know I have a knack of looking into people's real character, and never expecting them to act out of it, and never expecting another to do as I would do to the same case."

—The heaviest trout caught in Loch Leven, Scotland, this season, weighed four and three-quarter pounds, and the total number, 14,000, weighed about 18,000 pounds. It is not uncommon for an enthusiastic angler to begin work at five o'clock in the morning, and keep two, and sometimes three, rods plying vigorously until ten o'clock at night. Loch Leven's reputation as the best trouting lake in the southern half of Scotland is fully sustained.

—Next New Year's Day the ladies of that charming cluster of pretty cottages known as Short Hills, New Jersey, propose to celebrate the occasion by inviting their gentlemen friends to meet them in the Music Hall of the village, where the entertainment, from 7 P M to 1 A M, will consist of dancing, card-playing, conversation, and articles of menu. The hall will be handsomely decorated with rugs, pictures, flowers, and knickknacks from the residence of the hostesses, who expect to be fresh and cheerful because they will have had all day to rest in.

—A change has been made in the reading room of the Mercantile Library, and each of the New York daily newspapers is securely fastened to an oblique counter in front of a row of tall stools. The old way was to hang the papers on a rack, whence they could be taken down to be held in the hands of the reader, who sat comfortably in an easy-chair. One of the officials of the institution, being asked the reason of the change, said that heretofore it has been usual to see a member come early to the library, take one paper in his hands, put another one under him as he sat down, hold a third fast by his elbow on a table, and a fourth between his knees, so as to protect himself from interference.

—Mr George I. Seney has a large stock farm near his residence at Bernardsville, New Jersey. His favorite diversions are horses of good pedigree and oil paintings of good workmanship.

—Mr Alexander M. Agnew, a representative fireman of the days of the old Volunteer Department, speaks occasionally to his friends of his self-sacrificing services rendered to the city by that famous organization. Like most of his surviving comrades, he looks back with wonder upon the enthusiasm which inspired the ceaseless heroism of the "laddies," and without which none of their finest feats could have entered into history. His brother, Mr. John T. Agnew, was also a volunteer fireman; and his father, the late Mr William Agnew, performed some handsome service at the burning of Fulton Market sixty years ago.

—The relations between Tammany Hall and the Stalwart Republicans have long been supposed to be of a confidential character, especially in the business of trading votes, and this pleasant harmony seems to be affectionately indicated by a brand-new boiler, a house now adjoining part is decorated with a large pictorial representation of Mr. Roscoe Conkling and Mr John Kelly walking side by side, dressed in the latest fashion, the ex-Senator standing correctly erect, his right hand thrust beneath the breast of his broadcloth coat, and the ex-Comptroller similarly inflexible, but with a light bamboo stick under his left arm, and a benign smile gleaming toward his cobby beard.

—A New York author who has been summering in the country declares that the magnificent suburban villa never tempts him to break the tenth commandment. It looks too cold, he says. "But give me an artistic cottage on a well-stocked farm, far enough from the railway station to require the services of a horse and buggy, and suitably provided with poultry and dogs."

—A Texan soldier, who led an advance of skirmishers in the battle of Bean's Station, Virginia, declares that a certain war picture by Detaille reminds him an terribly of a scene in that engagement that he could hardly believe it to have been painted on the spot. His regiment suddenly found a railway embankment between them and the enemy, and in order to save their heads from the bullets they poked holes beneath the rails and between the cross ties with their bayonets, and fired through them at the gray-coats.

—Mr Gladstone, assisted by his son, the Rev Stephen Gladstone, cut down a large oak tree in Hawarden Park on the 7th of September. He finished the laborious task with comparative ease, and a number of strangers who were present cheered him loudly as he laid on the blows.

—The King of Spain's face lacks the bloom it had five years ago. His figure is slighter, his shoulders are rounded, his eye is restless, his beard has grown, his mouth sullen with an effort, and his look is melancholy. If Alfonso were only an overworked clerk, his condition would be remarkable.

—Bishop Payne, a colored gentleman, on an official mission to China in 1850, wrote "I shall be believed when I say that the cowardice of the Chinese troops in one of those fables of which history is too often made up. The courage was equal on both sides: the Mongols had numbers, we had resources; we knew how to conquer, they how to die."

—The inhabitants of Portuguese Guinea are planting successfully European vegetables, and rice, maize, manioc, yam, cocoa, sugar-cane, palm oil, ground-nuts oil, ginger, are common products of the soil. They examine their cances from trees, and have only their knives for tools. The climate is such that ordinary Europeans can stand it only two or three years at a time, though some Frenchmen enjoy good health after ten years.

—A friend of General Lew Wallace tells an interesting story of the origin of the well-known novel Ben-Hur. "Before and for some time after the war General Wallace was inclined to be skeptical in religious matters, particularly the divinity of Christ. One day, while travelling as a railroad, he chanced to meet Colonel Ingersoll, the infidel. They conversation turned on religious topics, and in the course of the discussion Ingersoll presented his views. Wallace listened, and was much impressed, but finally remarked that he was not yet prepared to agree with Ingersoll on certain very extreme propositions relative to the non-divinity of Christ. Ingersoll urged Wallace to give the matter the careful study and research that he had, expressing his confidence that Wallace would, after so doing, fall [illegible] in the Ingersoll view. CHAPTER XVI.

MR. SOTHERAN TO THE FRONT.

In the fact of having one genuine enemy at Tannenbosch the weighted upon Lady Constance's spirits which it could hardly fail for an instant—she must have felt this unnecessary—to be more than counterbalanced by the multitude of active friends who at once surrounded her. She was not only an excellent tactician, but she had the much rarer faculty of picking up, together with the colloquialisms of a people, their spirit and habit of mind. She could be an Italian among the Italians, and a Parisian among the Parisians, preserving all the time her own very distinct individuality. At Brunswick, which, besides the usual diplomatique, possessed a small cosmopolitan society, this versatility of hers was greatly appreciated. As for the blue-eyed Germans, they cast themselves at her feet in a body, so to speak, swelling with manly gutteral sobs and shock her tender sympathy with that quaint national compound of materialism and sentimentality which to Englishmen has always appeared so incomprehensible, and to Frenchmen so supremely ludicrous. Well old King Rudolf was enchanted to meet a lady of such culture, such elegance, and such skill in the subtleties of Teutonic speech. He ordered all the petty rules and regulations of court discipline to be held in abeyance so far as Lady Constance Milner was concerned; the palace gates flew open as often as it pleased her to enter them, in the stiff, old-fashioned gardens, among the statues and the orange-trees in their green tubs, his Majesty might sometimes be seen reading extracts to her from the Iliad, which he had himself translated into thirteen hexameters when a young man. She used to come back from these audiences yawning loudly, but admitting that sovereigns had a divine right to be bores, and that some sacrifices must be got up with in return for their favor, under the existing conditions of society.

Attachés of all nationalities and tall cavalry officers with clanking sabres afforded her a refreshing alternative upon her return home. Some shock-headed Socialists had been seen mounting her staircase, and would have been welcomed with the other visitors had not Lord Rossan, who watched his sister's proceedings with much amusement, declared that it was necessary to draw the line somewhere, and that he could not permit disaffected persons to be received under his roof. Lady Constance, therefore, was obliged to break off relations with the irreconcilable party, being perhaps not very sorry to have a plausible pretext for doing so; but she gratified her love of variety by cultivating the acquaintance of the principal actors from the Hof-theater, of a professor or two from the University, and of other talented persons, in whose presence the astonished nobility of Sonbin raised its chin and snuffed.

All these thronged the sunny drawing-room on the second floor of the "Englische Palais", and the reflection that there was safety in numbers did not prevent me from being bitterly jealous of each and every one of them. My own position was neither dignified nor agreeable. Being in some sort a member of the household, I was used by Lady Constance much as the wires of certain generals are in the habit of using their husbands' aides-de-camp. I was ordered to ring the bell. I was sent to look for this or that person's carriage. I fetched and carried in short, and got nothing in the shape of reward, except a smile or a word every now and again. Sometimes I thought that she took a delight in humiliating me, though I was careful that her manner betrayed any such deliberate intention. I felt like it, but I grinned and bore it, sustained by an inward conviction that, sooner or later, my day would come.

A circumstance which cured me a good deal was the sudden appearance upon the scene of Mr. Setheran, who took up his quarters in the best hotel in the town, and immediately resumed those patient siege operations which had for their object the ultimate conquest of Lady Constance's hand and heart. Little as I loved this dogged wooer, I could not refuse a grudging tribute of admiration to his unruffled pertinacity. It was not often that he took umbrage as he had done at Tannenbosch, but then it was not often that Lady Constance laughed at him. She turned him away from her door full twice for users once that she admitted him; she snubbed or took no notice of him where he had succeeded in affecting an entrance, but he cared for none of these things. He meant to win, and really it almost looked as if he would win in the long-run from sheer strength of purpose. He was not overcreative, and his life, the story of which I gleaned at odd times from Lady Constance and others, had moved him to difficulties. The younger son of a younger son, he had been educated for the bar, and pushed out at an early age to make his voyage through the world, with nothing to help him on his way except a thick skin, the advantages of which were partly neutralized by a skull of corresponding thickness. He worked hard, but made little way, and for many a long year navigated his bark across stormy waters, keeping clear of wrecks, not so much, perhaps, because he feared their blandishments, as because he was compelled to concentrate all his attention upon the difficult task of keeping himself afloat. After rounding the cape of middle age he found himself suddenly in smooth water. The successive deaths of a number of relations put him in possession of lands and wealth. He settled down upon his estates in the North, entered Parliament, and devoted himself to the breeding of cattle and the development of the white waistcoat which formed so conspicuous a feature of his outward man. Then, for his sins, he encountered Lady Constance, and conceived for her one of those attachments which are less demonstrative than the passion of youth, but which are quite as unreasonable. No man hardly here expected that she should fall in love with him, but he knew himself to be rich and resolute, and he knew her to be poor, ambitious, and consequently impulsive. The game, therefore, was not a hopeless one, nor was he the man to throw up his cards after a first, a second, or even a third defeat.

One day, not long after his arrival, Lady Constance asked me to ride with her to Friedensberg, a royal castle, celebrated all over Germany for the beauty of its situation among the wooded Sonnan hills. I consented joyfully, for it was a long time since such a mark of favor had been vouchsafed to me, and when, the appointed hour having come, I found that we were to start alone, my satisfaction was complete. Lady Constance had selected for her mount a fidgety young chestnut horse, nearly thorough-bred, which Lord Rossmo had lately purchased. I would rather have seen her upon a quieter animal, and made bold to say as much, but the only smiled, and reminded me that she was an Irish woman.

I rode out of the court-yard beside her, feeling more light-hearted than I had done for months past, but, alas! my glee was destined to be of short duration; for, as we passed the Römischer Hof, a stout equestrian in a white waistcoat came pounding across the road, and from the confident manner in which he ranged himself alongside it was only too evident that Mr Sotheran had been invited to join us. I was ineffably disgusted, and Lady Constance did not lessen my ill-humor by whispering, "I am sorry to have asked you to make one of a party of three; but Count Waldstein and his wife failed me at the last moment, and you were the only substitute at hand."

So that was all I had been wanted for! "I should have thought you would have preferred having Mr Sotheran all to yourself," I could not help saying.

"Should you, indeed? That shows that you haven't often tasted the charms of Mr Sotheran's conversation. But never mind; we'll have a pleasant ride in spite of him."

We should certainly have had a pleasant ride without him. It was one of those delicious sunny afternoons of late autumn which are more frequent in Southern Germany than in England. There had been a slight frost the night before, and the air was still crisp and fresh after it, the woods were brilliant with patches of russet and yellow; the rocky cliffs for which we were bound stood out high and clear against a pale sky; every sound from the town behind us rose into the still air with a musical distinctness which told of the coming winter. Lady Constance was in unwontedly high spirits, and even I, angry and disappointed as I was, began to recover my equanimity when I discovered that she was drawing out our companion, and amusing herself with his pompous, pretentious ways. Mr. Sotheran, rambling along beside her, his elbows squared out at right angles with his body, was directing attention to the defects of German agriculture, as evidenced in the fields which stretched to right and left of us, and drawing disparaging comparisons between the benighted foreigner and the trumbers Briton. He was a little too much given to talking about "my estates," "my tenants," "the instructions I gave to my agent before leaving home," and so forth; and he was easily encouraged to dilate upon these topics with a magnificence which afforded ample room for ridicule of a covert kind. I don't know whether he suspected that Lady Constance was making fun of him, or whether he took none of the sarcastic commentaries which she let fall between his windy periods; but if he did, he bore his punishment like a stoic. To me, at all events, it was a comfort and a pleasure to perceive that she knew him for the dull fellow that he was.

A ride of little over an hour brought us to Friedensberg, a fine old mediæval fortress, backed and flanked by woods, and standing on a steep hill-side high above the valley of the Schlammerbach. There we should have dismounted, in order to scale the cliffs behind the castle, which were approached by a rough path accessible only to pedestrians. But Lady Constance did not at once follow the example of Mr Sotheran, who had already got off his horse, and was nodding approvingly at the prospect, just as he had done on a previous occasion in Sicily.

"I hate walking in a riding-habit," she said. "Don't you think we might ride to the top?"

The guardian of the place, to whom this question was referred, replied by a decided negative. "Out of the question, gracious lady! You could lose your life if you attempted such a thing."

Lady Constance remained unconvinced. "Has it never been done?" she asked.

"Never!" answered the man, emphatically. "Never in the world!"

"Then," cried she, "let us be the first that ever burst into those silent woods on horseback. Come along, Mr Maxwell. Mr Sotheran, I suppose you are not afraid?"

Mr Sotheran, who was still on foot, glanced at the heights above us, where, among beech and pine woods, could be discerned portions of a narrow track more like a staircase than a foot-path. "Good gracious!" he exclaimed, "you are not seriously proposing to ride up that place, and on a nervous young horse too? Why, the thing is impossible!"

"Well," said Lady Constance, coolly, "that is just what I want to find out. You never can tell whether a thing is impossible or not till you have tried to do it."

"But an open person thinks it necessary to convince himself that he can't perform miracles," objected Mr Sotheran. "Now, my dear lady, you must give up this preposterous notion. You can't be allowed to do such foolhardy things; you can't indeed."

The words were not happily chosen. Lady Constance laughed. "I don't know who is going to prevent me from doing what I please," she answered, "but we doubt you would be more prudent to remain where you are. Are you coming with us or not?"

Mr Sotheran looked up at the precipitous ascent, looked down at his own pseudo-equestrian person, looked at his horse—a horse back with suspicious fore-legs—and hesitated. "If I were Mr Maxwell's age and weight, and if I had one of my own horses here," he began, "I should be willing to take my chance; but under all the circumstances—"

Lady Constance did not give him time to finish. She turned her horse's head away with a contemptuous gesture, and left him stammering wretchedly. I was really sorry for the poor man, who was being made to look like a coward when perhaps he was nothing of the sort, and whose remonstrances were quite justifiable. If I had not joined issue to him, it was because I knew that they would be worse than useless. What I hoped was that if Lady Constance were not interfered with the would presently realize for herself the danger of the task which she was undertaking, and would come to the conclusion that, whatever right she might possess of breaking her own bones, she had no business to take such liberties with her brother's horse. I myself was mounted upon a wise and sober little cob, given me some years before by my uncle. I could depend upon him to do anything in reason that he was asked to do, and to retain his self-possession under all circumstances. I therefore pushed past Lady Constance, saying that I would give her a lead, to which fortunately she offered no objection.

For a couple of hundred yards or so after leaving the castle our way led us along a sandy patch which presented no difficulties, but when we reached an abrupt ascent over ledges of rock, rising one above the other like irregular steps, Lady Constance's horse, as might have been anticipated, turned restive. He plunged, reared up, and finally wheeled round and broke away with her. She pulled him up, however, without apparent trouble, and brought him back, snorting and quivering, to the charge. This manœuvre was three times repeated, and then at last I ventured to say, "Hadn't we better give it up?"

There was a slight flush upon Lady Constance's cheeks, and her eyes, ordinarily so lustreless, were sparkling. "You can, if you choose," she answered, "I shall not."

After that there was nothing for me to do but to move onward and upward. My good little beast climbed like a cat, and the other—whether because he was admirably ridden or because he was fairly frightened into quiescence I can't say—contrived to follow him. The ascent proved, upon the whole, less formidable than I should have expected it to be, but it was by no means easy of accomplishment, and we traversed more than one ugly place, where a slip would almost certainly have been fatal. No doubt many people who care about doing stupid things might get their horses safely to the top of the Friedensberg, but, as a matter of fact, I believe no one ever has done it since Lady Constance and I made ourselves into a nine days' wonder by performing this feat. Neither of us spoke during the long scramble. I did not feel that I was in much personal peril; but my heart was in my mouth the whole time, and I don't know when I have experienced a greater sense of relief than when we emerged upon the grassy plateau which forms the summit of the hill.

"Well done, our side!" exclaimed my companion, triumphantly. "I was determined to do it as pretty as the attempt."

"Was it worth while?" I asked, with a glance at the chestnut's streaming coat and starting eyeballs.

"I think so," she answered. "Isn't it worth a little trouble to have put Mr. Sotheran to utter confusion?"

"Do you know," said I, "I don't think that was quite fair. He could never have got up here on that spavined animal, and if he had tried it, the chances are that he would have broken his neck. I don't think I should have come, in his place."

"Yes, you would," retorted Lady Constance, sharply; "you would have come and risked your neck. Not that there was much risk about it, for he could here dismounted at any moment. But he turned out, as I knew he would, and I'm glad of it. He won't hold up his head before me for some time to come."

I said nothing. There was a bitter malevolence in her voice which surprised me, and it seemed to me a little unworthy of her to call a man of Sotheran's age a coward for hesitating to commit what most men of fifty would have considered an act of sheer insanity.

"But I like you for taking his part," she added, by and-by, in a softer tone. "You are quite right to stick up for fair play. Only you should understand that fair play is a luxury restricted to men. We poor women should never win a race without jockeying."

"Why should you care to win a race from that fellow?" I asked, still vaguely dissatisfied.

"Because I detest him so!" she answered, with sudden vehemence. And then, laughing a little, "Mr. Sotheran and I are like the believer and the Evil One in the Methodist hymn—

"'The devil and me, we can't agree;
I hate him, and he hates me.'"

"He doesn't hate you, of all events," I remarked.

"Doesn't he?—qui sore sorre. He thinks he adores me now, but if ever Mr Sotheran and I become husband and wife—and more unlikely things have happened—we shall soon earn notoriety as the most quarrelsome couple in Europe. I have made it my business to study human nature, and I should have studied it to very little purpose if I couldn't recognise a bully when I see him."

"Good God!" I exclaimed, impetuously, "why do you talk of anything so horrible as marrying that man? Is it his money that you want?"

"Yes," answered Lady Constance, composedly, "just that. I can't get on without money, and I suppose a day is sure to come when I shall find myself reduced to my last farthing. That will be Mr Sotheran's opportunity. My dear Charley," she continued—this was the first time that she had addressed me by my Christian name, but she often did it afterward—"I see no better than my neighbors; most people think that I am worse. Why should I scruple to marry for money, when hundreds of innocent young girls do the same thing every year? I should prefer not to degrade myself; I should prefer not to marry at all, I should prefer to marry anybody rather than Mr Sotheran—you, for instance. But then I am afraid you have neither money nor lands."

I shook my head. The very mention of the possibility of such a thing as her marrying me had sent a thrill through my whole body, and yet she had only said that she preferred me to a man whom she detested. "I may have a moderate fortune some day," I said; "but it's uncertain. My uncle is out bound to leave me a penny, and I have only got a little of my own."

"And I suppose your uncle may have the bad taste to live for a good many years yet," she remarked, smilingly.

"Of course," said I, "you don't know that my uncle Bernard is not like other fellows' uncles—a rich old beggar from whom one has expectations, and whom one longs to see drop off his perch. He is the best friend I have in the world, and the very last thing I could ever wish for would be to lose him."

"Yes, that is very proper and very creditable to you. Still, we must all die; and when he dies, you will be his heir, I presume?"

"I don't know," I answered; "I'd rather not talk about it. What difference can it make?"

"Really," said Lady Constance, "you are a very unusual sort of young man. After such an exhibition as I have just favored you with, anybody else would have been complimenting me on my courage, or at the very least expressing some gratitude for having been so cleverly delivered from an obnoxious third person, but you begin by lecturing me for my cruelty to the said third person, and then rebuke me in the most peremptory way for displaying an interest in your prospects. Are you quite sure that you are so very much in love with me, after all?"

I answered, coldly enough, that I was quite sure. "As sure as I am that you don't care and never will care a straw for me. That day at Taormino I was foolish enough to think—but I don't know exactly what I thought, and it doesn't signify now. It wasn't your fault, you did your best to keep me from making a fool of myself."

"No," she broke in suddenly, "I didn't do my best. On the contrary, I tried to make you lose your head. Why did you defy me, you silly boy? I am sorry now—at least I think I am sorry. But what can I do for you?"

"I don't know," I answered; "nothing, I suppose. Or rather, yes, you can do one thing—you can walk back to the castle, and let me lead your horse. The going down will be a harder matter than the coming up, I expect."

"Nonsense the world," she exclaimed. "I would do a good deal to oblige you, but that I can't do and won't do. If Mr Sotheran saw me return on foot, he wouldn't believe I had ridden a yard of the way."

And as spite of all my entreaties she did ride down. How she managed it I can't tell. I myself had to clutch the back of my saddle more than once to keep myself from sliding over my horse's ears; but whenever I looked back at her she was sitting erect and composed, patting the chestnut's neck, and encouraging him to place himself to positions which I am quite sure that he had never supposed his four legs capable of assuming. And so in due time we reached our starting-point, and rejoined Mr. Sotheran, who, rather to my surprise, proved equal to the occasion.

"I have been watching your progress through a field-glass," he said, "and I see that, after all, I was mistaken in supposing that the climb was anything so extraordinary. In fact, the guardian misled me by his observations. I should have followed you if I had not thought it better to give my horse a rest."

Lady Constance said nothing, but she looked at him with a peculiar smile, and the unhappy man was withered.

All things considered, I don't know that he got more than he deserved.

THE STORY OF ATLANTIS REPEATED.

THE recent destruction of the island and volcano of Krakatoa, in the Straits of Sunda, by a submarine outburst, vividly recalls the story of the last continent "Atlantis," as told by Mr. IGNATIUS DONNELLY in his book, published about a year ago by HARPER & BROTHERS, under the title of Atlantis, the Antediluvian World. In this remarkable and most interesting work the author maintains the theory that Atlantis was the original home of the human race, where civilization first arose, and from which the shores of the Mediterranean and North and South America were peopled. Egypt, where the story was preserved, was its most important colony.

That this vast continent once existed, and that it was destroyed by a tremendous volcanic convulsion, leaving on vestige except the peaks of the Azores, appears to be highly probable. In a similar convulsion, though on a smaller scale, the island of Krakatoa was destroyed. On the last Sunday in August, writes a correspondent of the New York Sun, "without any warning, there was a tremendous outburst of subterranean thunder, and the volcano of Krakatoa vomited forth an ink-black cloud, which spread over the clear tropical sky with inconceivable quickness, wrapping the land in complete darkness. Then it began to rain ashes and dust, and in a very few minutes the greater part of northern Borneo was very fertile and very populous country, was completely destroyed. Tremendous explosions followed, stones and volcanic matter were hurled to distances of from 200 to 300 miles, the roar of the great volcano were blown out into the sea, its structure collapsed, and the entire island of Krakatoa slowly subsided into the water and disappeared. On Monday morning there was not a vestige of it to be seen, the ocean having taken its place."

THE OHIO LIQUOR LAWS.

WHATEVER may be the effect of recent legislation in regard to the liquor traffic in Ohio on the politics of that State, the testimony is all in favor of its practical excellence. The measure was very peculiar. The Constitution of Ohio prohibits the licensing of the trade in intoxicating drinks. The State has been there or less agitated for many years by the efforts of the Temperance party to secure an amendment to the Constitution prohibiting the making or selling of liquor in the State. So far their efforts, for various reasons, have failed. The result has been that, since they could not secure prohibition, and were forbidden to have resort to license, the liquor traffic has been as free as the traffic in wheat or dry-goods, and much more profitable than either. With its large German element the State has produced an enormous demand for beer, and has fully satisfied it, so that, according to local statisticians, who ought to know, there has been more light beer made and drunk in Ohio of late years than in the empire of Germany—a statement which on gravely doubt, but which has a basis of truth, since the brewers of the State paid tax on over forty-five million gallons in 1881. The beer, however, has not been the only form of intoxicant on which Ohioans have indulged. The distilling interest in the State is very large. Last year it used over four million bushels of grain, from which was made over fifteen million gallons of liquor, and so long as the retail traffic in this product was unrestrained it is obvious that a considerable portion of it found down the throats of Ohio people.

Various attempts have been made by the Legislature of Ohio to get some sort of revenue out of this business, or at least to derive some revenue from it. A law, called the Bond Law, was passed in 1882, which was found to be unconstitutional. Last year another law, called the Scott Law from the name of the member who proposed it, was brought forward, and, after a good deal of discussion and hesitation, was passed. The liquor dealers instantly contested its constitutionality, employing the present Democratic candidate for Governor, Judge HOADLY, as their counsel. But this time the law was decided to be in accordance with the Constitution, and went itself on the 20th of June. The law directly a tax but it levies a tax of $300 yearly upon each person "trafficking in intoxicating liquors," which is defined as "the buying or procuring or selling of intoxicating liquors" otherwise than on prescription as for mechanical or sacramental purposes. It does not include the manufacture of liquors from raw material or the sale thereof by the manufacturer in quantities of one gallon or more. If the business is "exclusively in such intoxicating liquors," the tax is $100 a year. Various penalties are attached to violations of the law. Non-payment of the tax when due incurs a fine of twenty per cent. of the amount. Refusal to give proper information to the assessors brings the assessment up to $375. The tax is a lien on the premises occupied, and selling on premises without the written consent of the owner incurs a fine of $100, with alternative imprisonment. Selling strong liquors by persons returning only beer and wine raises the assessment to $450. All but one of these provisions, it will be noticed, are strictly confined to securing revenue.

The revenues and fines are divided as follows. In every county having a police force, three-eighths go to the police fund and three-eighths to the general fund, in counties having no police force, three-fourths go to the general fund, and one-fourth in each county goes to the credit of the fund for the support of the poor. The only police regulations in the law consist of a prohibition of the sale of distilled, malt, or vinous liquors on Sunday, or their sale at any time to a minor without the written order of his parent, guardian, or the physician, or their sale to any person habitually intoxicated or in the habit of getting intoxicated.

under penalty of a fine of from $25 to $100 and imprisonment for from five to thirty days. This prohibition is a near approach to the demands of the radical opponents of the traffic

It is estimated by those familiar with the business of liquor-selling at retail in Ohio that this tax will yield about $2,500,000 yearly to the treasuries of the various counties. Governor Ferris puts the amount rather above these below that sum. Senator SHERMAN put it in one of his speeches at $2,500,000. The relief to the taxpayers in a State generally so commodious in its expenditures must therefore be very decided. A fair idea of its working may be obtained from the statistics for Cleveland. In that city 843 dealers were assessed $200 each, and 379 were assessed $100 each, making a total of $203,800. A correspondent in Dayton writes that all moderate men are pleased with the operation of the law. In Montgomery County the amount collected was about $70,000, of which $40,000 was expended in cleaning and improving the streets of Dayton. Popular opinion in every part of the State, so far as can be judged at present, is decidedly favorable to the law. Even the more respectable of the saloon-keepers, or "saloonists," as they are called in the elegant language of the Ohio press, approve it. The only strong opposition is political, and it remains to be seen how strong that is. Not even a Democratic Legislature would hardly dare to repeal the law which has proved a source of double use revenue to the county treasuries, and which brings the liquor trade within the reach of police regulation.

THE COREAN EMBASSY.

On page 613 we give the portrait of MIN YONG IK, Minister Plenipotentiary of the King of Corea, or TAI CHOSEN, to the United States, who arrived week before last, and was received by President ARTHUR on the 18th inst., in New York.

The ceremony took place in a parlor of the Fifth Avenue Hotel, where the President, attended by the Secretary of State, the Assistant Secretary, and several other gentlemen, awaited the Embassy, about eleven o'clock in the evening. The Minister and his suite entered the room in single file. First an order, as first in dignity, came MIN YONG IK, who is a relative of the Queen of Corea, and a noble of the highest rank. He was dressed, as were his companions, in his richest robes of state. A loose garment of flowered plum colored silk showed through its openings a more white tunic, also silken. The whole was belted in with a broad band covered with curiously wrought plates of gold. Upon the Ambassador's breast hung an apron cut two storks embroidered in white upon a purple ground, and bordered with many brilliant colors. On his head he wore his hat of ceremony, a singular structure of silk, bamboo, and horse hair, which according to Corean customs, it is indispensable to wear upon all official occasions.

Second in the procession came the Vice Minister, HONG YOUNG SIK, a son of the Prime Minister of the Corean Kingdom. His dress in the main resembled that of MIN YONG IK, his lower rank being denoted by the fact that only one stork was embroidered upon the apron covering his breast.

Standing in the hall, just outside the open door of the reception-room, the Ambassadors and their suite formed a single line, facing the President. At a signal from the Minister, they dropped together on their knees. Then raising their hands above their heads, they bent their bodies forward with a slow, steady sweep until their foreheads touched the ground. Remaining in this attitude a few moments, they arose and advanced into the room, President ARTHUR and the gentlemen with him bowing deeply as they entered. Then Secretary FRELINGHUYSEN rose, coming forward, led MIN YONG IK up to the President, and introduced him. The President and the Minister joined hands, looked earnestly in each other's faces for a moment, and through the interpreter exchanged some words of compliment.

Minister MIN YONG IK then pronounced his formal address to the President, speaking in his native tongue in a solemn and rather pleasant voice, and the President replied. There was a short interchange of courtesies, and the Embassy withdrew, repeating at the door the obeisance they had made on entering.

VIEWS IN ANAM.

THE way of aggression that France has commenced in the far East has called attention to the little-known kingdoms tributary to China that lie to the south of that huge empire. Under the rule of the late NAPOLEON III. she had already taken possession of the province of Cochin China, and is now extending her sway over Tongking and Anam. But the conquest of the country has proved far more difficult than was expected: the French forces have either been repulsed, or gained victories which have been fruitless, and as disastrous as defeats, and the ill-will of China has been aroused by the attacks on her vassal kings.

Ha-Noi is the chief commercial town of Anam, and here the advance of the invaders received a check on the 15th of August. The French forces, divided into three columns of five hundred men each, sallied out from Ha-Noi—which had been taken possession of at the beginning of the contest by the ill-fated Captain RIVIÈRE—with the design of driving the Black Flags back to Son-Tai. One of the columns attacked a village on the Red River, a few miles from Ha-Noi, but failed to take it; another was driven back from a village named Vong, and chased back to Ha-Noi by the Black Flags, the third remained idle. In another direction, however, the French attained a success. The town of Mai-Dinong, situated at equal distances from Ha-Noi and Hai-Fong, and containing a population of thirty-five thousand souls, surrendered to Colonel BADEN.

But the most important event of the campaign was the capture of the capital, Hué. This city, which has been visited by few Europeans, is situated on the river Hué, and has a history which goes back to 1750. In 1570 it became the residence of the princes of the NGUYEN family, and in 1771 fell into the hands of the rebels TAY-CHANG, from whom it was recovered in 1802 by GIA LONG, who had it furbished by a French engineer. King LOUIS MAYE, who reigned from 1820 to 1841, added a second line of defences within the older works, to protect more nearly the royal palace and treasure house. This royal or official city is quite distinct from the commercial town, which lies on the other side of the ditch of the fortified enclosure, and is united to the citadel only by two wooden bridges.

Hué, however, has no industry of its own except some little ornamental work, protected by the court. Such was the city which was attacked on the 18th of August and occupied on the 20th. As it approaches the sea-board the river of Hué loses itself in lagoons and swamps, and communicates with the sea by only one narrow channel. This channel of Thuanan was entered by two vessels, the Pajave and the Lynx, but they found further progress stopped by two barriers, and the river defended by a series of intrenchments armed with artillery. It would have been impossible, if these had been defended, for the French forces to have reached the city by water, but after the capture of the forts at the mouth of the Thuanan pass the Annamite demanded an armistice, it was granted, and M. HARMAND proceeded to lay before the King the demands of his government. He demanded the recognition of the French protectorate over Anam and Tongquin, the annexation of the province Binh-Thuan to French Cochin China, and the occupation of the Thuanan forts by French soldiers.

France furthermore engages to drive from Tongquin the so-called "Black Flags." The title of these irregular troops ought to be translated "Black Bannerets" rather than "Black Flags." They play the same part in French dispatches from Anam that the Kwantles did in their dispatches from Tonquin two years ago. They are not, however, purely mythical, like the tribes invented by M. RATISBAS, nor are their brigands. They are the remains of the Tai Pings, the dreaded rebels who shook the Chinese throne. When the revolt was suppressed, the unconquered survivors roamed the frontier into Anam.

REMINISCENCES OF TOURGUÉNEFF.

By HJALMAR H. BOYESEN.

I HAD the pleasure of spending some very happy days in TOURGUÉNEFF'S company in November and December, 1873. Dr. JULIAN SCHMIDT, who is the high-priest of the TOURGUÉNEFF worship in Germany, had given me a letter of introduction, which insured me a cordial reception. TOURGUÉNEFF was then in his full vigor—a tall, manly man of robust proportions. His face, the lower half of which was covered with a grizzly mustache and beard, was of a large and massive mould; his eyes were blue and good-natured, though usually half hidden beneath the drooping lids, his nose was straight, thick at the base, and betrayed its Semitic origin. Nevertheless, the face as an ensemble gave the impression of beauty. His manner as well as his expression was that of a philosophic, or, as he himself inserted, an indolent man. It is difficult, however, to comprehend how a man who has accomplished so much, and whose methods are so laborious, can possibly have earned such an epithet. He made a point of always disclaiming imaginative gifts.

"I never imagined anything," he said, repeatedly. "Everything I have written is the result of experience and observation. To be frank, I have no faith in imaginative novel writing. Leave imagination to the poets; their lot is one of sharp senses, and a little constructive ability to put together what he sees. FLAUBERT'S theory, I think, is the correct one, whatever one may think of his application of it. Madame Bovary, however, is a great book, and its worth will be recognized when most of the rest of us will be forgotten."

Again and again he returned to this theme during my intercourse with him in the winter of 1873; and he even did me the honor to send me FLAUBERT'S works, including that extraordinary mystical méhange, La Tentation de St. Antoine, which overtook me on seas as I had crossed the Atlantic. In his letters he spoke frequently of return to FLAUBERT, for whom he entertained the warmest regard, and exhorted me to study his writings, which were the most notable phenomena in French literature since BALZAC. His criticism on my own performances, which he always had the kindness to read, were from the point of view of scientific naturalism; and I could not help noting the reflection that if he had been faithful to his own creed he could not have escaped rivalry with ZOLA. But the fact was, he was much more of an artist than he himself suspected, and science, though he abstractly recognized its authority and its enduring mission, was yet very remote from his sphere of thought. If he did not write like ZOLA at all, he said, it was only because he could not. FLAUBERT was a scientifically educated man, while he (TOURGUÉNEFF) was not. In his youth young people had not yet waked up to the importance of scientific study; they studied themselves instead with the horrid abstractions of German philosophers. He had himself for a time drawn from the muddy fount of Hegelian philosophy; it had left an oppressive emptiness in his soul and a bitter taste in his mouth. Education had of late taken a much more sensible turn, and the wide-spread discussion of and interest in scientific matters augured an educational revolution before the century was much older.

In the spring of 1879 I had again occasion to spend some months in Paris, and did not tarry long before paying my respects to TOURGUÉNEFF. He had just then returned from a visit to his estates in Russia, and had made observations which had filled him with apprehension. His brother had recently died, and, as I understood, had willed some of his property to him. This was the immediate occasion for his journey. His friends, however, of which he had more than he ever had dreamed, had persisted in thrusting him into notoriety by sending deputations to meet him, giving banquets in his honor, and altogether making him quite uncomfortable by their homage. In St. Petersburg they gave a dinner for him, at which he had been compelled to make a speech, and he had had the courage to say frankly what filled his heart. He had counselled moderation, attempted to curb the humiliating violence of the revolutionists and their well-wishers, but had plainly betrayed that, in a way, he shared their hopes and sympathized in their ultimate aim—the abolishment of despotism. The condition of Russia was so deplorable that it was difficult to see how it could be worse. The secret police and the system of paid denunciation threatened to undermine the security of society. Nobody was safe any longer, and it was often brave and honorable men who were exposed to suspicion and persecution. For all that, violence could never cure these social disorders. Violence produced only a further relapse into barbarism, and postponed the era of constitutional liberty into a still dimmer future.

In this vein he spoke, and the next morning he received a visit from an agent of the secret police, and a letter from some lofty personage, commanding him in the most courteous language to leave Russia without further delay.

"I had business to attend to," said TOURGUÉNEFF "and I could not leave. I therefore respectfully declined. I went to Moscow. There the students insisted upon making demonstrations in my honor. It was of no avail that I entreated them to leave me alone and to keep quiet. Again I received a warning from the authorities, urging that if I would not quit Russia on my own account, I must be aware that my presence afforded an excuse for disloyal demonstrations, and that I could, without the slightest provocation on my part, plunge many young men into misery. This argument I could not afford to ignore, for I recognized that it was true. I therefore hastened to my estates, and as soon as my business permitted, returned to Paris."

"I should think," I remarked, "that you would have felt an issue for your own safety."

"Oh no," he replied, "they would have hesitated long before they could have molested me if I should ever take up my residence there, per hope I might become sufficiently inconvenient to make them overcome their scruples. But that is, of course, out of the question. I confess, however, that the temptation often comes to me, and never so frequently as now. There seems to be a work for me to do there which I could find nowhere else, and if I were twenty years younger, perhaps I might undertake it. But I am sixty years old now, and am no longer in robust health. The gout is torturing me, and is slowly travelling up toward the vital parts. One does not recognize a new vocation at sixty, especially when one is as gouty and as indolent as I am."

Many other scattered observations on Russia and Russian affairs I find among the notes which I jotted down while returning from a walk or a ride with TOURGUÉNEFF to the Bois de Boulogne. He was, as he always had been, overwhelming me with kindness, introducing me to VICTOR HUGO, ALPHONSE DAUDET, ERNEST RENAN, and many others whose acquaintance I highly valued. As Frenchmen found my name hard to pronounce, they finally abandoned the attempt to identify me, except by the honorable ambiguity, "M'sieu de M. TOURGUÉNEFF." Among the several Americans whom I, in turn, received permission to introduce to him, there was especially one who pleased him, and to whose visit he repeatedly referred with pleasure, and that one was MARK TWAIN. It may, perhaps, please him to know what a man whom he revered as he did TOURGUÉNEFF thought of him.

"There, sir," the Russian exclaimed, the first time I met him after MR. CLEMENS'S call—"there is a man who at last conforms to my notion of what an American ought to be. Your other friends here—and yourself, too, for that matter—are mere tireless cosmopolitans; you might be almost anything. But this man has a physiognomy. He has the flavor of the soil."

He had read Roughing It with sincere pleasure. Innocents Abroad he did not care much about, and its humor had a peculiarly grotesque flavor, which did not appeal to him. But Roughing It contained situations which equalled or even surpassed anything in BRET HARTE. That "M. Bandman's funeral," he said, ought to suffice to make a man immortal. Of BRET HARTE, TOURGUÉNEFF also entertained a high opinion, though he feared from what he had seen of his later work that prosperity was proving dangerous to him—that, in fact, he was losing his self-criticism. Among the other American authors with whose works he was acquainted he regarded MARK TWAIN as the greatest, although, to be frank, he had no affinity for him. Among the English authors he had several good friends, particularly CARLYLE, who was a great and vigorous personality, and gifted with a power of denunciation which had not been equalled since the days of the Hebrew prophets. As for TENNYSON, he had never been able to discover the secret of his popularity, and attributed it chiefly to the slowness in English poetry of to-day of more vigorous and original minds. He had visited the Laureate at his country place, and had been pleasantly entertained by him; but his estimate of his genius had only been confirmed by personal intercourse.

"The philosopher, MR. LEWES, the husband of George Eliot," he went on, "always displayed much interest in my writings, and I had the pleasure of spending several evenings in his company and that of his gifted wife. On one occasion he took me aside and asked me confidentially which of his wife's works I regarded as the greatest. 'The Mill on the Floss,' I replied, unhesitatingly. 'I am greatly disappointed to hear you say that,' he exclaimed; 'I had hoped you would say Daniel Deronda.' 'That I could not conscientiously do,' was my reply, 'for I confess I like it least of any. It is a work of great ability; but it is not of the kind which appeals to me. After The Mill on the Floss, my choice would be Adam Bede or Silas Marner.' MR. LEWES was amazed that our views were so diametrically opposed, but I assured him that I was in no sense a critic, and that my preferences were a matter of temperament rather than reflection. George Eliot, with whom I had some agreeable talks, never in my presence alluded to any of her works. In fact, I derived the impression that she did not like to have any one talk about them. Her style always seemed to me unfortunate. In spite of her great insight and dramatic power, she impressed herself to an overelaborate and cumbrous manner. If she had been less great, her style would have made her works to me positively unpalatable."

Several times I met at TOURGUÉNEFF'S house young Russians who were more or less directly connected with the Nihilist movement. Especially do I remember vividly a young man with a strangely bewildered expression, who had been imprisoned for seven years in the fortress of Kief. The terrible hardship he had endured had almost destroyed his humanity and TOURGUÉNEFF was endeavoring to re-awaken his interest in life. As far as I remember, his crime consisted in having taken part in some demonstration in front of the CZAREWITZ'S palace, and to have expressed on several occasions disloyal sentiments. He was imprisoned without trial or sentence, and at the end of seven years, when his cell was needed for somebody else, he was pulled out into the sudden glare of the daylight and told to go. His first impulse was one of amusement at having been disturbed, and his only desire was to creep back into his dark and dingy hole. His life was ruined; he did not know where to turn. His only refuge seemed to be alliance with the Nihilists, with whom he had not formerly been associated. Somehow he obtained from them means to go to Paris, where he became one of TOURGUÉNEFF'S many pensioners. At the latter's request he began to write a record of his life, merely as an effort of memory, so as to regain his hold upon existence. When he had finished a chapter he went to TOURGUÉNEFF and read it aloud to him, receiving his suggestions and criticisms. It was on such an occasion that I was admitted to TOURGUÉNEFF'S study, and when this young man had taken his departure the sad story of his wrecked life was related to me. Another time as I entered I found the novelist engaged in making peace between two young revolutionists who had challenged each other to mortal combat.

"It is terrible," said he, "how deeply rooted the barbaric instincts are in many Russians, even those who have a gloss of European culture. At least, I am afraid, most of us are yet Asiatics. And what can you do with a people like that? If you give them a parliament and constitutional government on the English pattern, they would not know what to do with it. It would result in anarchy. An imprudent experiment in communal and municipal self-government is now being tried, but the material for intelligent voters appears even there very scanty. What I blame the government for is not that it refuses to inaugurate sweeping reforms, but that it winks at corruption, and by its horrible secret police and spy system further brutalizes the people, instead of educating it for a better state of things. Its barbarous punishments for such offences as are included under the term 'political,' so far from preventing disloyal sentiments, produce rather a reckless despair which makes violence easy and natural. This I have preached to my young revolutionary friends a hundred times, but it makes an impression upon them. They don't care what becomes of their great-grandchildren; they say they prefer to reap the blessings of liberty and constitutional government in their own lifetime. Well, so, to be sure, would I, but neither they nor I can make Russia's poet, of which her present and her future are the inevitable results. It is the sudden flooding of the country with so-called modern thought which has produced Nihilism. This thought had not grown in our soil, and could not have grown there. It was like an intoxicating ether which unsettled the emotional reason. There is a danger in being too rapidly civilized, in anticipating the slow growth of history. Japan, they say, is being destroyed by a too high civilization, and I am not enough of a prophet to say what the result will be in Russia."

I have made the above extracts from my notebooks omitting my own questions and occasional comments, and placing in juxtaposition remarks which were not always made on the same occasion. The problems which were agitating Russia interested me greatly, and I believe TOURGUÉNEFF had less hesitation in speaking his mind freely to me, because I was a foreigner, and because he knew that I was in sympathy with his ideas. Nevertheless, what I sought was only information, which he had the kindness never to refuse me. After much deliberation I have come to the conclusion that these could be no objection to publishing his views, now that he is dead, and is permanently beyond the reach of the government which in his lifetime did so much to persecute and annoy him. As the unprejudiced views of a man whose experience had afforded him exceptional opportunities for observation, they can scarcely fail to be of value.

THE OPENING OF THE VATICAN ARCHIVES.

POPE LEO XIII. has appealed to history to justify the Papacy, and to prove its usefulness, both now and in the past, to the civilized world. In order to make his appeal authoritative, he has thrown open the archives of the Vatican, under restrictions, no doubt, but, as may hope, under such restrictions as will not, in the end, exclude any conscientious scholar. In a letter to Cardinal DE LUCA, Vice-Chancellor of the Church, Cardinal PITRA, Librarian, and Cardinal HERGENRÖTHER, Prefect of the Archives, the Pope admits that the study of ecclesiastical history in our century has impaired the estimation in which the Church is held throughout Europe. He could therefore have what he deems false history refuted by the true, and he charges the cardinals named with the duty of opening for inspection the archives of the Papacy to Catholic scholars. Then he believes it will be demonstrated that the Papacy has rendered immeasurable services to civilization, and that it is still indispensable to the progress of mankind. The letter is long, filling five columns of the Osservatore Romano, and has received respectful comment from Italian papers of nearly all shades of political opinion. They place especial emphasis on the fact that the contention between Italy and the Church is now shifted to a new ground; that instead of meeting history by an appeal to infallibility, Leo will meet history by an appeal to the documents from which history is written. This it a great step in advance for the Papacy: it is the act of an enlightened sovereign, and if the result shall not be a change of the verdict of our age upon the questions at issue between it and Rome, we shall at least have access to treasures of information which have been hitherto locked and barred against all curious explorers. One thing is clear, the Papacy confesses itself to be put upon the defensive, and opens its storehouse of original documents in order to vindicate itself. What this means for historical students is well expressed by the London Times. "It is as if the Governor of the Bank of England were to stand in Threadneedle Street and request passers-by to help themselves from the cellars and tills." The history of the Papacy is in large part the history of Europe. Represented in every court in former ages, he has kept often holding the highest civil and political offices it has had a place in the life of every nation, and has been the inspirer or antagonist of nearly all national policies.

This is, however, but one step. It has been announced prematurely that the Pope has opened the entire Vatican Library to the public. It is much to be wished that he had so done; but so to have failed to see in the papal letter sufficient ground for the announcement. The carefully guarded ancient manuscripts will still, we fear, be kept under lock and key; the old jealousy, which has made the examination of them by Protestant scholars so difficult and so unsatisfactory, will still make them next to inaccessible. Special permission has had at all times to be secured for the seeing of the small selection of manuscripts shown to the public. How unlike this to the treatment of the student by the other great libraries of Europe! The Royal Library of Germany is open to every adult who wishes to use a book in the reading room. University officers can take books to their homes for examination, by special arrangement books and manuscripts are sent to scholars for perusal, or are forwarded to public libraries near their homes. LICHTLER, the author of the Left of Wycliffe, received from the Imperial Library of Vienna forty volumes of the English reformer's unpublished works for leisurely study. The manuscripts of the University of Cambridge are accessible to accredited scholars who are known to be engaged in useful investigations, and the Codex Alexandrinus lies open before the eye of the visitor to the British Museum. It seems hard that the library which in manuscript wealth is the richest of all should be practically closed against the Protestant world. When the most of these treasures were gathered the Papacy was the guardian of Western Christianity. It has shown its fidelity in keeping; let it now show its liberality in imparting of its stores.

The Vatican Library is the monument of the sagacity and love of learning of a long series of Popes. It was founded in the fifteenth century by NICOLAS V.—himself a student and a munificent patron of literature. It was his ambition to make Rome the centre of the learned world, and he applied himself mightily to his task. Greek scholars from Constantinople were especially welcomed by him, and the manuscript treasures of that doomed city were drawn to his own capital. The additions of NICOLAS to the already existing Papal Library were 5000 manuscripts. The Library Building was erected by Pope SIXTUS V. in the latter part of the sixteenth century. Entire collections of manuscript and printed volumes have been absorbed by this master collection, such as the library of the Elector Palatine, the original manuscripts plundered from Prague by GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS, and in this century the library of Cardinal ZELADA, and so late as 1856 nearly 7000 volumes which once belonged to Cardinal MAI. Other libraries exceed this in the number of printed books, but no one is so rich in manuscripts. Of these last there are 25,000, nearly 20,000 of which are in Latin, and over 3300 in Greek. It is hardly necessary to mention the Codex Vaticanus of the Bible, which takes its name from this library, and which has been edited by and printed under the supervision of Cardinal MAI. There are also to be found here manuscripts of the ancient Latin classics running back so far as the fourth century, and one of them, a De Republica of CICERO, supposed to date from the third century. It is an astonishing fact that the printed volumes have never been accurately counted, as that estimates of their number vary from 100,000 to 200,000. This is the more astonishing when we remember that NICOLAS V., the founder of the library, devised a catalogue which was the model for the librarians of his time. The lists of the printed volumes in use are written, and are for the librarians only. There are also printed catalogues of manuscripts in certain special lines. The building itself is the finest for library purposes in the world. Successive Popes have lavished upon its decoration all the resources of painting and sculpture. Nominally it is open to visitors every day, but in point of fact it is closed on Thursdays, feast days, and from the month of June to the month of November. The ordinary visitor is hurried through the halls by the custodian, who punctually takes the prescribed fee, and, as he passes along, sees only the locked doors of the cases which contain the manuscripts.

We are still left to conjecture how far the liberal offer of LEO XIII. will be construed, by the cardinals named, to extend. "None," says the London Times, "not known to be of unimpeachable Catholicity are likely to be admitted." But will this limitation be insisted on? Even if it be, the world will be the gainer by the publication of the documents laid away in the papal archives. We are not surprised that the concession is bound up with restrictions; for a new liberal, scholarly Pope is awkwardly liberal; liberality is not a customary papal virtue. Leo XIII. may be assured, however, that in every step he takes in this direction he will be met by the increased respect and the applause of lovers of learning throughout the Christian world.

MRS. HOWARD'S "AT HOME."

I.

In one of the Italian cities most frequented by foreigners for winter residence there is an old palace with a coat of arms carved above the entrance gate, a mouldy inner court adorned with battered statues, and a neglected garden in the rear. The noble family, rightful owners, has dwindled to an impecunious son, luminary of the Nice clubs, an uncle, canon of a cathedral, and a sister, married to a senator of the kingdom. These distinguished people convert to the old palace only to extort the uttermost farthing of rent from such tenants as choose to inhabit the vast chambers. Decay has set its seal on arch and court, but Banksia roses still bloom on the boundary wall, and a Judas-tree blushes in pink sprays in honor of the spring time. A porter no longer guards the entrance, and beggars roam up the dark stairway to jangle bells in quest of alms, for the water-purveyor of the house, a swarthy man clad in a shirt of purple flannel, who perpetually vanishes and pops out of oblique little doors in dusty corners, is not empowered to drive away mendicants. At the date of which we write an intruder of inquiring mind could have perceived a small visiting-card nailed to the door of the first-floor apartment bearing the name of Mrs. Horatio Fowler, Philadelphia. Another flight of the worn steps brought the visitor to a second landing of red tiles, where the massive portal had a similar bit of pasteboard inscribed Mrs. Thompson Howard, Boston. Further on, the doors of the old palace had brass plates unconscerable of vavaliers and advocats, while the upper story was occupied by a countess, who sallied forth in gay toilets, attended by a footman in livery, reputed to polish knives and wash dishes as the privacy of home.

"They take pot-luck up there," affirmed Mrs. Howard's Catarina, with a toss of her pretty head.

At twelve o'clock, on a spring morning, the postman rang several bells attached to the entrance gate, like the brass stops of an organ, and proceeded to rift his harvest of letters and journals for the respective lodgers. Simultaneously doors flew open, and baskets span down the well of the staircase, held by cords. The postman carefully freighted these receptacles, and the baskets ascended again with the news of the day, each carrying some hope or pain from the great hotter of the world.

Pretty Caterina, in her crimped hat, had emerged on the landing and lowered her basket—a measure to be deplored as derogating from all style, but necessary, since the cook had gone to market. Caterina smiled down on the postman—a brilliant glance intercepted by a raw man-servant on the first floor. He was young, and of fascinating exterior. His black hair was puffed out on either side of his head, his eyes were lustrous, and his mustache knowingly twisted to a point.

"Santo Madonna! the signora below has set up a man-servant!" she announced, presenting a small note from the basket to her expectant mistress.

Mrs. Howard received note and statement in dignified silence. She opened the missive, and a smile of triumph shone on her face. "He accepts my hesitation!" she exclaimed, aloud.

This remark was the key-note of the lady's ambition. She was a lion-hunter, and had secured a fresh prize.

"Where is Miss Norman?" she added.

"The signorina went out for a mouthful of fresh air," replied Caterina.

Jane Norman entered swiftly. "I am late," she explained, apologetically. "I have had an adventure this morning. I have been following a gentleman about for an hour."

"Following a gentleman!" repeated Mrs. Howard, and lowered the eyeglass through which she had been spying at the note to gaze at her companion.

Jane Norman laughed nervously. She was a slender and genteel young woman, usually attired in black, who slipped through a crowd unobtrusively, and kept well in the background. Granted the sympathy of congenial intercourse, her hazel eyes became brilliant and her smile charming, while such incense as good-humored masculine flattery rendered her charmless.

"The gentleman was a stranger," she continued. "I heard an Italian in the crowd say, 'See those pickpockets after a foreigners.' Then I noticed two young men lounging before a shop."

"Well?" said Mrs. Howard, impatiently.

"I kept between him and the thieves," resumed Jane. "He entered a church, and before one of the altars I managed to warn him."

"Really! Did he know your name?"

"Oh no."

"Probably he was aware that you live with me. I admit no clandestine acquaintances, mind."

Jane winced, and repented of her rash confidence. She can not bicker to forget her dependant position under Mrs. Howard's needle-pricks of reminder.

"He has nothing except that I am a country-woman," said the younger woman, taking up her pen. "Is there any correspondence for me this morning?"

Mrs. Howard began to scribble wildly notes of invitation to her acquaintance. The card read: "Mrs. Howard at home. April 12. To meet Mr. Poynter."

"Mr. Poynter, the celebrated author, is coming," explained the patroness, complacently. "You know his writings, of course. They have been all the rage in America for the past five years."

"No," said Jane, directing a pyramid of envelopes.

"He wrote the novel of the season: Nothing, an Idyl."

"I never read it," added Jane.

"His poems have been collected into a volume called Dandelion-down. His most profound romance, they say, is Feathers."

"Will you invite the ladies of the first floor?" demanded Jane, demurely.

"I do not know them," said Mrs. Howard, sharply. "I am obliged to be very careful—in my position."

"But had an English Lord and an Italian Marchese to dine last night," warned Jane.

"Indeed!" Mrs. Howard's eyes sparkled with anger.

Thursday dawned. Mrs. Howard received with stately elegance of demeanor, in black velvet trimmed with antique lace. Her rooms, once occupied by an English poet, were hung with tapestries, plaques of majolica, and dim pictures. Nothing more modern in the way of a chair than the spindle legs of the Louis Quatorze period was permitted. Soon the great yellow salon, with portières of black and gold, and walls daubed in amber damask, was thronged, chiefly by ladies, all eager to see Mr Poynter, the American author. Mrs. Howard had long wielded the sceptre of a social despot. She set up some, and put down others, with a high hand. Power had rendered her arrogant.

Jane Norman, pouring tea in a small boudoir, became aware of a startling fact. Mr. Poynter did not come. Mrs. Howard's company smile was a trifle forced, and her glance abstracted. Tham passed, and the guest of the occasion remained conspicuous by his absence. What did it mean? Was she to be lightly mocked at? Mortification and wrath awoke in her breast. The last cup of tea was drank, and the last curious spectator departed. Already Mrs. Howard beheld gossip, that most tantalizing of petty bees, spreading wing at her door to soar as far over the Anglo-American colony of the foreign city with such a piquant item of scandal as that the lion had not appeared at all, or made excuse.

Later a rumor reached the second-floor apartment, filtered through Caterina and Luigi, the new man-servant below. Mr Poynter had spent two hours with Mrs Fowler and her daughters. As if this were not sufficient guilt and sorrowful for one day, some of Mrs Howard's guests had looked in on Mrs Fowler in departing, and had been presented to the affable author. These were chiefly matrons with eligible daughters, who understood that dancing parties were to be given here.

"What does such an insult mean to one of my family and position?" cried Mrs. Howard.

II.

Edward Poynter was tall, plain of feature, and of middle age. He had learned in the battle of life not to wear his heart on his sleeve. A better tailor would have rendered him distinguished, while a more ample sweep of black hair would have imparted eccentricity to his appearance. A traveller without enthusiasm, because travel had come too late, a cool spectator of the crowd, a man infinitely amused, and a trifle scornful of his own popularity: such was the hero of Mrs Howard's at home. In earlier college days and during the struggles of an editorial career he had poured forth his soul in poems and philosophical essays, which had met with no recognition. Then he had turned to a society novel in anger, and produced, grimly derisive of the effort, Nothing, an Idyl. The author was profoundly astonished at his success. Feathers followed, and fashion claimed Edward Poynter for its own. His dislike of publicity, his aversion to small-talk, his attempt to remain secluded, only enhanced his value. Possibly these lighter works possessed facility of expression and true talent which he alone refused to recognize.

The previous Saturday he had strolled through the halls of an artists' club, where a ball was given to celebrate the centenary of Raphael of Urbino. The portrait of the divine youth was embowered in laurel, while the artistic fancy had converted the withdrawing-room into a subinacian grotto, with the aid of pearly shells, pasteboard crabs and lobsters, coral, and electric lights, for the repose of panting dancers. Here Mr. Poynter had been presented to a bevy of his country women—tall ladies and short ladies, young and old, with every gradation of humor, assurance and slimness. Mrs. Howard was among the number. In accepting her invitation the vagrant possible impression of her personality remained in his mind. The date was treasured in his memorbook. On Thursday he sought the old palace, inspected the mouldy court, and ascended the wide stairway. On the first landing a servant stood with the door open. The servant ran the fascinating Luigi, intent on obtaining a glimpse of Caterina above, and also with an eye to the company which should flock to Mrs. Howard's reception.

"Is the signora at home?" inquired the author.

Luigi bowed, and ushered him into the presence of Mrs. Fowler and her charming offspring, Frances, Maisel, and Georgiana.

"So kind of you to come!" murmured the lady. She also had achieved to invest the disagreeable interior odorn some entertainment which should shed lustre on her position, and here the patronage fell from the heaven, all roused, as it were. The rout was pleasant. The young ladies fluttered about with their birthday books, and a few dozen agers dropped in. Mr Poynter described the manner in which a lady had warped him of pickpockets a few days before. The Fowler girls giggled.

"You must come to our Flower Fair for the new American church," said Mrs. Fowler.

"Madame, I am confident your daughters will be rose buds on the occasion," was the gallant response.

The maidens clapped their hands.

"What a lovely idea!" exclaimed the elder, archly.

Mr. Poynter found them in harmony with their surroundings. Every bracket and table was freighted with bibelots, even as the Misses Fowler were decked with buckles, chains, bodies, and clashing bracelets.

"Thank you for a delightful hour—for Mrs. Howard," said Edward Poynter, with recollection of memory.

Then he withdrew, serenely unaware of having acquitted himself creditably of a senseless task some obligation, and all ignorant of the storm he had aroused above-stairs.

Left alone, the Fowlers burst into uncontrollable laughter. Maisel seated herself at the piano and performed a rattling Strauss waltz, while her brother and sisters joined hands and danced around the room.

"What fun! He thought you were Mrs. Howard!" cried Frances.

The Flower Fair for the fund of the new American church succeeded Mrs. Howard's at home swiftly that the mortified lady hoped it would serve to efface the remembrance of his many names. Vain delusion! Everybody knew before the lapse of twenty four hours that the famous author had visited Mrs Fowler of Philadelphia, and ignored Mrs. Howard of Boston. The culprit one manifested no sign of contrition for his misdemeanor.

Edward Poynter was recalled from dreamy contemplation of Perugino in a gallery by a proud cord of invitation to the Flower Fair. A face haunted him, pure in outline and lighted by a pair of hazel eyes. Seated before the master piece of his preference, he had yielded to the impulse of inscribing a tender little essay in his note-book to this unknown woman. For a moment she had emerged from the cosmic obscurity of a church fragrant with incense, and read his own soul with one vivid look, then vanished again. Who was she? Maid, wife, or widow? What was the secret of the seemingly candid eyes, for surely there was a shadow of pathos in them? The enigma of a woman's glance maddened and interested him. Why? He could not decide. The moment had come when he was to such an impression.

"What would this world be without fans?" he mused. "I suppose I am expected to buy mine piecemeal and impossible blowing books."

He tore up the manuscript, scattered the fragments, and went to the bazar of charity. The American flag waved above the door of a large hall and a hum of voices greeted the ear. Edward Poynter paused on the threshold with that contemplative manner peculiar to him. Stalls all down the wall, each presided over by fair ladies attired like the blossoms vended. Near at hand a parterre of Peppers arrayed and nodded, the flame of color extending from scarlet satin bodices, relieved with wheat sprays, to little mourners which seemed to have been dropped from the pansy of Ceres. Further on, a variegated Pink spread her aromatic-scented wares in front of proximity to an Ox-eyed Daisy encamped decked with silver leaves. The Wild Convolvulus purged conquestionally from her bower of trailing vines, while the Corn flower enhanced the value of her simple bouquets by brushing them with her purple hair. Edward Poynter was not slow to recognize the Misses Fowler in this galaxy of beauty. He smiled involuntarily. They had taken his advice, and represented flower-beds. A cloud of pink draperies enveloped their center stand, and in an atmosphere redolent of perfume the three sisters attracted admiring eyes. They were shepherdess dresses of pink silk and their blonde hair sparkled with diamond stars for the dress.

"There is Mr Poynter," remarked Mrs Fowler, and approached the clergyman who was conversing with Mrs Howard. "I do hope we shall make a lot of money for the church fund."

"The ladies are giving me zealous assistance," said the clergyman—a mild and peaceable Christian, who ignored the hostility of those in politicians.

Mrs Howard bowed stiffly. Mrs Fowler nodded, and rustled the folds of her rich crimson robe.

"You should welcome Mr Poynter," she continued to the pastor of the flock. "He has come to see my girls dressed as rose-buds Such a dear man as he is, and not a bit spoiled by flattery. You know him, madam?"

"I love met him," replied Mrs. Howard, with her most stately bearing.

Pride goes before a fall. The clergyman hastened toward the door, but before he reached it Edward Poynter darted away toward the lower end of the hall. Mrs. Fowler's countenance lengthened. The oldest Miss Fowler pricked her finger smartly on a thorn of the moss-covered table.

Edward Poynter had discovered in his leisurely survey of the scene a shrine of the Lily-of-the-Valley, with a single occupant standing calm and fair amidst the sheaves of delicate green bells and long, cool leaves. White silk tulle softly enveloped her, and from a trellis of green chenille rose a slender throat and a graceful head, with a single pearl for ornament in the dark hair. The Lily-of-the-Valley was Jane Norman, escaped from the chrysalis of every-day bondage to the shrine of a gouty old lady—until the flowers faded Tropical plants were arranged behind her as a relief of darker foliage to enhance the transparent tissue of her dress and the stainless purity of the blossoms.

"I would not have believed Jane could look as well," reflected Mrs. Howard, slowly approaching.

Emulation had led her to thus present her companion to the community. Had not the artful Caterina beguiled Mrs. Fowler's Luigi, and learned what the toilet of the Misses Fowler would be? Had not Mrs. Howard determined to eclipse them as much by the refined beauty of a lily-of-the-valley as in the superiority of her own breeding? Motive employs obscure wheels in small communities as well as in imperial governments.

"Have I found you again?" said Edward Poynter, leaning on the table, and speaking hurriedly.

Jane started, and their eyes met in a swift recognition.

"Will you buy my lilies?" she rejoined, mindful of Mrs. Howard's objection to followers.

"I shall purchase no other flower," he returned, eagerly. "The pickpockets got my purse, after all."

Color dawned in Jane's cheek, and a rippling smile swept over her face.

"You should be more careful," she said.

"You should not have deserted me so cruelly," he echoed, placing a spray of lilies in his buttonhole.

"How amusing to have the thieves secure the prize in the end!" she added. "That would furnish an incident for an author now here."

"Does he need incidents?" demanded Edward Poynter, studying her face.

"I have only glanced at his books; but he does seem to need incident," she returned, with a touch of sarcasm.

"What else?" he asked, abruptly.

"Pith," said Jane Norman.

"Good-day, Mr. Poynter," interposed Mrs. Howard.

"Good-day, madame," responded the courteous culprit.

Mrs. Howard glared at him stonily. She was accustomed to her public, therefore she stifled her emotions. Jane had turned pale at the mention of his name.

"I regretted not seeing you on Thursday," impressively.

"On Thursday I visited Mrs. Howard," he explained, airily.

"Pardon me; I saw Mrs. Howard," said that lady, with a bitter smile.

"Then you have a memento here."

"There is only one Mrs. Howard, sir. I am a resident of many years."

He looked at Jane, and she came to the rescue.

"Mrs. Howard expected you on Thursday to meet her friends," she said.

"I visited Mrs. Howard and her charming daughters—"

"There is a person with daughters on the first floor of one palazzo," interposed Mrs. Howard.

Edward Poynter gazed in bewilderment at the two ladies. His next question was seemingly irrelevant. "Were you there?"

"Yes," replied Jane, suppressing her amusement.

The clergyman swept down the visitor to admire the other stalls, but Edward Poynter manifested a preference for the Lily-of-the-Valley which was clearly apparent to all.

"People will talk if you remain here longer," demurred Jane, whose cheeks had become as pink as those of her sisters of the Rose-bud department.

"Let them talk! If you permit me to remain, their opinion is wholly indifferent to me," he said, in a low tone. "What an idiot I was to slight Mrs. Howard!"

"I did not know you had written Feathers and Dandelion-down," added Jane, with contrition.

"Too despise the rubbish, I can see."

"Yes, I do," avowed Jane, with a dilution of the nostril. "A man should find some nobler task."

Edward Poynter was delighted. His eyes softened.

"I have been searching for you all my life," he said. "Ah, why have I never before found you?"

The next month Edward Poynter and Jane Norman were married, and sailed for America.

Mrs. Howard and Mrs. Fowler have buried the hatchet, and visit each other. Mrs. Howard expresses a fear that the Fowler girls will never marry, as they have no dot, and hints darkly that the late Mr. Fowler was a carpenter by trade. Mrs. Fowler gives it as her opinion that Mrs. Howard is an assuming old frump with dyed hair, and adds as entire disbelief in her Boston origin. On one subject both ladies agree: they consider the American author Edward Poynter as greatly overestimated, and doomed to early and merited oblivion.

"What can he have seen to admire in her? Surely she made her own dresses, they fitted so badly." They meditate Georgina, Frances, and Mabel Fowler. Then these maidens spread afresh their pretty draperies, and dance on in pursuit of such elusive will-o'-the-wisps as husbands. Seniors they have in abundance, and many nibbles at the matrimonial bait, but the family income will brook no admission into the requisite dowries. Jane Norman had not a penny, and made her own gowns. Magical gifts of destiny! How can such mortals be explained, at least to the understanding of the Misses Fowler?

The fascinating Luigi jilted Caterina in favor of Mrs. Fowler's cash, a solute person of means. Caterina, in despair, threatened to throw herself from the window, but thought better of it, and married the water-pumper of the house. She may be seen loitering in the court, good humored, slipshod, with disheveled hair, a baby on her arm, and her knitting-work in her fingers, ready to gossip with all the world, as of old.

The seasons pass over the Italian palace. The Judas-tree blushes pink in the golden warmth of summer, and winter frosts fringe the fountain with icicles. Massive wall, gateway, and vaseable statues remain unchanged, save the ebb of fitful human life ebbs and flows in the wide courtyard and vast chambers with the lapse of years.

ART IN DETROIT.

THE leading citizens of Detroit, Michigan, have organized an Art Loan Exhibition remarkable for extent, variety, and quality. They gave eight months to the work, and subscribed at the outset $30,000 as a guarantee fund to meet any financial loss that might be incurred. They appointed their committees as long ago as last February, and they held a ratification meeting on the 12th of March in Music Hall, and listened to addresses from distinguished speakers, particularly to a letter from the Hon. THOMAS W. PALMER announcing his readiness to contribute $10,000 toward building an art gallery, in case $40,000 were contributed for others. They issued a circular asking the loan of treasures suitable for the exhibition. They constructed an "Art Wigwam," on the general plan of the Centennial Art Annex, one hundred and thirty feet square, at a cost of $10,000. They proceeded to adorn the interior of that edifice with oil paintings, water-colors, etchings, engravings, statuary, and bric-à-brac, the pictures being so numerous that three weeks were consumed in hanging them. They opened the exhibition promptly on the day announced—the 1st of September.

Never was a project for an art loan exhibition conceived more clearly, backed more generously, carried on more systematically, or executed more successfully. "Upon passing through the Turnstiles," wrote an eye-witness on the opening night, "the visitors found themselves in a blaze of light, surrounded by a superb collection of paintings from New York, Boston, and the East, and involuntarily paused out of sheer wonder that such a sight should ever have been seen here. Passing into the rotunda, they stood in doubt for the instant as to which of the rooms opening around them possessed the greatest attraction. The splendid and sensational works of art, the magnificent settings of the paintings, the silvery flood of the electric lights, the men and women moving about softly as if on sacred ground, the harmonious blending of the lights, shades, and colors, must be seen to be appreciated. Before eight o'clock there was a crowd, but with none of the haste, anxiety, or excitement usually attendant upon such a gathering. All moved about admiringly and curiously, but there was no vulgar rush, no boisterous enthusiasm, no rude elbowing, shoving, or clamor."

We have received a series of photographs representing various views in the interior of the building, and also a catalogue of the exhibition—the latter a well-arranged and instructive octavo pamphlet of one hundred and sixty-seven pages, edited by Miss CLARA A. AVERY—and the impression produced by these documents seems to explain and justify the appreciative enthusiasm of the writer just quoted. By far the largest and most important portion of the exhibit consists of oil paintings, and among the distinguished names represented by them are JOE ANGELO BELLEI, Bonheur, Comerre-Perrin, Corot, Diaz, Dupré, Andrea Kauffman, Leonardo da Vinci, Millais, Poynter, Raphael, Rembrandt, Ricardo Reni, Salvator Rosa, Rubens, and Vanderpol. Rosa Bonheur, Julio Bastos, Cindy, Coomey, Dagnet, De Cock, De Neuville, Diaz, Fortuny, Gerome, Jacque, Jacquet, Jundt, Lambinet, Marchetti, Meyerheim, Palmaroli, Passini, Pelloy, Rousseau, Rico, Rotonnat, Schreyer, Vibert Villegas, Zamacois and Zuni. Such names as these settle at once the rank of an exhibition of pictures, and present an attraction that any city might be glad to harbor. Thus there are near even American artists, the most celebrated of them being honored with short biographies, which sometimes convey to a few words a good deal of interesting information. Of Mr. WILLIAM H. BEARD we read: "Brother of JAMES—a thorough American, in spite of European study." Of Mr. J. WELLS CHAMPNEY: "Lecturer on anatomy in the schools of the N. A. D." Of Mr. J. FOXCROFT COLE: "Although a careful student of French landscape art, he has retained great individuality, and penetrates the soul of nature." Of Mr. W. M. DE HAAS: "Artist to the Dutch navy, 1857." Of Mr. FRANK DUVENECK: "Commenced his career as frieze painter—superior technique portraits in Rembrandt style." Of Mr. R. SWAIN GIFFORD: "Taken to New Bedford when a child; has travelled much in the East, and is very successful in representing Oriental life." Of the late Mr. SANFORD R. GIFFORD: "One of the most original of American artists in depicting atmospheric effects." Of the late Mr. JOHN F. KENSETT: "His fame rests largely on his landscapes of American scenery." Of HAMAS D. MARTIN: "Almost wholly self-taught, member of several societies."

The section devoted to water-colors and black and white comes next in order, and is followed by the sections devoted respectively to amateur work, sculpture, colonial antiquities, bric-à-brac, textiles, and miscellaneous articles, among the latter being about two hundred and fifty pieces of terra cotta and hand-made and wheel-made pottery, duplicates of objects in the Cesnola Collection in this city. In his letter consenting to forward these specimens, General DI CESNOLA wrote: "The trustees of the Metropolitan Museum of Art having authorized me to lend the Detroit Art Loan Exhibition such antiquities discovered by me in Cyprus as are not at present on exhibition in the Museum, I have selected from them specimens which will very fairly represent the ancient art of Cyprus in its also growth, beginning from a period still earlier than twelve centuries before our era, and coming down to the time when the Romans were ruling over that island, namely, about two thousand years ago."

This magnificent exhibition is the first step in a carefully matured scheme for establishing in Detroit a permanent museum and school of art.

WHEELMEN AT SPRINGFIELD.

THE grand bicycle tournament at Springfield, Massachusetts, which began on the 18th inst. and continued three days, was the most successful and interesting meeting of the kind ever held in this country. It was organized and conducted by the Springfield Bicycle Club, and as a pecuniary venture its results were emanently satisfactory, the judicious outlay of $16,000 in prizes and advertising being rewarded by the receipt of $24,000 in gate money and entrance fees. Besides this, they have won the reputation of being the most enterprising bicycle club in the country and the most active promoters of a sport which is winning a place as popular favor only accorded by base ball. The popularity which bicycling has gained in this its sixth year of existence in this country was shown by the throngs of sight-seers who flocked into Springfield to witness the novel sport. On the second day of the races 23,000 persons, by actual count, occupied the grand stand and other available positions in Hampden Park, and it is estimated that three times that number viewed the parade of 600 wheelmen through the city streets earlier in the same day.

The races were remarkable as resulting in a general breaking of records that had already stood the test of several famous meets. The most novel race, which was over a distance of one mile without touching hands to the handlebar, was won by an American ex-bicycle. The machine is an novel as the race was on it, for its wheels occupy the reverse of the ordinary position, the small one being in front.

The most exciting race was that for the twenty-mile amateur championship. After an exceedingly close contest, which aroused the enthusiasm of the great crowd of spectators to a pitch of excitement, it was won by GEORGE M. HEWES, of the Springfield Club, in the fast time of 1 h 7 m. 32 s., his only competitor, THOMAS W. MIDGLEY, of Worcester, Massachusetts, coming in twenty yards behind. HEWES's time in this race breaks the amateur and professional record of America, and he also succeeded in lowering the American record for every mile above the tenth. The professional race for twenty miles, contested the next day, lowered HENDEE's record he more than a minute, being won by M. W. HOLBAN, of England, in 1 h 6 m. 20 s.

The twenty-five mile amateur race for the championship of the United States was won by A. H. ROBINSON, of London, England, in 1 h. 23 m. 10 s., which time breaks the American record by 13 m. 4 s. CHARLES F. FRAZER, of Smithville, New Jersey, really came in first, but as he had fouled ROBINSON on the homestretch, the judges gave the second place.

A five-mile tricycle race was won by the ex-champion bicycler, L. H. JOHNSON, of Orange, New Jersey, and the five-mile college race was won by A. D. CLAFLIN, of Harvard, in 16 m. 40 s.

The total attendance at the races during the three days of the meet was 50,000 persons.

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

THERE is a singular nature has arisen in Texas. The cattle kings have inclosed vast tracts with wire fences, leaving stretches of miles upon miles without any gate or passageway. To go around one of these fenced areas is a journey of several days. The temptation for travellers to cut the wires and pass through is very great, especially since the land inclosed belongs to the public domain. This has been done, has resulted in serious affrays, and has at last brought the matter conspicuously before the people of the State. The Legislature will, without doubt, try to adopt some measure for the adjustment of the troubles at the next session.

A newspaper printed in Richmond, Virginia, makes the somewhat remarkable statement that "we meet with plenty of Northern people who are more deficient in reading, writing, and arithmetic than the negro anywhere in the South," and on the strength of this assertion it desires that Northerners shall cease to repeat that the southern negro needs educating.

It is claimed that the jinrikisha, or two-wheeled cart in which passengers are drawn by men, was introduced into Japan by a Yankee inventor. The Yokohama Mail says that three hundred thousand of them are now in use there, giving employment to at least two hundred thousand able bodied men. It seems that Yankee ingenuity can detect "a want long felt" to Asia as easily as to America.

The civil service examiners say that there is a dearth of applicants for the places that pay small salaries.

When some of the Fish Commissioners were on Narragansett Bay recently they "picked oysters out of the teeth of the sakes, and told their age by wrinkles in the shell." Oysters have not yet learned the art of concealing their age by the obliteration of wrinkles.

A Western newspaper's opinion that a phrenologist is "a man who can tell from the bumpers on a boy's head whether he is to be hanged or to be a missionary."

Another American has distinguished himself in the Old World by appearing at a theatre in Milan with a luminous scarf pin in which a tiny electric light glowed. It was made to burn for five hours by a small apparatus carried in the waistcoat pocket.

There is lamentation in Kentucky, born of the report that the corn crop this year will be small, and of the thought that a part of it will be turned into meal cakes and other solids.

One of those Mexican creatures known as the burro was shipped to St. Louis. The agent concluded that "burro" meant "bureau," and he accordingly reported to his superior, on the arrival of the car-load, "one bureau missing, and one jackass over."

Accounts appear in the newspapers occasionally of trials of speed between the magnificent steamboats that sweep around the Battery into in the afternoon and out into the Sound. These craft are the handsomest of their kind in the world, and their decks are nearly always black with passengers while passing where there are objects of interest on shore to be seen. The officers of the companies owning the boats would be very reluctant to acknowledge that racing is permitted. Perhaps it is done without permission, or maybe it is not done at all. But if there is such racing, there is great danger. The explosion of the immense boilers carried by a modern Sound steamboat would be a terrible affair.

No. 2. "Ah! this time," says old Perkins, "I think I have the right thing. Quiet little animals, gnats, harmless and perfectly trustworthy."

THE NORTHERN PACIFIC JUBILEE.

One of the great events of the present year is the completion of the Northern Pacific Railroad, which was celebrated at a point far up in the northwestern corner of Montana, September 8, 1883. The great enterprise of building this transcontinental highway has been prosecuted fitfully and under many difficulties, financial and physical, since 1864, but no actual work was undertaken until the spring of 1870. By the autumn of 1873 the road was completed from Duluth, at the western end of Lake Superior, to Bismarck, on the Missouri River, Dakota, and from Kalama, Washington Territory, to Tacoma, on Puget Sound, the total number of miles of road then in operation being 660. In the panic of 1873 the great house of JAY COOKE & Co. failed, the sale of Northern Pacific Railroad bonds was stopped, and the bank of railroad building was suspended, until 1877, when unimportant operations were resumed on the Pacific coast. After various changes in the management of the affairs of the company, FREDERICK BILLINGS became president of the road in 1879, and under his direction work was vigorously pushed on all divisions of the line. In 1881 Mr HENRY VILLARD, who had previously secured control of all eca, river, and railroad transportation lines in Oregon and Washington, obtained a controlling interest in the Northern Pacific Railroad, and was elected president of the company. Since that time the enterprise, which is one of extraordinary magnitude, and is burdened with vast difficulties, has been prosecuted to a successful completion.

The last rail was laid and the last spike driven at a point on the line of road which may be described as 1168 miles from Lake Superior and 847 miles from Puget Sound. These figures indicate the length of the road between the two points at which the work was originally begun. But from this spot St. Paul, practically the eastern terminus of the line, is 1795 miles away, and Portland, one of the western termini, is 706 miles distant. The place made famous by the driving of the last spike is a lonely intervale in the Rocky Mountains, bounded in by lofty and almost treeless peaks. A decorated roof, supported by columns of timber, was erected between the temporary track used for construction purposes and the road-bed over which the finished line ran to rest. Westward of this was a pavilion for the ladies of the party, and flanking this was a music stand, in which was posted the Fifth United States Infantry Band, which discovered excellent music for the occasion. Around were grouped Indians, artizans, miners, country people from distant cabins and railsys, and a large company of excursionists from Montana and the East, brought thither by trains of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, and from Oregon by the trains of the Oregon Railroad and Steam-Navigation Company, the Western corporation of Mr VILLARD'S numerous enterprises. Considering the distance of the place from any settlement, the crowd assembled was very large. Some of the people from the adjacent region had travelled fifty or sixty miles to see the show, camping out at night, and soon there rejoiced that they were able to behold the iron rails laid in the line that should connect their neighborhoods with the rest of the world.

The principal speeches of the day were made by Messrs. WILLIAM BILLINGS, and WILLIAM M EVARTS. These were worthy contributions to the somewhat voluminous literature of the transcontinental celebration and excursion. But, in order to group together representatives of the various States and Territories traversed by the line, the Governors of Minnesota, Wisconsin, Dakota, Idaho, Montana, Washington, and Oregon were brought out with brief speeches, and General GRANT, inasmuch to operations calls, made a few bright and pleasant remarks to the company. A gap of 1200 feet had been left between the eastern and the western ends of the advancing lines of rails. Gangs of track layers, two men in each, were stationed at each end of this gap, and at a given signal they went eagerly to work, laying their rails with marvellous rapidity, and advancing toward the last tie, 600 feet distant from each. With prodigious clamor and clatter of iron, and amid cheers from the assembled crowds, the last rail was laid, and then the last spike was driven, first by Mr H. C DAVIS, who, when superintendent of construction, had driven the first spike. He struck a blow, then President VILLARD, Mr BILLINGS, General GRANT, and a long line of distinguished men each dealt a tap, until the last spike was fairly driven home, and the great work was completed.

OUNCES OF PREVENTION.

SUMMER HARDENING.

Cold water and cold air are healthy people's tonics. The robust and healthy may expose themselves to nicker, winter or summer, with only the ordinary rational precautions. For delicate people and for young children the question of exposure is somewhat less simple. They can not enjoy or profit by the exercise and exposure which benefit the robust in cold weather, for many of them, indeed, ample shelter and clothing are scarcely sufficient to keep them warm. There is a class of invalids who are always cold, and these are difficult people to cure, for generally you have to change their whole way of life and thought in order to cure them. But there is another class who can be so trained as to be hardened against both cold and heat from the beginning. I mean the children, and the best time to begin with young children is the summer.

It is a somewhat delicate task, for children are much more sensitive both to heat and to cold than adults are. And why? It is generally said that children are more "delicate" than adults; but this, at least in the sense that is usually understood by the words, is not at all the reason. The surprising thing about a healthy child is not his delicacy, but his toughness.

But why, then, is a child so sensitive to cold? The reason is not a physiological but a purely physical one, and it is worth dwelling upon for a moment. The principle is that the smaller of two solid bodies has the greater surface in proportion to its contents; this much of geometry is familiar enough, but we do not remember to apply it. A buckshot has a thousand times more surface for its size than a cannon-shot; a cube of an inch to a side has but one-eighth of the solid content that a cube of two inches to the side has, but it has one-fourth as much surface, six square inches, that is to say, as against only twenty-four square inches in the larger cube. The smaller cube than has, therefore, twice as much surface in proportion to its bulk as the cube of two inches to a side. The same is true of any other solids of similar forms, whether spheres, cubes, or human beings; it is true, therefore, of a child three feet tall as compared with his father who is six feet tall. Supposing the proportions the same, the child will have just twice the radiating surface to be chilled or warmed, in proportion to his bulk and weight, as the man.

With he tender skin the furless and featherless young human animal is the most defenseless of creatures against the cold. At the other extreme of the scale in this respect is the bountiful equipment of birds against the cold. It is a beautiful compensation. As among the most exposed and smallest of creatures they should be the coldest, on the contrary they are the warmest blooded of all creatures; even the smallest wren or rice-bunting rejoices in his vival fountain of living heat, a vital spark in the cold, the little heart beats unchilled under his feather wrapper.

This is not a side light; on the contrary, it bears directly upon the question of hardening the featherless young of our own kind against the cold. Many parents think that all they have to do is to keep the child always and every minute in warm clothing. It is a mistake, it makes the skin tender, it prevents the due growth of the power to resist the cold. The secret is to let the child feel both cool air and cool water a little while at a time, and so to prevent the overdelicacy of the skin.

How is this best managed? fly a very brief one both every evening, on undressing a healthy child, and by frequent baths in water, not too cool, during the summer.

But let the baths be short ones unless the water is warm. When children are taken to swim in pond or river, which may be done from the second year if the water is warm, take them out before they get cold, entering well for shivering and blue lips. You will not watch them too carefully, but be sure that you let them bathe, unless the physician points out reason to the contrary. If you do not, if you insist upon "coddling" them night and day, under warm clothes all day and warm blankets all night, throughout the summer, I will tell you what you are providing for all the winter—a continuous series of colds and influenzas, the result of the overtender skin for which your "coddling" is to blame. I have spoken of the danger of pneumonia for the elderly, but in our climate it is a frequent disease at all ages, from the earliest.

When colds and influenzas have once begun, then you must wrap up the child as warmly as possible, and that makes the skin still more tender, and invites still more colds. The physiological situation is what would be called a "vicious circle" in logic. Baths ranging from 75° to 85° Fahr. are then the best cure too as overmeuitive skin. They may be given in winter, too, but mean during the progress of a cold, and it is best to take the temperature by a thermometer.

For the rest, exposure to the cool air under exercise is the best of hardeners, in summer as in winter, the difference being that in summer one has not to guard against excessive cold, and exposure need not be attended with any risk. The summer, for this reason, is the time when the delicate should seek pleasurable exercise in the open air, as surf-bathing, boating, and mountain rambles in discretion. There is too little of these at one summer watering places, and too much sitting on hotel verandas. All that I can say will not save the sitters on hotel verandas

SOME OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

The regular visits of this beautiful weekly come like rays of golden sunshine into the family circle.—Zion's Herald, Boston.

Although its visits are not "few and far between," it is very like to a good angel of the household.—Christian Intelligencer, N. Y.

It conveys information and amusement to all, and many a teacher will know better how to instruct her class after having perused its pages. It is one of the peculiarly admirable publications of the day.—Philadelphia Record.

Harper's Young People is a noble storehouse, well stocked with good things, grave and gay, for the whole household of children—from the wee none to the boys and girls well on to their teens. Parents can make no mistake in subscribing for the current year, that their little ones may have a yearly round of joy.—From the "Sunday-School Journal," edited by the Rev. Jesse H. Vincent, D. D.

The villainous trash—the penny-dreadful "boys' and girls' papers"—at one time so popular and so numerous, have nearly all, thank fortune, been driven from the field by the introduction of publications for the young which are just as cheap and perfectly healthful and wholesome. This good work of reform was led by the Harpers of New York with their handsome Young People.—Pittsburgh Commercial.

Harper's Young People has now come to be one of the most attractive and excellently edited juvenile periodicals of the day.—Independent, N. Y.

Harper's Young People is the best weekly for children in America.—Southwestern Christian Advocate.

No more attractive Christmas gift could or made to a child than a copy of this bound volume.—Cincinnati Commercial.

One of the most conspicuous successes in the publishing way.—Philadelphia Press.

The grand success of this beautiful and instructive illustrated weekly for young readers is the best proof that it fills a needed place. No magazine of its kind has ever come into such boundless popularity in so short a time.—Chicago Inter-Ocean.

The illustrations form a choice art gallery in themselves, and a gallery that contains some gems worthy of preservation by the people of the most cultivated taste in pictures.—Brooklyn Times.

In its weekly instalments it has been the delight of innumerable boys and girls in this New World of ours, for Young People is read from Hudson Bay on the Irishmen of Panama. In a literary sense, the material found in it is excellent, and the information given on innumerable subjects is always conveyed in a sensible and tasteful manner.—N. Y. Times.

An entertainment variety of entertaining and instructive material suited to young folks' reading, sown thickly with a multitude of capital illustrations—this is what we find as we turn these well-freighted pages.—Boston Journal.

We know of no book better calculated to interest and instruct the young than the fifty-two numbers of this popular illustrated weekly. It contains a vast amount of good reading of the most varied character. . . . All that the artist's skill can accomplish in the way of illustration has been done, and the best talent of the country has contributed to its text.—New England Journal of Education, Boston.

In no special field there is anything that can be compared with it.—Hartford Evening Post.

As for the pictures, they are beyond criticism, and show a thorough appreciation of the needs of the young people.—Indianapolis Herald.

For children the volume is simply a treasure-house of delightful things.—Philadelphia Bulletin.

There is entertainment enough in its eight hundred and odd pages of stories, sketches, poems, puzzles and pictures to fill up the evenings of a whole winter. It is good, wholesome entertainment, too, and will both amuse and interest the juveniles.—Philadelphia Inquirer.

Its wealth of stories, sketches, poetry, pictures, puzzles, and correspondence form a collection of substantial treasures the possession of which will make any boy or girl in the land "as happy as a king," and which, by reason of its moderate price, is within the reach of all who wish to have it at their command.—Baltimore Gazette.

In regard to pictorial excellence the best artists are represented in illustrations of all sizes and character.—School Journal, N. Y.

Harper's Young People is the best of all the weeklies for children.—Steaming Chronicle, St. Louis.

An inexhaustible reservoir of humor, instruction, and entertainment for the young people of the family. Its tone is unexceptional, and it will be found an admirable present for the juveniles.—Indianapolis Journal.

If we had a dozen children and could only buy one Christmas gift to be divided among them, our choice would certainly fall on this book that has so many beautiful pictures and quaint stories penned between its handsome covers, for it will give delight to the little four-year-old who cries out "I don't want a series to say 'Jacking Santa Claus'" as well as to the intellectual boy or girl who loves to read riddles, solve puzzles, laugh over funny stories and cry over sad ones. Long live Harper's Young People! say we.—New Orleans Picayune.

THE REPUBLICANS OF NEW YORK

THE division of the Republican party in New York during the last few years has been notorious, and the apparent unity of its Convention this year, in which its defeated faction was apparently supreme, is very perplexing to many observers elsewhere. But the explanation is not difficult. The root of the schism is in the system of party management. Nearly a sixth of the party vote was in the city of New York, where there are about 80,000 Republican voters. Nine-tenths of these voters were disfranchised at the primary meetings, which were wholly under the control of the district associations. These associations were composed of office-holders and professional politicians, and were the mere tools of a few leading office-holding politicians, who were in turn the parasites and instruments of the United States Senator. The associations sent about seventy delegates to the State Convention of about 450 members, so that, with the allies and dependents of the central ring throughout the State, the Convention was always practically in the hands of the ring or machine. The power of this machine was maintained by its strict organization, based upon patronage. The consequences of its ascendancy were seen in the venality and degradation of politics, and the rapid decline of the party.

The culmination of this contemptible system was reached in the attempted control of the GARFIELD administration by Mr. CONKLING. This at once revealed the exact situation to the party and the country. Mr. CONKLING was indignantly driven by the party from public life, and when his residuary legatees in the party endeavored a year ago to compass their ends by the old tricks, the effort ended in the most overwhelming defeat in our political annals. From that moment it was clear that the Republican party in New York would never rally again until a radical and fundamental change was made in the city organization, and until a Convention once more represented the free will of the party. For this purpose a reorganization was ordered which involved the dissolution of the associations. The machine succeeded in postponing the completion of the reorganization until after the late Convention and the selection of the State Committee for the next year. This it has accomplished. But the progress of reform in the party is, nevertheless, prodigious. After the coming election every Republican voter in the city will have an equal right in the primary, and the associations will be disbanded. By the passage of the reform bill the power of patronage and of assessments upon office-holders has been vitally impaired. By the decision of the National Convention, Presidential delegates will be elected in districts, and the slavish device of the unit rule has been abolished, and the late State Convention, with a machine majority of two-thirds, proposed and passed a resolution demanding the vigorous prosecution of civil service reform, which now means a specific system defined and regulated by law; and the same Convention ordered an inquiry looking to a vast extension of representation in Conventions.

Of course all these things are hateful to the "machine." But it can not help itself, and naturally it strives to save what it can. We observe that there is some disposition to think that nothing has been gained because the State Committee is a machine committee. But what can it do? Next spring the Presidential delegates will be elected by districts, and in every district of the city every anti-machine Republican can vote freely. He may also vote for a County Committee to take the place of the present Central Committee, and for an Assembly District Committee. The freedom which has been demanded has been obtained. The power of the State Committee to corrupt politics by controlling patronage is baffled, not only by the law, but by the indisposition of the President to become the Committee's agent—which has cost him the favor of a squad of Stalwarts—and by the advance of public opinion. It is very possible that the old machine does not care for success in the election of this autumn. But it has nothing to gain by defeat. Having the Committee, it has the official responsibility of the election. But all that is unimportant. The great result of the events of the last three or four years is that the Republican party is placed in the position of progress in which it naturally belongs. Its apparent subjugation by the machine control in 1876 nearly cost it its national ascendency. Its overthrow of that control in 1880 restored its power. The shameless effort to renew the control in New York in 1882 produced an adverse majority of 200,000. The Republican party may dissolve, but it will never bend its neck again to the yoke that it has broken. The power of the independent Republicans is now understood. If the machine should try any of its old tricks next year, it might play them successfully, but the Republican party would be annihilated by Republicans. Mr. DRAPER, one of the old and trusty machinists, has succeeded Mr JOHN F. SMYTH upon the State Committee. He is from the very citadel of Stalwartism. But Mr DRAPER says plainly, and with perfect truth, "The old way of managing politics, especially in the Republican party, must go, or the party itself must go." It is because this has come to be the general conviction of the party that its Convention was harmonious, and that the prospect of its national success next year is most promising.

THE PRICE OF DEMOCRATIC SUCCESS

THERE is but one thing which can be foreseen clearly as the result of Democratic success next year. The party leaders and press carefully avoid all declaration of its position upon any question of national policy. But one purpose they have boldly unveiled: should the Democrats succeed, there will be "a clean sweep" of the civil service. This, they say, is what they mean by reform. Any real reform, like that advocated by Mr PENDLETON, they frankly abjure, and Mr PENDLETON himself has paid the penalty of his advocacy of it by being repudiated by his own party associates in his own neighborhood. Mr. ABBETT, the Democratic candidate for Governor of New Jersey, announces that he shall reward his friends; and that droll Democratic personage, General DUMBER WARD, who roundly scolded the Ohio Convention for not nominating him instead of Judge HOADLY, and who told them that the only practical atonement they could make was to elect him to the Senate, also announces that reform means a clean sweep.

We are not unmindful of Democrats who are among the most earnest and able and persistent friends of reform, and to whose labors the reform is greatly indebted for its prosperous progress. But they would hardly claim that the Democratic party would carry out reform as they understand it, and as it is now enforced. There were Democrats who sustained the war for the Union unreservedly and in good faith. But the whole unorganized and organized opposition to it was Democratic. Mr. TILDEN and FERNANDO WOOD, each in his own way, sought to embarrass the Government. All the obstruction proceeded from the Democratic party, which, as a party, finally declared it to be a failure. The relation of the party to reform is the same. There are faithful and admirable Democratic reformers. But the tone of the party, as a party—a tone revealed in State platforms, in party speeches, and in party organs—is of the utmost hostility to reform. The Democratic party seeks power simply to seize the spoils. "Turn the rascals out," means only, Give us rascals a chance.

What the country has to gain by Democratic success, therefore, is a traffic in place such as was never known, and a consequent inconceivable corruption and demoralization, and which may well startle the country. During the Republican ascendency the country has seen an immense increase of places and of official emolument. But the Republican party has matured a scheme, that has become law, which opens the service to all parties upon equal terms, and prevents political corruption by means of patronage. If it be objected that it did not do this until the service was filled with Republicans, the reply is that the scheme contemplates the summary removal of all unfit officers, and that its essential purpose is disregard of party favor in selection. To undertake a political equalization would be to defeat the cardinal object of reform, while the natural changes in the service by removal, death, and resignation would result in filling the service without party preference. To this reform, not in general, but in the method already in operation, the Republican party is fully committed, no doubt with many a wry face and incredulous heart among its machine members, but with the profound conviction of its controlling intelligence. This unreserved committal, and the active Democratic hostility to reform, and the Democratic silence upon every other question, make this a distinct and commanding issue. The independent vote is essentially a reform vote, and the course of the Democratic party upon the question of administrative reform arrays this powerful vote against the Democratic candidate.

TWO DEMOCRATIC CONVENTIONS.

THE Democratic Convention of Massachusetts might properly be described as the BUTLER Convention. In that State there is no Democracy but Butlerism, and what Butlerism is, the Democratic papers from 1861 to 1875 constantly and contemptuously declared. The chief argument for his renomination which was urged in the hotels was that he is "picturesque," and attracts the people. The Democratic leaders cherish a touching confidence in the stupidity of the people. But they will learn some day, perhaps, that one of the chief reasons that the party has been so long out of power is its contempt of the popular intelligence. The American people are not such fools as the Democratic politicians suppose. Colonel CODMAN'S speech at the Republican Convention described General BUTLER'S political character and career in a way which every honest and intelligent voter can understand, and it expressed the view which such voters in Massachusetts take of his Excellency.

In the New York Democratic Convention the State administration machine had everything its own way. The expected contest over seats was skillfully avoided by the admission of the Tammany and Irving Hall delegations. The managers did not care to delay organization by a quarrel with Mr KELLY, who has proved his readiness and ability to defeat his party, but having admitted him and his "braves," and committed him to abide by the decision of the Convention, or appear in the rôle of a bolter and a disturber of Democratic harmony, they proceeded to put the "slate" nominations through without regard to his preferences. Mr. KELLY made no effort to conceal his chagrin; and it is evident that the action of the machine leaders has introduced a strong element of discord into Democratic councils.

The platforms of both the New York and Massachusetts Conventions are unimportant, because the Democratic party announces that it appeals to the country as a party of superior honesty. The rascals are to be turned out! Democracy means reform. This is the party platform as declared by its press, but intelligent voters are not likely to be deceived by its shallow sophistry and loud professions. As for the Democratic ticket nominated in New York, it will not be claimed that it is in any way superior to that of the Republicans, who have renominated the State officers, whose service has been most satisfactory. It is an apathetic year, and the vote will be light. The result will by no means foreshow that of next year, for in no State are changes so sudden and signal as in New York. But there is a prestige in success which should lead every man who believes that recent events show progress and reform to be much more certain under Republican than under Democratic ascendency to interest himself actively in the election of this year.

THE DEATH PENALTY.

A VALUABLE and interesting contribution to the debate upon capital punishment was made by Professor FRANCIS WAYLAND, president of the American Social Science Association, in opening the recent annual meeting at Saratoga. Professor WAYLAND is one of the students of penal science whose opinions have great authority, and the fact that a man who does not argue from emotion, but from a careful observation and from the collection of statistics, declares that the death penalty does not adequately incapacitate the convicted criminal from doing society further injury nor adequately deter others from following his example, gives very great weight to the argument for repeal of the death penalty.

The statistics cited by Professor WAYLAND are significant. In Massachusetts, during the years from 1800 to 1882, both inclusive, there were 170 trials for murder in the first degree. Twenty-nine persons were convicted of the crime so charged; twelve of the twenty-nine had their death sentences commuted to imprisonment for life; sixteen of the seventeen whose sentences were not commuted were hung, and one committed suicide before the day fixed for execution. In twenty-six cases verdicts of murder in the second degree were rendered. In 1852 Rhode Island abolished the death penalty. During the following thirty years there were seventeen convictions in twenty-seven trials for murder. In the English House of Commons it was stated in 1821, without contradiction, that during the twenty years between 1800 and 1881, for other crimes except murder, the number of committals in which there were convictions was seventy-six per cent., but for murder only forty-nine per cent. of which forty-six per cent. were reprieved. And in 1864 the Parliamentary Capital Punishment Commission was told by Lord Chancellor CRANWORTH that "juries wished to rid themselves of the responsibility of finding a man guilty of a capital offense," adding by way of illustration the case of a man "who was tried for murder attended with highway robbery, and acquitted, but was afterward tried for robbery, on precisely the same evidence, and convicted." Numerous cases were cited before the Commission by eminent members of the English bar to show that capital punishment often leads to the acquittal of guilty men.

Ex-Attorney-General TRAIN, of Massachusetts, says that the fear of causing the execution of an innocent man presses "with fearful power" upon a jury, and the reason of the small percentage of actual executions for murder is unquestionably the unwillingness of juries to convict. This is another form of the reason which Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY alleges for the constant acquittals under the severe English capital law of seventy and eighty years ago. In that case it was the sense of cruel disproportion between the offense and the penalty. In the modern instance it is the mingled fear of doing an irreparable wrong and doubt of the real efficacy of the punishment. Whatever the rightful and desirable objects of punishment for murder may be, Professor WAYLAND holds that they would be very much more certainly secured by imprisonment for life than by death. This point he argues with great ability. But imprisonment for life must be assured and absolute, and it must be without hope of pardon, by making release from confinement impossible until, before the court in which the prisoner was convicted, his innocence shall be established. Professor WAYLAND'S paper has very strong plea.

MR. LOWELL ON FIELDING

It was a very graceful act upon the part of the managers of the institution at Taunton, in England, which has just erected a bust of FIELDING, to invite the American Minister, who is also a distinguished author, to unveil it, and the address of Mr. LOWELL was worthy of the subject and of himself. He is always most happy in literary criticism and characterization, and nothing has been said of FIELDING which is more clearly discriminating than this address.

Undoubtedly in many passages FIELDING to-day unreadable. As Mr. LOWELL says, he is not to be commended pueris virginibusque. But he states the reason precisely in saying that it is not because he corrupts, but because he shocks. Our habits of speech and of writing do not permit such freedom. But we should have been as much shocked by the polite conversation of FIELDING'S time as we are by the free passages in his works. The story of the good old ladies at Olney to whom COWPER used to read what is not now thought tolerable to read shows how radically the fashion and taste of times change.

Mr. LOWELL ranks FIELDING as the real father of our novel of manners, and as a creative genius of the second order, leaving SHAKESPEARE and the few greatest poets in the first class. The excellence which they have in common is fidelity to truth, and the morality of their genius lies in its perfect confidence in truth. Smaller writers try to help out nature as a moral by making all sinners die to agony. But the power and interest of such writers are gone the moment that it is clear that all sinners do not die in agony. One great value of Mr. LOWELL'S capital address is that it will lead to a little closer inquiry into the nature of morality in literature.

SOME SUNDAY-SCHOOL SUCCESSES.

THE secretary of the New York Civil Service Reform Association announces that the association is ready to aid the public authorities in the prosecution of any citizen, Republican or Democrat, who may attempt to violate the State law against the swindle known as political assessments. The secretary will be glad to receive at his office, No. 4 Pine Street, any evidence that may aid in securing the conviction of offenders.

The provision of the State law upon this subject is much more stringent than that of the national law, and is well worthy the careful consideration of all committees, treasurers of committees, and bosses of high or low degree, who may be contemplating the little game of assessment. This is the law:

"SECTION 16. No person shall directly or indirectly solicit or receive, or be in any manner concerned in soliciting or receiving, any assessment, subscription, contribution, or pledge, for any political purpose whatever, from any officer or from any person receiving, or entitled to receive, a salary from the State, or from any county, city, town, village, or political division of the State, as fees for the discharge of any public duty, nor from any member of any public Police Department, or Fire or other department, within this State, or any of the political divisions thereof, nor from any person officially connected with the system of public instruction in this State, or in any of the political divisions thereof."

It is not "any officer" or "any employé," but "any person," who is prohibited from trying the swindle. And the penalty for violation of the law is a fine of not less than $50, and not more than $1000, or imprisonment for six months, or both.

This curbs of Sunday-school politics. Here is a mammy-mammy interference with the natural right of bosses to pick the pockets of employés, a feminine regard for honesty and fair play, an unmercenary and sentimental concern for common decency. Senator MAHONE is dexterously trying to put his hand through the lines of the national law without hitting them. But the New York law is solid. The Sunday-school took advantage of Mr. JOHN F. SMYTH'S absence from Albany, and effectual prohibition of this meanest kind of swindling is the result.

A DANGEROUS CHALLENGE.

SENATOR MCPHERSON, of New Jersey, is a distinguished Democratic leader who was invited to preside at the late New Jersey Democratic Convention. The spirit and the ability with which he does his part of the great work of Democratic reform are shown by a remark in his opening address. He said of the party of LINCOLN, SUMNER, and SEWARD, "it has been in power over twenty years, and bribery, fraud, and thievery compose its only record." From a co-partisan of the TWEED Ring, the Cipher Dispatches, Tammany Hall, BUTLER, and the Maryland Democratic performances exposed by Governor HAMILTON, this seems to be a strong statement.

It is one of the remarks which display in the most ludicrous light the Democratic claim of reform. Democratic speakers and newspapers evidently suppose that a party can succeed by wholesale vituperation of its opponents, and that the most crushing epithets and loudest lungs will carry the day. Their chief reliance for some time was upon DORSEY'S storm. But the contempt with which the country received them has been disconcerting. The one thing which the Democratic party has to fear is remonstrance, and it is a singularly stupid blunder to challenge the comparative record of the two parties. Yes this is what the New Jersey Senator has done. His sweeping assertion that the history of the last twenty years in this country is one unalleviated waste of fraud and theft shows how very little patriotism and wisdom and national pride and accuracy of memory may be found in a Senator of the United States.

The last twenty years are by far the proudest and most illustrious epoch of American history, and it is the epoch of Republican ascendency. The previous thirty years constituted the most degrading epoch of that history, and it was that of the dominance of Senator MCPHERSON'S party. The preservation of the Union was not fraud; emancipation was not bribery; the maintenance of the national credit was not thievery. These things were done while Senator MCPHERSON'S party, as a party, declared the war a failure, and denounced interference with slavery, and while Democrats supplied the ranks of the paper-money party. The memory of patriotism in like the boy's thoughts, which are "long, long thoughts." The country does not forget, nor, as it surveys the achievements of the last twenty years, does it cry, with Senator MCPHERSON, "Thievery! thievery!" That proud remembrance will not indeed prevail against party anodynes, but it will incline the popular heart to demand ample credentials of better conduct from any party which would supersede that whose services have been so beneficent.

PERILS OF HOME TRAVEL.

THE evident recklessness with which the Riverdale steamer was certified to be safe has naturally excited a great deal of carnally among that part of the suburban population which depends upon ferries for access to the city to know the condition of the boats to which it is obliged to trust itself. The testimony of JOHN MCCULLOM at the investigation was rather startling for the suburban residents, for with the air of an accomplished expert he specified boats which in his opinion were extremely unsafe. Among these was the Staten Island ferry-boat Westfield, whose boilers he had been employed to patch, and whose naggardly owners, he said, would not permit him to repair them effectually, so that now he did not consider them to be secure.

As the Westfield and the other boats of that ferry have recently passed into new hands, it was a very interesting question for Staten-Islanders who travel by the Westfield every day to know whether the new owners were aware of the alleged insecurity of the boat. We see by the Island papers that the owners lost no time in determining the matter. They applied to Messrs. COBANK & THRALL, the makers of the boiler of the Westfield, and they promptly examined it, and reported unreservedly that it was entirely safe, that it had never been necessary to replace it, and that it was always kept in the best order. It appeared also that MCCULLOM is not a first-class workman. The superintendent of the ferry also states that he personally regularly examines and tests the boilers.

In this case, therefore, there would seem to be no reason for apprehension. But there is always occasion for the most careful scrutiny and care. There is plenty of proof of criminal negligence in the supervision of the ferries and railroads that lead to the city; and, as we lately pointed out, nobody is punished for the slaughter which periodically occurs.

PERSONAL.

WHEN off the stage SALVINI impresses one as entirely lacking in that subtlety which so distinguishes him on the boards. Neither his conversation nor his face suggests in the slightest degree the delicate and fine intellectual resources of his interpretation of Conrad or Othello. Great as an actor, as a man he seems ordinary, save for his size.

—A New York merchant who returned last week from a visit to Europe was most impressed when passing near Washington Market, where the pavements abound in baskets of peaches, grapes, plums, and Bartlett pears. "It does me good," he said, "to see the fruit. In Europe there is nothing like it—nothing to compare with the abundance of it and the beauty of it."

—The Rev. Dr. EDWIN F. HATFIELD, late Moderator of the Presbyterian General Assembly, and for many years a well-known clergyman of the Presbyterian Church in this city, died of heart-disease, September 22, at his home in Summit, New Jersey. He was born in Elizabeth, New Jersey, in 1807, was graduated from Middlebury (Vermont) College in 1829, and in 1833 from the Andover Theological Seminary. In the latter year he took charge of the Seventh Presbyterian Church of St. Louis. He became pastor of the Seventh Presbyterian Church, at Broome and Ridge streets, in this city, in 1835, and during his administration the membership was near one thousand. Dr. HATFIELD was called to the North Presbyterian Church in 1850, and was its pastor until 1863, when he became financial agent of the Union Theological Seminary. A portrait of Dr. HATFIELD was given in HARPER'S WEEKLY for June 2 of this year.

—The number of young artists who have had a thorough training in the art schools of Paris and other European cities is much larger to this metropolis than ever before, and though they can not sell all the studio pictures they paint, their services in the decoration of the exterior and interior of private residences are likely to become extremely remunerative. Work like that done recently by Mr. WALTER SHIELS in the frieze of Mr. D. O. MILLS'S dining-room, and by Mr. FRANCIS LATHROP, Mr. W. H. LOW, and Mr. MAITLAND ARMSTRONG in other houses, is interesting not only in itself, but as indicative of a new and promising field for our best native artistic talent.

—It was two hundred years ago that Vienna was delivered from the Turkish siege, and on the last anniversary of that memorable occasion a memorial stone was unveiled on a neighboring hill, inscribed with the words: "From these heights, on the morning of the 12th of September, 1683, JOHN ROMANUS SOBIESKI, King of Poland, the Imperial Lieutenant-General Duke CHARLES OF LORRAINE, the Electoral Princes JOHN GEORGE KÖNIGEN of Saxony and MAX EMANUEL of Bavaria, Prince GEORGE FREDERICK of Waldeck, the Margraves BRANDT and LOUIS WILLIAM of Baden, and other commanders, descended with the troops of the Emperor LEOPOLD ROMANUS, and with German and Polish auxiliary forces, to the battle for the delivery of the city of Vienna, which had been sorely distressed through a siege of sixty-one days by the Turkish army." Vienna despises the Turks nowadays.

—A number of tenants recently evicted from Colonel HAM'S estate, near Tipperary, Ireland, applied for out-door relief to the guardians of the poor. They were in wretched condition, and compelled at night to shelter themselves with boughs of trees and to sleep in the ditches. The guardians refused their application.

—The Khedive of Egypt sleeps five hours nightly, omits the usual siesta, and works sixteen hours daily. He recently visited an Egyptian hospital which had no doors, no doors, no windows, holes in the roof large enough to admit a man, and general destitution enough to shock a brute. This hospital is described by the European doctor who is in charge of it as "better than most of the hospitals in Egypt."

—Telegrams from all the principal parts of the Russian Empire, from the Caucasus, the Crimea, Siberia, and Poland, testify in warm terms of the affection in which the great novelist TOURGUENEFF was held by his nation. In the universities and chief schools of Russia arrangements are making to perpetuate his memory by founding scholarships—a tribute never before paid to a novelist.

—The awful infant mortality and the enormous proportion of illegitimate births in the West Indies are said to be due not to any actual or innate immoral disposition of the black race, nor to the black woman's want of care of her offspring, but to the scarcity and bad quality of the food, and to the want of proper homes.

—An English clergyman writes that there are four thousand unemployed clergymen in the Church of England, many of whom are both able and willing to work, but who can not find anything to do. "The fact is, a clergyman past forty finds it year by year increasingly difficult to get employment. Younger men are preferred." Yet "experienced men would do far more good in country parishes than these junior brethren."

—The Comte de Chambord's will began as follows: "I die a good Christian and a Catholic. I feel no hatred for any one. I forgive all those who have injured me, and I beg all those whom I may have wronged in any way to pardon me. I pray Almighty God to save my soul."

—Miss Booth, of the Salvation Army, was forbidden to hold services in Geneva. She visited the order twice in twenty-four hours, was arrested in each instance, and conducted by the police to the frontier of the canton.

—It may be pleasant for the members of the late Co-operative Dress Association of this city to learn that at the sixth annual meeting of the Ladies' Dress Association (limited) of London there were no angry discussion, no scene of disorder, and assertions that the value of the stock had been considerably overestimated, and that the stockholders had not yet received any dividends.

—Riders of bicycles are sometimes in peril. A half-dozen of them were riding down Threadneedle Street, London, a few days ago, when a horse attached to a wagon slipped on the asphalt pavement, and in falling caught his leg in the wheel of one of the bicycles, throwing the rider as heavily as to render him unconscious. The next rider, unable to stop his machine, rode on to the prostrate animal, which kicked him violently, breaking his right thigh and right arm.

—A fairy "tea service" of very diminutive proportions has been made by a German manufacturer, and presented to the German Crown Prince. The tea-tray was beaten out of an old Prussian coin the size of a copper cent. The tea-pot was made of a coin half the size of a cent, and its cover of a coin one-quarter that size. All the pieces are so wrought that one can easily recognize each coin, either from the inscription or from the arms stamped upon it.

—A Roman house has been discovered in France, in the Department of the Drôme, about five feet below the surface of the ground. Its floor was of mosaic, and fragments of the bases and capitals of small Doric pillars were found in place. Among the debris were pieces of black and red pottery, of wine vessels, and of bones of domestic animals that had been used for food or for sacrifice. There were also some box-wood pins used by Roman ladies for fastening their hair.

—A gipsy king was arrested recently in Warwickshire. He, his son, daughters, and grandchildren—altogether about one hundred persons—have led a wandering life in four large caravans for many years. His offense was an assault upon a pound-keeper. It took eight policemen to capture him.

—A bedroom steward of the Cunard steam-ship Servia was sent to jail for six months for stealing a pocket-book from a passenger on board the vessel. The pocket book contained a letter of credit for $70,000, two drafts for $250 each, one draft for $126, and several bills of exchange for $6000 each. The theft was committed while the passenger was asleep in his berth, and the thief was detected by his effort to negotiate one of the drafts at a Liverpool pawnbroker's.

—Mr. ANDREW H. GREEN, while talking to a friend recently, recalled with animation some incidents of the days of his Comptrollership during the TWEED régime, when "for two years the only government the city had was to the Comptroller's office," and when he sat in the Board of Apportionment in the company of such choice spirits as TWEED, SWEENY, HALL, and CONNOLLY. The history of that period, he said, has never been written. Mr. GREEN has been urged very strongly of late to commit some of his recollections to paper. This number of times that his life was in danger is doubtless calculated to warn him in himself, for a description of some of them would be very interesting reading.

—Life at Homburg, says the Saturday Review, is very much like life at any other German bath. It is the usual routine of drinking and bathing, enlivened by listening to bands and gossip—a monotonous kind of existence, delightful to some and dreadfully oppressive to others. As a general rule, the healing springs in which sick folks are bidden wash and be clean lie in stifling valleys where the air is as relaxing that it can not assist, if it does not positively retard, the work of restoration. But Homburg lies on the open hill-side, and has a constant supply of fresh bracing air. The town is said to contain eight thousand inhabitants, but the impression left on the mind of the casual visitor is that there is no town independent of the visitors.

—"The author in the far West of America," says the London Times, "has left all that he most dearly values behind him, if he be a man of education and refined tastes. He has, indeed, a waterproof roof over his head, with an abundance of coarse and monotonous fare. But he abandons indefinitely the pleasures of congenial society. Even the agriculturist is 'crowded up' by rough neighbors, and the cattle-breeder must fall back on the company of his cow-boys. It is all very well for a man in the vigor of his youth, exhilarated by the pleasures of hope, and overflowing with high animal spirits, to tunnel in a hovel and pass long days in the saddle. But no years go on, and he suspects that age is stealing upon him, he begins to fret over the horrible essence that really amounts to heart-breaking failure. Marriage, of course, is out of the question, unless he marries so far beneath him that he might almost as well have mated with an Indian squaw. Those undeniable facts must be looked fairly in the face by any one who thinks of turning to account his energy and small means by pushing his fortunes in the far West of America"—or, we may add, in any new country whatsoever.

of last year, and Governor CLEVELAND's administration, was unanimously adopted. The nomination of candidates began with a bitter and prolonged contest between the "machine" candidate for Secretary of State, Mr MAYNARD, and Mr KELLY's. It resulted in the nomination of the former by a vote of 207 to 182. Mr KELLY left the hall as soon as Mr PURCELL's defeat became apparent. His followers remained to see the fight out; but it was evident that the "machine" candidates would be put through.

The head of the ticket, Mr ISAAC H. MAYNARD, is a lawyer by profession, and he has been a Democrat ever since he entered public life. He was born in Bovina, Delaware County, this State, April 9, 1838. He was graduated from Amherst College in 1862, and was admitted to the bar in the following year. Since 1865 he has lived in Stamford, and practiced both law and politics. He served as Supervisor, and as President of that town for several years, and was first elected a member of the Assembly in 1875. He was re-elected in 1876.

Mr ALFRED C. CHAPIN, candidate for the position of State Comptroller, was born at South Hadley, Massachusetts, on the 8th of March, 1846. After attending various public and private schools, he was admitted to Williams College in 1865, and graduated in 1869. On completing the regular course at the Harvard Law School, Mr CHAPIN was admitted to the New Hampshire bar. A year later he removed to Brooklyn, and was admitted to the New York bar. In 1881 he was elected to the Assembly, re-elected the following year, and was chosen Speaker. He is among the youngest of those who have held that position.

Mr ROBERT A. MAXWELL, candidate for re-election as State Treasurer is a little over forty years of age, and resides at Batavia, where he has large business interests. He is a farmer's son, and was born in Washington County. Graduating at the Albany Normal School, he entered upon teaching, at the age of eighteen, in Greenwich, New York. Afterward he taught school in Kenosha, Wisconsin, but later on he went to Chicago, and engaged in the

AT BUFFALO.

THE New York Democratic State Convention was organized in the New Music Hall at Buffalo on the 27th ult., with the Hon. ATHOLL C. CHAPIN as temporary chairman. It was evident from the first that the "slate" which had been prepared by the State Committee, with the possible exception of Mr. KELLY's candidate for the position of Secretary of State, Mr PURCELL, would be nominated. In spite of the general desire for "harmony," there was evidently a very bitter feeling against Mr KELLY in the minds of the [illegible] Democracy. His power was acknowledged to be too great to admit of the exclusion of the Tammany delegation, and the necessity of placating their chief was proof to appointment to their opponents. Tammany was therefore admitted, with an allowance of twenty-four delegates. Two were given to Irving Hall. The County Democracy was, however, declared, by a large majority, to be the regular organization. The platform, which reaffirms that

CHAPTER XVIII.

I GET INTO DOCTRINAL COMPANY.

For a week or more all Frauenschöhne could talk of nothing but the exploit of which Lady Constance had been the heroine, and I—at a respectful distance—the hero. The newspapers commented upon this latest instance of English eccentricity in terms half flattering, half ironical, while among the rank and file of Lady Constance's admirers the share which I had taken in it was naturally the subject of some envy and jealousy. Herr Von Schortzheim and Herr Von Pfortzheim, of the Body-Guard, proposed, indeed, to mount their chargers and sally forth to the Friedensberg without delay to vindicate the honor of Suabian horsemanship, and had accepted the offer of three to one, laid by Herr Von Sportzholm of the same regiment, that they would not get from Frauenschöhne to the top of the hill and back again within the two hours, when their order was quenched by a direct prohibition from King Rudolf, who had got wind of the affair, and gave it to be distinctly understood that such acts of headlong folly were by no means to his taste.

At the first court ball of the season, which was given soon afterward, a mild rebuke was addressed to myself from the same exalted quarter. His Majesty, after opening the proceedings according to usage by leading a stately polonaise, in which all the high dignitaries of the realm took part, was pleased to pause before me and to inform me that he had heard of my escapade. "Ché en fous en fais pas num gomblitments, monsieur," said he, in the remarkable dialect then affected at German courts, and he went on to point out how guilt pitiable would have been my position if a life full of promise, usefulness, and charm had been cut short through my heedless conduct. "I, for one, could with difficulty have brought myself to pardon you," he said.

Considering that it was Lady Constance who had involved the aforesaid valuable life and my worthless one in a common peril, this strictures seemed hardly merited; but I bowed my head beneath it in silence, and the worthy old gentleman, thinking perhaps that he had been too hard upon me, singled me out for some flattering marks of favor later in the evening. Upon the whole, I benefited by a hat had occurred in more ways than one. Among the Schortzheims and the Pfortzheims I obtained the reputation of a dare-devil fellow who would stick at nothing; the ladies, both native and foreign, made a lion of me in a small way, and, what was far better, Lady Constance became greatly softened in her manner toward me when we were alone. She was sorry for me, I thought; and if that was not much to have gained, it was at any rate better than nothing.

Let a man be never so hopeless and forlorn, he can not in early youth very well keep himself from occasional lapses into high spirits, and candor compels me to acknowledge that I did not at this time find the world an gloomy or I felt it my duty to do. Pemberton, the first attaché, who returned from leave in the beginning of the winter, proved to be an old school-fellow, a few years my senior, of whom I had known something at Eton, and we soon became fast friends. Pemberton was not in love with Lady Constance, which was a comfort. He was a cheery, brusk little fellow, who flattered about Frauenschöhne in pursuit of pleasure day and night, and gathered honey from a great variety of flowers. Under his able guidance I improved my knowledge of German life and manners in other than court and aristocratic circles, and spent many a merry evening among the bourgeoisie, or in the Bierhallen where the students congregated, and where the atmosphere was on thick with smoke that noon could hardly see one's opposite neighbor.

These Bierhallen varied in rank and respectability, some depending for their attraction entirely upon beer and music, others holding out baits of a less innocent kind, while one at least was little better than a gambling hell. It was at the latter establishment that I chanced one evening to meet with an adventure which in the sequel bore productive of permanent and serious influences upon my life. I sat alone, for Pemberton had gone to a ball to which I had not been invited, and I strolled into this place merely to fill up the evening, not to play baccarat or roulette—the company being usually composed of persons whom one felt more inclined to watch than to sit down to a card table with. It was a long, low-pitched, dirty room, crowded with noisy people, some of whom were playing billiards, some dominoes, while the majority smoked, drank beer, and looked on. Sometimes a good deal of high play took place in this shady retreat; but on that occasion the gambling element was represented only by a group of four men in a corner, who were cutting and shuffling in philosophic indifference to the hubbub that was going on around them. The noise, the foul air, and the anomalous tame character of the proceedings would soon have driven me away, if I had not gradually become interested in these four card-players—or at least in one of them. In the first place, he was an Englishman, and that of itself would have been enough to excite my curiosity, for Englishmen were not common in Frauenschöhne in those days. He was a pale, fair-complexioned, rather dissipated-looking man, whose age might have been five-and-thirty, or thereabouts. He wore a mustache, which led me to set him down as either a cavalry officer or a swamp; but I inclined to the former belief, partly because he had the appearance of being a gentleman, and partly because, after watching him and his friends for a time, I shrewdly suspected that he had fallen among thieves. His three companions were foreigners of a type which it was easy enough to classify. Every now and again I caught them exchanging a significant glance or a scarcely perceptible nudge. Evidently they were having a fine time of it; and evidently also my unfortunate compatriot was not quite in a condition to look after his own interests. The hand which lifted his glass of brandy and water to his lips was deplorably unsteady; he was making efforts to concentrate his muddled brains upon the game which would have been comical if they had not been rather melancholy to witness; and the puzzled frown with which he regarded the three rogues showed that he had a foggy idea that all was not as it should be. I always felt that disreputable Englishmen had a special claim upon my sympathies, for I had not yet given up the notion that I might some day recognize my cousin Harry in the person of one of them; added to which, it seemed extremely likely that there would be a row before very long. So I thought I would stay where I was, and see what would come of it all.

My expectations were not disappointed. The Englishman, who, instead of growing more tipsy, had apparently recovered possession of his faculties as the evening advanced, detected at last a hot on double had been going on the whole time. He brought his hand sharply down upon the wrist of the dealer, who was sitting next to him, forced the cards out of the man's fingers, and glancing at them, remarked, quietly, "I thought as much! Now you will be so good as to hand me back the money you have stolen from me."

The sharpers knew better than to comply with this modest request. The whole three of them started to their feet and began storming and vociferating; a crowd collected round the table; the proprietor of the establishment came running up to entreat the gentlemen to finish their dispute outside and not to put him into trouble by quarrelling on the premises; and in a few minutes the disturbers of the peace were jostled to the door and ejected, the Englishman still clutching to his man like grim death. The time for justifiable intervention seemed to have come. I pushed my way through the crowd, and, on emerging into the street, found my luckless countryman in a sorry plight. Two of his friends had vanished, but the third had got him down upon his back and was diligently pounding his head against the hard stones. To free him from his assailant was a matter of an great difficulty, but, unfortunately, while I was bending over him and inquiring whether he was much hurt, the swindler decamped with the spoil.

The Englishman got up, gasping, but not much the worse for his rough treatment, and then, before we had time to exchange a word, up came a policeman, and, with the greatest presence of mind, took us both into custody for public brawling. In vain I assured this wooden-headed functionary that he had saddled the wrong horse; in vain I gave him my name and address, warning him that he would arrest me at his own proper peril; he refused to be reasoned with. He had taken me in the act, he averred, and anything that we might have to say in our defense must be said to his superiors next day. So, as I really could not consent to be locked up, I was compelled reluctantly to take the law into my own hands. It being advisable on all grounds to avoid needless violence, I contented myself with jerking Dogberry's legs from under him, and depositing him very comfortably in a heap of mud, and while he lay there bellowing lustily, my fellow-prisoner and I betted down the street like lamplighters. Whether he gave chase or not I don't know, but we saw no more of him. We darted swiftly through the narrow by-ways of the old town, where our capture had been effected, and when we reached the public gardens and the Neustadt, which quarter represents the Mayfair of Frauenschöhne, we felt ourselves tolerably safe.

However, it was just as well not to linger area he that has dangerous neighborhood, and as my companion appeared to think. "I'm very much obliged to you," said he, breathlessly, "but it won't do for us to stand here and say polite things. See you again, I hope. I'm staying at the Rhinischer Hof, and my name is Chapman. Good-night, and many thanks."

He hurried away as he spoke, and I thought I could not do better than follow his example. I was soon sound asleep, and it was not until I awoke and was indulging in an amused retrospect of last night's scuffle that it occurred to me that I had done a rather stupid thing re giving my name to the insulted policeman. This impression was disagreeably confirmed some hours later, when a message was brought to the Chancellerie requesting my immediate attendance upon my chief. Pemberton, to whom I had related the events of the previous evening, remarked, cheerfully, "Now you're going to catch it," and I went upstairs feeling very much as I had been used to do in by-gone days when told to "stay after twelve" for an interview with the head master.

I found Lord Rossan in his study, sitting behind a table loaded with blue-books and dispatch-boxes. He had intrenched himself, as it were, in a strong position; he had put on a black coat, and his countenance wore the expression of austere dignity which befits the envoy of a great nation. From all these portents I gathered that a severe wigging was in store for me, and the ear-caustic "Well, Mr. Maxwell!" with which my entrance was saluted was anything but re-assuring.

I said I believed I had been sent for.

"And I presume," Lord Rossan remarked, "that you expected to be sent for. Really I am at a loss to understand what can have been your motive for conducting yourself as you did last night, unless, indeed, you are ambitious of being dismissed from her Majesty's service with ignominy."

I replied that I was not aware of having done anything as yet to justify such extreme measures.

"Oh, indeed! you don't think you have gone far enough? Then let me advise you to continue as you have begun, and you will probably arrive at the desired result. Make some more public disturbances in gambling saloons, mix yourself up with a few more gangs of swindlers, knock down another policeman or two, and then come to me and ask me to recommend you for promotion."

"I didn't knock him down," said I, feebly; "I only laid him upon his back."

"You don't say so! That, of course, makes all the difference. Unfortunately, however, the Chief of the Police, who has just called upon me to lodge a serious complaint against you, is hardly likely to appreciate these subtle distinctions at their proper value. I suppose you are aware that, if you had not happened to be attached to the staff of the British Legation, you would be at this moment in prison upon a charge of having assaulted the police in the execution of their duty."

Under the circumstances, it seemed to be rather a fortunate thing that I was attached to the staff of the British Legation, and although I did not say this, the thought that was passing through my mind was probably legible upon my features, for Lord Rossan continued:

"It is true that your position and mine have preserved you from penal consequences so far as this country is concerned, but whether you will find that a matter for personal congratulation is another question. You do an appeal to have taken into consideration what is nevertheless a very certain fact, that I am responsible for those who act under me, and that, if it bring discredit upon me, I have very little choice but to dispense with their services."

I was really a good deal frightened by this time. "Will you allow me to give my version of the affair?" I asked, humbly.

"I shall be delighted," answered Lord Rossan, "only I must tell you that nothing can extenuate offenses of this kind. It is the mere A B C of your duty to keep out of rows, and more particularly out of street rows. However, pray go on, I am all attention."

I then gave a circumstantial account of what had happened, or the end of which Lord Rossan professed himself unable to see in what way I had improved my case. "The question," he observed, "is not whether the man was right in arresting you, still less whether you were justified in breaking away from him. Your fault consisted in getting into a row at all, and, as I told you before, that is a fault which, from the nature of the case, admits of no excuse."

Nevertheless, I had detected a twitching about the muscles of his cheek, and a quickly suppressed twinkle in the corner of his eye, which led me to hope that his luck would prove worse than his bite. "In point of fact, Maxwell," he went on presently, in a more friendly tone, "you have only been plea to offer, the plea of inexperience, and that I am ready to accept. You will not be able to bring it forward a second time, remember. Remember also in future that you are not exactly a free agent here, and that you can not damage your own reputation without in some measure damaging mine, as well as that of your nation."

He resumed, after a short pause: "I may perhaps add that when a man is in low places of resort, one is, or ought to be, especially cautious about speaking to strangers, and that if one is unfortunate enough to fall into the hands of the police, one is not such an infernal ass—ahem!—I or you should not be so impervious to all the promptings of common-sense—as to make known one's identity."

I admitted that I had done foolishly in this particular, and expressed my sincere contrition, and Lord Rossan, who perhaps found it rather difficult to re-assume an air of judicial severity after his little slip of the tongue, ended by laughing good humoredly. "Don't do it again, that's all," he said. "As for your friend, whose name, luckily for himself, has not transpired, you may tell him from me that I am delighted to think he has been robbed of his money, and that I trust he will lose no time in removing himself from Frauenschöhne."

I did not think it necessary to deliver this message verbatim; but I communicated the substance of it to Mr Chapman, whom I sought out at his hotel later in the day, and who did not seem to attach much importance to it. Seen in the light of day, Mr Chapman was an older, paler, and somewhat more debauched looking person than he had appeared the night before, but, to set against these disadvantages, he had a pleasant voice, and there was something peculiarly taking in his manner. He thanked me warmly for my timely assistance, said how sorry he was that my good-nature should have got me into trouble, and then gave a laughing explanation of the predicament in which I had found him. "I only arrived here yesterday, and I picked up those fellows in the train. The more fool I, you'll say."

"They were such very evident swindlers," I remarked, rather surprised that a man of his age should have been so easily taken in.

"Oh dear yes; but I had seen something from them to start with, and I didn't know what to do with myself in the evening; so I let them entice me into that den of thieves. They dragged me, of course; you must have seen that for yourself. But even so, I ought not to have allowed myself to be done out of my money in such a stupid way. However, it's gone now; so there's no use in bothering about it."

"You take it very good-humoredly," I could not help remarking. He was lounging in an arm chair before the fire, and looked the personification of easy contentment.

"Well, yes," he said. "One may unveil the inevitable in that way as in any other."

After a short silence I asked him whether he proposed to remain long in Frauenschöhne, to which he replied that he really didn't know; it would depend upon circumstances. "I believe," he added, "that a friend of mine is staying here—Lady Constance Nibor, whom of course you know, or she is a sister of Lord Rossan's. Can you tell me her address?"

She has rooms at the Legation," I answered, and with that absurd jealousy which every fresh person who obtained acquaintance with Lady Constance stirred up in my breast, I scrutinized Mr. Chapman's small, prettyish features and sandy, what effeminate type of countenance, concluding comfortably that he was not her style at all.

"What—in the house itself? That's rather unfortunate," said he, smiling. "I suppose it mustn't venture to call upon her, then. Lord Rossan would probably think it his duty to have me summarily ejected."

"I see quite sure he wouldn't do that," replied; "but Lady Constance has her own rooms which he never enters, and she is always at home about ten o'clock. I shall be looking in there presently, we might walk down together, if you like."

Mr Chapman hesitated. "Oh, I am in no hurry," he said, "any time will do." But presently he seemed to think better of it, and said he would go with me.

"I suppose, at whatever time I go, I shall find her surrounded by a crowd," he observed.

I admitted that this was highly probable, and hazarded the conjecture that he had known Lady Constance for some time.

"Yes, for several years," he replied. "She is a—a lady who has a large acquaintance."

Somehow I did not think that his sentence had been originally intended to end in that way, and I wondered what he had been going to say, and why a suspicion of a snile fluttered about his lips for a minute or two. But he did not gratify my curiosity. He began to talk about Frauenschöhne and its resources, and about German characteristics generally, chatting pleasantly enough upon those subjects for a quarter of an hour, after which we sallied across the public garden, and entered the Legation together.

As usual, a little group of visitors was assembled in the semi-obscurity of Lady Constance's drawing-room, where the candles had not yet been lighted. They were all sitting round the fire, listening to an anecdote about the latest marvel Empress Eugénie, which one of the French attachés was relating, and Lady Constance seemed to hear the end of it before she rose from her chair. She greeted the new arrival in the customary manner, as if she had seen him the day before. "How do you do? You and Mr Maxwell have been distinguishing yourselves, I hear. At least I presume you are the unknown English man of the adventure." Asl, without waiting for his reply, she returned to her place, and one of the French conversation which our entrance had hardly, he said to have interrupted.

Mr Chapman was perhaps accustomed to his ways; at any rate, he did not show any sign of being disconcerted by his reception. He found a chair for himself just outside the circle, and waited patiently. After a time I noticed that he had drawn nearer to Lady Constance, and that under cover of general conversation they were having a colloquy which, judging by the earnestness of his manner and the close attention with which she listened to him, had some interesting matter for the subject. It did not last very long, and when he had finished what he had to say he got up and quietly withdrew. The other visitors dropped off one by one, and at length I found myself sitting opposite my hostess, who had taken out some ivory tablets and a pencil, and was apparently making rapid calculations by the fire light.

Presently she looked up, and remarked: "I suppose are getting on. Mr brother tells me he has given any one such a lecture for years as he gave you this morning. It seems to have been rather deserved, too."

I said I didn't see that at all. Why I do often a man to be half murdered before one eyes?

"You ought not to go to places where you are likely to be half murdered, and rather than compromise your career, you ought to shun the Chapmans on the world to be quite sure of it."

"Poor Chapman! And in said you were a friend of his?"

"Did he? That was pretty cool of him. It seemed thoughtless, though, I don't know why I shouldn't call me his friend if he likes. I don't claimed."

"Who is he?" I asked.

"Really," said Lady Constance, "I don't know you who he is; I never thought of inquiring. I know what he is."

"And what is that?"

"Well, as far as his dealings with me are concerned, he is a sort of tout."

"A tout?"

"I mean an individual who picks up information for me and gives me tips about the money market. I must say for him that he has never rendered me valuable services at different times."

"So that, perhaps, is to entitled to call himself your friend, after all."

"Oh, I make it worth his while, of course. If I win, he gets his share of the plunder; if I lose, he is none the worse off. Sometimes he makes mistakes, but as a rule he is to be depended upon. I could have made a fortune through him more than once if I had only the capital enough to work upon, or pluck enough to work without it."

"But why doesn't he make his own fortune? If he has such opportunities?" I asked.

"I suppose because he has neither capital nor pluck; but I don't know much about him."

"I am sorry he turns out to be such a bad fellow," said I, musingly. "I rather took to him; I thought he seemed to be like a gentleman."

"I dare say he is a gentleman," Lady Constance said; "indeed, I should think he probably was a gentleman by birth. I can't agree with you in liking him, though. He strikes me as a poor-spirited creature, and I fancy, by the look of him, that he drinks."

"I wish—" I began, and then checked myself.

"What do you wish? But I know. You wish I could keep clear of relations with such shady characters. Ah! so do I, for the matter of that; but necessity has no law. Everybody, they say, must swallow a peck of dirt before he dies. I know many great and good people who swallow whole bushels of dirt, and look as if they liked it. If you must needs put on your wishing-cap, wish that I may be able to like it. You couldn't do me a greater kindness."

THE VALLEY OF THE UPPER MISSISSIPPI.

The character of the scenery along the valley of the Upper Mississippi is so entirely different from that along the southern division of the same great waterway as to excite constant surprise in the mind of the traveller who, from the deck of an up-river steamboat, views it for the first time. Instead of the dark bayous and vast stretches of low sedge-land or flat savanna which form the predominating features of the lower river, the upper valley is filled with bold bluffs of limestone and sandstone, crowned with dark cedars, and worn by the elements into most fantastic forms. The explorer Schoolcraft, who discovered Lake Itasca in 1832, in writing of this upper valley, says:

"It is bounded on each side by corresponding bluffs of calcareous rocks which attain a general elevation of four hundred feet, and throw an interest over the scene which prairies and forests, woody islands and winding channels, beautiful and picturesque as they certainly are, must fail to create. It is to these bluffs, now standing into spiral columns, naked and crumbling, now sloping into grassy hills, or intersected by lateral valleys, here grouped in the fantastic forms of some antiquated battlement mocking the ingenuity of man, there stretching as far as the eye can reach in a perpendicular wall, but ever varying, pleasing and new, that the valley of the Upper Mississippi owes its grandeur and magnificence. Its broad and glittering channel, its sunflower prairies and aspiring forests of flowering shrubs and animated [illegible], serve to fill up and give effect to the imposing outline so boldly sketched by the pencil of nature in these sublime and pleasing bluffs."

On page 632 our artist in the "Sugar Loaf" and "Chimney Rock" has represented some of the strangely beautiful effects that produced such deep impressions upon Mr Schoolcraft, as they have since upon all travellers who have succeeded him.

In the upper right-hand corner of the group of sketches is one of the "Maiden's Rock," which, on account of the legend connected with it, is one of the most interesting features of the landscape surrounding Lake Pepin. This so-called lake is merely a widening of the river, half a day's sail below St Paul, in which for twenty [illegible] miles it covers an average width of from one to three miles. According to the legend, the Maiden's Rock, rising abruptly from its eastern shore to nearly five hundred feet, was during the early days of the occupation of the Northwest by the whites the scene of a melancholy tragedy. The Indian girl Winona loved a white man, a young hunter who was one of the first of his race to penetrate thus far into the wilderness. He would have married her, but her parents forbade this, drove him from the village, and set the day upon which Winona must wed a young chief of her tribe, for whom she had no liking. On the morning of the appointed day, finding other escape impossible, the distracted girl fled to the summit of the rock that still stands a monument to her memory, chanted her death song, and, in sight of the entire tribe and her parents, flung herself headlong from the giddy height. To this day, as, in the still hours of night, the raftsman floats over the placid waters of Lake Pepin, he fancies he hears the sweet, far-away notes of the death-song from above the Maiden's Rock, and the passing tourist gazes upon it with an interest which is awakened by no other feature of the landscape.

The Upper Mississippi was first seen at the mouth of the Wisconsin River by the Jesuits Marquette and Joliet, who in 1673 left Lake Michigan, at Green Bay, ascended the Fox River, and by a short portage gained the head-waters of the Wisconsin, down which they floated to the Mississippi. As they descended the latter river, it was left for Father Hennepin to discover the chief beauties of its upper valley six years later. He did so involuntarily, having been captured by Indians at the mouth of the Illinois River, and taken to the Sioux villages sixty leagues above the Falls of St. Anthony. The prisoner revenged himself by attaching forever to the grandest falls of the entire river the name of the brown-robed friar of Padua, for which he displaced the musical I-ra-ra (laugh) of the Sioux, and the Ka-ka-bi-kah (severed rock) of the Chippewas.

Although the vast rafts of lumber, on which whole families live for weeks, and sometimes months, still form prominent features of the river scenery, the great clumsy flat-boats, or "broad-horns," once so common, are fast disappearing. Before the advent of steamboats they formed the sole means of transportation for freight, and also carried many passengers, who were obliged to work their passage in place of paying a fare in money. A story is related of one of these primitive arks, which, though old, will bear repetition. A traveller wished to engage passage from far up on the river to New Orleans, but for some time the captain of the "broad-horn," not fancying his looks, refused to take him. At length he relented, and the passenger, with his grip-sack, was taken aboard. For several months he worked with the rest of the crew, sharing their good and ill fortune with such cheerful good-nature that he became a general favorite. At length they reached New Orleans, and the passenger, stepping up to the captain, held out his hand to shake a farewell. Grasping the proffered hand warmly, the captain exclaimed: "Good-by, Mr G——, good-by. I'm sorry to see ye go. I didn't want ye at first, for I thought you was a gentleman, and I didn't want none of them long-legged cusses yawping around and asking nonsense questions; but now I'm glad you come, for, by jingo, thar ain't nothin' of the gentleman about you. Good-by, Mr G——, good-by."

The "broad-horns" are still occasionally to be seen, loaded with the produce of the country adjacent to the waters of some tributary stream. They are propelled by long sweeps, or, with great square sail set, move heavily before the impulse of a favoring wind; but they no longer carry passengers. This branch of the business was long ago monopolized by the swift high-pressure, light-draught river steamers which have also captured most of the freight traffic. Of these steamers the first up-river boat was the old Virginia, 118 feet long, and drawing six feet of water, which made a trip to the mouth of the Minnesota, or St. Peter's River, in 1823. Among the innumerable successors of the Virginia are a score of fine passenger boats bearing such names as War Eagle, Northern Light, Golden Era, and Grey Eagle. Their grand saloons are of the gold and white, gingerbread, highly ornate pattern which impresses the rural Westerner so profoundly, and which he recognizes as the standard by which to gauge all magnificence.

"Indeed," said Mrs. Jones, of Jonesville, on the Upper Mississippi, when trying to impress her neighbor Mrs Smith with the grandeur of Mrs Brown's palatial Fifth Avenue mansion—"indeed her parlor is quite as handsome as a steamboat saloon."

The water of the Upper Mississippi is as clear as that of the Hudson, and its wonderful scenery is destined to become nearly as famous as that of the latter river. The view from the ramparts of old Fort Snelling, at the confluence of the Mississippi and Minnesota, is alone almost worth a journey to St Paul to gaze upon, and it is but one of a [illegible] and views equally grand that offer themselves from so many points along the valley of the Upper Mississippi.

IRON SHIPS ON THE DELAWARE.

The recent completion by the American Ship-building Company, at Chester, Pennsylvania, of the superb iron sailing ship T. F. Oakes, marks an era in the history of iron ship construction in the United States. The new ship is not only the largest iron ship of her class ever built in this country, but is one of the largest and finest in the world. Although this ship-building company was only organized last March, with Henry H. Gorringe, of Obelisk fame, as President, and the keel of this their first large ship was laid in May, she was launched and ready for sea a few days since. She is a full-rigged, three-masted ship, 282 feet long, [illegible] 12 feet. Her lower masts and spars are of iron, and she is fitted with all the modern steam appliances for hoisting yards, weighing anchor, [illegible] etc. [illegible]

[illegible], T. F. Oakes [illegible] William H. Starbuck, of New York, and [illegible] the Vice-President of the Northern Pacific Railroad. She is intended for the grain trade, and will sail on her first voyage from New York to San Francisco, thence to [illegible], thence to Calcutta, and from there back to New York.

This new iron ship-building company is making a speciality of iron centre-board schooners for [illegible] trade, and have already several of these [illegible] two more on the stocks. In addition to these they are building another ship larger than the Oakes, a freight and passenger [illegible], and a [illegible] collier with a capacity of 1200 tons. They [illegible] the future of [illegible] comparatively new American industries, and speak of the Delaware as the "Clyde of America."

THE CHINESE WALL.

Somewhat more than two thousand years ago it entered the head of Chi Hwangti that a wall between his dominions and the country of the Huns would keep those restless warriors from making so many destructive and unwelcome visits among his people. The most despotic of modern monarchs would hesitate before such an undertaking, but probably it never occurred to Chi to consider the wishes of anybody but himself, and therefore he gave orders that the wall should be built. Every third laboring-man in the realm was drafted for the great work, and as much of it required only unskilled labor, and as the forces were continually strengthened by fresh relays, it is not wonderful that even as many as fifteen hundred miles of wall should have been built within ten years.

Chi did not live to see the wall completed, nor indeed did any of his family; but nevertheless the wall has served to hand his fame down to the present ages even better than the hatred of him which is taught children to this day in China. The reason given for execrating his memory is that he sacrificed so many lives in hurrying forward the completion of the wall. Tens of thousands of laborers are said to have died from overwork. It is much more likely, however, that he owes this hatred to an offense committed against the literati of the country. When he usurped the throne of China, and murdered all who were of royal blood, he took the name of Chi Hwangti, or First Emperor, instead of his own name of Chwangsiang Wang. He not only took the title, but he made an effort to have himself considered the first emperor by future ages by issuing an order that all records previous to his time should be destroyed. He was especially anxious that the writings of Confucius and Mencius should be burned, and fearing that some of the learned men might rewrite these works from memory, he executed five hundred of the literati. The men who wield the pen are dangerous to offend, and it is probably due to them that Chi is one execrated. It is interesting to know that the name China, by which we know a great country, and which is unknown by the inhabitants of that country, comes from the house from which the builder of the great wall sprang. Tsin, or Chin, was the dynasty which Chi Hwangti founded, and was so called from the name of the feudal state which he had governed before usurping the throne.

In its best parts the wall is composed of a body of earth and small stones faced with masonry on the side toward Mongolia, and merely banked up on the inner side by a sloping wall of earth. A top surface paved with brick and about fifteen feet wide is maintained in some places, but in many others the wall is only distinguishable on the inner side by the parapet of bricks which for the most part crowns the entire length of the wall. On the outer side the wall ranges from twelve to thirty feet in height. The eastern end of the wall is the one and was originally the best portion, the western end degenerating into a mere embankment of earth, which frequently is completely lost sight of. As the wall runs over the crests of the mountains, it is terraced, and in places presents the appearance of a gigantic stairway. At intervals there are towers about forty feet in height, built not on but near the wall, and it is in these towers that such guards as there are are stationed.

The utter uselessness of the wall is evident at a glance. It would be unfair to condemn it because it would soon crumble before a fire of artillery, but it is because it could not keep out even the soldiery of the time when it was built that it must be condemned. It is easy to imagine an army of Huns smiling sardonically at the sight of such a barrier to their progress; and, moreover, the facts of history prove that whenever the northern tribes wished to enter China they did so. In its pictorial aspect the wall is both pleasing and striking, as in consequence of the [illegible] of the hills over which it runs it can be followed by the eye from a suitable eminence for a long distance. Over hills and valleys it trails like a [illegible] serpent, now darting out a spur [illegible] to [illegible] almost [illegible], and now doubling around a too [illegible].

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

The late Mr Marwood, Hangman.—Matthew Arnold's Pension.—The Laureate's heavy task.—Old War Ships sold.—Crowning a Rose Queen.—A Jeremiad.—Enterprising Brigands.

It is said that when Marwood lately visited the House of Commons he looked with peculiar interest at one of the more prominent of the professional obstructionists, as a tailor regards a possible customer, with an eye to a fit; he was accompanied by a small bridal party, to which he had previously acted as "best man." What a curious choice it seems for a bridegroom to make! One hears a gentleman at the altar jocularly spoken of as being "turned off," but that he should employ professional assistance of this kind is something [illegible]. In one, however, the [illegible] fashionable, Mr M was [illegible] his address—[illegible] Lane, Horncastle, Lincolnshire—was the doorkeeper of the [illegible] chamber. Perhaps, in the case of a government official entering the matrimonial noose, there would be a certain appropriateness in employing him, but I doubt his ever being patronized by the Peers. At one time, when no peer could be hung, but only beheaded, the contemplation of the members of the Upper House would have had a certain interest for Mr Marwood, as being "quite out of his line." Since the above was written poor Mr Marwood has "gone over to the majority"; his death will probably be considered in Ireland to be "a judgment."

There has been discontent expressed that Mr. Matthew Arnold should have had £250 a year conferred upon him from the Civil List. It is alleged that he is too "well-to-do." I do not know his financial circumstances, but it is hardly likely that a man of his character would have applied for the grant unless he stood in need of it. As a prince of the Bonapartes has just received a similar pension for writing books that nobody ever read, we need not surely grudge a true English poet and brilliant essayist the same sum from the public purse. For my part, I only regret that a man who has written so much, and so the whole as well, should stand in need of any subsidy of the kind. Poetry and essays, however, are their own reward. It is curious to contrast, indeed, the great reputation of some literary men with the pecuniary results they receive, while, on the other hand, some successful playwright who appeals to "the groundlings" makes his tens of thousands.

Even poetry, however, is not all ideal, and has sometimes to concern itself with very commonplace subjects—if one is a very great poet indeed, at all events, if one is laureate. I wonder whether it can be true that the unfortunate Mr Tennyson has been sent for to Osborne, and requested to write a new "Lycidas" upon the demise of the late Mr John Brown? One can not but picture the face of the bard upon receiving this royal command. (What a picture, by-the-bye, it would make for Punch!) I once knew a little "last joined" Woolwich cadet who was compelled (with slippers) to make a poetical address extempore, in the presence of his tormentors, to the moon. I suppose, however, the laureate was allowed to go home and think about it. I can see him now with Webster's Rhyming Dictionary (for the thing can't come naturally) and the Court Guide and "Lycidas" before him.

"We laureates in our youth begin in gladness,
But thereof comes in the end Despondency and Madness."

"Among the novelists of next season," I read, "we are to have the wife of a judge, whose husband has pronounced the MS. to be a work of the highest order." I am not surprised—I should not be surprised if the wife of an archbishop wrote a novel—but the question is, "Is he a good judge?"

Six of our old war ships have been sold to a timber firm in London, one of them the Rodney, whose "actions" are historical. What does the firm do with them? it may be asked. I happen to know: they sell them (to me amongst others) for fire-wood. Ship timber makes beautiful fires, and burns blue and all sorts of colors. Next winter, perhaps, I shall have a historical fire. It is much better than burning my MSS., as some have recommended. But really it seems rather a shame. Why do not rich people, who have a turn for relics, and give untold gold for a chair of Marie Antoinette's, or (worse) Madame Du Barry's, buy the Rodney and put it in their lake at home, as they turn a veteran steed out to grass? It would at least be something to talk about—a very great desideratum in the country.

We have been crowning a Rose Queen in the Rosery at the Crystal Palace, with heralds, and acolytes, and all the rest of it, as in France. I am very glad to hear that any young lady in the New Kent Road should have given such satisfaction to her friends and neighbors as to have earned that honor, but I don't think such displays are very wholesome, or do much good to the young person they intend to honor. I am quite sure they are not suitable to the national taste. Mortal hara followed the heralds, pointing out the fact that their legs were padded. The impression left by the narrative of the proceedings is that the whole ceremony was open to this remark. To be told that it was "a custom of the days of Louis XIV." does not, "taking one consideration with another," seem to me to quite dispose of all objections to it.

The last electrical invention records and reproduces conversations carried on through the telephone. The next will perhaps do the same for ordinary table-talk. This will be very wholesome. I think if people could read in black and white the inane observations they make at dinner parties, for example, they would be a little more careful—or more silent. The best printed conversation of this sort is in one of Trollope's novels, where he makes two military gentlemen communicate their views upon spiritualism to one another. It is not at all too bad to be true. The most [illegible] talk, perhaps, is that one overhears (and can not, alas! help overhearing) upon piers at watering places during the summer months. It is built upon the Socratic system: all questions except a modicum of answers. "Have you ever been to France? Do you like band music? Can you swim?" To which the fair one answers in monosyllables.

We have been laughing at the French Red Sea enterprise for the recovery of Pharaoh's chariots, while all the time there has been a Tara Trust Fund (it must have been on trust indeed) among ourselves to excavate Tara Mount, in the County Meath, "to recover the deeds given to the prophet Jeremiah when he purchased the land of Palestine." The company, it seems, has suffered [illegible] and its subscribers are described in the treasurer's sheet, who has had the misfortune to become a bankrupt, as "partly secured creditors." If the security depends upon the recovery of those other securities, this phrase is the most euphemistic that I have ever met with. The lament of these unfortunates may well be called "a Jeremiad."

I have so little sympathy with brigands, whether Greek, Turk, or Italian, that I can not fancy a man's being proud of a country in which such scoundrels are permitted to exist, far less to flourish; but still, when a thing is done, even though it be brigandage, one has a certain satisfaction in seeing it done well. Viewed in this light, I can not withhold my admiration of that marauding band who captured the municipal authorities of Florina the other day, Governor, Cadi, and all, while sitting in council. Imagine a band from East London seizing on the Court of Aldermen, Lord Mayor, Mace-bearer, and Chaplain, and carrying them off from the Guildhall into the recesses of Epping Forest! How convenient it would be for the new scheme of municipal reform! And yet I don't suppose the Home Secretary would venture to wink at it.

I see that a castor-oil is advertised as being without taste. I dare say the discovery is not true; but if it be true, what a vista of happiness (if happiness is relief from misery) does this open to medicine-takers! If castor-oil can be made tasteless, one can believe that [illegible] be made palatable, [illegible] tractive. There [illegible] all. A [illegible] palate. I [illegible] heard [illegible] that an improvement has been made in this [illegible] should [illegible] medicine. This is rubbish. Why, if [illegible] I mean dispensing chemists—thought [illegible] would never cease experimentalizing [illegible] jalap to Turkish [illegible] Such [illegible]

THE UNFORTUNATE GRANDSON OF MRS. HODGE.

ONE very hot morning a young woman mounted the many stone steps that led to a pretentious mansion in the metropolis, and rang the bell. Her unexceptionable appearance puzzled the liveried party that replied on her summons. He looked helplessly from the name upon her card to herself. The name upon the card was "Miss Madeline Coutts," but the poor flunky was very much at a loss what to do with her. There was a certain canon of style and assurance about this young woman that forbade his leaving her standing in the hall, but whether to introduce her to the sacred precincts reserved for the habitués of the house—?

"In reply to an advertisement of Mrs. Hodge's," said Miss Coutts, quietly.

"Oh, ay—that indeed," said the relieved footman; and immediately showed her into a small room on the end of the hall.

She had not to wait long. Her arrival seemed to be eagerly expected, but the few minutes that she remained there alone assured her that the apartment was unconfortably small, choked with costly knickknacks of an artistic nature, and the one window was shrouded with brocatelle and lace. Miss Coutts rarely used a fan; her composure of manner and immobility of feature gave her the appearance of being cool; but she really was as hot as one of her controlled temperament could be. When Mrs. Hodge came into the room it became emphatically several degrees hotter. She was a lady of ponderous dimensions, fat, swarthy, and red. Miss Coutts, being thin, fair, and pale, began at once to struggle with a mutual antipathy. Mrs. Hodge had no asthmatic affection that made it necessary for her to gasp out her sentences, so that Miss Coutts felt as if every word was impelled by a powerful calorie within this immense mechanism.

Miss Coutts was prepared to hear that her errand was in vain, as so many errands of hers of the same nature had been; the advertisement had been couched in such ambiguous terms, and the remuneration offered was so unusually large, that Miss Coutts had had very little hopes of success. She thought she would try, it was her imperative duty to try, and keep on trying; but she had grown almost hopeless, and a remark that was just now shot at her from the asthmatic Mrs. Hodge almost startled her. It placed Miss Coutts in the novel position of hesitating to accept a very lucrative offer. In any other case the sum of money proffered would have caused her immediately but quietly to close with the terms, and under her cold exterior would have been a quickening of all the pulses that led to delight.

But Mrs. Hodge had said that for this large sum of money she was to take entire charge of an idiot. Mrs. Hodge had used the term "defective intellect," but Miss Coutts could easily construe her meaning, especially when she was told that the boy was nineteen years old, and had not the entire control of his limbs; that a plan of education had been devised for him by the distinguished physicians having the case in charge, the Kindergarten method, combined with others that Mrs. Hodge would explain: for instance, his last governess had devoted several hours a day to taking her pupil into the grounds adjoining the house, which were fitted up expressly for the purpose, and teaching him gradually to take notice of form and color. He had shown a fondness for flowers, which it was hoped might lead to great results. Every movement and articulation of the pupil must be carefully noted down. His former governess had put them in the shape of a diary, which the physicians interested in the case had considered an excellent idea. Mrs. Hodge would show Miss Coutts the form of diurnal annotation undertaken by the late lamented governess.

"Is she dead?" said Miss Coutts, becoming perceptibly paler.

"Yes—oh yes," said Mrs. Hodge, walking over to an escritoire of marble and bronze, and taking from a secret drawer the diary of the late governess. "I am sorry—to say—that she—is dead," gasped Mrs. Hodge. "The physicians—and myself—all agree—that had she lived—a material improvement—would have—taken place—in my—unfortunate—grandson."

Miss Coutts felt an emotion of pity for the woman before her, but it was not strong enough to neutralize the effect of the knowledge that the late governess had actually died in the work agreed upon.

"Did she die here—in this house?" said Miss Coutts.

"Yes; she had—no friends—or relatives—in this country. She died—we regret—to say—from nervous—exhaustion. She was—an estimable—creature. Here is—her last—annotation."

Miss Coutts could not restrain a cold chill down her vertebræ as she took the album of the late lamented governess in her hand.

"Please—read—aloud," said Mrs. Hodge; and Miss Coutts read:

"July 10.—Ernst becoming more and more accustomed to the use of a fork at meals. Was compelled to restrain his appetite at breakfast. Items.—Small plate of soup, slice of bread; two soft-boiled eggs; about five ounces of rare beefsteak, large saucer of oatmeal; one cup of coffee. Here restrained. At 8 A.M. went into garden; plucked morning-glory—common convolvulus; held it before Ernst. He clutched it, tore it in pieces, distinctly articulating the words, 'Hallelujah! Hallelujah!' Mem.—In this ejaculation is there not some analogy to the word 'glory,' thus connecting a thought of the patient with the name of the flower?"

Here the annotation ended.

"Was the late governess buried from this house?" said Miss Coutts.

"Yes; only—a—week—ago," said Mrs. Hodge; "and now, if—you—please, we—will—go—to—the—apartments—of—my—unfortunate—grandson."

"Excuse me," said Miss Coutts. "I beg you will allow me some consideration of your proposal. I am not prepared just now."

Miss Coutts was visibly embarrassed. Her sympathy for Mrs. Hodge struggled perceptibly with her repugnance to the proposed task.

"How—much—time—do—you—require?" said Mrs. Hodge, coldly. "Too—much—has—been—lost—already. Ernst—has—deteriorated—shockingly—since—the—death—of—the—late—lamented—attendant."

"I must decline, if you please, all further consideration of your proposal," said Miss Coutts, firmly. "I am perfectly assured that I would be quite incompetent."

"No—no, don't—give—it—up," said the poor woman. "Don't, you—can—do—it—if—you—try. Come—and—see—him. He—isn't—so—bad, when—you—get—used—to—him. He—used—to—be—violent, and—bite; he—don't—bite—any—more."

Miss Coutts got upon her feet.

"I am very sorry," she said, "but I can not think of it—not for a moment."

"See—here," said the wretched grandmother. "Your—appearance—pleases—me, you—are—a—lady—every inch—of you. I'll—give—you—more—money; you—can—save—it—up. He—late—governess—had—money—in—the—bank—enough—to—bury—her—and—more."

"Please excuse me now," said Miss Coutts, beginning herself to gasp out her words. "I'll—think—of—it. I will, indeed."

"When—shall—I—see—you—again?" said poor Mrs. Hodge. "This—evening?"

"Yes," said Miss Coutts, knowing perfectly well that with her consent she would never see her again.

Mrs. Hodge rang the bell. The footman opened one of the big front doors. Miss Coutts took a long breath, and ran lightly down the steps, scarcely leaving off running till she turned the corner. Reaching her boarding-house, she immediately shut herself up in her room, and began a letter to her brother at the South:

"I know perfectly well, dear Tom, how important it is that I should get something to do. I know that everything is sold, the money gone, and that you are reduced to living upon a paltry salary, which you can ill afford to share with anybody; that my habits must seem dreadfully expensive to you, that you are in love, and naturally want to marry; and that I am the most miserable millstone that ever contained the neck of the dearest brother in the world."

Here the pen remained suspended over the paper. Miss Coutts looked carefully at the door to see that it was closed, at the windows to see that the blinds were down, then she dropped the pen, and putting both her shapely hands upon her temples, she let the tears ooze out of her eyes upon the letter before her. She restrained her sobs: not in the world would she let the young couple in the adjoining room know that she had cause for tears.

"So proud," she murmured, "and so poor—so unlearning poor! Tom has an idea that nothing but teaching of a certain kind will do, and as he keeps me dependent upon his bounty. And such a bounty! Poor dear boy! I'll have to take this place. I'll have to go and live with this idiot, keep him from choking on his meals or stabbing himself with his fork, and for a change I can go into the garden—always with my madman—and show him a morning glory that he'll scream! Hallelujah! over, and in his ecstasy perhaps take a piece out of my arm. But I'll do it. Yes, for Tom's sake, I'll go there, and die in that awful house, like the other lamented one, with the unfortunate grandson of Mrs. Hodge; and what it left over from my funeral I'll leave to Tom."

At this moment there was a knock at the door Miss Coutts lifted her head, pressed her fingers a moment upon her eyes, and brushed back her hair. "Come," she said, and the maid who entered with a letter in her hand, though she was a cunning jade, would never have divined the late distress of Miss Coutts. The letter was from Tom.

"DEAR MADGE" (it ran),—"Inclosed please find check for one hundred dollars. Make it go as far as you can. I'm removed from office here, to make room for a greedy politician, but devilish nicely and secretly, beyond precedent. Every dog has his day. Your fraternal cashier goes out to Leadville; been longing to go for some time, but restrained by thoughts of you; hesitated to give up sure thing; now it has given me up, proved itself unsure, and settled it. Your beggarly allowance will be all right for six months—after that, the deluge!

Aff., TOM."

Miss Coutts had shed all her tears. She was a little ashamed of her late outburst. Besides, she was glad Tom was rid of his sinecure berth under the government, which they both called the drudgery of office, and she was relieved now of Tom's restrictions regarding her employment. She immediately took up the morning paper and looked at the advertisements for domestic help of all kinds. She thought she might possibly get a place to take care of children, though she hated children in the aggregate, or a position as seamstress, though darning her stockings, the only sewing she ever did, was the bête noire of her existence. Presently her eyes fell upon the following:

WANTED.—A middle-aged lady of culture and refinement, to take entire charge of housekeeping in a small establishment out of town. Address John Marvin, Box 943.

Miss Coutts knew as little of housekeeping as she did of sewing or caring for children, but she could write very well, and her replies to advertisements frequently brought some little results; the trouble had been that she was too particular, and what she considered the necessities and restrictions of her life were too numerous and expensive. But she was driven to desperation now, and this last contingency of being given over to the unfortunate grandson of Mrs. Hodge completely subdued her. Perhaps the words "culture and refinement" determined her. Anyway, one pleasant evening Mr Marvin's coachman made up his mind he was bringing up to the house a fine lady visitor, and was surprised to learn she was only the new housekeeper; but they got on together very well indeed—so said that Hopkins, who was the gardener as well as the coachman, picked and cleaned with his own hands the vegetables for the table. Miss Coutts's pride was so secure that she had no need to hedge it round with petty formalities, and the cook became fairly in love with her. "Too young, is it?" she said, within hearing of Mr. Marvin. "There's many an auld head on young shoulders, and a wise one too!"

Mr Marvin had said, in their first interview, that he feared Miss Coutts was too young for the responsibility; but she threw an earnest entreaty into her reply: "Do not let that be an obstacle, sir; try me at least. I am not young, I am nearly twenty-eight." As if that was old enough for anything. She looked much younger, and had not been in the country a month before she would have passed for very little over twenty. She restrained all outward expressions of delight; but she was really perfectly satisfied with the life that was offered to her. Mr Marvin had quickly assured her of his entire approval of her management, and had of late even gained a certain uneasiness at aspect and demeanor that he had not worn upon her arrival. Contrary to all her expectations, she found that Mr. Marvin was the easiest one to manage in the whole establishment, and thought on first that his financial affairs probably absorbed his mind to the exclusion of the minor minutiæ of home life. But after a little time the natural discernment of her sex led her to believe that some blight rested upon the life of her employer that robbed it of all zest and interest. He arose early, walked about the grounds, but seemed to care nothing for the horticultural growth annually as dear to the heart of a small landed proprietor; he paced to and fro the garden paths, his hands clasped behind him, his head bent, his face gloomy and preoccupied. His horse was brought to the door punctually at nine—sometimes the vehicle in which it was Hopkins's choice he should ride was scrupulously clean; at others it was dusty, or even bespattered with mud altogether, according to the convenience of Hopkins. It seemed on not matter in the least to Mr Marvin. Sometimes, by a freak of luck and extraordinary exertion upon the part of Miss Coutts, the domestic menage of Mr Marvin was a marvel of excellence, at others, everything was confusion and discomfort. Sometimes every meal that was set before her employer was the perfection of culinary success; at others, when baleful influences of various kinds were at work, nothing was fit for a civilized palate. Mr. Marvin did not seem to be aware of these irregularities. One evening everything upon the table was underdone. Madeline sat opposite her employer, and not being able herself to eat the food that she had ordered to be placed before him, she watched with vexation and remorse the various dishes which successively left the table untouched.

At breakfast the next morning everything was overdone. Madeline had her cup of tea. She could make good tea; but unfortunately Mr. Marvin drank coffee at breakfast, and his cup remained untasted. Madeline could see that it was black, bitter, and muggy. Mr. Marvin's breakfast consisted really of a crust. The carriage was on the door. There had been a storm in the night, and it was covered with mud.

A hot color suddenly flamed in the ebonk of Miss Coutts.

"Mr Marvin," she said, "are you aware that you have a wretchedly managed house, and that your carriage is almost always dirty? that your last two meals have been vilely cooked? The cook has been ill; it is no fault of hers; but two people ought to be discharged at once from your employ—your coachman and your housekeeper."

"If the cook is ill, she is incapacitated from her usual duties," said Mr Marvin.

"But every efficient housekeeper should know how to get a decent meal," said Miss Coutts.

"Then it appears you are not an efficient housekeeper," said Mr Marvin.

"Not by any means," said Miss Coutts; "and I never shall be; and Hopkins won't keep the carriage clean."

"Do you want to know me, Miss Coutts?"

"Heaven forbid, Mr. Marvin! Only for your sake."

"Then I am very well satisfied with you; and on for Hopkins, he has been with me many, many years, Miss Coutts. I am under great obligations to Hopkins, which I hope I shall never forget."

The dark face of Mr Marvin grew darker and gloomier. He got into the dirty carriage, and Madeline watched it disappear down the road.

"I'm afraid he's murdered somebody, and Hopkins has helped bury the body somewhere about the place," said Madeline to herself; "but somehow I can't help liking him immensely. If he were not so glum and so old, I should begin to believe I was falling in love with my master; but, after all, I'm getting old, too—awfully old!" And, on drive away this unpleasant thought, Miss Coutts went on work with a will. She was not really so inefficient as she pretended; there was considerable of laziness and a lack of persistency about the matter, which Miss Coutts proceeded to mend. Although the cook was still confined to her room, the meals became presentable and appetizing. She had been compelled to call Hopkins to her aid, and resolved to do her best also to reform his ways.

Hopkins was picking fruit in the garden one afternoon, and Madeline was gathering flowers close by.

"We must do all we can to please our master Hopkins," said Miss Coutts, musingly. "Do you pick the finest grapes for him, and I'll gather the prettiest flowers. He doesn't seem very happy and we must do all we can to cheer and comfort him."

"It ain't much wonder," said Hopkins, "that he don't take to happiness as a duck does to water, and I don't think the matter of a few grapes, be they fine or faulty, will serve to comfort him. As for flowers, miss, if you'll take my advice, you'll keep 'em off the table, the sight of 'em must be a kind of curse to him. They will grow in spite of me, though I clip 'em down so often as I think of it, for they seem to pass a body's sight."

Miss Coutts paused in the arrangement of her nosegay, and stared at Hopkins.

"Why?" she said—"why are they so painful to him?"

"That's no matter," said Hopkins, "but they are—they must be, in the common natur' of things."

"Won't you tell me why, Hopkins?" said Miss Coutts, coaxingly.

"No, I won't tell you why," said Hopkins, "it's nobody's business."

Miss Coutts's eyes, which were always large, grew bigger and rounder. She looked at the brawny head of Hopkins lifted to the vine, and then she shook her own. She really began to believe that somebody was put secretly away under one of the flower beds, and the pretty blossoms fell not of her hand unheeded to the ground. This would account for her master's sad dark face, his mournful smile, his gloom and abstraction, and this also would account for the suspicion and assurance of Hopkins. Miss Coutts resolved not to chide Hopkins, or hurry him, or provoke him to any sudden wrath. Hopkins must be conciliated. Miss Coutts felt sure that Hopkins held the life of her master in his hand, and she also felt that that life was becoming very dear to her. It did not matter whether she was of any particular consequence to Mr Marvin, considering everything, she thought, perhaps it was better that he should be simply kind to her and thoughtful of her welfare, to be one of the of his other servants. She could on no account to the fact that there was a dark secret in his life, something only shameful, perhaps she could only hope it was not of a criminal nature—but as long as he didn't love me, she was in Piety to be no fund of him as she planned. She picked him up, and pity is akin to love.

Months had now passed away, and Mr Marvin, as I said before, had gained a certain humanity of aspect which was unknown to him before the coming of Miss Coutts, and although she trembled for this frail security, Miss Coutts was glad that the load was gradually lifting off her master's mind.

One evening in early October she walked out and Ire upon the porch, waiting for the first glimpse of Hopkins, who had gone to the train for his master. A delicious meal was ready to be served. She herself had taken unusual pains with her toilet, carefully avoiding flowers, after the evening of Hopkins, she was compelled to wear those little accessories to dress that make a plain woman charming, and a charming woman irresistible. And there was, above all, that air of tender expectancy and eager anticipation in her face that Mr Marvin had grown to look for and yearn upon as he journeyed home. It seemed to him that night that she had never looked so womanly and fair, and that his home had never been so inviting.

"Oh, how glad I are to get home, Miss Coutts," he said. "Everything here is dear to the heart and pleasant to the eye." And as Miss Coutts, in the delight of the moment, blushed and held out her hand to him, he put it upon his arm, and kept it briefly but warmly in his own as they walked into the house. Miss Coutts felt his heart beating against her fingers, and her own began to leap outdoors.

"What if he should really love me?" she said to herself; and "What if this great handsome should, after all, be mine?" whispered the heart of Mr Marvin.

They even into the pleasant dining room. How pretty the table looked!

"How hungry I am," said Mr Marvin. And then a glum voice from the door called out: "Here is a letter for you, sir. I got it in the post this mornin', and it lay for two ever since."

The handwriting was a strange one to Mr Marvin. He opened it and read it through, grew paler and paler as he read, till at last Miss Coutts came to over to him, and held his head upon her arm. Her own hand trembled as she put a glass of water to his lips, but she did not call for help. "The time has come," she said to herself. "Detection, discovery, is at hand. We must do something impudent."

Mr Marvin by a strong effort got his nerves under control.

"You must think I am strangely weak," he said, "but there is bad news to that letter—terrible news. My mother-in-law is dead."

Madeline almost laughed, but she knew that if she once gave way to laughing she would fall into hysterics, but what a commonplace announcement to make such a fuss about!

"Your mother-in-law?" she repeated.

"Yes; it seems a calamity to which people easily resign themselves, but it is a terrible one to me. Great Heaven!" cried Mr Marvin, starting up from the table, "and I dared just now to be happy!"

He went out upon the porch, and walked up briskly on and Ire, Miss Coutts went into the parlor; the pretty meal was left untouched. The window of the parlor opened wide upon the balcony where the unhappy man was walking. Miss Coutts went over by the old-fashioned piano.

knew now that the rod was at hand. She had forgotten that Mr. Marvin had ever been married; he had never alluded to it in any way, but in the death of his mother-in-law it was evident his danger had become imminent. Disgrace and ruin suddenly threatened this poor creature who had just "dared to be happy."

She began to sing in a low trembling tone, tears falling out of her eyes upon the yellow keys:

"'Come, rest in this bosom, my own stricken deer;
Though the head has fled from them, thy home is still here;
Here is the smile that no cloud can o'ercast,
And the heart and the hand all thine own to the last.'"

Miss Coutts went on with the song, her voice growing clearer, firmer, sweeter, purer, as she sang. Mr. Marvin had heard all the great singers of the day, but it seemed to him he had never listened to a voice like this.

"'Through the furnace undrinking, thy steps to pursue,
And shield thee, and save thee, or perish there too.'"

"Do you mean what you say?" he said, leaning over her, his cold hand upon her shoulder, and his wretched face close to her own. "Are your heart and your hand, your love and your whole being, mine, in spite of everything I may have to tell you? By Heaven, Madeline, I believe you are a woman among ten thousand—that you will cling to me through everything."

"I will go with you to the scaffold," said Madeline, and she meant what she said.

"It is not as bad as that, my dear," said Mr. Marvin, "it is not a crime, it is a misfortune. Come out upon the balcony, and let me tell you all. I begin to feel comforted already." They sat together on the wicker sofa, hidden by the flowing leaves of the Virginia creeper; a soft light yet shone in the western sky; one little star alone was visible; a belated blackbird swung to and fro upon a branch in the garden. Madeline nestled close to the strong arm thrown around her. She will never forget that night to the latest to her life. Yes, she loved him, she was prepared for any revelation he might make to her; she was even glad, she said, to be able to prove to him the nature of her love.

"God bless you, Madeline," said Mr. Marvin. "My story in a brief one. I saw not fear to dwell upon it long. I married when I was but a lad of twenty-one. In a few years my wife died of a horrible malady—epilepsy. The only fruit of our union was a boy, who seemed to me as perfect and beautiful as an angel when he was born, but as the years went by the curse he had inherited from his mother became apparent, only in a more shocking form. He was not only a hopeless idiot, but grew deformed, and incapable of governing the muscles of his limbs. He could articulate with difficulty, and seemed only comfortable when in the arms of Hopkins, who carried him about among the flowers, which he would clutch and tear. I could not bear this abhorrent and painful sight, and was about making arrangements to have him conveyed to some private asylum, when his grandmother brought me to give her the care of the boy, to whom she had devoted her every moment. I consented, and have never seen the boy since, though the thought of his miserable existence has embittered my life. He has outlived the devoted woman, and here in this last letter she begs of me to go on with the work which she has begun. The letter says that he is improving gradually, that her whole fortune shall be given over for his benefit. All she asks of me is rush under my roof for my unfortunate son. Madeline, what can I do? Dare I refuse this dying prayer?"

Madeline was silent. Had Mr. Marvin looked into her face, he would have been shocked by the expression there.

"No," she said at length; "you can not refuse to have him here." Then she added, "Your mother-in-law's name was Hodge?"

"Yes," said Mr. Marvin, chilled somehow by the cold and measured tones of Madeline. "The boy is called Ernst, after his maternal grandfather."

"Yes," said Madeline, "I know his name is Ernst. He must come here, of course—" Here she burst into tears and sobs. "I love you so!" she said, clinging to Mr. Marvin. "I do love you so!"

"My sweet Madeline," said Mr. Marvin, "calm yourself. He is not a maniac, he is perfectly harmless."

"He is a vampire," said Madeline. "He has killed very many people who have been forced to share their lives with him. He will kill you—" She did not say that he would kill her, because she had determined that she would fly, as she did before. She would go out to Louisville to Tom, anywhere, to be free from the grandson of Mrs. Hodge. She would born shared poverty, disgrace, a dungeon with her beloved master—anything but this awful presence. How well she remembered the poor grandmother!—her minute description of the terrible life meted out to the attendant of her grandson. Her piteous appeals, her frantic belief of more money enough to bury the miserable attendant when she died, and more. How lost was that room in the city, with its clinging treasures of upholstery and art! How powerful and red and swarthy was the wretched Mrs. Hodge! Every moment she had feared the approach of her unfortunate grandson. Madeline grew faint and sick with this repelling retrospect, and, overcome with the impending grief of parting with her adored master, her heart stopped beating, her head fell heavily back upon his shoulder. A blessed insensibility came to her relief.

It was many days after when she awoke to perfect consciousness. A raging fever followed her first insensibility, and a crisis went by during which her life hung by a thread. But [illegible] Mr. Marvin said to her inside her count her illness as providential.

"My sweet Madeline," he said, gravely, in reply to the glance of terror that she cast about her, and her one word—"Ernst?"—"I know that you were ready and willing for the sacrifice, but it is not demanded of you. My unfortunate son soon followed his grandmother. God has at last taken pity upon his misery and mine. But I hold your heroism to my heart of hearts, dear. Now all I ask of you is to get well."

Madeline looked upon the wasted hands he kissed and caressed. She was so weak, so very weak! She could not tell him then—nor did she ever gain courage for the revelation—that her only heroism had been the yielding up of a union with her beloved master, and going out to Tom at Louisville, thus fleeing forever from the unfortunate grandson of Mrs. Hodge.

MRS. FRANK MCCARTHY.

DEER-HUNTING.

SPORTSMEN of the future, if there be such, will examine with curiosity the truthful and realistic sporting pictures of Mr. Foster. They will look at them, and regret that the scenes therein depicted are to them no longer possible of actual realization. Possibly by that time they may live under a form of government founded on principles of exact justice; consequently they will jeer at the heritages of the game under which an exiled and pender on the striking absurdity which has led it to permit the dissolution of the country of every form of wild animal and bird life.

During the floods in the Mississippi Valley in the spring of 1882 the extraordinary high stage of water forced large herds of deer and other game from their usual haunts. These poor creatures, on common occasions very and difficult of approach, by the ruinedless pressure of the advancing waters were completely demoralized and cowed. Driven from one resort to another, they at last took refuge on the slightly elevated spots, small islets on a receding sea extending from horizon to horizon. To these islands the deer and other game were followed by hunters, who contently destroyed them, leaving their carcasses to decay where they fell. The survivors of these enormous and extensive battues were driven for refuge to the tops of the levees, where, dazed with hunger and fear, they were knocked over and killed with clubs.

In cases where the destruction of these animals was necessary or supply food to persons famishing with hunger, any mode of killing them was entirely legitimate, but in the majority of cases the slaughter was carried on from a mere wanton love of killing, and the superior human quality which urges its possessors to take advantage of the helpless creatures of the game kind.

In all parts of the country it would appear that any mode of capturing deer is considered proper, hence we find these animals pursued upon as if they were fierce and dangerous foes to man, rather than timid and timed, forever seeking safety from the human hand or heading flight.

By heard we take up a book which purports to relate the hunting adventures of a clergyman. Therein we find an account of fire lighting deer. That is, this teacher of the truth seats himself comfortably in a boat propelled by a guide. On the bow of the skiff is a lamp provided with a powerful reflector. The boat is gently pushed to a spot which the deer frequent as a feeding-place to their feeding grounds. The light from the lamp dazzles them, they approach within a very few feet. So soon as their eyes, shining brightly in the glare, are visible, the holder of the gun fires, and the animal is either killed outright or driven frantic with terror into the recesses of the forest. This process of fire-lighting has given the coup de grace to deer-hunting in the Adirondacks.

Driving deer—another mode of hunting the animal—is one which requires more patience than is possessed by the average man. This method requires the service of a number of gunners, who are posted at convenient points on the course the deer is likely to take when roused by the hounds. They do not, however, always take the route laid out for them, consequently the gunner has ample leisure to commune with his own thoughts—to calculate the date, for example, when a crisis is to call a meeting, ably portray a character in his part [illegible]. Again, it offers to those who have what the French call esprit d'escalier—a mind on the stairs—to rehearse withering repartees ready for immediate use, which are commonly thought of, too late, when one is on the staircase and the occasion passed. Driving deer, therefore, is not so popular a form of hunting as stalking, which keeps a man on the alert, and all his faculties centred upon one object. This method, however, does not possess the same interest when undertaken in our forests as upon the bare, ragged mountains of Scotland, where the game is seen during the entire process. There deer-stalking is a much finer art than with us.

It is the Virginia or red deer which is usually seen in our Eastern markets. Chicago is the great centre for the collection of deer, and indeed all varieties of game; thence it is distributed to all parts of our country and Europe. The dealers in Chicago have created for the success of their business a very complete system. They spare on expense to secure the services of the most expert gunners. These, on far as deer-hunting is concerned, they furnish with a complete outfit. Late in the autumn they are sent to the northern portions of Wisconsin, Michigan, and Canada. It is by no means a holiday trip. These men are brought face to face with great hardships. They are obliged to travel great distances in open sleighs on routes where the thermometer often falls to 35° below zero, when the [illegible] shrieking the drifts in clouds. When they reach their destination they erect a log cabin a hundred miles or more from any other habitation. Here they store their provisions and traps, and prepare for their hunting trips, long distances into the wilderness. After their camp is prepared they may yet have to wait for a light snow to cover the icy crust of the earlier deposits. When this moment arrives they leave on their snow-shoes and beat up the surrounding woods. In the newly fallen snow the trail of the deer is easily followed. So soon as the game is sighted, the hunter, if he be not already on an up-wind beat, makes a detour to secure this position. From cover to cover he stealthily approaches the feeding herd, keeping a steady eye on the tails of the animals. Singular as it may appear, the movements of the tail of the deer is to the gunner full of significance. If it is jerked with a quick motion, he knows that the animal's suspicions are excited. The deer raises his head and glances about him in a nervous, anxious manner. If he is satisfied that no immediate danger is near, he switches his tail again, and reassures him feeling. With his eye constantly on the tell-tail of the deer, the hunter glides from tree to tree until he is within easy range. Armed with a magazine rifle, the gunner may speedily kill ten before the herd gets beyond range. It may appear an easy matter to stalk deer on above described. Far from being so, however; a man must be very handy and expert to pick his way on snow-shoes—bewildering machines to the novice—amid the débris of fallen trees of the forest.

When the deer has been killed, the hunter opens him and removes the entrails. He then climbs a young tree and bends the top to the ground. To this he attaches the carcass. The tree, when released from the weight of the beast, springs back and lifts the dead animal beyond the reach of prowling wolves. At his leisure the hunter, within a day or two, visits the various saplings to which he has secured his game, and removes it to his shanty, where it is stored until a convenient opportunity occurs for him partner or himself to transport it to the nearest railway station, whence it is sent to his employer in Chicago. These dealers pay the gunner by the piece. The latter, consequently, apart from suffering no end of hardship, is liable to lose all the benefit of his hunter's work if, through an error of judgment, he should be overtaken by a sudden rise of temperature and thaw. Then the roads become impassable, and the carcasses he may have on hand inevitably spoil.

For those who may desire to indulge in deer-hunting, Texas offers the most inviting field. There the climatic conditions are not rigorous. The game, moreover, is found on the open, breezy prairies. To successfully stalk deer in that locality the services of a well-broken mustang horse are indispensable. The hunter, who walks, has a strong attached to the bit of the animal, which is gently driven toward the deer. Now and again the horse nosts he allon of to stop and graze. When within gunshot, the hunter shoots with his gun resting across the saddle.

GASTON FAY.

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

In a recent week about five hundred Chinese sailed from San Francisco for their native land. Nearly all of them carried the certificates necessary for their re-admission to United States territory should they desire to return. Perhaps they thought that these return checks would have a money value in the Flowery Kingdom, where, among the millions of men, it ought to be easy to find a good many who would fairly answer to any description that could be written out for the purpose of identifying one who was entitled to the privilege of returning.

For a comet that was yet telescope from a mundane point of view, the wanderer which is now approaching the sun, after an absence of more than three-score and ten years, awakened considerable interest last week. Observers were surprised to find that in the course of a single day its brilliancy had increased six or eight times. Considering the comet's distance from the sun, this outburst of light was regarded by astronomers as more extraordinary than the bursting into pieces of the comet which last year startled the people of the latitude by an sudden and brilliant advent from the southern skies.

An incident of the drought in New England was an arrangement between the Boston and Albany Railroad and the residents of a Massachusetts village for the delivery to them of a tank of water each day. Information is not at hand as to whether a rainy day which intervened prevented the carrying out of the arrangement.

A recent event in ocean steam-ship traffic is the breaking of the record as respect to quick passages from the other side. It now stands six days twenty-one hours and forty minutes—more than two hours better than it was before the Alaska finished her latest westward voyage.

American tomatoes are shipped in large quantities to England, where they are greatly appreciated by diners at the clubs. They are believed to be a remedy for biliousness, besides affording material for several agreeable dishes. Not many years ago they used to be called "love apples" in this country, and were thought very pretty, but nobody dreamed of eating them.

A Chinese reporter who sought an item in a resort frequented by white and yellow heathens was subsequently found in the street deprived of his gold watch and chain and fifteen dollars in coin. As nothing is said about his diamonds, it is presumed that the magnificent compensation which, according to the testimony of a distinguished newspaper authority before the Senate Committee on Education and Labor, is enjoyed by New York reporters is withheld in San Francisco because of the competition of Chinese cheap labor.

A restaurant-keeper in Rome has displayed a genius for advertising which would have been worthy of a Yankee. Under a law of Italy, tradesmen must pay duty on every advertising bill or poster publicly displayed, but the municipal fetes of candidates for office may be posted without the payment of this tax. The restaurant-keeper placarded his name throughout Rome as that of a candidate for election to the Chamber of Deputies, adding the location of his restaurant and the bill of fare for each day. When he was arrested he pleaded that he had been a candidate, and had actually received eighty votes. The outcome of the case has not been announced.

The retiring Democratic Governor of a Southern State was congratulated a short time ago by a matter-of-fact friend on "the comforting knowledge of the fact that while you came into office on a boom, you go out on a bigger one."

Stories from the new petroleum fields in Roumania eclipse even the wonderful tales told of Cherry Grove and the other famous pools of the Pennsylvania oil regions. The "wild-cat" well near which two cities grew up in a month in Cherry Grove was an magnificent affair in comparison with the well recently sunk in Roumania by an American driller, if the stories told of its yield are true. It is said that petroleum was found at a depth of one thousand feet—the average depth of the Pennsylvania oil wells—that a column of oil gushed out with such force that it was thrown more than a hundred feet into the air, and that the flow continued for ten days on the rate of nearly five thousand barrels a day. There is a story of a well in Pennsylvania—one of the first drilled in the Cooper Tract—blowing the drilling tools, weighing some two or three thousand pounds, through the top of a seventy-foot derrick; but it is accepted generally as a yarn illustrating the utmost possibility of a phenomenal well rather than the chronicle of an actual occurrence. Perhaps the imaginative originator of this story will yet find himself humiliated by being compelled to believe that some well in Roumania has actually eclipsed that which his fancy pictured.

THE COW BOYS OF COLORADO—LASSOING AND BRANDING CALVES.—DRAWN BY W. A. ROGERS.—[SEE PAGE 634.]

MY POLO PONY.

A subscriber writes: "I have been presented with a handsome polo pony, but being very long legged, I can not sit on him without my feet dragging on the ground. Can you suggest a style that will be both comfortable and graceful?"

Oh yes, my boy, several. Take your choice.

COW-BOYS.

THE "cow-boys" of the Rocky Mountain region are a race or a class peculiar to that country. They have some resemblance to the corresponding class on the southern side of the Rio Grande, but are of a milder and more original type. In the great herding districts, where the cattle are fattened in great part upon the public domain, and roam, winter and summer, over vast areas without fences, without roads, and with only scattered and irregular places for water and shelter, the herdsmen play an important industrial rôle. It is their business to keep the cattle on nearly together as possible, to guide them to the pasturage and wooded hollows, to separate them when they get mixed up with those of other droves, to brand them at the proper seasons, and to drive them on the nearest market or others. Often their regular occupation is attended with a good deal of danger. In Montana and in some parts of Colorado and Dakota the Indians, turned loose to hunt buffalo near their reservations, fall upon the cattle and run them off, and against these raids the "cow boys" go always armed, and not unfrequently have to undertake exploits which, were they United States cavalrymen, would be reported to the War Department as "battles." At other times the men in the employ of rival and jealous owners become involved in quarrels which end in a more or less free fight. Again, when the season is severe, and snow falls among the lower slopes of the mountains, the care of the herds becomes a hazardous task. Still again the half-tamed cattle "stampede," and it becomes a matter of no small amount of courage, skill, and address to keep them or get them together. On such occasions the "cow boys" are obliged to hang on the flanks of the plunging herd, and keep them, as far as they can, headed in the same direction, until the cattle from sheer weariness relapse into some sort of quiet and orderliness. The tendency to "break" is a mystery even to the most experienced herders. It usually shows itself toward night, and there are unmistakable signs of its approach, but no general theory of its origin has been reached.

The outfit of the cow-boy is a horse, usually one of the "ponies" of the region—small, tough, ugly in look and temper, but capable of great service when once trained, a Mexican or "army" saddle, such as are shipped in great quantities from New York; a blanket, as with the best herdsmen, a pair, one being of rubber; one or more pistols, sometimes a rifle; and, with great uniformity, a liberal flask of whiskey. Among those who seek this wild life on the very frontiers of civilization, or beyond them, there are naturally many untamed and lawless spirits, and these have given to the name of cow boy a character hardly deserved by the class. For the most part they are laborious, faithful, and an ember on their fellow men in the same region. But constant exposure, a monotonous life varied only by danger or exertion of extraordinary character, and exclusion from the usual social relations, inevitably tend to make the more disorderly among them reckless and cruel. Gambling and drinking are about the only diversions accessible, and both are indulged as with a zest quite unknown to the quieter circles of civilized parts of the country. Even among the worst of "cow boys" thieving is rare, and the outrages with which they are charged in this line are usually committed by men who resemble them only in being mounted and armed. There attaches to the name an unconscious association with the cow-boys of the Revolution, whose only calling was to steal cattle and everything else they could run off from either side along the "debatable ground" between the British and Continental camps. The cow-boys of the West have, on the contrary, a regular business, which the greater number of them follow with quite as much fidelity as the average farm-hand on "drover" of the East.

It is not to be denied, however, that the exceptions to this rule are sufficiently striking to attract the attention of the lovers of the picturesque in current reading, newspaper or other. Occasionally a band of the cow-boys will take it into their heads, in an interval of leisure, to "clean out" a neighboring town. For one of these exercises they "load up" with whiskey, gallop at night-fall into the streets, and race down them, firing right and left at any one whose appearance indicates a degree of luxury which, in the interests of their ideal of democracy, should be suppressed. Then they visit the liquor saloons or gambling hells, which are only too frequent, consume what they like, and drive out the occupants. A few weeks ago a squad of five rode into Ute Creek, Colorado, and perceiving a Mexican trader with the high-sounding name of Don MACEDO ARRAGON, made some impudent demand of him. He refused it, snatched his shot-gun, and retreated down the road. When the cow-boys followed and fired on him he returned the fire, killed two of them and wounded a third, and these fell, shot in four places. He lingered twelve hours and died, and the murderers escaped. At Deadwood a bend recently undertook to "clean out" a Mexican gambling saloon, but two of them were killed, and the others fled. On a lonely ranch in Colorado a little company of them quarrelled over their cards. In the first moment the oil-lamp was thrown down, and a desperate fight with knives and pistols went on in the darkness, until four men were left lifeless on the floor, slippery with blood, and only one escaped, badly gashed and shot, to tell the awful tale. Terrible as such occurrences are, they are the incidents of a mode of life which necessarily draws many of the more wayward and violent of the frontier population, and though they stand out in bolder relief, they are not proofs of a greater brutality or a lower type of manhood than the affrays which frequently take place on the excursion boats from our own city. Indeed, bad as are the worst of the cow-boys, the class, as a whole, are better than the "gangs" which infest portions of the river wards of New York, the neighborhood of the Thames Embankment in London, or the quartiers excentriques of Paris. And what is more, the worst of the former are sure to disappear, while the latter grow in numbers and violence with the progress of "civilization."

A COMPANION TO THE GREEK TESTAMENT AND THE ENGLISH VERSION.
By PHILIP SCHAFF, D.D., President of the American Committee on Revision. With Facsimile Illustrations of MSS. and Standard Editions of the New Testament. Post 8vo, Cloth, $2.50.

"This work has grown out of Dr. Schaff's studies in connection with the Revision Committee, and is a wonderful thesaurus of information on every subject relating to the history and the critical study of the New Testament Scriptures. In the opening chapter the author deals with the language of the New Testament, analyzing the style and vocabulary of each of the writers in succession with nice critical acumen and accurate scholarship. The manuscripts of the New Testament, their history, general character, and division into the ancient versions—Latin, Syriac, Egyptian, Æthiopic, Gothic, and Armenian—and their value; Patristic quotations; textual criticism, its history and object, the origin, number, and classes of the variations, and the critical rules to be applied in solving the problems raised by discrepancies between the various sources of the text: the history of the printed text from Erasmus and Stephens to Westcott and Hort; the authorized English Version, its origin and character, the Revised Version, its peculiarities, and the history of its preparation and publication—are all treated of in separate chapters in the most methodical and exhaustive manner. On all these topics Dr. Schaff's work presents the ripe result of the researches and speculations of investigators and authorities of all schools and nationalities. The reader in this is not only informed of the present position of the highest scholarship on the numerous questions embraced in the scope of the 'Companion,' but is also directed to the means of pursuing the study of the subject in any of its branches with absolute completeness."

OLD MEXICO

AND

HER LOST PROVINCES.

A Journey in Mexico, Southern California, and Arizona, by way of Cuba. By WILLIAM HENRY BISHOP, Author of "Detmold," "The House of a Merchant Prince," &c. With numerous Illustrations chiefly from Sketches by the Author. 12mo, Cloth, $1.50.

"Mr. Bishop has furnished in this work a most interesting and instructive description of Mexico and the great provinces over which that country at one time held sway. The curious conditions of life in these regions, and their peculiar physical characteristics, invest them with a strong fascination; and the growing interest which is taken in Mexico at the present time by citizens of the United States cannot fail to secure for the book a cordial welcome and an extensive circulation. Mr. Bishop writes from personal observation in an easy and agreeable style. The illustrations have been engraved from sketches made by the author, and will add materially to the usefulness of the volume."

THE UNITED STATES
MUTUAL ACCIDENT ASSOCIATION,

320 and 322 Broadway, New York.

CHARLES B. PEET (of Rogers, Peet, & Co.), President.

JAMES R. PITCHER, Secretary.

INCORPORATED 1877.

The original and the largest Mutual Accident Association in the World
Effects a saving to the insured of more than one half the usual cost of accident insurance.
This Association has paid to the Beneficiary of each member who received fatal injuries, who held full policy, $5000.
It has paid more than 2000 claims for indemnity for disabling injuries.
It has in force over $70,000,000 accident insurance, with weekly indemnity amounting to $18,000,000 per annum
It saves to the membership in the cost of accident insurance furnished, as compared with that of any other reliable company, over $280,000 per annum.
It has no proven death or indemnity claims, or indebtedness of any nature, audited and unpaid.
The anonymous circulars issued by rival accident insurance (stock) companies, and distributed broadcast by their agents, and intended to prejudice the public against this Association, have signally failed in their object, as the Association has increased its business since January 1st, 1883, over $30,000,000
The Membership Fee in this Association for $5000 accident insurance, with $25 weekly indemnity, is $4, payable but once. Annual dues thereafter $1
Assessments for $5000 insurance have never exceeded the cost of $12 per annum, and may be paid at one time, in advance, if preferred, and the sending of assessment notices also omitted if desired. Assessments paid in advance are held in trust by the Ninth National Bank—special deposit.
$10,000 accident insurance, with $50 weekly indemnity, at proportionate rates.
There is no reason why the number of assessments in this Association should increase with the advancing age of members, as insurance against accidents is not affected by age, as in the case of life insurance.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 13, 1883.

RE-OPENING OF THE ART COMPETITION.

The judges appointed to award the prizes in the Art Competition for the illustration of ALFRED DOBELL'S "Christmas Hymn" have reported [see HARPER'S WEEKLY dated September 1] that they "are not justified by the conditions of the competition in awarding any prize whatsoever." Three hundred and thirty-eight drawings entered into the competition, and twenty-three were received after the 1st of August—too late to be considered.

Pursuant to the intention given in their original "offer to young American artists," the MESSRS. HARPER have determined to re-open the competition, enlarging its scope and modifying the limitation as to age, in accordance with suggestions made by the judges

For the best original illustration appropriate to Christmas—the drawing to be suitable for publication in HARPER'S MAGAZINE, *to be made especially for this competition, and to be the exclusive work of an American artist not over twenty-seven years of age—*MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS offer an award of THREE THOUSAND DOLLARS, upon the honorable understanding that the successful competitor shall use the same for the prosecution of art study in one or more of the best American schools, including also a sojourn abroad of at least six months for the study of the old masters. The award will be paid in such installments and at such times as shall best suit the convenience of the recipient for the purposes specified.

The drawings must be received by MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS, *at Franklin Square, New York, not later than March 1, 1884, addressed "ART COMPETITION, Harper's Magazine": and each must be designated by an assumed name or motto, which should also be given, together with the real name, age, and residence of the artist, in a sealed envelope securely attached to the drawing, and not to be opened until the result of the competition shall have been determined. The name of the successful competitor will not be publicly announced until the publication of the drawing.*

MR. R. SWAIN GIFFORD, N.A., MR. F. D. MILLET, A.N.A., and MR. CHARLES PARSONS, A.N.A., Superintendent of the Art Department at HARPER & BROTHERS', will act as judges of the competition.

The treatment of the subject is left to the artist, limited only by the special reference to Christmas. Either the Bible story of the Nativity, or the social features of Christmas, past or present, may be chosen for illustration. The judges, in making the award, will take into consideration not only the technical art value of each drawing, but also the appropriateness of the subject selected, the sufficiency of the illustration, and especially the originality of conception and treatment. The combination of different designs in a single picture should be avoided.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK, September 6, 1883.

THE APPEAL TO THE COUNTRY.

THE important party conventions throughout the country have now been held, and it is scarcely a month to the election. The significant fact in the situation is that all the conventions demand substantially the same things, with a bearing in the Democratic platforms to a tariff for revenue only, and in the Republican platforms to administrative reform. There is an evident disposition in some of the States, and especially in New York and Massachusetts, to pronounce chiefly upon State affairs, and the platforms of the year show conclusively that the parties are not divided upon great questions of national policy. In this situation the practical question for the voter is obvious—which of the two parties is more likely to be the agent of the reforms and the good government which both profess to desire? Since both make the same professions, this question can be satisfactorily answered only by an estimate of probabilities arising from the general character and traditions of the parties, and by their conduct when they are in power.

The best Democratic statement is that which was made by ex-Speaker CHAPIN in the New York Democratic Convention. His speech recognized fully the paramount necessity of reform in politics, and of the indispensability to Democratic success of a general popular conviction that the party is a reform party. But the instinctive feeling of every intelligent reader of the speech was that it was singularly out of place in a Democratic convention, and that neither the ex-Speaker nor his views are at home in the Democratic party. He and his speech represent what some hereditary Democrats wish that their party believed and intended, but what also the history, the traditions, the active leadership, and the actual conduct of the party show that it neither believes nor intends. He praised the reform bill passed by the Legislature. But except for Republican urgency the bill would have been smothered, and it was in no sense whatever a Democratic measure, except that Governor CLEVELAND sincerely favored it. In Ohio and Pennsylvania and New Jersey, upon the lips of Democratic orators and the pages of the Democratic press, there is nothing but contempt for reform. The very morning after Mr. CHAPIN'S speech the New York Sun remarked, bitterly: "A great many Democrats become fools when they talk about civil service reform, so called." Despite Mr. CHAPIN'S words and the sympathy and endeavors of other Democrats, no man in his senses doubts that the Sun expresses the general sentiment of its party, or supposes that Democratic reform means anything else than general loot and plunder of the public service.

As for Democratic honesty and purity of administration, the Democratic Governor of Maryland has frankly and plainly exposed them in that State, while here in the city of New York, where municipal administration is wholly in Democratic hands, the recent revelations of fraud and theft in the Dock Department, in the Comptroller's office, in the Department of Public Works, and now in the Bureau of Tax Arrears, prove conclusively that Democratic control is not a guarantee of official honesty. Now while it is true that there have been instances of flagrant dishonesty under Republican rule, it is no less true, and it is significant of Republican character and temper, that they have been most remorselessly exposed by the Republican press and unflinchingly prosecuted by Republican authority; and that while the patronage of office has enormously increased during the long Republican ascendency, it is Republicanism which, while still dominant, has radically restricted the power and the consequent corruption of patronage, and made the actual reform already begun a cardinal party measure. The Republican party, moreover, is now, as it has always been, strongest among the most industrious and most intelligent citizens. No party has ever had so magnificent a tradition. It has shown unprecedented power of self-correction and recuperation, and it is to-day stronger in the confidence of the independent voters than it has been for many years. It is those voters who will decide between the two parties as probable agents of reform and progress, of more decent politics and honest government, and there is no question that the great body of such voters will support the Republican party next year, unless, in the mean while, it should forfeit the confidence which it has fairly earned.

COMIC POLITICS.

AN amusing effort of the BUTLER demagoguery in Massachusetts is to depict BUTLER himself as the representative of the poor laboring man against the aristocracy. The nice gentleman of fortune, with a nosegay in the button-hole of his dress-coat, steps off his yacht, on which he has been taking his pleasure, and after receiving the dividends which have accumulated in his absence, poses as the friend of the hard working man against the silk stockinged and ruffled shirted aristocracy.

And who are these bedizened aristocrats who are to be thrown from their ill-gotten power by this generous gentleman? The silk stockings and the ruffled shirts are those of the industrious rural and farming population of Massachusetts, the children of the district school, the men who live by the sweat of their brows, and who are glad if by incessant work they can make the ends of the year meet. They are the sons of the minute men of Concord and Lexington a hundred years ago; the men who left the plough themselves to march to the war of the Union, and whom BUTLER'S lackeys did not then deride as silk stockings. These are the great body of the anti-BUTLER voters in Massachusetts, men who know a political charlatan now as thoroughly as Governor ANDREW knew one twenty years ago, men whose fathers made Massachusetts what she has always been, and who are worthy sons of their sires.

These sturdy silk stockings and ruffled shirts have chosen for their leader a silk stocking like themselves, the honest son of a hardy farmer, a teacher of the district school, who has risen not like his opponent to riches and universal distrust, but to commanding public position and universal confidence and honor. BUTLER says that the people of Massachusetts took him up and made him what he is. In return he is trying to take them in to make him what he hopes to be. His lesser henchmen feebly deride the silk stockings of those who expose and oppose the General's little game. But the chairman of the BUTLER Convention has said something rather more stringent than ruffled shirts of BUTLER himself. "He was distinguished," says Mr. EDWARD AVERY, "for his readiness in making promises and giving pledges of every kind; and at all times, when it was necessary to the fulfillment of his purpose, he displayed equal readiness in breaking them." Gentlemen who hold this opinion of a candidate and still vote for him, and at the same time accuse the farmers of Massachusetts, who prefer an honest man, of wearing ruffled shirts, greatly enliven the political season.

FREE NOMINATIONS.

THE letters of Mr SHERMAN S. ROGERS, the speech of Senator WARNER MILLER at the Richfield Springs Convention, with the inquiry ordered by the Convention looking to the reform of the primaries and the enlarged representation in conventions, show that the public mind is now aroused to the great importance of reform in the primaries. The Brooklyn Union well says, however, that there can be no such reform without a quickening of public intelligence and a revival of active personal interest in public affairs. The people—that is to say, the great body of the voters—must give time and take trouble, or there will be no reform.

The first step to induce them to give time and to take trouble is, as Mr. ROGERS shrewdly says, to bring the primaries into the daylight. They must be given the importance which justly belongs to them as the initiatory act of popular government. The law, as far as practicable, must surround them with the seriousness and dignity of an election, and party organizations must take care to make them perfectly free. This will stimulate the interest and activity of the individual voter, because it will assure him that his voice will be as influential as any other voice in selecting candidates. It will show the great multitude of honest men in the party who never attend a primary because they are sure that it would be of no use, that at the small cost of time and trouble necessary to drop a vote they can defeat rings and cliques which they would not undertake to defeat if they had to take their chance in a packed room. The poll of a primary open and conducted with the formality of an election, and the honest counting of the vote deposited, is as good a guarantee of free nominations as can be devised.

Such a poll, indeed, would not at first attract every voter. The habit of indifference must be overcome. The suspicion of bad faith must be allayed. A man whose legs have been tied until they are withered will not at once spring up and run when they are released. Emancipation did not endow the enslaved race with all wisdom and virtue. But unless actual interest in the conduct of public affairs and in the prosperity of the party agency upon which voters rely has altogether perished, a plan which will secure to every voter an equal weight in selecting the men who shall administer the government will probably bring as many voters to the poll of a primary as to that of an election. The more radical the remedy, the better. Senator MILLER'S suggestion of an enlarged convention is admirable. Not only would such a body be more difficult to manipulate, but it would give every district a direct interest in the convention, which would stimulate local and general enthusiasm. But the reform must begin in a way to bring the voter to the primary. For this it is necessary not only to give to each primary a delegate, but first of all to assure the individual voter that his vote will count at the primary, and that packing of the primary will be useless. This assurance can be given only as it is given at the actual election. This is the supplement of Senator MILLER'S capital proposition of primary representation in the convention. It is the plan suggested by Mr. ROGERS, and some three or four years ago by Mr. LANSING, both of Buffalo, and which may therefore be called the Buffalo plan.

LOOK OUT FOR THE LEGISLATURE.

THE State Senate which will be elected in New York this year will take part in the election of the next United States Senator. This fact will show to every voter the importance of the election and the necessity of securing proper nominations for the Legislature. The existing harmony must not persuade Republicans that the selection of candidates may be left to chance, and that any Republican is a good enough candidate. There is, indeed, a universal formal agreement upon the policy of reform in the caucus and in the civil service. But, as always happens under such circumstances, one part of the party earnestly favors the policy, and the other merely acquiesces, without especial interest in it, and even with a certain hostility to it. It is therefore indispensable to the prosperity of the reforms to which the party is committed that the Legislature should represent the reform sentiment in order that no reactionary United States Senator may be elected.

The selection of candidates for the Legislature should be determined by their known position upon the question of free primaries and of administrative reform, and when there is the least doubt of their views the candidates should be asked to declare them. There has been for some years a contest in the Republican party which has reached its natural issue in the success of the progressive sentiment. But the situation can be maintained only with care and sagacity.

The State platform declares the position of the party upon administrative reform, and no man can honorably ask or expect Republican support who does not fully and honestly accept it. It approves also the primary representation of the people upon "equal terms and fooling." No man who does not honestly hold this view, which involves rejection of the late machine management of the party, is a proper Republican representative. To elect State Senators this year and Assemblymen both this year and next year who are in full sympathy with these views is to elect a United States Senator who will represent and promote the real conviction and purpose of the Republican party.

THE NEW YORK REPUBLICAN PLATFORM.

THE Albany Express has crisply summarized the New York Republican platform as follows, and upon this platform the Convention, without dissent, nominated the present State officers, whose service has been most meritorious. It may be safely asserted that every Republican who declined to vote last year, or who voted against the Republican candidate to rebuke the nefarious means by which the nomination was secured, will gladly support the candidates and the platform of this year, reserving his opinions upon the question what policy best protects American labor:

"Approval of the national administration, the reduction of internal taxation, bounties to the nation's defenders, and the gradual extinction of the public debt

"The complete success of civil service reform

"A tariff affording revenue to the government and protection to American labor

"The promotion of American shipping

"The establishment of a national bureau of labor.

"Honest primary elections.

"No monopolies, no unjust discriminations in transportation, no violation of chartered privileges.

"Equal taxation

"Maintenance of free canals

"The right of the people to demand the submission of a constitutional amendment to popular vote in regard to the manufacture and sale of liquor."

MUSIC OF THE WINTER.

THE announcement of music for the winter in the city is unprecedentedly rich. The three greatest living prime donne of Italian opera will sing here simultaneously, and the ten great orchestras of THOMAS and DAMROSCH will play the noblest symphonies of the chief composers. There will be also admirable chamber concerts, and the few charmed evenings of the Mendelssohn Glee Club. No city in the world will be more attractive for the variety and excellence of its music.

Among the announcements none is more novel and interesting than that of the proposed series of THOMAS concerts for children or young persons. This is an enterprise which several ladies have suggested, who desire that their children who are studying music may have an opportunity to hear the best instrumental work which is most adapted to their years. To this end it must be carefully selected by an intelligent master, who will have regard to the conditions, and Mr. THOMAS was obviously the man. He has taken warm interest in the plan, and if the preliminary subscription at SCRIBNER'S and elsewhere shall warrant, the concerts will take place.

The general plan contemplates afternoon concerts not so long as to fatigue a young audience, the selections to be made from the brighter and "easier" works of the masters. There is something of the same general purpose in the scheme of the popular THOMAS audience in Brooklyn, and both series will undoubtedly tend to popularize without vulgarizing the best music. The advantage of the children's series to the young people who are studying music in plain. There could be no more delightful commentary or illustration or incitement added to their musical studies than such concerts.

ASSISTANT BISHOP POTTER

THE universal satisfaction and commendation with which the election of the Rev. HENRY C. POTTER to the Assistant Bishopric of New York has been received recalls the similar unanimity of feeling which greeted the elevation of Mr. Justice GRAY to the Supreme Bench. Dr. POTTER is the rector of Grace Church, in the city of New York, one of the largest, most prosperous, and most fashionable of the city churches, and no minister is more beloved and respected by his people. In his religious denomination he is a Liberal Churchman rather than a High or Low Churchman, and for that reason he is obnoxious to no ecclesiastical party.

This position is not of design, but results from personal character. No clergyman has been more severely tried by the perils of prosperity, and none has more simply and naturally surmounted them. His church is proverbially conservative. His own parish is, for a favorite pastor, a Sahara. But Dr. POTTER has kept his church in the van of all good and charitable and humane enterprises. The poor and the suffering and the needy have always found his voice to be their voice, and his hand their hand, and in his devotion to the essential duties of a Christian pastor he has had as time, nor has he had the taste, for ecclesiastical bickerings.

What Dr. POTTER has been as the pastor of a parish he will undoubtedly be as the bishop of a diocese—not as much as ex-Governor on a liberal and humane religious leader, by his catholic spirit and his wise and generous activity bringing all other churches into sympathy, although not into communion, with his own. The community as well as his Church may well be congratulated upon his election.

A GOOD NOMINATION

IT is a pleasure and a duty to commend such a nomination as that of Mr. STARR JANEWAY for the Supreme Judgeship in the Second District of New York. He seems to possess every quality which is desirable upon the bench—perfect integrity, manly legal learning, the judicial mind, professional experience, vigorous health of nature, intellectual independence; and while of Republican sympathies, he is entirely free from entangling political alliances. The State will be fortunate should the people at the Second District elect Mr. JANEWAY.

THE PEOPLE AND THE NEWTOWN STENCHES.

Two or three years ago we united with other journals, and with a great number of respectable and intelligent citizens, in exposing the dangerous nuisance of the Hunter's Point and Newtown Creek stench factories. They pollute the water and the air around the city, and breed and aggravate disease as well as desolate whole neighborhoods with sickening and stifling odors. The subject was brought to the attention of the Governor, who requested the State Board of Health to investigate. The Board reported that everything which had been stated was true, and the Governor ordered the pest-breeders to consume their refuse or to close their works.

Of course they paid no head to the summons, and the poisoning process continued. But the people of the immediate neighborhood in Kings and Queens counties decided not to submit longer, and they have procured the indictment of the nuisances by the Grand Jury. Governor CLEVELAND also, like his predecessor, has issued a stringent order, which the officers have enforced, and it will now be seen whether the people have any rights which sludge-pouring and fat-boiling and pest-breeding establishments can be compelled to respect.

The Health Boards of Kings and Queens had ordered the factories to be closed until the causes of complaint were removed. They were, however, kept hard at work during the night, and a detective, having obtained admission only by showing his shield and revolver, found at one factory several tons of horse-flesh and the remains of other animals spread upon wooden platforms, covered with sludge acid, and left to decompose in the sun. It is not surprising that the neighbors felt that the time had come for trying again which is strangest, an unscrupulous corporation or company, or the people. We shall not omit to note the progress of the contest.

THE PRESIDENT UPON BURNSIDE.

THE President's recent remarks at the laying of the corner-stone of the Burnside Memorial Hall in Bristol, Rhode Island, were a very felicitous and just description of a most honorable and patriotic citizen. He said:

"I heartily join with you in paying tribute to the memory of that distinguished citizen of Rhode Island whose name yonder structure is henceforth privileged to bear. So long as it shall endure it will in some degree serve to perpetuate the fame of a soldier faithful to his trusts, whose courage found its only rival in his modesty, of a statesman whose every act was prompted by the loftiest patriotism, and of an earnest, sincere, and manly gentleman who abounded in all courtesy, who scorned all deceit, and who never failed to follow in the path of duty whatsoever it led."

PERSONAL.

HAPPY is the artist who lives in a house which he himself has built and adorned. Mr. SAMUEL COLMAN'S new house at Newport is a charming specimen of old colonial architecture. The cubic wood-work of its spacious lavatories hall is slightly stained, so as to suggest neither red nor green, but a certain pleasantly neutral, and the bricks of its flooring, each twelve inches square, have been waxed and tinted to a painter's admiration. Throughout the building the ornamental porcelains are Chinese and Japanese ex clusively, creating a harmony far out of reach of any juxtaposition of English and Eastern products of the pottery. The tone of the library is a black blue, and the curious ceiling of Moorish design remains mainly of Eastern silks of various hues and embroidered devices. In the drawing-room the mural decoration illustrates the Persian idea of a mosaic of one tone against another, instead of the Occidental idea of a mixture of tones, and is a timeless study of rose and buff—two colors in the play of which an artist has a natural delight. The richly furnished studio is done on a scheme of the color of old armor—somewhat in the spirit of the Veterans' Room in the Seventh Regiment Armory.

—The bust of General WASHINGTON on the new two-cent postage stamp was engraved by that venerable Academician Mr. ALFRED JONES, from the celebrated mask which was taken from life by the French sculptor HOUDON. This mask, for a long time in the possession of CHARLES HALLS, the sculptor, was given by him to another sculptor, Mr. WILLIAM MACDONALD, and then sent in bronze by Mr. MACDONALD PARKE. Mr. WILLIAM PAGE'S portrait of WASHINGTON was painted from it, and from it also was modelled Mr. WILLIAM R. O'DONOVAN'S colossal statue which now stands in the public square of Caracas, Venezuela.

—Mr. THOMSON TOMLIN'S personal friends express their satisfaction over the financial success of his late series of ninety-six concerts. They say that the series has made him almost rich, and they declare that they are glad of it.

—In PUBLIC still lives, since $125,000 have been collected during the last year for the Peary Memorial Fund, and $125,000 more are expected to be raised this year.

—M. RENAN on princes: "A prince belongs par fonds to the profession of arms; a great prince may be mad enough to be a patron of literature, he should not be a man of letters. AUGUSTUS and LOUIS XIV., presiding over a splendid development of the intellect, are, next to the cities of genius, like Athens and Florence, the finest spectacle in history; NERO, CHILPERIC, King LOUIS of BAVARIA, are but caricatures."

—Professor W. G. SUMNER'S able and brief treatise on What Social Classes Owe to Each Other leads the Eclectic Magazine to wish that a copy of it could be put into the hands of every thinking man in America, because "it would help to clear up chaotic and sophistical reasoning on subjects of very false conclusions and to disturb the pictured harmony of things. After the great mass of plausible sentimental, and wild rubbish which has been talked and written on the various social and industrial problems of the time, this little book comes like a burst of sunlight."

—The position of foreigners in China is again becoming precarious. Less than fifty years ago English merchants or their employés were often glad to give up every dollar in their possession in order to save their lives, and the rights now in force and other Europeans were secured only after persistent struggles with the then very small force of the Celestials.

An American lady having complained that she could find no one to tell her where GEORGE ELIOT is buried in Highgate Cemetery, is consoled by a correspondent that a simple granite obelisk in that quiet and little frequented graveyard marks the spot, and can easily be found.

—It is the universal experience of mankind, observes a late essayist, that "those whose lives are spent among hardships and dangers seem less perceptible of the elements of beauty or romance which accompany them, and are sensible only of the stern realities of their lot." This, doubtless, explains why Cunard captains are proverbially so indifferent to the belles of the voyage.

—The new Luther Hall in the venerable town of Wittemberg consists of the Reformer's lecture-room, and of the six rooms adjoining it which he and his wife and ten children inhabited.

—From the London Times of September 14: "The fact that every Englishman carries his patriotism for British beer with him into the remotest corners of the earth accounts for the enormous export trade which is carried on in that commodity."

—We are sorry to read in the Athenæum that the proposed fund for the financial benefit of Mr. MARTIN FARQUHAR TUPPER "seems" to be making progress. We wish there could be no doubt about the matter. Hundreds of persons whose chief glory was derived only from their connection in killing pouds have had funds raised for them, but Mr. TUPPER never harmed a human being.

—An amateur fisherman on board a smack in the North Sea describes his life as "rough to the extreme." Fresh water was carried only for drinking, and when he wished to take his bath he dismissed himself on deck, and got one of the sailors to bore water at him from buckets. "This kind of bath is extremely bracing. The sailors will put themselves to any trouble for you, and I regularly took my twelve buckets as an extra three times a day." His breakfast consisted of fried fish—fresh from the sea, crisp and delicious, and cooked on coal—hard biscuits, and tea strong and warm; his dinner of salt beef, potatoes, and suet dumpling. He caught large numbers of turbot, soles, cod, flounders, and haddock.

—ALPHONSE refers to his wife as "the Austrian princess who assists me in the duties of my royal office."

—A recent artist on gloves mentions a pair into which some fastian powder had been put for the purpose of squaring the hands of a lady to whom they were to be sent, another pair filled with gold, and offered to a judge, and a third pair which WALKER put on when he desired to impress his contempt for MYRIAMANUS, whose symphony he was about to conduct at a Philharmonic concert.

—Mr. DUFFERIN CODE, the dramatic critic and novelist, died of heart-disease on the steps of the front porch of his house. A servant inside the building heard the door-bell ring, and, on answering it, found her master lying on the stones. He was dead before a physician could reach him. Mr. CODE did a great deal of solid work in his profession, and some of it will be of value to the future historians of the English stage.

—Says the Lahore (India) Gazette: "The last magazine article on an Indian topic that has appeared for some little while is one published in FRASER'S MAGAZINE for June. If the writers who overland English periodicals with their disquisitions on local autonomy for India, or with lucubrations on the state of Indian finance, only knew as much and wrote as cleverly as the author of the Hatrack's paper on 'Indian Art in Metal and Wood,' the English public, instead of being bored by India, would perhaps be both interested and enlightened."

—A transparently simple passage from a current novel: "'Love,' said the ardent, impassioned Bertha, 'pure and in its initiative, bestowed on a worthy object, still leaves that object to its own nature, and then rise with it. Set on an unworthy one, of whom the estimate in its crude state exceeded its intrinsic worth, it may run out, but that will scarcely affect the order of the passion, which, in its intensity, provided it had even but a slight basis to work on, will still elevate the object, at least to its own ideal; to do otherwise, it would cease to be love.' 'On the contrary,' interposed Burnet, 'it is itself subordinated, for, according to your theorism, assimilating itself to its object, whom it first endows with unreal and even theocratic attributes, it so thoroughly achieves therein that it loses its own identity.'" Harriet here stops a moment, presumably for a short visit to the pantry.

—The invalid's room furnishes a late repository in wealth the depository of a great deal of gossip. For the amusement of an invalid many people think it justifiable to make a good story a little better, and they will speak uncharitably of others in order to be charitable to the sick. After eulogizing his neighbors as the most flagrant manner, a man will leave the chamber of an invalid priding himself on having perpetrated an act of mercy. The patient must be made to laugh, at whatever cost, and he is sure to be tempted to entertain others with gossip at second hand, as it is the only manner in which he can repay the visitors for their kindness in coming to see him. It is not an uncommon thing for an invalid's room to be a regular hot-bed of gossip and scandal.

—JOHN BURNETT on Lord RIPON, the Governor-General of India: "I have known Lord RIPON ever since he was a child. A short time before he started for India I met him one day in Piccadilly, and asked him about his appointment. 'Rest assured,' he said, 'that my change in my religious belief (he had just become a Catholic) has made no change in my political principles. I have been offered by Mr. GLADSTONE this great appointment, and I will try to discharge its duties faithfully.'"

—"From the first," says Mr. GLADSTONE, "I have watched the temperance question with great interest, but I am bound to say that no phase of it ever yielded me so much satisfaction as the sight of large numbers of ministers of all denominations, and of course still larger numbers of members of perhaps all the churches, wearing the blue ribbon: it is an exceedingly gratifying circumstance, and speaks well for the future."

—A traveller ascending the Himalayas, and when near the top, not unaccustomed to a sudden and violent storm, which obliged him to turn back and seek the refuge of his camp, but he found no more difficulty in breathing at a height of 22,000 feet than at a height of 12,000 feet. He ate but little game, although lucky enough to get a fine ounce, or snow leopard.

—The Hon. Secretary of the London Swimming Club writes to the London Times that most of the accidental drownings on the English coast are erroneously attributed to cramp. "I have for a period of twenty years had communication with immense bodies of habitual bathers, and, except in one case, where a man had contracted for a match, I never heard of a case of cramp; and to that case it did not prevent the man's winning the race." The chief cause of accidental drownings he believes to be "that men do not accustom themselves to the water," and when once they lose their presence of mind, "which is caused sometimes by a mere trifle, it help is not at hand to re-assure them, drowning is almost inevitable."

—An able French essayist, M. EMILE MONTÉGUT, who understands SHAKESPEARE, and has translated him into French, went recently to see a performance of Macbeth on the stage. Confessing to a friend his disappointment at what he had seen, he added: "SHAKESPEARE is too great a poet not to lose much on the theatre. It is right that SHAKESPEARE'S plays should be acted, but on this condition, that it is clearly understood beforehand what he loses by it. When one truly knows the great poet it is interesting to learn what are the purely physical emotions the actor scene can give. But those who know the poet only in the theatre carry away with them the most false and narrow idea of his work."

—Mr. THOMAS SUMNER PEARY, author of English Literature in the Eighteenth Century has received from a distinguished French author and professor M. KNAPP, a proposal to have that excellent and very successful book translated into the French language. There are no works of that class in that language, and M. KNAPP supposes a belief that a signal service would be rendered to men of letters in France by a translation of Mr. PEARY'S book. It will be noticed that M. KNAPP does not propose to revise the book.

—The "Veiled Prophet," a mysterious personage of St. Louis, made a triumphal march through the streets of that city on the evening of Tuesday, the 2d inst. The throngs of people who witnessed the procession were unparalleled in number and enthusiasm. The Prophet and his high-priests, heralds, standard-bearers, etc., led the line, which was several miles in length. Following his gorgeous chariot was a long succession of floats, representing scenes of Fairy land, with Queen Mab, who was seated in a mushroom-shaped chariot drawn by mice, and other characters from fairy-lore. CHAPTER XVIII.

If the reader ever owned a dog of uncertain lineage and unsatisfactory points, he will doubtless have acquiesced sadly and humbly in any adverse criticisms passed upon his property by—let us say South, who is a competent judge and the reader's very good friend. But if the ignorant and offensive Jones should have ventured to pronounce an unsolicited verdict to the same effect, the case will certainly have assumed an altogether different complexion. Under such circumstances the cur ceases suddenly to be a cur, and develops into a valuable mongrel; wins hooked like blemishes just now become positive beauties, the dog is a first-rate dog—in, at all events, better than any dog that Jones ever had, or is likely to have. Then my opinion of the dubious Chapman, which had sunk very nearly to zero under the influence of Lady Constance's contemptuous remarks, rose many degrees the moment that Mr Sotheran thought fit to announce that the stranger did not possess his esteem. "Pasque Philippe di non, mai je dis oui" cried the citizen who recorded his vote after that of the Duke of Orleans upon the question of the postponement of the King's execution; and when Mr Sotheran, who, from living in the same hotel as Chapman, had various opportunities of studying his merits and demerits, declared that he had "taken the man's measure," and didn't care about associating with him, I asked no better reason for asserting boldly that there was nothing whatever amiss with the man, that he was capital company, and that I hoped he would be induced to make a long stay at Fratzenschloss.

Now it was perfectly true that Chapman was capital company, and, whether his history and occupations would have borne looking into or not, it was difficult to help liking him. I had seen a good deal of him during the week that had elapsed between his first reception by Lady Constance and his condemnation by the illustrious Sotheran, and I had found him not only clever and amusing, but to a somewhat special degree amiably disposed toward myself. There was a shade of deprecature, too, in his bearing which appealed to one's generous impulses. "I know I am an outcast," his manner sometimes seemed to say; "I am aware that my antecedents are shady enough to justify you in showing me the cold shoulder; but at least I have done you no harm, and if it pleases you to come every man them and talk to a poor devil who is out of luck, I don't see why I should send you away." Probably he guessed that Lady Constance had told me all that she knew about him—indeed, he hinted as much, though he was not inclined to be communicative about himself.

"I have had a hard life, Maxwell," he said to me one day; "and, for the matter of that, I have lived hard. When one has reached middle age, one can't turn back and begin all over again. You must take a man of forty as you would take a wife, for better or worse, there's no use in finding fault with him. Luckily in has this great point of superiority over a wife, that if you don't like him you can leave him."

I assured Chapman, with such circumlocution as the case seemed to require, that I did not mean to leave him. Independently of the loan in his favor with which Mr Sotheran had unwittingly furnished me, I felt greatly drawn to this most inoffensive declasse. He never sought my society, but he was evidently grateful for it, and I did what was in my power to mend matters the place pleasant to him. I could not well introduce him to Lord Rossan; but I made him acquainted with Pemberton, for whom, however, I was disappointed to find that he was not met in a spirit of confidence. Pemberton, who had seen men and cities, had a lofty horror of what he called "casual King fishmen," and strongly advised me to avoid intimacy with this one. "If I want to borrow money of you before long," said he; "and one of these mornings he'll disappear, leaving his tradesmen to send their little accounts to us you. You see if he doesn't."

Lady Constance was less particular. She did not take much notice of Chapman, but she made no objection to receiving him, and treated him, upon the whole, very much as she treated the other frequenters of her drawing room. After a certain lapse of time she observed to me that if he intended to make a long stay he might as well be presented to her brother, and replied to my demurrer by incontinently asking him to dinner. Rather to our surprise, he accepted the invitation. I should have mentioned that Lady Constance was in the habit of occasionally bidding friends to partake of her brother's hospitality, and that this privilege of hers had never been called in question, though it was plain enough that her sister-in-law only lent it an unwilling countenance. As for Lord Rossan, he was the most easy-going of men up to a certain point; but, perhaps for that very reason, it was not prudent to take liberties with him. Lady Constance had taken an unquestionable liberty in forcing him to receive Mr Chapman, and both she and her guest were made to understand this. When Chapman presented himself, looking very like a gentleman in his well fitting evening clothes, he was greeted by a cold bow from his host, a still colder one from his hostess, and was left to his own devices.

This behavior, which made me uncomfortable and Lady Constance angry, did not in the least disturb Chapman's calm. During dinner he spoke little, and turned off with a good deal of quiet tact the direct invitations addressed to him across the table by Lady Constance to show some resentment for the slight put upon him. An attitude of dignified reserve was, no doubt, the most becoming that he could have assumed under the circumstances; what I did not quite understand was why he should have voluntarily placed himself in so unpleasant and awkward a situation.

But as soon as the ladies had left us, he explained his conduct in a manner that fairly took my breath away by its audacity. He rose from his place, walked up to the head of the table, where Lord Rossan was sitting, and said

"I owe you an apology, my lord, for intruding upon you this evening. You have shown me in the plainest possible way that I have been guilty of an intrusion, and I fully admit it. When Lady Constance Milner was kind enough to ask me to dinner, I only accepted in order to have an opportunity—which I could not otherwise have found—of saying personally to you how vexed I have been to think that one of your attaches should have so nearly got into a scrape through my stupidity. It is disagreeable enough to have to confess that one has been drawn into bad company one's self; but it would have been inexcusable to drag a young fellow and a total stranger into the mess, if one had done such a thing intentionally. I only wished to say for myself that I am really innocent of that offense, and also to express my regret for the whole affair, which, I assure you, can only have caused you greater annoyance than it has me."

With that he bowed, nodded and smiled to me as he passed my chair, and made as though he would leave the room.

Lord Rossan's hostility was disarmed at once. His generous Irish nature, which was but thinly overlaid with an acquired diplomatic veneer, would never have suffered him to turn a friendless man away from his table; nor could he in justice hold Chapman responsible for Lady Constance's breach of propriety.

"Sit down, my dear sir," he exclaimed, ruing and hastily interrupting his guest's retreat, "pray sit down again, and don't trouble yourself any more about that unlucky business. Dear me! haven't we all been in queer company once or twice in our lives? Wait now till I tell you a story about the Bishop of Derry and a thimble-rigger, who took him to task for poaching against Punchestown Races."

His good humor and his brogue had returned simultaneously, and in another five minutes Chapman and he were discussing horseflesh and steeple-chasing as if they had been friends all their lives. But Pemberton, who had watched the scene with an ironical smile, whispered to me, "All very fine; but if he was as desperately anxious to apologize, what hindered him from sending in his card and asking for an interview? I should laugh if he were to do clear old Rossan out of a twenty pound note after this."

As such source of merriment was provided for Pemberton's benefit, Mr Chapman now became a tolerably constant visitor at the Legation, and as he was careful never to present himself in Lord Rossan's quarter of the building without a direct invitation, and was invariably agreeable and unobtrusive when he came, the obscurity which hung over his antecedents (and which he made no attempt to disembark) was soon forgotten.

But no one part, I ended by finding it rather strange that he should never by word or hint have betrayed who he was or where he came from. Chance acquaintances are not, of course, expected to produce immediate vouchers for their respectability, still, there are few people with whom one can associate upon terms of intimacy for a month without hearing something of their belongings and ordinary pursuits. At the expiration of that period I had told Chapman the whole, or nearly the whole, of my own history, and in some parts of it he had seemed to be greatly interested. At last there came an evening in such unlike it than he abruptly broached the mysterious subject.

"I dare say you have often wondered, Maxwell," said he, "why I have displayed quietly to all that you have told me about your concerns, and have never said a word to you in return about mine."

We were sitting before the fire in his little salon at the Russischer Hof, whither we had returned after spending the afternoon in skating. I still not quite know what reply to make, so I adopted the safe course of making none.

"You see," he continued, "my affairs are not quite so pleasant to talk over as yours. I am like your unfortunate cousin, I have been under a cloud pretty nearly all my life."

"But not for the same reason, I am sure," observed I, wishing to say something pleasant, and succeeded in saying quite the most awkward thing that I could have hit upon.

Chapman drew the tip of his waxed mustache through his white fingers, and looked at the fire. "I thought," said he, "that you considered your cousin's sin sufficiently punished by now."

"So I do. I shouldn't allow it to make the slightest difference in my behavior to him if we met. Only, between ourselves, you know, he talent have been a queer customer at one time."

"Ah, that in modern Christianity all over! One may forgive, at a pinch, but one knows better than to forget. And yet the theory, I believe, is that you may commit any sin under the sun, and it will not only be forgiven, but absolutely obliterated, if you go down on your knees, and confess, and repent. It is easy enough, you see, to square our little account with Heaven; but when it comes to applying the same rule to our own conduct—pas si bête!"

I was not concerned to point out the fallacy of this reasoning, but I thought there was some thing to be said on the side of those who, having been once beaten, are twice shy. "The difficulty is," I remarked, "to judge whether repentance in sincere."

"Do you mean seriously to tell me that that would affect the matter one way or the other?"

"I think it would, certainly."

"Well, I believe your cousin's repentance is sincere, in fact, I am sure it is. I ought to know as much about it as any body, because I am the man."

This was said so tranquilly that I did not at first realize the meaning of the words, and took it that Chapman was merely implying by a figure of speech that his history and my cousin's were in some respects identical. But he did not suffer me to remain much longer in doubt. "I assure you I am speaking the truth," he said, with a rather amused look.

I suppose it is only exceptionally gifted persons who can find appropriate words in which to express their feelings when confronted with a startling disclosure. I have noticed that most people in remments of sudden emotion say something utterly ridiculous, as I did upon the present occasion. What I said in my bewilderment was: "By George! Then your name isn't Chapman at all?"

"Certainly not," he replied, compassionately; "my name in Le Marchant, and I use it—sometimes Chapman is the name same with another derivation, you know." And then, after a momentary silence: "I have astonished you more than I expected to do; it seemed to me that you must have had some suspicion of this."

I shook my head energetically. "Never?—never for a single moment! I'm awfully glad to see you, now, I added, making an effort to rise to the level of the occasion, but still oppressed with a painful sense of inability to grasp my companion's identity. And then we shook hands, and Harry, as I must now call him, heaved a deep sigh.

"Why didn't you tell us this before?" I asked.

"It would be more to the purpose to ask why I have told you now, wouldn't it? Well, I don't know why, except that I felt it would be too mad to go on deceiving you. Of course I would rather have held my tongue. I am a miserable, lonely sort of beggar, I haven't many friends in the world—or rather, I have none; and you and I got on well together; perhaps I may say that we have liked each other. Now there will have to be an end of all that."

"How an end?" I don't understand what you mean," said I. "If we were friends before, we could be doubly friends now—naturally."

"I don't know about naturally," observed Harry, with a faint smile. "To my mind, it wouldn't be a very natural kind of friendship. Why, only a few minutes ago you said you were sure I had never been guilty of such an offense as your cousin's. Well, now you know that I was guilty of that same offense. It stands to reason that you must have a proportionately lower opinion of me."

"Not a bit!" I declared, stoutly. "That doesn't follow at all."

"Excuse me, my dear fellow, but it must follow. Besides, I can see by your face what you are thinking. Suppose we say good-by now; and I'll promise to clear out of Fratzenschloss in a day or two."

"You jump to conclusions in such a frantic hurry," I complained, "that you don't give me time to collect my ideas. I haven't said how delighted I am to have discovered you at last, but surely, after all that I have told you, you must understand that. You may be sure that I shall not rest now till I have got you back to Thirlby again."

"I hope," broke in Harry, quickly, "that you don't think I have revealed myself to you with any expectation of your carrying out those quixotic plans you spoke to me of."

"Quixotic or not, I mean to carry them out, I can tell you," said I.

"You must not think of it. I won't say anything about my having forfeited my birthright, because, after all, that is a point about which I am not quite so certain. I won't say either that you have been kind to me, and that therefore it would go against the grain with me to cut you out of your property, but I will give you two reasons for keeping what I have told you to yourself—a good one and a better one. I don't want Thirlby; I haven't the smallest wish to be a country squire in a neighborhood where everybody would cut me: that is the good reason. The better one is that, however much I might covet the place, no power on earth would induce my father to leave it to me. If I know anything of him, he would sooner see me starve."

"Perhaps you don't know him so well," said I. "You can't know him so well as I do, or you would not speak of him in that way."

"We speak of him according to our different experiences of him, I suppose," said Harry, good-humoredly. "If you were to ask General Cavaignac and General St. Arnaud what they thought of Napoleon III., you would probably get two accounts of the same man which couldn't be made to fit in with each other in any way, and sometimes, when you have talked to me about your uncle, I have found it rather difficult to believe that you were describing my father. My father was very harsh to me when I was a boy," he added, in a graver tone, "and I can't forget it. As for his having cut me adrift afterward, nobody is likely to blame him for that."

"Well, perhaps he may have changed," I said. "However that may be, I know he has not finally made up his mind to disinherit you. He told me that it would make a difference, for instance, if you were to distinguish yourself in some way."

"Which I am so extremely likely to do! I have as many opportunities of distinguishing myself, have I not? You had better let him know that you have met me, and when he asks how and where, 'Oh, in a gambling hell, half drunk, in company with three card-sharpers.' I should think you are certain to succeed in melting his resolution."

"Well," I said, not much liking these sneers, yet feeling that there was perhaps a little excuse for them, "you will give me leave to try, at all events."

"Indeed I will not," he returned, "that is the very thing that I am not going to do. Seriously, my dear Maxwell, I want you to understand that when I have told you I must remain a profound secret. I trust on your honor not to mention it to anybody, here or elsewhere. In particular I wish you to keep it from Lady Constance Milner, who knows quite enough of me as Mr. Chapman, and who might get me into all kinds of trouble if she were to let out that my name is Harry Le Marchant."

I promised without hesitation not to say a word to anybody in Fratzenschloss, but declined to be put upon my honor as regarded keeping my secret in ignorance. "It is absurd to ask such a thing," I said. "You ought to have made your conditions before you spoke."

He went on stroking his mustache with the shiny hand of his, and frowned thoughtfully at the glowing logs on the hearth. "I suppose I ought. Well, still, you at least agree to keep my secret—after all, it is my secret, not yours—and I give you leave to make it known."

"I won't agree to anything," I declared. "I might wait long enough before you gave me leave to help you. The English of all this is that you don't want to deprive me of what you are pleased to consider my rights, whereas I don't mean to deprive you of what I know are yours."

"Don't talk such unutterable bosh," he retorted, sharply. "What, in the name of goodness, do you take me for? I tell you I am nothing but an adventurer, and as for a man's conscience, I haven't been able to afford such a thing for years. Pray don't run away with the notion that I should abandon any of my rights, or other people's rights either, if I could get hold of them. And don't imagine that you would render me the smallest service by letting my father know that you had come across me: it would be all the other way. He is aware that I am alive; what more have you to tell him, by way of inducing him to reconsider his decision, except that I sometimes go about under a feigned name, and that, after associating with me for a few weeks, you haven't yet had your pocket picked?"

There seemed to be something in that. I said, "All right; I'll hold my tongue for the present, but I won't commit myself to anything more than that."

Harry made an impatient gesture, as who should say, "Take your way, then." Presently he resumed: "All things considered, I am glad to have made a clean breast of it in one, and I am glad, too, that you don't feel yourself called upon to drop my acquaintance. If you would let me know sometimes when you are passing through London, it would be a kindness. You can't, of course, understand what an immense boon it is to a runaway, such as I am, to be allowed to talk to a gentleman again." He paused and then added in a lower tone, "It can't be very out either for you, who have never committed a dishonorable action in your life, to understand how I came to ruin myself as I did in years gone by. Well, perhaps, some said, someone needed."

"I wish you wouldn't talk like that," I exclaimed. "By-gones are be-gones, let us agree never to refer to them again. And look here" I added, moved by a sudden and perhaps rather foolish impulse to make him feel more upon an equality with me—"you are wrong in supposing that I have never done anything dishonorable. If I or you something about myself which I have never told to any one else, will you promise to keep my secret? You see I make my conditions beforehand."

He replied, with a look of some surprise, that if might rely upon his discretion, and then, half repenting already of what I was doing, I made a brief and hurried confession of my treachery to Maud, and my admiration for Lady Constance. He did not appear to be astonished. He had seen from the first, he said, how matters were. And so for ever throwing Miss Dennison overboard is a matter over that doesn't seem to me such a terrible thing. There was no engagement, you see, and therefore there can be nothing dishonorable in your changing your mind, according to circumstances. But then you will probably think that my lights are likely to be a little dim. Nor, if you'll allow me, I'll give you a piece of advice. Don't be discouraged about Lady Constance. She is worth winning, for, independently of her personal attractions, about which I presume to offer no opinion, she is a woman who will get her husband on in the world, or know the reason why. Some day you will thank more of that than you do now. And I don't see why you shouldn't do her. She will make a certain income a condition, I grant you, but you will have a good income."

"No, I shall not," I interrupted.

He smiled, and said we couldn't discuss that. "And besides—what do I know?—she may be capable of marrying you without the income, for she is anything but mercenary by nature. Don't you despair, and don't lose patience."

This counsel was so very unlike what I should have expected to receive from any one the one man that it fairly astounded me. Naturally too, I was both pleased and encouraged by it, and for the next half-hour I forgot everything else in discussing upon the curious facility with which Lady Constance had besmirched me, and my generalness to resist her influence—to all of which Harry listened with a good deal of kindly attention.

Not many days after this he left somewhat abruptly for London, whither he was summoned by business, which (as I gathered from what Lady Constance let fall) was connected with the financial operations already alluded to. He gave me the address of an eating-house in the City where he was always to be heard of. "For you won't require to be told that I don't belong to a club," he remarked, with a rather bitter little laugh.

THE CITY GOVERNMENT.

THE population of New York has increased within the past twenty years about fifty per cent. The cost of its government has increased during the same period about three hundred and thirty per cent., and the amount paid for salaries four hundred and thirty-three per cent. Nevertheless, New York is to-day the dirtiest, the most expensive, the worst governed, and perhaps the most uncomfortable city which is inhabited by civilized men. It ought to be the healthiest city on the globe; instead of being so, it stands in that respect far down on the list. As the most democratic city in the world, its government should be purer than that of any other; instead, however, its officials, considered either as officials or as individuals, are, as a rule, less respectable persons than the officials of any other city, the greater part of its debt, said Governor TILDEN'S City Commission, "represents a vast aggregate of moneys wasted, embezzled, or misapplied", and in no city are official frauds, defalcations, and thieves so frequent, so shameless, and, it must be added, so quickly condoned or forgotten, as in New York. Within the past six months it has been discovered that there were thieving and black mailing going on in the Commissioner of Jurors' office, that there had been great frauds committed in the Comptroller's office, and that the frankest sort of stealing was taking place in the Bureau of Water Register and in the Bureau of Arrears. These things are investigated and talked about, but the public would be much less surprised at the discovery of similar malfeasance in the other city departments than if the offenders should be brought to justice. We are callous to corruption, and the offenders and their offenses are quickly veiled by popular forgetfulness. Every day one may see on Broadway former city officers who resigned as were discharged in disgrace walking about apparently as prosperous and as happy as if there was no such thing as disgrace in the world. The stealing is not, however, all direct stealing. We support great numbers of superfluous officials, and we pay enormously salaries the amounts of which are simply outrageous.

The clerks of justices' courts, for example, receive three and four thousand dollars a year, and we pay the aldermen two thousand dollars for ten or three hours a week of mischief-making. These latter gentlemen do so little good that we are apt to think them harmless, and to forget in how much positive evil they are responsible. We owe to them the constant disorder of the streets, and their misuse of the power of confirmation is notorious. MAYOR EDSON, in a quasi-apology for some scandalous nomination made by him, intimated that he could get nothing done without coming down in the level of the Board of Aldermen; and probably no improvement in the administration of city affairs will be practicable until their power of confirmation is taken away. Thirteen of the present Board are liquor dealers, and it is a matter of common gossip that it has long been necessary in order to get any measure through the Board to resort to bribery. It is not stiled by that name—Heaven forbid!—but to carry your measure you must "retain counsel."

The retainers are very large, in order, as one of these "counsel" explained, that there may be "so much for each alderman in the majority," and a moiety as compensation for his own services. The aldermanic view of legislature is illustrated by a story, said to be true, of a reputable lawyer who wanted some measure passed by the Board, but found that he must either pay for it roundly, or else slip it through "unbeknownst" to them. He accordingly prepared an innocent looking resolution, which was introduced and passed. No sooner had the passage been announced than one meditative alderman jumped up, and slapping the table, cried out, in the most chagrined tones, "My God, here, there was money into that thing!" meaning thereby that he and his friends had lost an opportunity to plunder. There is one other form of indirect corruption which is carried to such an extent in New York as to be almost peculiar to it, namely, the practice of assessing candidates for office. This practically amounts to auctioning off the nominations to certain offices to the highest bidder. There are now in one of the upper courts of New York city two judges, one of whom is reported to have mortgaged his salary for a term of years in order to pay his assessment, and the other of whom is said to have paid twenty-five thousand dollars in cash for his nomination—not more, that would have been flagrant, but in the form of an "assessment."

The causes of all these conditions lie in the fact that in New York city local self-government has been practically abolished, and all proper civic feeling consequently weakened or destroyed; in the fact of the intermixture of municipal with State and national politics, and in the consequent development in the city administration of the spoils system. All the laws for the city of New York are made, not by its own citizens, but by the Legislature at Albany, and to this fact is to be attributed the number of bad laws and the great confusion of all the laws relating to the city. Governor TILDEN'S Commission said upon this point, in 1877: "It may be term that the first attempts to secure legislative intervention in the local affairs of our principal cities were made by good citizens in the supposed interest of reform and good government, and to counteract the schemes of corrupt officials. The notion that legislative control was the proper remedy was a serious mistake. The corrupt citizens and rings then sought to be baffled were quick to perceive that in the business of procuring special laws concerning local affairs they could easily outmatch the artful and clumsy labors of disinterested citizens. The transfer of the control of the municipal resources from the localities to the capital had no other effect than to cause a like transfer of the methods and arts of corruption.

"If any one questions the mischievous results of these practices [legislative interference], he has but to note the increase of debt and taxation in the city of New York from 1860 to the present time [1877], during which legislative intervention in the local affairs of that city has been most extensively asserted. The debt has increased from eighteen millions to one hundred and thirteen millions, and taxation for annual expenditures from nine to twenty-eight millions."

The transfer of the battle-ground for honest government of the city to Albany has made it no difficult in fix the responsibility for bad measures, and rendered the whole contest so difficult, that good citizens have generally given up the endeavor, and been contented to leave the contest in the hands of the national parties. Those citizens, moreover, who really desire good government are so absorbed in their own affairs that they are unable to compete with those to whom politics is a means of livelihood. They become disheartened, and therefore inefficient, and they are very apt to be hopelessly blinded by their affiliations with the national political parties, so that when the opportunity to do a good piece of political work is presented to them, they can hardly be induced to take advantage of it. Last year, for instance, the Citizens' Committee presented candidates for office, all of whom, but particularly the judicial candidates, were incomparably the superiors of their competitors. Yet thousands of reputable Democrats voted for the inferior candidates because they thought that they might otherwise "hurt their State ticket." How, some of them ever specified.

So this year the citizens have again an opportunity to rescue the Board of Aldermen, and to elect four judges, and yet it is uncertain whether they will act. The prime cause, however, of most of the waste and extravagance in the city government, and the direct cause of such scandals and corruption as have lately been unearthed in the bureaus of Water Register and of Arrears, in the Commissioner of Jurors' and the Comptroller's offices, in the treatment of public offices as the private property of political parties, by means of which they pay debts, and for whose benefit they err in be administered.

The first object of an employé in the Chemical Bank, for example, is to attend to his business, and if he fails to do it he is found out and discharged. But the first object of an employé in the Comptroller's or Sheriff's office, on the other side of Broadway, is not at all to attend to his proper business, but to attend to the business of his particular faction. If he is negligent, or if he steals, forges bonds, or levies black mail, the chances are that his superiors are too much occupied with primaries, deals, and "seeing the boys" to find him out, and he is not discharged.

We need to have business in the City Hall managed just like business in the bank, whereas, under the present system, employés of the city are furnished with every facility for being corrupt, and with every inducement to regard their official duties as of secondary importance. The remedy is to apply the principles of civil service reform to the city government. Such a reformation is needed quite as much in New York as it ever was at Washington. Under Chapter 334 of the laws of 1883 the Mayor has the power to begin the reform, and if he is correctly reported as saying that the recent exposures "have made him sick at heart," we may hope that it will be begun, and that he will use all his influence to secure the additional legislation needed in place the administration of the city government upon precisely the same basis as that of any other business corporation. Then, and not until then, we may be reasonably sure that the next six months will not bear such fruit of scandals as the last.

The remedy for legislative interference is provided in a proposed amendment to the Constitution, which comes finally before the Legislature at its next session. This, in substance, guarantees to cities the right of municipal self-government, republican in form, and restricts the power of the Legislature in the enactment of general laws in reference thereto. It prescribes that it shall be the duty of the Legislature to provide for the organization of cities and incorporated villages, and to restrict their power of taxation, borrowing money, and contracting debts. Such power, by the passage of general laws only, applicable alike to all incorporated cities, and that the Legislature shall not pass any special or local bill affecting the municipal government of a city.

It also provides that no city shall increase its permanent debt beyond the rate of taxation about that prevailing at the time of the adoption of the amendment, or undertake new public works without public hearing on the question of issue thereof, and the act authorizing the same shall have been published for at least three months, and thereafter submitted to the people of the city at a general election, and received a majority of all the votes cast for and against it at such election."

The adoption of this amendment would be a long step forward. The good people of New York should see to it that it is passed by the next Legislature; and as after its adoption it will be too late for the Legislature to undo the evil it has done, they should also see to it that the charter is amended this winter by providing that the Mayor shall have the power to appoint the heads of departments absolutely, and to remove them without trial—then, if improper appointments are made, the responsibility for them will be clear; 2, that there shall be only single heads of the city departments; 3, that the election for city officers shall take place in March or April. Only by a spring election can the selection of municipal officers be discovered from the confusing influences, the passions, and the intrigues of national politics. The allegation that the people can not be induced to come out for a spring election, and did not do so when such elections were held, is incorrect, and the statistics do not bear it out. The condition of the government of the city of New York is well known. If the respectable people of the city desire to better it, those remedies, which are those generally agreed upon by those who have most carefully studied the subject, are within their grasp. If the people want good government they can have it.

MACKEREL FISHING.

"LOOK at that fleet of yachts!" exclaimed a New-Yorker, as he stood on the rocky shore near Booth's Bay, on the coast of Maine.

"Those be mackerel boats," remarked an old fisherman, who was mending his pots close by. "There's nasty weather comin'," continued the old sea-dog, "an them fellows wouldn't be makin' harbor."

True to his prediction, the "nasty weather" soon came in the form of a drifting black fog, accompanied by rain-squalls. It is an ill wind that blows nobody good, and as the harbor rapidly filled with the graceful mackerel boats the writer jumped into a small boat and pushed from the shore for a closer inspection. The first schooner reached was the Levanter, from Gloucester, and well might she be mistaken at a short distance for a yacht. Her tall masts were almost hid in the drifting fog, and although the rough weather and salt spray had turned the gilding on her bow, and bleached the black hull, still she was neat in appearance, and the grace of her lines told of speed.

"Come aboard!" shouted a tall man who, with pipe in mouth, stood near the wheel. Aboard everything was as neat and tidy as a Yankee kitchen. Fourteen or fifteen men form a crew enough to man the seine boats and dories.

Mackerel run in schools at the surface of the water, like menhaden, and the dark spot they make on the water can be seen at a great distance on a clear day. A man is posted at the mast-head, and keeps a lookout until fish are seen. After a school is sighted it often happens that the whole crew, with the exception of the cook, leave the schooner, and while they are seining the master of pots and kettles runs the craft single-handed. The seiner is another important passenger aboard the boat, and at the request of the crew a sketch was made of him at work. There, perched upon the cross-trees of the mizen mast, two swinging twenty feet or so are from one side to the other, the writer sketched the lookout as the opposite mast-head.

Leaving the Levanter, with many invitations to call again, we pointed our boat for the dock of the canning factory. Here we found men busy cleaning "tinkers" (small mackerel), removing the head and entrails with one dexterous cut of the knife. These fish are put up in neat cans, and make a very palatable morsel. Numerous pretty girls, with fresh complexions and rosy cheeks, work in these factories, and it was an odd sight to see them crowded around a long wooden trough, filling the cans about to tumbled astonished with coal oil.

All along the shore when the mackerel are running, the expert circles and whistles, while, with an eye sharper than the man at the mast-head, he searches for fish. After a headlong plunge into their midst it is seldom he appears without his plunder glistening in his talons.

There are about seven hundred sail and an army of men engaged in pursuing the mackerel, and about three millions of dollars are invested in the business. The men go shares on the catch, the cook alone having a regular salary. The last not been a good season, but the fishermen do not appear to be discouraged, for, like all sailors, they let the morrow take care of itself.

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

CONFLAGRATIONS are made by the managers of some of the smaller Western railroads that the cars which they send to the east board are often carelessly or by design loaded for points in the West remote from the places of departure. These cars sometimes find their way to the tracks of rival roads that are still more poorly equipped, and trouble without end is made for the lost-car agents, whose office is made necessary by the exigencies of freight traffic over the vast railway system of this country.

A delegate to a Greenback Convention in Bedford rose "on a point of order." When asked to state his point, he said that he had been trying for half an hour to make a motion, and he didn't want to wait any longer.

In some of the grain-raising regions of California the crop is greatly damaged every year by hot blasts that blow from the north. A plan of dotting over with the withering currents by exploding bombs on the air has been seriously proposed.

The bosh of Roman Catholic faith seems to be having things their own way in Cleveland, Ohio. The Mayor, nearly all the city officers, and most of the policemen are Irish and Catholics. In one of the wards a flag is displayed the upper edge of which is red, the body white, and the lower edge green. On the flag are the words, "Hoadley, Rice, Daniels, and Victory." A resident who signs himself as a Democrat writes to one of the papers asking whether the national colors are to be changed to red, white, and green by the Irish element in his party.

The popular liking for government notes is in no danger of giving place to aversion because some of the young women who count greenbacks in the Treasury have had their fingers poisoned by the arsenic in the coloring.

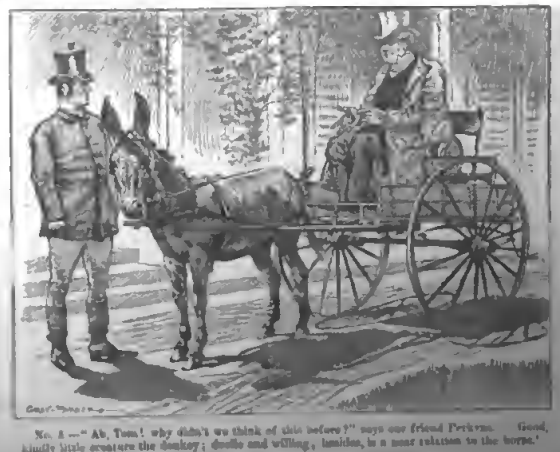
Captain SARGE, the arctic explorer, believes that there is reason for hoping that the Greely expedition may be found not to have resulted so disastrously as is generally feared. He has written to the London Times, having got a line of retreat which he believes Lieutenant Greely might have followed, and which would have taken him where he would have fallen in with Esquimaux and an abundance of provisions. The theory of Captain SARGE is based upon an intimate knowledge of the arctic routes, and of the localities at which provisions had been left in anticipation of such a journey and its necessities.

Unintentionally King Alfonso seems to have done in Paris what the Vermonter from Bellows Falls boasted that he would do—"make that old town howl."

Sticking an the first day of October in the United States is one of the things to be remembered as necessary the remarkable year of 1883.

It is proposed to run trains between Paris and St. Petersburg, through Berlin, the speed of which throughout the entire distance shall average fifty-six miles an hour—a rate fat beyond anything that is attained on American roads over long distances, and beyond anything that has yet been accomplished on the continent of Europe.

It is averred that the President caught an eighty-pound bass in the course of his fishing in Eastern waters. There is an old story which illustrates the manner in which this statement is received by the generality of fishermen. A long-lived veteran of the lob and sinker had been spinning yarns for an audience of city fishermen, who had listened with every appearance of credulity. When he had finished, the visiting anglers put forward their oldest story-teller, and watched with some little interest to see how the veteran would receive the yarn. While the city champion was telling of the capture to a seine of a huge monster of onboard of magnitude, and of the labor of hauling him here to a fresh-water pond by the employment of mule teams, the entertainer was gravely nodding and audibly assenting to the probability of every statement. The yarn spinner came at last to the climax, in which he told, not without some dignity, the number of bales of hay they were fed daily to the imprisoned monster of the deep. All eyes were on the old fisherman, and he did not weaken. "Too-se," he said, with many profound nods, "them big fish, they do eat hay."



No. 5.—"Ah, Tom! why didn't we think of this before?" says our friend Perkins. "Good, kindly little creature the donkey; docile and willing, besides, is a near relation to the horse."

THE EPISCOPAL CENTENNIAL.

BY THE REV. CHARLES H. HALL, D.D.

It seems to be a foregone conclusion that there must somehow be a centennial anniversary, which the Episcopal Church is now celebrating. When we ask what in the event which justifies this impression, which the General Convention is solemn session is recalling, which has induced the vestry of Christ Church in reuew, so fur as possible, the status of their venerable building, the answer is very indefinite. There was, indeed, no event of the year 1783 of sufficient importance to call for general attention. The first General Convention which met to prepare for organization, which was not completed until 1789, met in Christ Church, Philadelphia, and or that body, in its regular order, has this year convened in that city, and will hardly meet there three years hence, it seems proper to recall the past and exchange congratulations over the century's growth. In fact, the general grace a century ago was one of utter prostration. The only event in which the Episcopal Church became interested has been already quietly and properly honored. Of the fourteen clergymen of the Church of England who were left in Connecticut, "ten of them, refusing from all discouragement, met in Woodbury in the last week of March (1783) following the publication of peace, to deliberate no the affairs of the Church, and to organize for the future." The "meeting was kept a profound secret, even from their most intimate friends at the lutz, and it was so quietly held that on minutes of it were made or published." There and thus assembled, a th what was probably necessary caution, for the suggestion of bishops in this land had always been a firebrand, these ten persons fought against their discouragement, and persuaded the Rev SAMUEL SEABURY in undertake an expedition to England to obtain, if he could, the episcopal office. The result was doubtful. By the way, the story goes now that this last sprang the bishop and clergy, who desired to honor the anniversary of that event, walked in most informally in the same room of the old house at Woodbury, now occupied by an ancient dame. The old lady, when asked if the clergy might have the use of the room for a reunion and supper, replied, after some hesitation, "Well, I dunno. I'm opposed to dancin'. They can come if they don't dance."

Dr SEABURY, who became the first Bishop of the American Church, had been a chaplain to the British contingent on Staten Island, and a hundred years ago Sir GUY CARLETON was delaying the evacuation of the city of New York to protect the loyalists, who, we read, to the number of thirty thousand, found refuge in Nova Scotia before the end of the year. Dr SEABURY had been for a short time "in duress vile" in his native state "for active hostility to the measures of the Congressional government." With letters from the clergymen of New York, he sailed for London in June, 1783. Baffled by many impediments in London, he at length went to Scotland, and was consecrated at Aberdeen by the Non-juring or Jacobite bishops, November 14, 1784. We find, therefore, no epoch on which to hang a centennial celebration, but may well ponder the facts of the moment which suggests itself between the two ends of the century.

The organization of the Church came later. In May, 1784, nine clergymen, three from each State—New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania—"after prior correspondence," met at New Brunswick "to consult for the interests of a society for the Support of Widows and Children of deceased Clergymen, which had existed under Charters of Incorporation from the Governors of the said three States." They determined while thus assembled "to procure a larger meeting in the following October in New York, both to revive that Society, and to agree on some general principles of the union of the Episcopal Churches throughout the States." This was done, and a beginning made.

In consequence, the first General Convention of sixteen clergymen and twenty-six laymen from seven States met in Christ Church, Philadelphia, in September, 1785. In the same church gathered on Wednesday, the 3d inst, four hundred deputies and sixty bishops from every part of the republic to consult for the interests of their constituents. The State of New York sent two delegates to that primary assembly, the Rev SAMUEL PROVOST, A.M. (afterward first bishop of this State), and Hon JAMES DUANE, Esq. The questions of that day were novel and perplexing, the doubts and difficulties harassing. The winnowing of the colonial Revolution had left the mustard seed with them exceedingly small. The real work they found to do was to assert the prime necessity of union among themselves independently for the first time since the days of the apostles of all help from the State, and in opposition to the prevailing popular systems of belief; of unity in doctrine, discipline, and worship, under Episcopal tutelage, with the Church of the Ages and with the faith, or their belief it, once for all delivered to the saints. The Episcopal contingent of this nation has been true to their conceptions of truth and duty. The labors, battles, and victories of that body here been along one consistent line of thought. The Episcopal Church struggled first for a right to be, and to be tolerated, and there has been a time when defent seemed certain. She has made good the right. In those first meetings she timidly but urgently asked for the episcopate from those who had failed to conquer us, and it is to the credit of all parties that the passions of the times were resolutely excluded from ecclesiastical circles.

Now, after a century, we look instinctively at results. Take the old stronghold of Puritanism, Massachusetts. In 1775 there were four clergymen there, and a few hundred members. The last report of that State (1882) shows 182 clergymen, 18,076 communicants, perhaps five times that number of members, and $309,883 10 of annual contributions. The moral stand-point, a high line been gained through much tribulation, can not be calculated in numbers. Or turn to New York. When the Rev Mr PROVOST journeyed across New Jersey in that September of 1785, he could have counted up the parishes which he met in a loose sort representing no his fingers. To-day five dioceses, duly manned, 737 clergymen, 67,153 communicants, and $1,964,223 22 of annual contributions mark the change. The work of the first bishop of New York was very small. To-day it exceeds the powers of any five men to overlook it with ordinary fidelity. True, the population of city and State has increased, but there has been a change of front from the scattered few left by the Revolution, with dark clouds chilling them, in the united and resolute "sacramental host of God's elect" commanding for the name great facts and convictions.

What makes this year no interesting centennial to our Episcopal communion, is chiefly the fact that there is a spirit abroad in the Church which teaches a duty to meet the wants of the age. The convention now in session does before it the report of the Committee on the Enrichment of the Prayer Book—a subject which has been gaining in importance for many years, and is now supervalent. The chief object is to enlarge the liturgical resources, and so make them more flexible, while departing no whit from the doctrine and discipline of our forefathers.

In our General Conventions Bishop BENJAMIN PORTER has been recognized as a valued and useful member. He has always been a power "to make for peace, and for those things whereby one may edify another." His record in these general assemblies has endeared him to the Church at large, and it is to his honor that he has filled for many years the most important See in the land with a reputation for meekness, kind fitness, and self forgetfulness which no one now questions. Born in 1802; he was elected in the Convention of this diocese, then containing those of Albany and Long Island, or consent to Bishop OGDENSBURG, whom he in the course of nature succeeded. Until that date the diocesans had come mostly from Trinity Parish. Dr. PORTER, then rector of St. Peter's, Albany, was elected successively for his blameless reputation, for a fruitful pastorate, quiet, and free from party passion, a wise, cautious, laborious, and resolute man of God, satisfied with acknowledging things "as the Church has received the same." Twenty years ago diocesan conventions were somewhat sonnet and less guarded in speech than they are now. It is largely due to the exercise of the same qualities in the bishop that the change has come over them. Resolute in his own convictions of duty, doctrine, and worship, he has been patient, cautious, and generous before the opposition of others; and while his policy has been sometimes suggestive of the Fabian tactics, time has proved him generally right. The late election of his assistant has demonstrated two facts beyond dispute—one, that party passion in its ugly forms has succumbed, and given place to a magnanimous courtesy and true charity; the other, that his flock was as glad as he could be to give him as his assistant one of his own kin, and, hardly less, of his own kind of Churchmen. In the whirl of our life, with its currents and counter currents of thought, feeling, and varied interests, where in the nature of things all manner of doctrinal opinions and universal vagaries are represented at high pressure, it is providential that the "master of men molds" has been marked by freedom from pride, prejudice, and passion, firm as a rock in his moderation, and wise in his refusal to yield to the passing gusts of the hour. Long may the honored face be seen among us!

We may see in the fentures of the Bishop-elect, whose future opens so auspiciously, the signs of his character. His "moderation has been known of all men." To call him Broad-Churchman, or Low or High Churchman, is an absurd misnomer. No one who knows him ever thinks of him under either title. A graduate of the Episcopal Seminary of Alexandria, Virginia, in 1857, and still honored by his Alma Mater, he ought to be a partisan, which he is not. Twenty-six years ago it would be next to impossible, under the parties then raging, to have elected a man of that ilk. Tempora mutantur et nos. He has won the confidence of his brethren, he has earned the graceful right to speak to the honored gentleman whose name was opposed to his now as he did in the late convention on New York by his character and merit. He owes it also partly to the increase of something in the whole Church, before which party passion has been stilled. His first parish was in the village of Greensburg, Westmoreland County, Pennsylvania; next, St John's, Troy. Thence he 1860, after refusing a large church in Cincinnati (1852), and the Presidency of Kenyon College (1863), he went to be assistant minister on the Green Foundation of Trinity Parish, Boston. He has been best known as rector of Grace Church in Broadway, New York, since 1868. There for fifteen years he has been seen and known of all men, and has left in it a monument of good works. As an author he has published several works of practical religion, marked by earnestness and ability, and by solid evangelical truth. He received the degree of Doctor of Divinity from Union College, Schenectady, where he was born, and over which his father presided until he was called to be Bishop of Pennsylvania. He is a Churchman by inheritance, and has been fitted for all the details of his office by his experience as Secretary of the House of Bishops for many years. All who love the Church which he has served so well will unite in wishing Dr PORTER a long and successful career. He becomes bishop on the eve of the century which has seen great things under the able men who have continuously upheld the ideas which the Episcopal Church represents to this nation. We can trust him to carry on their work, and to add links to the American succession.

A PORCELAIN PIPE.

"I'll give you three days to lose your senses, then you'll crve over her."

"I don't rave over ceramics."

"Oh, pshaw! you must admit that she in the only available object to adore in the valley."

"Admitted. I shall confine myself to the beauties of nature, however."

"You can't do it. Given a little backwoods hotel, only one pretty girl, Harry Goddard with nothing to do, and he will be completely at her command at the end of one week."

"Not at all, Tom, ploisonné no copper, and all that sort of thing, is not my style. I'll tell you what I'll do, though. I believe that you intend to stay here about a month; she remains the whole season. I'll bet you cigars that I will be the favorite before we leave."

"Make it a box of cigars, and I'll do it."

"Done!" answered the young man addressed as Harry, lighting a fresh cigar.

"Done is it?" responded Tom, adding: "I say, Harry, how many cigars do you smoke in a day? I should think that you would be a bonanza to the cigar man."

"Would if I paid. But I can't afford cigars; I generally smoke a pipe. But why do I find you here? When I left you at Freiberg I thought that you would settle down there, be a college professor, and do your share toward making the youngest portion of humanity miserable. You are worse than a will o'-the-wisp; first in Germany, then in California. I believe that if I should be cast away on a desert island in the Pacific, the first object that would greet my eyes would be Tom Arthur gravely taking a sqniut at me through a surveyor's tripod, or perhaps, hammer in hand, erecting pebbles on the shore."

"Very possibly; I should be as I am now, in pursuit of knowledge. I came West to study the gold and silver mines, and the general formation of the country. But you—what are you doing? You have nothing to call you from New York," answered Tom.

"I?" repeated Harry, with a nervous twitch of his hand; then, in a careless tone: "Oh, I'm an Ishmaelite, a peripatetic, my eyes are with the fool's eyes, in the ends of the earth. I came for information; in search of something to write about; looking for a subject."

Tom laughed. "I'm sleepy," he said, with a yawn. "Hullo! it's past twelve. Get to bed, you Bohemian!"

"You can go to bed, I'm going to have a smoke before I turn in," replied Harry.

"Smoke!" may I ask what you've been doing ever since supper?"

"Burning cigars. I'm going to smoke now," saying which he went to his travelling bag and took out an immense porcelain pipe, together with a package of tobacco.

"Let me see your pipe. Why, here is the fair ceramic as she might have looked ten years ago. Where did you get it?" said Tom, in surprise.

"Got the best plain in Strasburg," Harry answered, examining the pipe for a moment. Then he added, as he filled and lit it: "It does look like her, but it can't be! I guess the only resemblance is the enamel. That pipe was painted for me by a lady. I wouldn't take a thousand dollars for it; some day I'll tell you why." And Harry sprang out of the low window on to the little piazza, and turning to wish his friend good-night, he strolled down the road.

Harry Goddard was a young man about twenty-eight years of age, well built, and rather good-looking. He was almost clever enough to be called brilliant, consequently he was so lazy that he accomplished but little. He wrote in a desultory way for half a dozen magazines under half a dozen different names, and as he had no difficulty in disposing of his wares, he never was in want of money. Always good natured and full of spirits, some who knew him thought him shallow, and that he had no depth of feeling; in fact, his nature was a most contradictory one. Tom Arthur, who perhaps knew him better than any one else, said that he had the timber for a first-class man in his composition, but at present it was covered with a veneering of flippancy, and marked into something like many of our modern articles of furniture—pleasant to look upon, and such a thing as we like to see in smoothes man's parlor, but of no earthly use to any one.

Tom Arthur was about the same age, tall, handsome, and energetic, he was an engineer, a graduate of the Freiberg School of Mines, and devoted to his profession. He was as different from his friend as fire from water; gifted with an excellent memory, his mind was stored with knowledge of all kinds, systematically arranged, and ready for instant use; but he was as modest as a girl without, and was as much underestimated by his acquaintances as Harry was overrated. They had known each other for nearly twenty years, having been neighbors and school-mates, and their had separated when Tom went to Freiberg and Harry to Yale. One day Tom was surprised by having Harry burst into his room with the announcement that he was travelling through Europe, and that he thought he would drop in and see him. They again separated to meet in two years in the Yosemite Valley.

But to return to Harry as we left him on the road between Black's and Hutchings's. As he puffed lazily at his pipe he paused for a moment to enjoy the beauty of the scene. One of his redeeming qualities was an enthusiastic love of Nature in all her varied forms. The moon was not yet set, but was slowly disappearing behind El Capitan, flooding the valley with cold light, in which the beautiful Cathedral spires on the one hand, and the Three Brothers on the other, appeared clothed with a supernatural grandeur. The deep shadows of the pines, the almost fantastic appearance of the rocks towering high above them, which, in the tremulous light caused by the scudding clouds crossing the moon, seemed to sway or and fro with a rhythmic motion, to advance into the light and how, then to recede again into the darkness—all seemed so strong, so grand, that there was none of that involuntary tremor such as one feels when standing under the shadow of the works of man.

The dull booming of the Yosemite Fall, the musical plashing of the Bridal Veil, the ruking Merced below, and far above among the crags and snow peaks the faint echo of the Vernal and Nevada falls, combined to make a roar that at first seemed almost deafening, yet the silence was so perfect that Harry trembled to break it even by a footstep. Opposite to him was the Yosemite Fall, its second leap one vast lunar rainbow in the rays of the setting moon. Harry stood, he did not know how long, enchanted by the exceptional scene; then, with a few vigorous puffs at his pipe, he walked along the path toward Mirror Lake, winding in and out among the tall pines, past Hutchings's and Lamson's, around huge rocks, and over rude bridges made of a couple of planks and a rail, till at last he reached the lake, and taking his seat on a large stone, gave himself up to the tranquil meditation that the pipe indicates. How many pipes he filled we can not say, but as he shook the last grains of Lone Jack out of his pouch the sun was rising over Cloud's Rest, and though he could not yet be seen, the rose beams which heralded his approach were fast breaking through the haze which enveloped everything. The mist slowly lifted from the surface of the lake as the rays of the sun grew more powerful, till the broad edge of his disk was seen peeping above the Cap of Liberty, gilding the crags and little streams with a glory which can only be seen at sunrise. Harry rose and walked slowly toward the hotel.

At breakfast Tom opened the conversation with the "fair ceramic," or Harry pretended to spring her, by calling attention to the mat which was just rising from the valley, and explaining that a mist swing to the fact that Harry had been up all night smoking. Harry explained calmly, but despite their efforts they could not break through the reserve with which she seemed to surround herself. While Harry and Tom were in their rooms getting ready for their daily tramp, they speculated as to the cause of her sudden change, for the day before she had been extremely friendly. They commented freely upon her actions, and finally concluded that she would be more like herself at dinner time.

That evening or they sat on the little veranda, Miss Scott (the "fair ceramic") received four attentions so kindly, and so completely ignored Harry, that when those two gentlemen were preparing to retire, Tom remarked, "Ah ha, my boy, I've got you now! come, produce the cigars. By dove! if it were not for a certain little lady 'way down East,' I don't know but—"

"Don't crow till you're out of the woods," interrupted Harry, crossly. "I've got some two yet, and one never can tell what may turn up."

Harry's last remark seemed almost like a prophecy, for the next afternoon as they sat on the veranda a strange gentleman came entering down the road no the back of a most dejected donkey. As soon as he caught sight of Harry he tumbled off his steed, and rushed up to the piazza, crying, "Why, Harry Goddard, what are you doing here? I'm glad to see you, by jove—glad to see you!"

"Thank you, my lord. I suppose you are still my tutor-old hobby—botany," replied Harry. Tom looking around, he continued, "Allow me to present you to our friends;" and in turn he introduced Lord Horburn to Miss Scott, Mrs Potts, her aunt, and Tom Arthur. Lord Horburn remained with them during the evening, and proved himself a most entertaining companion. When Harry and Tom entered their room, Tom said, in a tone of comic despair, "I'm left. Your noble friend did the business. How Miss Scott smiled, and the aunt fairly gushed, at the mention of a title!"

"I didn't think that she was that kind of a girl; but they are all alike. Speak of a lord, or a duke, or a count, to an American girl and she is on her knees at once. Even I shine in the reflected glory of Horburn's title.

"Either a title or money," Harry continued. "So what chance have you or I in the great matrimonial race? Now out of every ten fellows who get married eleven the girl's affection under false pretenses. You remember Jack Van Brun, how he used to make Ruth Morrison cut in the opera, and go without lunch for a week or make up for it. It was a clear case of obtaining love under false pretenses."

"I don't believe she married him because she thought he was rich," interrupted Tom.

"No, perhaps not, but she would never have looked at him in the beginning if she had thought him poor. I tell you a fellow don't need much in these days to be popular among the girls. If I had a son, I should teach him, first, to dance, second, or make five dollars' worth of slow remodellar, third, to talk society nonsense. Then, if he had time, I'd teach him to read and write, but I shouldn't try to load his mind with anything worth knowing." A mild snore from Tom gave assent to these propositions, and Harry, finding no one to listen to him, followed his friend's example, and went to sleep.

For the next three weeks Lord Horburn made one of the party on all their excursions, and one moment they would see the gray tale whisker and good-natured face between the cheery ears of the brain donkey which he bestrode, on which the saddle would be vacant, and his lordship would be on his knees at the side of the trail examining some new fern or strange moss. On those rides Harry forswore the use of his beloved pipe, for although he was convinced that the fern on it was only a chance resemblance to the face of the "other painting," there was a peculiar feeling of doubt that haunted him when he would compare, as he sat smoking his pipe, the rich golden-brown of the hair, the perfect color of the face, the regular irregularity of the features, with the living reality which he had before him all day. It was safer, he said to himself, out to display it, as it would be almost impossible to make any one who did not know all the circumstances of how he came by it believe that it was not an attempt at a portrait.

So the days passed, with picnics, where Miss Scott and Harry superintended the making of the coffee, excursions up the trails, where Tom photographed the party with every conceivable variety of background, moonlight rows on Mirror Lake, and at the last a grand dinner at Snow's, when Lord Herbert sent his own man up the day before to prepare for them. This was to be the last occasion of the season. Mrs. Potts and Miss Scott were to leave the valley in a day or two for Lake Tahoe; Lord Herbert intended to spend a few days in the Calaveras grove of big trees; Tom Arthur proposed to study hydraulic mining in the region of Dutch Flat, Harry was the only one who can not decided upon a course of action. In fact, he had become more and more interested in Miss Scott, and resented any allusion to the artificiality of her companions as a personal insult. As they rode down the narrow trail from Snow's into the valley, and all the way to the hotel, Harry tried in vain to speak to her alone. Immediately after supper the ladies pleaded weariness and retired. Soon after, Tom and Harry entered their room, and as Harry took up his great pipe and prepared to smoke, Tom remarked "I say, you promised to tell me the history of that pipe; who met men? There in no time like the present, you know."

Harry laughed nervously. "There is no history about it," he said, with assumed carelessness. "I bought the bowl plain in Stockton, and Mrs. May painted it for me in New York."

"What, not old Mrs. Hay? I didn't know she could paint."

"No, not old Mrs. Hay—her daughter-in-law; Susie Andrews was her name before she was married."

"The Miss Andrews that you used to write to and rave about when you were in Europe?"

"The same."

"But I didn't know that she was married."

"She wasn't when she painted the pipe."

"But I judged that you had intentions in that direction yourself."

"I did," responded Harry, "but the intentions were all on my side. You see she and I had always been together—like brother and sister, in fact—and while I felt more than a brotherly affection toward her, her love for me was simply a sisterly regard. When I came back from Europe and told her, she informed me that she was engaged to Charlie Hat, painted me this pipe bowl, and advised me to take a trip for my health. We didn't have a row, or anything of that kind. She told me not to come back till I got over it, then she gave me this pipe bowl, and told me—this is the queerest part of it—told me that there was the girl she wanted me to marry."

"Well?" inquired Tom.

"Well, you know I— By Jove! I—I'd like to do it," said Harry, with some hesitation, then gathering courage, he continued, "Do you know, I believe that Miss Scott is the original of the picture on my pipe."

Just then there was a knock on the door, and as Tom opened it a waiter delivered to him a neat little package.—"For Mr Goddard and Mr Arthur." On top was an envelope directed to the two gentlemen. Harry tore it open and glanced at the contents.

"What is the mischief! 'Bet'—'cigars'—'neather of you preferred'" Here, Tom, read it; I can't. I begin to see what it means."

Tom took the note, and read as follows:

"GENTLEMEN,—As it will be next to impossible for you to settle the bet which you made concerning me, I send you a box of cigars, as that neither of you may be the loser. I leave the valley to-morrow morning, and we shall be spared the mortification of meeting again. I would drop as a parting hint that you can not be too careful to discover what the walls of your rooms are composed of before you comment too freely upon your neighbors. MARIE L. SCOTT."

"To Mr. T. G. ARTHUR and Mr. HARRY GODDARD."

Harry sat for a moment as if stunned, then stepping to the bureau, he shook lifted a small Spanish stiletto. Tom sprang forward and grasped his arm. "Hold on!" he cried. "Don't use a knife; you don't want to do set."

Harry shook himself free, then with a quiet smile, he asked "You didn't think that I was going to kill myself, did you? Oh no, I only want to see what the wall is made of." And as he spoke he thrust the keen blade into the side of the room. "Worse than I expected," he said, as he drew it out and examined the cut. "Not even a board partition, only some cheese-cloth arrangement from beam to beam and papered over. She must have heard every word we said. In future our communications must be made in writing."

Harry sat for a moment, scrawled a few words on a piece of paper, and threw it to Tom, remarking, "See to that, will you?" he grasped his pipe and left the room. He rushed down the mail to the corral, found his guide, had his horse saddled, and started off up the Coulterville trail.

"He'll break his neck," muttered the guide.

But Harry sped on up the narrow path, and as from time to time a turn of the trail disclosed a bit of the valley, he would pause to look. So he galloped ahead, till, in the gray of the morning, when he was but a few miles from Dudley's Mills, where he intended to get a fresh horse, his own beast, wearied with the long and hard ride, stumbled and fell. Harry shot over his head, and far beyond the edge of the narrow road which was cut to the side of the mountain. He rolled down over the sharp rocks, and then all was a blank.

His first return to consciousness was when he found himself on a comfortable couch, felt a light touch on his forehead, and heard some one murmur, "Harry!" As he opened his eyes he saw a vision of gold-brown hair floating over a light morning wrapper disappear through the door. His first thought on his dazed condition was that the head on his pipe had come to life, and he decided few the pocket where he had thrust it before he started on his night ride. His coat was off, there it lay on the chair. He must see his pipe. He tried to rise, then became aware that there was something wrong. As he fell back with a groan, again that bright vision entered the room. This time it said, "You must not move, Mr Goddard, I will get anything you want."

Harry looked with wondering eyes for a moment; then glancing toward his coat, articulated, "My pipe." She felt first in one pocket, then in another, and at last brought a handful of bits of broken porcelain. Harry regarded her intensely; then, with a satisfied look, he murmured "I thought so. You are the same. The pipe is broken, and you are the picture room to life, are you not?"

"Yes, yes," she whispered, with a sigh; then groaned to herself, "Oh, if he should always be this one, and I to blame for it!"

But Harry had sunk into a quiet sleep, and the next morning he was much better. He was only sprained and bruised, the doctor said, though how he escaped breaking every bone in his body was a mystery. Miss Scott and her aunt were in the stage, coming around the same curve where Harry had met with his accident. The driver saw the dark figure caught to the branches of a bush about half way down the side of the mountain, and with true Western promptitude he took a coil of rope out of the box, tied one end fast to a strap, the other around his body, crawled down the descent, and taking hold of the insensible man, made his way back to the stage. When they arrived at Dudley's Mills, Harry was put to bed, and lingered for several days in delirium.

At last, when he had recovered enough to be able to walk around, he thought of Tom. He telegraphed to him "I am at Dudley's Mills. Come on." When Tom received the dispatch he was thunder-struck. Harry had written on the piece of paper which he handed to him when they parted: "I leave for San Francisco, send my baggage by to-morrow's stage, real Coulterville. Will write in a week or two." Consequently, what he could be doing at Dudley's Mills, Tom was at a loss to imagine. However, he did not stop to reason, but ordered his horse, and set off immediately.

That evening, as they sat on the cozy little piazza in front of the hotel, Harry told about his wild ride and his rescue, and how he had taken Miss Scott to be the picture on his pipe come to life, and gave such an amount of startle personal information as that even good-natured Tom was bored, and at last managed to say, with a suppressed yawn, "And so you lost your pipe, did you?"

Harry's eager mood was changed in an instant, and a laconic "Yes" was the only answer.

"You felt pretty bad about it, didn't you?" pursued Tom, feeling that he must say something, yet afraid that he would start Harry talking again.

Harry rose from his chair and turned toward the door. There in the doorway, like a picture, framed in the honeysuckles and roses, stood Marie Scott. Harry stepped to her side, and slipped his arm around her. "Felt badly? No. Why should I mourn for the picture when I have the original?" he answered, as he drew her gently into the house.

ALLAN FORMAN.

LADIES AT LAWN TENNIS

IF one club was strong enough to break the barrier of prejudice that forbade ladies to compete in open lawn tennis tournaments, it was the Staten Island Ladies' Club for Out-door Sports, and that organization has vindicated its position by holding a tournament in which ladies belonging to any club in the country were admitted to compete. That such prejudice has existed—and it is by no means not overcome—is evident from the fact that whereas open lawn tennis for male amateurs have been frequent in the past three years only one club has offered a purse for ladies to open competition and even that one has since done so [illegible]. The Ladies' Club is therefore entitled to great credit for having in spite [illegible] what it is to be hoped will prove a very great success.

The tournament which properly [illegible] on account of stormy weather was held on the ground of the Staten Island Cricket Club on the 24 of October and two following days and was a complete success. The weather it is true, favored the players rather than the spectators, since it was "bracing" even to frigidity, but the gayety of the scene, and the strong interest manifested by the often brilliant and always worthy play of the contestants, were sufficient to keep the sense on lookers from paying any greater heed to the chilly atmosphere than was absolutely forced upon them. October is, to be sure, somewhat late in the season for out-door tennis, but or long as the summer outing is extended far into the autumn, the tournament at the home club must be held either in October or in June, and the latter month is as much too early for good play as the former is late for balmy weather. With the exception of the ladies' and gentlemen's doubles, in which a lady and gentleman played as partners, the contests were open only to ladies, ten players entering for the single-handed matches, six pairs for the doubles, and eight for ladies' and gentlemen's doubles.

It may have been a matter for short-lived regret, but it should rather be a subject for congratulation, that the first prize in the most important event, the single-handed match, was won by a visitor from another club. There is a sense of hospitality when a member of the home club wins the best prize, for which orangees have been invited to compete, and at the same time there is apt to be a feeling of disappointment if the home club is left entirely out of the race. The Staten Island Ladies' Club should be well satisfied with the result on the single-handed match which was won by Miss Goodwin, of the Franklin Archers and Tennis Club, after an interesting and brilliant a match as was ever played between ladies in this country, her last opponent being Miss Anthaine Rousseau, of Staten Island, who thus took the second prize. Miss Goodwin's style is that which has been the winning game in the last three years, she plays up at the service line, and makes frequent and skillful use of the volley, the principal point of difference between her game and a strong male player's being that she relies more on "placing" a volley than on force. Miss Rousseau is the champion of the Staten Island Ladies' Club, and the match between her and Miss Goodwin was what those swellers should have seen who have said in their haste, "All women are duffers."

"FRANCESCA DA RIMINI."

IT has been said that if there were no mariages de convenance there would be no French plays. But this theme has been the mainspring of many a tragedy long before the glittering and elusive modern French society drama with its pointed morale—or, to be more accurate, no morale—had its run of popularity. The story of the woman who weds the man she does not love, and then loves the man she should have wed, dragging down lover, husband, and self to destruction, has often been told on the stage. History has furnished many such instances to the dramatists; yet the most picturesque of them all, and that most admirably adapted to dramatization, waited many years until it became part of the literature of the stage. The scenes in the actual history of FRANCESCA DA RIMINI form of themselves, without perversion of historical accuracy, a brilliant arena of dramatis personæ. There is the gloomy background of a noble mind and heart imprisoned in the twisted body of the hunchback FARCIOTTO, in bright contrast to it the brilliant beauty of his brother PAOLO, the whole picture inclosed by the gentle grace of the loving, unfortunate FRANCESCA. Moreover, a point of great value to the modern dramatist, the double, offers fine opportunities to the scenic artist.

From the history of FRANCESCA DA RIMINI, MR BOKER has constructed a play of remarkable strength, which, however, in its present form contains the elements of even greater strength. In its original production by E. L. DAVENPORT, many years ago, it failed. It was then a reading rather than an acting play. MR BARRETT of late years, with his keen discernment, saw in it the possibilities of a great success—at any rate, he recognized in LANCIOTTO a character admirably adapted to himself—and set to work with MR BOKER to condense it into a drama for the stage. The result is a strong play of six acts, each act having a distinct climax, and the climaxes growing in strength until the curtain rolls down over a terrible tragedy. When I say that the plot contains possibilities of even greater strength, I mean that a more liberal consideration in the first two acts, which, from the necessities of the story, are rather wanting as dramatic movement, would develop the plot more effectively. I shall not give more than a synopsis of the plot. To end the bloody wars of Guelph and Ghibelline, LANCIOTTO of Rimini is betrothed to FRANCESCA of Ravenna. Paolo sues for his hunchbacked brother so successfully that he wins FRANCESCA'S affections for himself. She, duped by her father into the belief that LANCIOTTO is counterpart of Paolo, though undeceived before the betrothal, meets decoit with deceit, and consents to the marriage. From the very altar LANCIOTTO is called to the war. A love scene between Paolo and FRANCESCA is overheard by PEPE, the jester, who, hating LANCIOTTO, rushes to his camp, informs him of the perfidy of wife and brother, and is awarded with death. The husband takes horse for Rimini, and surprising Paolo and FRANCESCA, kills them, and takes his own life.

I admire particularly MR BOKER'S management of the climaxes in Acts IV. and VI. That to the fourth, with the fine grouping at the cathedral altar, is scenic rather than dramatic, as if so luring out the action of the following climaxes more strongly. At the end of the next act the final is killed. A murder well carried out is a strong climax, but MR BOKER has used his material so as to have a stronger one at his disposal for the next act. After the fall of the curtain the horror follows in imagination the outraged husband in his ride to Rimini. Consequently the love scene with which the last act opens emphasizes by contrast the guilt of the lovers. As PAOLO asks FRANCESCA for one last kiss, they hear LANCIOTTO'S hissing voice—"Take it!" Over them stands, not the hideous hunchback from whose touch FRANCESCA shrank, but the dark figure of avenging justice. It is the moral justification of LANCIOTTO'S vengeance which gives strength to the final tragedy. With great skill MR BOKER has idealized LANCIOTTO. He has given him an ardent, impulsive, noble nature, which shows to the audience for his physical defects. He is pitiable rather than repulsive. When he a Richard III., with a distorted heart in a distorted body the humiliation of the lovers would seem brutal murder. In Francesca da Rimini it is the vindication of a husband's wrongs.

To the great actor who created JOHN BOUCICAULT wrote VACQUERIE to RACHEL. MR BOKER might write in a similar strain to MR MACKAYE, who as LANCIOTTO is the central figure of this play. It is a part in which the actor easily surpasses his previous efforts—even his CASSIUS, which is usually considered his best. It is a dark, weird, impassioned personation, softened with fine art by noble love and faith for brother and wife.

A single "No" from Paolo or FRANCESCA would have saved them. His impulse then to give him a lying "No" rather than the truth. Then only when all is hopeless does he wreak his vengeance. MR BARRETT goes through the last two acts like a shattered carrying all before it. But there is one omission which if rectified would deepen the impressions of the last act. MR BARRETT'S personal appearance should bear traces of that fearful night ride to Rimini, in which the demons of murder and vengeance rode at LANCIOTTO'S side. A little disheveiment would add to the realism of the scene.

MR BARRETT is the self-made man among actors. He is now enjoying the fruits of untiring energy and devotion to art for art's sake. He is almost the only American actor of note who is constantly adding new parts to his répertoire. In the last few years he has brought out three American plays, Francesca da Rimini, Pendragon, and Cornel's Love. From his extraordinary success in the first-named, the general public now appreciate what many already knew—that LAWRENCE BARRETT is in the foremost rank of American actors, sharing the honors of the legitimate drama with EDWIN BOOTH and JOHN MCCULLOUGH.

GUSTAV KOBBÉ.

THE GREAT TROT AT FLEETWOOD.

ON the 20th ultimate, St Julien, screamed the King of the Turf since 1879, when he made a mile in 2.12¾, the fastest time then on record, was dethroned by Jay Eye-See, the little black gelding of Wisconsin. This gelding, which was named by spelling out the initials of his owner, James I. Case, has been known since his remarkable performance of the past two seasons as the Western Wonder. He is the worthy son of Ik-tinor and Midnight. In nearly every race he shows the mettle of these fine horses. Indeed, the parents of Jay Eye-See could not have been more appropriately named, for he is black as midnight, and dictates to his competitors the distance they shall trot behind him.

The Western Wonder was born in 1878, as he becomes the King of the Turf at the early age of five. He is certainly a very young ruler, and yet there is no trotter worthy to be appointed regent. If Maud S. were still on the track the might hold the reins of government until Jay Eye-See in of age. But Maud S., since Mr VANDERBILT became her owner, is no longer on the turf.

The young King of the Turf is of clean hands one inch high. He ran his first race as a four-year-old, last year, and beat, at Chicago, in September, Trinket's record for four year-olds, which had stood for three years. His two principal performances this season before the race with St Julien were at Albany and Providence. At Albany, in July, he wiped out Santa Claus's record for three-year olds, 2.18, by covering the mile in 2.18¼, while at Providence he beat his own record, trotting in 2.10¾ or within half a second of Maud S.'s fastest mile on record.

St Julien is a bay gelding, the son of Volunteer and Flora. He has made 2.11¾, which was the best record for a gelding until Jay-Eye-See's performance in Providence. His most wonderful season was in 1880. He ran in twenty heats the mile in less than 2.20, and five of the heats were remarkably fast. He is owned and driven by Mr. HUNTON.

The race between him and the Westerner was on a Saturday. On Thursday Jay Eye-See arrived here from Boston. He had been trotting there on the two days previous, trying to beat his own record, but in vain, and had come on here without a night's rest. He looked worn and tired, and a good many sportsmen criticised Mr CASE for letting the little horse work so hard just before the great race. But Mr CASE knew his horse. Jay Eye See is the idol of the Case family, and the idea of Mr CASE jeopardizing his chances of victory was preposterous. The gelding's gentleness and docility show how kind a master Mr CASE has been to him, for when he came into his possession as a two-year-old he was wild. BILLY COTE, who groomed Jay Eye-See, asserts that the horse has only been struck once since he passed into the hands of his present owner.

On Saturday the bluff to the north of the club-house was thrown open to the public for the first time since the Association was founded. The green of the hills between which Fleetwood nestles was hidden by the mass of human beings. The field was crowded with vehicles, the vehicles with people, and the people stood on the seats and crowded one another. There were room twenty thousand present. Had is not been for the rain-storm the night before, which led many to suppose that the race had been postponed on account of the heavy track, the crowd would have been much greater.

The race was for $2000 for the winner of three out of five mile heats. Mr CASE was lucky to start Jay on the heavy track, but concluded not to disappoint the multitude. Hewson and Brian got the geldings away head and head at the word "go." St Julien led most of the course, and rate the horse-stretch showed the Westerner half a length. But as the horses came pounding down the stretch "the little black devil" came forward with a grand spurt, [illegible] carried St. Julien off his feet [illegible] the [illegible] It was Jay-Eye-See's [illegible] by half [illegible] At the first attempts to [illegible] beat the Western Wonder [illegible] a length to the rear, but Brian [illegible] Nor [illegible] he underestimate his [illegible] leader's" steeds, for he won the heat he a length and a half. At the start for the next heat Brian again nodded for the word, though St. Julien was three-quarters of a length ahead. Brian was again right, for at the finish Jay Eye-See was three lengths ahead, and the winner of the race. Owing to the [illegible] track, the time was poor, being for the two heats respectively 2.24¾, 2.1[illegible]18.

BRIDGING NIAGARA AGAIN.

The existing railway bridge over the Niagara River was begun in 1852, and opened to traffic in 1855. It is a suspension-bridge, with a span of 821 feet, and was the first important work of its designer, John A. Roebling, who afterward designed the Cincinnati suspension bridge with a span of 1057 feet, and the Brooklyn bridge with a span of 1595 feet. This bridge has served the increasing traffic up to the present time, but the Michigan Central Railroad is now constructing, some ten rods above the suspension bridge, a work in some respects more daring, and almost as novel now as Roebling's bridge was at the time of its erection.

The span of Roebling's bridge from tower to tower has just been given as 821 feet. This is the distance required in order to gain a firm footing for the towers on the summit of the precipitous cliffs which form the shores of the Niagara River. But, precipitous as they seem and are, the actual waterway at the bottom is not much more than half of the span at the top of the gorge. A bridge with piers in the stream itself would not interfere with navigation over what poor Webb described, when he first saw it, as "the angriest bit of water in the world," but the same causes which make it unnavigable make impracticable the erection of a bridge with intermediate piers. The piers of the new bridge are established at the edge of the roaring river, 464 feet apart, and they are to be connected by a metal arch.

This span would a few years ago have been regarded as unbridgable by any other appliance than a suspended platform. Although it is only five feet greater than the central span of Stephenson's tubular Britannia Bridge, the method adopted by that engineer of making this vast girder in one piece, floating it under the piers, and hoisting bodily its vast weight of 1587 tons to its place, could not be adopted here, where the tideway, with a maximum velocity of nine miles of the Menai Straits, is replaced by the impetuous and incessant torrent of Niagara. Moreover, the height of 100 feet above the water which Stephenson was required to attain becomes here a height of 239. Before Captain Eads sprang his metal arch over the Mississippi, engineers would have regarded a suspension-bridge as the only solution of the new problem. That great work showed that a span of 520 feet, so many more than is required at Niagara, could be built, and built without centering, by gradually projecting an iron structure further and further from its heavily loaded or balanced base until two such structures met and became an arch, transmitting its pressure from end to end, having up to that time been two gigantic cantilevers.

This is the principle which has been adopted in the construction of the new bridge across Niagara, with modifications and improvements no doubt suggested by experience. The piers being here at the edge only and on the rock, the great difficulties which Eads encountered and vanquished in establishing his piers beneath the shifting bed of the Mississippi, and upon the everlasting rock 130 feet below its surface at high water, have not been met with here. On the other hand, the rise of the central arch of Eads's bridge is only 47½ feet, while the height of the arch at Niagara from the water is nearly ten times as much. This does not, perhaps, seriously complicate the engineering problem, but it touches the imagination more to learn of a human spider extending a web of metal day after day at this giddy height and over this mad torrent than at fifty feet above the lazy and muddy Mississippi. As a matter of fact, however, a workman who should fall at Niagara would probably not be perceptibly any deader than one who might have fallen at St. Louis.

BASE-BALL CHAMPIONS.

During the remarkable base-ball season just closed the sport has indeed won the title of "National game." So universal and determined has been the interest manifested in it, that in the conservative city of Boston alone 138,000 persons witnessed the League games of the season, and throngs of from 3000 to 5000 spectators of a single game have been common.

The struggle for both the League and Association championships has been close beyond precedent, and the victory in each case has been hailed by the city to which the winning club belongs as an event of the greatest importance, and one reflecting credit upon the municipality.

The League being the older of the two organizations, its championship is entitled to first attention, although an equal amount of skill and hard work was required to win the one as the other. The victorious team in this case is that of Boston, to which city the pennant now goes for the third time since the formation of the League.

A reference to their pictures on page 653 will show the members of the Boston club to be the determined looking fellows that their record of the past summer has proved them. Early in the season they were generally regarded as a second-rate club, on account of the number of new men on their roll; and, until the end of May, they failed to give any promise of their future success, being at that time seventh, or next to the last, on the list of League clubs. The season opened with Providence in the lead, a position taken after several weeks by Cleveland, but yielded again almost immediately to Providence. Again Cleveland passed to the front, to be ousted in turn by Chicago, who captured the lead by a series of magnificent spurts. During this time the Boston boys had kept so quiet that when they quietly stepped to the front and assumed Chicago's position everybody was surprised, and numerous prophecies were made that their tenure of office would be very short. But they maintained their ground, and steadily increased their lead, until, on the last Saturday of September, they defeated the Clevelands in Boston 6 to 4, thereby completing their tally of 98 games, of which they had won 63 and lost 35.

The American Association championship for 1883 has been won by the Athletic Club, of Philadelphia, after the most stubbornly contested series of games on record; and Philadelphia has gone wild over the victory. It is a victory of but one game, so close has been the struggle, and it was only won in the next to the last game of the season. Of their 98 games played the Athletics have won 66, St. Louis 65, Cincinnati 61, Metropolitan (of New York) 54, Eclipse (of Louisville) 52, Columbus 32, Allegheny 31, and Baltimore 28. The decisive game was that played with the Eclipse nine in Louisville, Kentucky, on the same day that the Bostons won their final League victory. The game was won by but one run, the score being 7 to 6.

Upon receipt of the news of this victory in Philadelphia immense crowds blocked the streets in the vicinity of the bulletin boards displayed by the daily papers, and the excitement was similar to that with which the news of some great battle was greeted during war time. Preparations were at once begun for the reception of the victorious team, who were expected to reach the city two days later—on Monday, the 1st inst.

On their way from Louisville the champions were joined at Cincinnati by the Metropolitans, of New York, who accompanied them home. At Harrisburg they were met by a reception committee from Philadelphia, consisting of the president of the Select Council and a number of prominent politicians.

Upon their arrival in Philadelphia in the evening the victors entered carriages and were driven through many of the principal streets at the head of a procession of eight thousand persons, members of base-ball and social clubs. Bearing torches and transparencies, and interspersed with numerous bands of music, the procession forced its way slowly through such great throngs of excited spectators that all other street travel was for the time being suspended. Public buildings, stores, and private houses were illuminated, banners fluttered on the night air, and the ovation accorded to these successful players of the national game was such as might have been tendered to a victorious army.

The parade was followed by a banquet, attended by many of the prominent men of the city; the freedom of the city theatres has been offered to the members of the team, watches, gold medals, and other testimonials have been presented to them, and altogether they have been treated like heroes worthy of the proudest distinctions.

The most interesting games of this season will be played in Philadelphia on the 17th, 18th, and 19th of this month, when the League champion Bostons will meet the Association champion Athletics, in contests for the base-ball supremacy of the country.

HEALTH

Is not possible when the blood is impure, and recovery from any ailment must be slow and uncertain while that condition continues. The Blood may be corrupted by the taint of Hereditary Scrofula, and the poisons of Mercurial and Contagious Diseases, and also by impurities implanted in it through excesses in living, improper food, derangement of the digestive and assimilatory organs, and other causes. The first external evidences of such vitiation are Blackheads, Pimples, Sties, Eruptions, and Boils. Yet more serious are the symptoms showing its internal effects in depression of the Spirits, Lassitude, Weariness without effort, Headaches, Dizziness, and enfeebled circulation. Be warned in time!

Ayer's Sarsaparilla

Is the only medicine that will thoroughly purify the blood. In millions of cases, during nearly forty years in which it has been the best hope of humanity suffering from vitiation of the life-current, it has effected cures beyond the power of any other remedy. Leading physicians know its composition from the most powerful alteratives, diuretics, and tonics, and prescribe it in their practice.

COMMENT ON THE POEM
By EDMUND CLARENCE STEDMAN.

Folio, Ornamental Cloth, Gilt Edges, and in a neat box, $10.00.

Uniform with Doré's "Ancient Mariner."

"The Illustrations in this superb volume—Gustave Doré's last complete work—are twenty-six in number, and rank among the most original and imaginative fruits of the great artist's genius. They form a wonderful pictorial paraphrase of the intense thought, passionate feeling, and fantastic imaginings of the weird American poem, the burden of which M. Doré conceived to be 'the enigma of death, and the hallucination of an inconsolable soul.' The drawings have been engraved by the ablest and most accomplished American engravers of the times."

DOES BENTON'S Hair Grower EVER FAIL!

We can grow hair on eighty or ninety per cent. of all cases, and are doing it constantly; in the new cases we have the follicle has been destroyed by skin diseases and the use of poisonous preparations. On those we can make no impression. In those cases are we sure that everyone should try Benton's Hair Grower before despairing of our power to help. Surely it is worth a trial.

My hair is nearly as good as ever.
R. C. PEACOCK, Shelbyville, Tenn.

DEAR SIRS:—I received one bottle of your Hair Grower, and, my hair is growing nicely.
GEO. W. CAMPBELL, Benton, Pendleton, S. C.

Dear Sir,—I am well satisfied with the Hair Grower but a few weeks when my hair began to grow over the part of my head where it was bald. I am now using the second bottle, and my hair is growing nicely.
Very truly,
J. B. SHARKEY, Red Bluff, Brazos.

Dear Sirs,—How much will you sell me a bottle of triple strength for? I feel the life of power in that. I cannot tell. My hair has been out for years, and I have got it started nicely. In my opinion it is worth a great many bottles, than you now my head before I began to use it and now that can hair begins to grow in some.
Yours truly,
J. B. SHARKEY, Red Bluff, Brazos.

HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE,

AN ILLUSTRATED WEEKLY.

Published October 16, contains the opening chapter of a thrilling story of adventure by DAVID KER, entitled

"THE LOST CITY"

The girl readers will be especially delighted with a short story by Miss SOPHIE SWETT, entitled

"HOW PIERRE KEPT THE LIGHT-HOUSE."

Among the other attractions of this number attention may be called to drawings by THULSTRUP, H. CHASE, W. T. SMEDLEY, and CHARLES HARVEY, and to a full page engraving entitled "The Baby Knight," and representing the German Emperor Charles Fifth receiving the Accolade at the age of three months.

THE OCTOBER ELECTIONS

LAST year the Democrats carried Ohio by some 19,000 plurality. This year they have elected the Governor by some eight to twelve thousand majority. But the result is due so entirely to a local temperance issue that it has no national significance whatever. The election of the Democratic candidate this year does not show that the usual Republican majority in a Presidential year will not appear a twelvemonth hence. It is not a success of which Democrats can be proud, nor which will make them hopeful for the larger contest, because the result certainly does not show that there is a strong and widespread desire of change for the sake of change, which is the sole Democratic reliance for next year.

The prohibitory vote has shown great strength. The amendment prohibiting the manufacture as well as sale of intoxicating liquors was not adopted by the Republicans. The Republican policy, on the contrary, was substantially that of high license. But the party represented effective regulation of the liquor traffic as against the free whiskey Democracy. This diminished the Republican vote by alienating the Germans, who are always opposed to what they consider to be the meddling of law with the private rights of the individual, and whenever the German vote has been diverted from the Republicans the Republicans have been defeated. It can not be altogether pleasant to Mr. ROADLY to reflect that he owes his election to a free-whiskey vote. It is, however, the hard condition of success for honorable and self-respecting Democrats that it demands pandering to the prejudices of the most ignorant and least American part of the foreign population.

National issues did not enter into the Ohio campaign. The Republican platform declared plainly for protection, and the Democratic platform straddled. As Mr. BEED says that in Massachusetts nothing but Butlerism is on trial at this election, not Republicanism, nor the tariff, nor the silver romance, nor any other question, so in Ohio it was a curious and to outsiders a complex form of the temperance question which has produced the result. Consequently, so far as appears, although the Democratic candidate is elected, Ohio remains a Republican State, and will undoubtedly pronounce for the Republican Presidential candidate next year. Iowa, the other October State, not only remains Republican, but elects the Republican ticket. The Democratic hope in New York that the October elections would foreshow a Democratic success next year which would help the party this year has vanished. These elections show that if a general change is to be made next year, some other reason is to be shown for it than the cry that the Republican party must go.

A CONTRAST.

THE tremendous majority for Governor CLEVELAND last year in New York was directed, not against Mr. FOLGER, but against machine politics. It was a Republican protest from which the Democratic party derived the advantage. It was a declaration of war to the polls against a system by which the machine entirely supplants the people, and which allows a Convention only to ratify the "slate" of a few managers who maintain their power by patronage and party organization. The lesson was so emphatic and so recent that it might have been supposed that the Democratic managers would heed it. But, with the stupidity which always marks them when fortune favors them, instead of showing in their Convention of this year that they responded to the plain demand of the voters, they presented to the State the spectacle of as absolute and tyrannical machine rule as has ever been known. This was so evident that when some nomination was called for, a voice demanded, "Who is on the slate?" The question expressed the consciousness of the Convention that it was merely registering the edicts of certain bosses. It was an assembly which signally illustrated the outrageous abuse which was overwhelmingly rebuked by Governor CLEVELAND'S majority.

On the other hand, the Republican Convention reflected in its action the conviction which was so unequivocally expressed last year, that the office shall seek the man, and that candidates shall not be imposed upon the voters against their will. The Republican Convention was a Stalwart body—Stalwartism being a word which describes the rejected system—but its action showed how much it had yielded to the new spirit. The party sentiment in the State had declared plainly for the renomination of the present efficient and satisfactory State officers, and there was no controversy in the Convention over the renomination. But there was one new name to be added. A designation was to be made for State Treasurer, and a gentleman was selected for the position, Mr. PLINY T. SEXTON, who is not only, by the universal testimony of his neighbors of both parties, singularly fitted for the office, but who refused either personally or by his friends, to take any step to secure the nomination. He was not written down upon a slate. He was not imposed upon the ticket by a machine. He was a spontaneous selection of the Convention upon a plain statement of his character and qualifications. The office sought the man, and not the man the office.

This contrast between the conduct of the two Conventions shows again what is now constantly and copiously illustrated upon all sides, that while the Republican party quickly responds to the desire that it should be the organized political instrumentality of reform in practices and methods which have properly disgusted the country, the Democratic party, hoping that it may come into power, shows itself closely wedded to the abuses which the country means to discard. The Democratic machine will hardly persuade the people of New York that it as a better agency of progress and reform than the old Republican machine which Republicans have "disestablished."

A PASTORAL LETTER

THE letter issued by Cardinal MCCLOSKEY and the Roman Catholic prelates of the late Council in New York is a singular document to be published in the United States and to American citizens. It expresses undoubtedly the views of the Roman hierarchy or priesthood, but hardly those of the more intelligent American members of the Roman Church. Its whole spirit is repugnant to the American principle of liberty, and its tendency is to foster an ecclesiastical state within the political state, which is necessarily mischievous. So far as the letter urges support of Roman Catholic magazines and newspapers and literature and denominational charities, and condemns secret societies and clerical debts, no exception need be taken, except that sectarian feeling does not generally require to be stimulated. But in denouncing mixed marriages and the system of public schools it takes a very different position, and challenges criticism.

If the Triennial Convention of the Episcopal Church, in Philadelphia, which immediately followed the Roman Catholic Council in New York, had attempted by the force of ecclesiastical and denominational authority to prohibit the marriage of Episcopalians out of their communion, and had joined with it a denunciation of the public schools as "the crime of sending your children to godless schools"—which are the words of the Roman Catholic letter—the public good sense would have condemned it as an exceedingly serious attempt to promote sectarian interests at the expense of the common welfare. If every religious denomination in the country should undertake to do the same thing, it is easy to see that the situation would become intolerable. It is by constantly ameliorating sectarian differences, not by exaggerating and inflaming them, that the general welfare is best promoted. But no method more certain to produce deplorable results could be devised than to limit marriages among the members of different denominations to those of the same denomination, and to substitute sectarian for non-sectarian public schools.

Upon this last subject the letter offers no fresh argument and presents no new view. It asserts the necessity of Christian schools, and maintains the injustice of a compulsory support of those which are not Christian. By Christian the letter means Roman Catholic, and by godless schools it means schools in which Roman Catholicism is not taught. Its argument is that instead of a system of public schools supported at the public expense among whose special advantages is the allaying of sectarian feeling, the whole business of secular instruction should be left to religious sects. The answer to this is that the good sense of Americans has long taught them that such a system would be dangerous to the public welfare. The state assumes no authority over religious belief. Every citizen may cherish his own faith, and inculcate it upon his children. But, in the common interest, it does not admit the right of any citizen to require that in the secular schools, which, upon the highest consideration, it maintains for its own welfare, any form of religious belief whatever shall be taught. This is the American view, and it will not be changed for that of Rome.

THE REDUCED PRICE OF NEWSPAPERS

A CURIOUS controversy has arisen from the reduction in price of the large daily morning papers in New York. The reasons of the conviction are not announced. But as the Times fell at once from four cents to two cents, the Tribune, the next day, from four to three, and the Herald, about a week afterward, from three to two, and as the Herald states that it "loses vastly by its reduction in price," it is fair to conclude that the other papers do not gain and that the change is due to rigorous competition. The World reduced its price to two cents before the change in its management last spring, and the Sun has been long sold for the same sum. The result of the reduction is that the Times, Herald, and World offer their double sheets at the price of the single sheet of the Sun, and for two cents against the three cents of the Tribune. For the public the cheaper the newspaper the better, provided that it is the price only, and not the quality, that is cheapened. It would be a matter of general congratulation if the circulation of the great New York dailies, with no abatement of the constantly increasing ability and higher tone which have distinguished them of late years, should be doubled or trebled. But we observe that Mr. MEDILL, of the Chicago Tribune, one of the shrewdest "newspaper men" in the country, is of opinion that reduced price implies reduced quality, and the Pall Mall Gazette, of London, takes the same view of the lower-price tendency there. If this apprehension should be justified, the result of the reduction would not be a cause of congratulation.

It is just at this point that the controversy to which we have alluded begins. The distribution of the daily papers is a business entirely distinct from that of the publication, and it is in wholly different hands. The distributors insist in the case of the Herald that the rate at which it is sold to them under the reduced price prevents them from making a living profit, and they refuse to sell it for less than three cents. The Herald holds that the increased sale from the lower retail price would enable the dealers to make a fair profit from the smaller margin, and that the dealers ought to take their share of the loss arising from the reduction. But as they do not agree, the Herald insists that it alone will fix the price at which it shall be sold to the public, and therefore it has established a system of delivery for itself by setting up special stands throughout the city. The success of this enterprise will depend upon the ability of the paper to improvise a system of distribution which shall be as effective as the system which has been developed by the news-dealers.

The news-dealers, who are the middle-men in this transaction, are unquestionably at liberty to charge for the wares which they sell a price which they consider remunerative. The papers have certainly an equal right to determine the price for which they are willing to be sold, and to refuse to deal with middle-men who demand a higher price. But the organization of the middle-men may be so complete that by diminishing the number of places at which a particular paper may be found, and by compelling it to incur the expense of a separate special distribution, it may add seriously to the loss already occurred by the reduced price. This, however, is the contest which the Herald has accepted, and the result of which will be very significant. For if it appears that a paper can be satisfactorily sold upon the Herald's terms, those terms will become general, unless other papers prefer to present the difference to the dealers.

RENOMINATION OF MAYOR LOW

THE renomination of Mr. SETH LOW for Mayor of Brooklyn by a great meeting of citizens irrespective of party is a most cheering incident. The charter of that city concentrates responsibility for municipal government upon the Mayor. Mr. LOW originally accepted the nomination to the Mayoralty upon the express condition that he should be under no obligation to any man or party, and that he should administer the city government like any other business trust. This was his platform. Upon it he was elected, and he has faithfully maintained its principles.

No city in the country has been more honestly and efficiently governed than Brooklyn under Mayor LOW, and the quality of the man is shown by nothing more plainly than that at the time when party spirit is most alive to dispute the selection of a successor—a time when it is held to be most desirable and advantageous to conciliate and equivocate in order to allay party and personal hostility—Mayor LOW announces a scheme of appointment to city employment which destroys the hope of a political use of the patronage. And nothing, also, more pleasantly illustrates the quality of the intelligent citizens of Brooklyn, of all parties, than the fact that this is the very time which they seize to renominate the man who has served the city so well. Should the party organizations renominate other candidates, the contest will be definitely drawn between the people of Brooklyn and mere party politicians.

There is one point in the scheme of municipal appointment proposed by Mayor LOW, which is [illegible]

ly the method of the reformed civil service, which merits especial attention. It provides that every person who signs a certificate for any applicant for examination shall agree to its publication, should publication be deemed desirable. This simple and admirable provision puts an end at once to loose and indiscriminate certificates, and compels every man to take the public responsibility of his action. The scheme of Mayor Low is so well considered that it will probably become a precedent for the public service in other cities. His administration and his spontaneous renomination upon his original platform show how deeply rooted in the intelligent public mind of the country is the conviction that the public business should be transacted upon business principles, and consequently that official patronage should not be used for party or political purposes.

THE LAST REVOLUTIONARY CENTENARY

THE last of the great series of Revolutionary centenaries will be celebrated as this paper is issued, and nowhere could these celebrations end more fitly than upon Newburgh Bay. No place is more closely associated with more interesting Revolutionary events than the bay and its neighborhood, while the commemoration has a peculiar fitness from all the other events of which the Hudson River was the witness. The river itself was in a great degree the chief strategic prize of the whole contest, and the celebration of this week, like all the previous celebrations, will foster the just pride of New Yorkers in their noble river for its signal historic and patriotic character.

The especial incidents of the last days of the Revolution at Newburgh and its neighborhood are familiar, and they have been recalled by the celebrations in the early summer at Fishkill and New Windsor, and at the old VERPLANCK house, where the Cincinnati was organized. If with these sites, West Point just below, and Forts Clinton and Montgomery and the chain and boom, and Kingston not far above, where the first State Constitution was adopted, and Poughkeepsie, where the Convention sat to ratify the National Constitution, be considered, the great historical associations of which Newburgh Bay is a centre become very impressive. It is but natural that at such a time of refreshed recollection and commemoration a Historical Society should have been formed at Newburgh which will take care that the heroic local traditions do not perish, and that every relic shall be carefully preserved.

The most ample preparations have been made for the celebration. The presence of the President is anticipated, and Senator BAYARD and Mr. EVARTS will be the orators of the day, and Mr WALLACE BRUCE, of Poughkeepsie, the poet. We may be sure that the story of great events will be worthily told, and the lessons of an occasion so grand and inspiring will be comprehensively drawn. They will be all the more impressive from the fact of the happy issue of the civil war, which has proved the quality and durability of the political system which sprang from the Revolution. Such occasions, indeed, so far as they stimulate the study of history, are of the utmost value. American patriotism can have no surer or more healthful nourishment than that which springs from the knowledge of the immensely increased well being of the individual man which has been derived from the modern development of liberty. New York was of Dutch origin. In Holland began the great movement of liberty, one of whose prodigious scenes closed upon Newburgh Bay. But the difference between the inhuman oppression which stung the Dutch states to revolt, and "the preamble" which led the American colonies to take up arms, marks the immense progress which had been made in the history of liberty during those two centuries. It will be for the orators of the day to show the advance of the last century, and in doing it every word they utter will be emphasized and enriched by the inspiring associations of Newburgh Bay.

A DROLL DOGAN.

THE Albany Argus, which is the organ of the present Democratic machine of which we speak elsewhere, and which opposes the repeal of the four years law as tending to the creation of an aristocracy, appeals to the friends of civil service reform to vote against the present Secretary of State, Attorney-General, and State Engineer as false to reform.

In support of this charge it makes the general assertion that Mr CARR, the present Secretary of State, and Mr HUNTER, the present Attorney General, made a clean sweep of their offices upon taking possession. As we know that this assertion is totally untrue of the Attorney-General, we have no doubt that it is equally inaccurate in regard to the Secretary of State. As for the dismissal of the deputy State Engineer by his chief, we know nothing. But if he was dismissed merely to make place for a politician "worker," and not for the benefit of the service, it was a gross wrong. This, however, is a fact not to be determined by the assertion of a bitter partisan opponent.

In correcting the Argus some weeks since, we warned it of the danger of making positive statements without adequate information. Its zeal for reform betrays it into eager and untrue assertions. Meanwhile the friends of reform will easily decide, upon a comparison of Republican and Democratic action, and of the tone of Democratic and Republican oratory and journalism—including the Argus—during the last year, which of the two parties will more probably favor reform. Their votes will be governed, doubtless, by their conviction of that probability, and certainly the last thing that will occur to them is that the true way to secure reform is to support the Democratic machine which displayed itself at Buffalo.

THE EXPENSES OF THE CAMPAIGN.

THE Republican State Committee in New York have issued a circular asking contributions for the expenses of the campaign. It is a simple appeal to all persons who desire Republican rather than Democratic ascendency, and for the first time every large or small national office-holder receives a request which is not a threat, and which addresses him on every other citizen is addressed.

This is a very significant fact, as showing how quickly the most confirmed aliens in party management yield to public opinion when clearly and resolutely expressed, and it illustrates also the folly of supposing that any such abuse "can not be helped." Of course it can not be helped if somebody tries to help it, or if courage and persistence succumb at the first defeat. But it is only two years since Jay HUBBELL was loaded with an apparent absolute supremacy, while this year scarcely a Republican dollar will be extorted by the old terror.

This correction of an abuse is the more striking because it was accomplished by a party in power which was enjoying all the profits of the abuse. But the members of that party whose steady purpose has done so much to remedy the miscarriage must not forget that the honest expenses of a campaign are necessarily very large, and that the fund which has been heretofore drawn from the office holders must now be supplied in part by the whole body of the party. Every Republican who earnestly wishes to prevent the abuses which would follow from general Democratic success should willingly subscribe a sum, however small, to aid the Republican canvass. Checks or money may be sent to EDWARD H. HOUSE, treasurer of the State Committee, at the Fifth Avenue Hotel.

"THE RAVEN."

THE poetical masterpiece of EDGAR ALLAN POE, illustrated in his strongest manner by GUSTAVE DORÉ, is one of the most attractive gift-books of the year. It is published by the HARPERS in the most sumptuous style, uniform with their edition of DORÉ'S illustrations to The Ancient Mariner. The volume contains twenty-four page illustrations, and two smaller ones, engraved on wood in a manner hitherto unequalled in the history of the art, and a remarkable composition for the title-page by VERVEER. The cover is embellished with a beautiful design by Miss DORA WHEELER.

It is an interesting fact that DORÉ'S last important work should have been undertaken for an American house. His attention had already been directed to "The Raven" as a subject for illustration, when Messrs. HARPER & BROTHERS' proposition touched him, suggesting this poem for his consideration. Attracted by the acknowledged superiority of American wood-engravers, the artist at once accepted the offer of the American publishers. The result of his genius, as reproduced by the genius of American engravers, is now before the public in this magnificent work.

In these illustrations GUSTAVE DORÉ has surpassed all his previous efforts. No other complete series of drawings from his pencil presents such sustained elevation to feeling and imagination. The volume is enriched with an admirable comment on "The Raven" by EDMUND C. STEDMAN, whose analyses of the poem and of the genius of POE is one of the finest pieces of criticism which this accomplished author has produced.

—Miss EDITH MACVEAGH, a celebrated Baltimore beauty, whose portrait recently appeared in HARPER'S MAGAZINE in an article on Baltimore by Mr EUGENE FIELD, took the white veil at the convent of Mount de Sales, near that city, about a year ago. Last week she took the black veil, and abandoned the world forever, but before doing so she unexpectedly transferred the whole of her large property to her relatives. Miss MACVEAGH, now known as Sister MARY AGNES, is a direct descendant of CHARLES CARROLL of Carrollton.

—From a recent oration by Monsignor CAPEL: "It has been said of myself, in common with others, that in the matter of converting Protestants 'it is simply magnetism'; and I believe some one has been told enough to affirm, 'A couple or three conversations, and there you are, and you don't know where you are.' But in England and in Europe generally men of every position in life, men of every possible form of culture, men belonging to every sect of religion, and men belonging to none, have joined the Roman Catholic Church."

—Boston evidently remains at these offices much later than then New York hostlers. One of them was found a few days ago quite loss at 5 o'clock P.M. "Is it because they work more slowly, or better more work, or think less of meeting correspondents?"

—"Of course," said a newspaper on a Boston train, "if a man hasn't got no New York paper, he'll take one about." That's our design, said that the reason why we can punish any newspaper proprietor we choose. If we don't like his paper, all we have to do is to say we haven't got it, and then our customers will buy something else."

—On public occasions the Empress AUGUSTA affectionately embraces his eldest son, and Count MOLTKE stoops to kiss his sovereign's hand.

—A passenger on a Fall River steamboat ascended to state-room No 19, took out of his pocket the key marked with that number, and tried to open the door; but, try as he would, the door would not yield. After exhausting his patience he appealed to the captain, who chanced to be passing by. The captain's efforts also were unavailing, though protracted. Presently, in accordance with his suggestion, one of the cable stewards was called, but he too found the job too heavy. "I will go to the clerk's office," he said, "and see what's the matter," and when he returned it was in his part the information that the figures 19 on the key had been read upside down. Their true interpretation was 61, so soon appeared from a visit to the state-room which bore that number. Meanwhile the occupant of No 19 had been sleeping in his berth, his key in the door inside, and his slumbers quite undisturbed by all the fruitless picking at the lock. He is believed to have had a quiet conscience.

—Two interesting relics of the romantic days of the old Volunteer Fire Department have just come into the possession of that distinguished fireman Mr CHARLES ADAMSON. They are the Chief-Engineer's hat and the foreman's trumpet of the late COMMODORE V. ANDERSON. On the trumpet are inscribed the words, "Presented to COMMODORE V. ANDERSON, Foreman of Hudson Fire Engine Company No. 1, by the Volunteers, as a Tribute of Respect, New York, January 1, 1836." These are a good many reminiscences of Chief ANDERSON and his associates in the profusely illustrated book recently published by HARPER & BROTHERS entitled The Story of the Volunteer Fire Department of the City of New York, and there is no souvenir of the days of the fire ladders that is not appreciated by the living members of the old Volunteer Department and their numerous posterity.

—Said Governor BENJAMIN F. BUTLER at the Attleborough Fair: "Our young men and our young maidens are sufficiently decayed away from us now by the glowing picture of what they can do in the new country of the West, if they will only give up Massachusetts and go there. I don't want them to do that, for two reasons. First, though they may make more money by going West, it is speculative; but if they work as hard and fare as bad here on they would there in making that money, they can make more here than there. But the difficulty is, they want their comfort here and their money too, and there is a gamble against that you can not have your cake and eat it too. Secondly, the West is not a good place to raise men and women." Why it is not the Governor did not say, and he might have added a third reason, namely, that in the next campaign he will need all the votes he can get.

—Madame NILSSON expresses her satisfaction that the new Metropolitan Opera-house is destitute of the "hoop velvet hangings that are such a nuisance in most European opera-houses, because they only serve to deaden and swallow up all the sound." Yet Madame NILSSON has certainly been extremely successful in most European opera-houses.

—Mr EVARTS eloquently calls attention to the alleged fact that rich clients, though fleeced by the lawyers, are "certainly not flayed, and may congratulate themselves that the fleece will grow again."

—The Southern editor again comes to the front as a patriot. In his address before the Bankers' Convention at Louisville, Mr HENRY WATTERSON said: "The whole story of the South may be summed up in a sentence. She was rich, and she had her riches; she was poor and in bondage; she was not free, and she had to go to work; she went to work, and she is richer than ever before. The South never knew what independence meant until she was sought by subjection to abolish herself. We lived from hand to mouth; we had our debts and our 'niggers.' Under the old system we paid our debts and walloped our 'niggers,' but under the new we pay our 'niggers' and wallop our debts. We have no longer no slaves, but we have no longer any debts, and we can exclaim with the old darky at camp-meeting who, whenever he got happy, went about shouting, 'Bless de Lord, I'm gettin' fatter and fatter!'"

—Mr HENRY G. MARQUAND, a staunch friend of art education, is about to loan to the Metropolitan Museum of Art his Rembrandt, the famous "Burgomaster Six," his FRANZ HALS, his Velasquez, and several other notable old masters, the collection to be arranged to a group by itself. Art students will appreciate this.

—One foreign exchanger says, among the sad consequences of the rumor that Mr PARNELL had been assassinated, the inconvenience to which the wanters at his hotel in Dublin were subjected. So intense was the desire to obtain the latest and fullest particulars that these useful persons "were knocked up before daybreak by mendacious visitors who wanted to know whether Mr PARNELL was in town, or where he was."

—Mr WATSON'S elegantly engraved invitations to a private view of his etchings in the Wunderlich Gallery of this city were last week responded to by an appreciative and artistic company of men and women, who studied the white-and-yellow scheme of decoration of the room and the quiet qualities of the aquafortis. Walls hung in dead white felt, wood work painted in accompanying yellow, pictures mounted on blue white cards in light frames of white wood with lavender linings, attendant dressed in cloth of white and yellow, sofa in yellow satin, and mantel in yellow tiles—it was a new sight.

—Chief Justice COCKBURN declares that he does not shrink from calling himself a radical, and that, much as he admires and supports Mr GLADSTONE, he is often not in agreement with the political course of Mr BRIGHT than with that of any other Englishman.

—The latest description of Prince BISMARCK represents him as dressed in plain clothes, with a dark summer overcoat and soft white snake, buying lightly on his stick as he walked along the platform of a railway station, between his wife and his son. He had just stepped into a "saloon carriage," the interior of which was richly decorated with flowers, and his thoughts, doubtless, were upon the extraordinarily deep little game he had played to extend one to King ALFONSO the conventional courtesy of an appointment to the honorary colonelcy of a German regiment.

—A cold breeze must have swept over Aberdeen when the Princess BEATRICE made her appearance to open a new public park. "It is with great pleasure," said her Royal Highness, "that I have come here in the Queen my mother's name to declare this beautiful park open." She then planted a memorial tree, and took a drive around the birdseye. A silver key was presented to her, as a souvenir of the ceremony, by Miss DYCE, who had given the park to the city.

—Dr R. W. RICHARDSON has been lecturing in London on "Felicity as a Sanitary Research." He told the amateur philosophers that if they were merely adding to length of life and developing population without giving felicity or the enjoyment of that attended life, they might in the long run be working evil rather than good for the human race. He did not think that hitherto they had added to human felicity, and he was sure that if they could not advance human felicity by a scientific research into the sources of it and the impediments to it—in other words, if they could not scientifically connect health and happiness—they had better never have been born.

—Mr JOHN EARLY, superintendent of education of pauper children, writes Mr CHARLES MORRIS, M.P., to re-enforce the meritorious talent which shows itself from generation to generation, and to do this by the process of depauperization to become useful and independent citizens. "Unfortunately the great educational lever is wanting: the family so long—one parent and child, which counts for so much in the daily lives of both rich and poor, ——— does not exist at all, or has at the very outset of life been rudely severed. The pauper population, especially the female part, is drifting into the large towns, and crowding the aggregate of vice and misery and crime. Surely the best thing for ——— state generally, as well as for the children ——— device some scheme by which, after due preparation and ———, they can be transplanted to some country where they can have a fair start in a new world, a which all their antecedents will be forgotten, and which needs the very thing that the country they have left possesses in abundance." The Children's Aid Society of the city has long acted upon these principles with much encouragement.

SIR MOSES MONTEFIORE.

By MRS. ZADEL BARNES GUSTAFSON.

In the pretty Continental looking town of Ramsgate, but aloof from it by wide fields of grain and clover, crossed by yellow lines of dusty road, on a green plateau with a fine border of woods, stands East Cliff Lodge. Not many yards from its front windows the white chalk cliffs make sheer descent to where the sea daily grasps and relinquishes the sands beneath—the golden sands for which the beautiful beaches of South English shores are so famous

It is a lovely and pleasantly solitary spot, inclosed in the cobble-stone walls no familiar as the boundaries of private estates in rural and suburban England

Set in the side of a hillock, and thickly bowered in vines, is a rustic door by which one passes down into the subterranean grotto leading among curious shells and dark shrubberies from the centre of the grounds to the sea. The walks through the garden and approaching the house are winding and richly shaded, and the murmur of the sea, mingling with the play of the wind in the leaves, makes a continuous flow of soothing melody around this hermitage, the home of one of the most charitable men who ever lived, and now one of the oldest among the living

In this charming garden, many years ago, Sir Moses Montefiore, even then in the middle years of life, used to receive the Duchess of Kent and her little daughter, and around the elders, while they walked and conversed, played and prattled the little maid, pleased with the butterflies and flowers, who now is the white-haired, care-worn mistress of the thrones, the crowns, and all the honors and orders of Great Britain and India.

At at Ilowarden Castle lives—whenever he can get away from the coil of state affairs to his beloved wood-chopping—the "old man eloquent," as at East Cliff Lodge lives the "old man benefficent," who has been an old man eloquent as well in the cause of his persecuted race, the Jews, for whom he has seven times journeyed to the Holy Land, the last time in his ninety-first year—in order to comfort his co-religionists, and relieve them both with money and counsel. For them also he has used—and successfully—at nearly every throne in Europe, pleading in person for redress of wrongs, for the repeal of oppressive decrees, for lesser privileges and opportunities, with so much majesty of presence, so much eloquence of feeling, and with reasonings so unanswerable, that he could not be repulsed. Once only did he find a potentate who would not receive him, and who proved inexorable cold to prayers which were echoed in the hearts of fathers and mothers all over the civilized world.

It happened in the year In 1852 the child of a Jewish family named Mortara, living in Bologna, was taken very ill, and through the agency of his nurse—a mere child herself, but an ardent Roman Catholic, fond of the babe, and fearing his eternal destruction—he was clandestinely baptized in the Romish faith. This fact, after a time—for the child recovered—leaked out, and in 1858, when the boy Edgar was in his seventh year, a party of Catholic bishops' guards stole him from his parents' roof, and fled with him to Rome, where they secreted him in a convent. The story of this abduction, of the boy's piteous grief, of the parents' terrible despair when they found their efforts to recover him were useless, spread like flames; universal interest and sympathy grew into universal protest against the outrage

Sir Moses Montefiore was then in his seventieth year, and had been only a comparatively short time returned from his visit of relief to the Holy Land, that had been desolated by the famine of 1854. He went at once to Rome and asked to see Pope Pius IX. Both the English and French governments stood by him in his appeal that the child might be restored to his parents. He spoke for Gentile as for Jew, he was the advocate of the first and most deathless principles of our common humanity. Pius IX remained invisible and dumb. Cardinal Antonelli, with whom he had a long interview, assured him that the case was "closed," the boy would be reared as a Roman Catholic, and not set free till his sixteenth or seventeenth year

This defeat—a bitter one—is the only failure chronicled in the long list of the deeds of mercy done by this noble Jew

Moses Montefiore was born on the 24th of October, 1784, in Leghorn, where his father, Joseph Elias Montefiore, was a merchant. His mother was Rachel, daughter of Abraham Mocatta.

He was a strong, handsome boy, in whom a practical, vigorous mind very happily combined with a sensitive, affectionate, and imaginative temperament.

He was trained as a merchant, and entered the Stock Exchange when very young, and was in 1814 made treasurer of the Portuguese synagogue. Cordially respected for his unblemished honor and uprightness he was as cordially liked for his sincere, courteous, and winning manners till the Alliance Insurance Office, opened in 1824, he was partly the founder, was its first president, and has been its only one, still filling the chair, after a tenure of nearly sixty years

His wife, Judith Cohen—daughter of L. B. Cohen, Esq., whom he married in 1812—was an educated lady of noble character and a benevolence of disposition equal to his own. Moses had acquired a considerable fortune in his business career, and his wife zoned as warmly as he did to use their leisure in discovering the right objects for their charitable designs, and their wealth in alleviating distress. In his love for Jerusalem, and his profound desire to raise the character and condition of the Jewish race there and everywhere, she helped him always with her quick sympathy, her sparkling intellect, and her steadfast co-operation.

In 1837 they went together to Syria. Earthquakes and the plague had made that land a seasonful one, full of misery and need. The fever still raged, but they did not hesitate through fear of it. They pushed through great difficulties, and camped at last on the Mount of Olives. They nursed the sick, cheered and soothed the terrified people who flocked around them, gave money to all who were ill to make a right use of it, and made generous use of it themselves for those who were by illness or moral weakness incompetent

It was on his return to London after these labors that he was knighted by the young Queen, then on her first visit to the city. He had been made a member of the Board of Deputies (a body constituted to take charge of Jewish interests at home and abroad) in 1828, and its president in 1835. In 1840 the services of this board were called into action by the cruel persecution of the Jews at Damascus, who, on a pretext somewhat similar to and as heinous as that trumped up in the infamous Tisza Eslar trial, were being tortured, hunted, and killed without mercy.

Sir Moses addressed a meeting in the Mansion House, offering to go immediately to the scene of these atrocities. The reply was the spontaneous subscription fund of £7000, to which Sir Moses's own contribution was large. Lady Judith went with him, and the French Jews re-enforced him in the person of the famous lawyer M. Cremieux. Arriving in Egypt, Sir Moses sought audience with Mehemet Ali. That monarch granted the request, and there was shown in to him a man of soldier commanding presence, more than six feet in height, erect, with finely knitted figure, gestures of subtle eloquence, a face mingling the Asiatic and Italian types of masculine beauty in lineaments of great harmony, dark eyes, flashing and softening, yet always penetrating and dominant, as he spoke of the unmerited woes of his race to the man who could relieve their sufferings. Astonished and affected, Mehemet Ali consented no admiring friendship for this defender of the oppressed, and granted him all he asked. To firmly establish this success, Sir Moses pushed on to Constantinople, saw the Sultan, and procured from him the Hatti Humayoun, which secured to the Jews rights equal to those of any other inhabitants of Turkish soil

Christians vied with Jews in welcoming him home to England from the journey, and he received a superb silver testimonial commemorative in design, weighing about 2000 ounces, and richly engraved with the scenes of his journeyings.

In 1842 he established in Jerusalem, at his own cost, a dispensary, available to all applicants, with a qualified physician, and supported the whole for three years, while a regular hospital was being organized.

In the winter of 1846 Lady Judith accompanied him on another long and anxious journey, this time to Russia, where the Jews were suffering from no afflicting plague. When at the close of his appeal Sir Moses asked, "Sire, will you not commiserate our co-religionists?" the Czar, as little able to withstand him as Mehemet Ali had been, exclaimed, "Yes, if they resemble you."

The universal treated his noble guest with great kindness, and provided him with every safeguard and convenience for his tour of investigation through Western Russia and Poland. During this journey Sir Moses gained a tremendous ascendency over the Jews in these countries by the unvarying interest he showed, by the kindness with which he rebuked as well as encouraged, and by the steady flow of his charities; and he induced them by thousands to turn to agriculture—a thing the Czar greatly desired, and which they had refused. When he came home from this work the Queen made him a Baronet. Then followed the already mentioned journey of relief to plague and famine caused Syria in 1854, and the earnest but fruitless effort in the Mortara case in Rome, 1858.

Soon after this came the overshadowing grief of his life. His beloved wife sickened, and on the 25th of September, 1862, she died. Her tomb, modelled after that of Rachel, stands near the synagogue built by Sir Moses at Ramsgate. They had no children. But the essence of her companionship remained with him in the ever-strengthening inspiration to leave as good thing undone that it was in his power to do. His benefactions were made in her name, which thus continues to be associated with wise charities and constant deeds of kindness and sympathy

Only a few months after her death he made another journey to the East, this time to rescue Christians from the persecutions of the Druses in Syria. He made a sixth visit to Constantinople in 1863, to get previous concessions to the Jews confirmed by the new Sultan, and in the autumn of the same year—to his eighty-first year—hastened to Morocco to save the Jews from persecutions similar to those formerly raging at Damascus; to Roumania, a little later, on a like errand of intercession for the Jews there, and again and yet again to the Holy Land, always as the relief-bringer. Like his public benefactions—not only to Jews, but to colleges, schools, hospitals, orphanages, and asylums—his private charities have been countless, as the widows and orphans of wrecked fishermen, the sick, crippled, and unfortunate everywhere, can testify. To the sufferers in the Tisza Eslar case, recently concluded, he sent £150

His interest in world affairs and in all that truly concerns other community or individual, and his impulse to help wherever it is needed, are as fresh as when he first knew the delight of giving, for though refreshed in body, he is still in possession of those noble powers of heart and mind which through his whole life, even into this his hundredth year, have been consecrated to humanity.

But there are on more journeys for him now, except that last one which will reunite him to his loved ones in the New Jerusalem.

CHAPTER XIX.

LE ROI S'AMUSE.

In accordance with immemorial custom, two or three Royal boar-hunts on a gigantic scale were held every winter in the forests near Fontainebleau. On the occasion of these festivities an army of beaters was employed to drive the game, shelters were erected for the sportsmen in each green alley of the woods; and every high-mobly born individual who could shoot—not to mention some who could not—was expected to swell the retinue of his sovereign, who sallied forth with great pomp, attended by his household, and accompanied by the Queen, with her household, and the Crown Prince, with his, and all the collateral Rudolfs and Albrechts and Ulrichs, with theirs; inasmuch that it was difficult to see how a single boar could be left alive at the end of the day.

Old King Rudolf, who detested these solemn functions almost as much as he detested his tight blue uniform, but who, being a king, had to submit to many things that he didn't like, used to play the Royal sportsman's part in an ingenious but somewhat comical fashion. As soon as he had reached his post a competent equerry or aide-de-camp was stationed before him, who, upon hearing the customary yells which ante-ceded the approach of the quarry, raised his gun to his shoulder. His Majesty then looked along the barrel from behind, gave the order to fire—I don't know whether the equerry always waited for this word of command—the boar, or roebuck, or whatever it might be, dropped; and next day the Schwalmthe Anzeiger published a list of the slain, in which it invariably appeared that King Rudolf's prowess had far surpassed that of any of his guests.

In the month of January I was honored by an invitation to a Royal boar-hunt, but did not witness the singular exhibition of vicarious skill just mentioned, being posted, as becomed my humble rank, at a faraway corner, whither no game was likely to stray, and where, for a long time, it seemed as if my share in the day's excitement would be confined to listening to the unearthly din raised by the beaters, and the distant shots of some fortunate sportsmen. Once I knocked over a hare, but I got no further chance of a shot, and from the silence that presently followed I judged that the whole party had moved to another beat. I did not dare to quit my post without instructions, and after a bit I sat down and lighted a cigar, thinking to myself that, but for the honor and glory of the thing, I might as well have remained at home.

There had been a thaw the day before, but now it was beginning to freeze again. The half-melted snow was hardening, wrinkled cat's-ice was forming in the puddles, and a biting wind swept through the pine branches. I was wondering whether it would be an unpardonable breach of etiquette to shoulder my gun and slip quietly back to Fontainebleau, when I was startled by shouts of "Schwein! schwein!" from the hill-side above me. I heard three or four shots, and immediately piggy came bundling down the alley, straight toward my shelter, like an express train. He was past me before I could fire, but I sent a bullet after him, and had the satisfaction of hearing a squeak, which told me that it had found its way home. The beast blundered on for a few yards, then staggered, halted, and rolled over, dead.

"A very neat shot," said a well known voice at my elbow, and turning round, I beheld Lady Constance, whose approach I had not heard in my agitation. She wore a tightly fitting dress of green cloth and a Tyrolese hat of the same color, ornamented on one side by a blackcock's tail—a costume which struck me as particularly becoming.

"Well, how are you getting on?" she asked.

"I haven't been getting on at all until this minute," I replied. "In fact, I am seriously meditating getting off; only I don't know whether we should have to go back to our lines before we were allowed to go home."

"You are growing tired of it, eh?"

"Well—I was until you came."

"So am I," said Lady Constance, "awfully tired of it." One of her heavy eyes added emphasis to this declaration. "Awfully—horribly tired of it all!" she repeated.

"Tired of this special entertainment, or of things in general?" I asked.

"Of both," she answered. "Pedantry and sentimentality are beginning to pall upon me. I have had enough of stiff-backed men and dowdy women and symphony concerts and Bonner thee into Hermes hexameters. I am sick of the whole business—luck, stock, and barrel. I think I shall desert."

"You don't mean to say that you will leave Transcendobole?" I exclaimed, aghast.

"I certainly don't contemplate spending the rest of my days here," she said, calmly. "Sooner or later I must go, and at present I think I would rather go soon than late."

"And what is to become of me?" I ejaculated, half involuntarily.

"I can't think. You had better go away too."

"You know very well that I can't go away," returned I; "but of course you don't care. Sometimes I think you don't care two straws for anything or anybody. To you it seems the most natural thing in the world that people should fall in love with you, only you rather despise them for being such fools. You amuse yourself for a time with their folly, and then you weary of them, as you do of everything else. As for what may become of them afterward, that is their affair."

* Begun in Harper's Weekly No. 1399.

She was neither displeased nor moved in any way for my little burst of ill temper. "Oh, well," she said, after a pause, during which she had been tossing a fir cone into the air and catching it as it fell, "I am not gone yet, and perhaps I shan't go for another month or two. I am subject to fits of restlessness; but as often as not they pass off in twenty-four hours. Why do you not you can't leave Fontainebleau? You are not bound to stay here."

"I am bound to my profession," I remarked.

"Oh, that is only a way of speaking. Your friend Chapman told me you had excellent prospects."

"Did he?" said I, wondering how much he had told her. "Did he enter into particulars with regard to those prospects of mine?"

"Yes; he said you were anxious to withdraw them in favor of a spendthrift cousin, who had gone to the bad. Why have you never spoken to me about this cousin and your disinterested affection for him?"

"I was afraid you would laugh at me," answered I, with perfect truth.

"I don't think I should have done that," said Lady Constance, thoughtfully. "It is a fantastic idea, but it is a fine one in its way, and there is nothing that I admire so much as a man who is capable of fine ideas. You won't put some into practice, but it is none the worse for that."

"I shall put it into practice if I can," replied I, firmly. "I don't want to pose as a fine personage, or a fantastic one either, I should prefer not to take what does not belong to me, that's all. I suppose you mean that my uncle won't alter his will, but I am not so sure about that."

"I know nothing of your uncle," Lady Constance said; "my meaning was that you are unlikely to persist in committing suicide. For people do, except under the influence of temporary insanity."

"Then I must be insane," said I, "for I shall certainly persist."

"Are you sure? Would nothing persuade you to give up that stern determination?"

She looked at me with a smile which troubled me and made me afraid. I fancied I could read in her face a conscious consciousness of power. I fancied she knew that there was one bribe which it would be very difficult—impossible perhaps—for honor and honesty to hold out against. Was she going to offer it, or was she only amusing herself with the spectacle of my subjection? A sense of impotence, of indignation with no one in particular, of revolt against the chains that bound me, caused me to exclaim, almost angrily, "Are you tempting me?"

The moment that the words were out of my mouth I should have been glad to recall them. I was that I had gone too far. Lady Constance drew herself up ever so slightly, dropped her eyelids, and repeated, on a tone of cold surprise, "Tempting you? You allow yourself to use such or equivocal expressions sometimes. Perhaps you will explain what you mean."

I could not possibly tell her what I had meant; neither could I very well remain silent, and as I should have wished to do so. I began to stammer out some utterly incoherent phrases, which to my great relief, were cut short by the appearance of the aide-de-camp, who announced that he had been sent by his Majesty to march for Lady Constance. Her prolonged absence, he said, had caused no little anxiety, and then he cast a hostile glance at me, for he also was among my companion's victims. The programme of the day, he went on to explain, had been brought to its conclusion; the carriages which were to convey me back to the town were in waiting, and almetic afternoon tea dear pig and I were added to the triumphal procession which followed King Rudolf to the gates of his capital.

Mounting the broad staircase of the Legation, and entering my room in a pensive mood, I came out to the flickering fire-light the outline of a human form reclining in my arm-chair, which form, upon closer investigation, proved to belong to nobody else but Mr. Chapman, who, as I have got at surprise and pleasure, to be in other than the chair of George Warren.

"My dear old boy!" I exclaimed, "I am so delighted all this distance to see you! You must have had a vision from Heaven, telling you to come!"

He replied, with his usual sober sense, "No, only I have been working rather hard of late, and I thought you wouldn't mind if I came for Christmas holidays by a run over here."

"Mind! you stupid old fool, no doubt, and be a cat, drank, and be merry. What would you like to have? Nothing? Well, then, you shall have a brandy-and-soda, whether you like it or not, to drink your health in. So you've been working hard, have you? And how is the state of the law getting on? Any briefs yet? It can only know how delighted I am to see you!"

George seemed a little taken aback by the warmth of my welcome. He said he believed that he had a fairly good prospect of getting on in time, though he had not as yet had the satisfaction of pocketing a single fee. He hoped I was not in right, and that I found the diplomatic career as pleasant as I had expected. When I had replied the candid I was that he was looking as pale with a certain air of compunction and shamefulness, which I was at a loss to account for until it struck me that he might have undertaken the pilgrimage with the object of discovering how matters stood between me and Lady Constance. This surmise damped my spirits a little, but I was not unlike me angry, as it could have done some months before. After all, the sooner my friends knew what must be known sooner day the better. After something had been said about Thirlby and my uncle and Mrs. Farquhar—neither of whom George Mand—George, who was leaning over the fire, remarked, casually, "Lady Constance Mand is here, is she not?"

"Yes," I answered; "she is."

"Ah!" said he; "so I understand." And then there was silence for a short time.

"Look here, George," I burst out at last, in desperation, "you may just as well speak plainly as to go on exchanging thoughts. Of course I know what you are saying to yourself, and it's all true. I have done exactly what you prophesied, and what I could have sworn that I should never do. I have fallen over head and ears in love with Lady Constance Milner, who doesn't care a snap of her fingers for me, and I have thrown over Maud Dennison, who—well, perhaps she may have been inclined to care a little for me at one time, though I hope it was not so. You are thinking that I am a vain, weak-minded ass, and something very like a perjurer into the bargain—"

"Indeed, Charley, I wasn't thinking all that of you," put in George, mildly.

"Never mind; you might have thought it, and been perfectly right. I think quite as badly of myself as any one else can think of me. All I have to say is that I can't help it."

"H'm—no; I suppose you can't help it," agreed George, thoughtfully; "I don't see how anybody is to help visitations of this sort. No man would expose himself to the worry and misery of falling in love with a woman who didn't care for him, if he could by any means avoid doing so."

I had not expected to meet with so much clemency. "You would have helped it," I sighed; "you would have had the wisdom to retire when she gave you the chance, instead of provoking her into showing you her power. Do you know that at Naples she actually warned me of what would happen if I persisted in forcing myself upon her? And I, like an idiot as I was, defied her. You would never have done that."

"Oh," said George, "she was no temptation to me. She might have practised all her arts upon me, and I should have been none the worse."

"She could have made you fall in love with her with the greatest ease; she could do it now if she liked, and not all your common-sense would save you," I declared, with some inconsistency. "She could make anybody fall in love with her. If she had had the misfortune to be born a century or two ago, it is my firm belief that she would have been burned for a witch. I wish she had been born centuries ago. Or rather I wish she was not going to be born until the next century. In many ways she is better fitted to live in the next century than in this one, and perhaps posterity won't be so susceptible as some of us are."

George pointed out to me that this was not the language of a lover.

"Perhaps not," I said; "but it expresses my feelings. I suppose I am hardly a lover in the ordinary sense of the word, for I would give anything not to be in love with Lady Constance. I scarcely ever talk to her without being angry and disgusted with myself, and sometimes she positively scares me. This afternoon she said a thing which made me feel for the moment almost as if she were an evil spirit. And yet I dare say she meant no great harm. I dare say she has meant no great harm all through; only I hate to think that I am so completely in her power that I daren't call my soul my own. It may be very unjust, and I believe it is, but I can't always forget that, but for her, I should have been devoted to Maud [illegible] I [illegible] deal happier than I can [illegible] be again."

"It appears to me, Charley," said George, gravely, "that [illegible] Miss Dennison. [illegible] you will find that [illegible]."

"Now, George," I [illegible] put on that sapient look [illegible] my temper. Don't you understand? [illegible] of [illegible] you don't. How could you when I can't make head or tail of [illegible]? However, you may take my word for [illegible] all that is over and done with forever. You think, because I rail in this feeble way against Lady Constance, that I don't really care so very much for her; but you are quite wrong. I would cut off my head to give her pleasure; I would go to the end of the world for her; I suppose there are very few things, good or bad, that I would [illegible] if she told me to do them. And all the [illegible] I know perfectly well that she has just about as much affection for me as she has for [illegible]."

George rubbed his head and said, "Well, I don't know, I'm sure," and after that neither of us spoke for a considerable time. Once or twice George opened his mouth as if he were going to say something, but thought better of it, and sat drumming abstractedly upon the arms of his chair, while the wood fire crackled and hissed and the wind howled in the chimney.

At length I determined to dismiss black care, at all events for the present. I got up and stretched myself, remarking that we shouldn't make things any better by talking about them. "What are you going to do this evening? Come down-stairs and be introduced to Lord and Lady Rowan; they'll be sure to ask you to stop and dine."

George, with his usual reluctance to make fresh acquaintances, said he thought he had better wait until the next day; but I would take no refusal, and presently dragged him down to the drawing-room, where we found Lady Rowan alone. Lady Rowan had often heard of George Warren from me, and accorded him a very different welcome from that which she had extended to poor Harry. Among the generality of her guests she passed for a somewhat chilling person; but she was beloved by shy and retiring members of society, whom she had the knack of setting at their ease without any of the obvious efforts at doing so which shy people so deeply resent. George was a young man after her own heart—a young man entirely free from vice, vanity, or affectation, yet a thoroughly manly fellow, with no suspicion of priggishness about him. She recognized the [illegible] to which he belonged in a very few minutes, and began asking him questions about his home, and telling him of the many clever things that her husband had lately said and done, which was always a sure mark of her favor.

"Lord Rowan and Mr Pemberton have gone to dine at the Palace," she said, after a time; "but if you will put up with my company and Mr Maxwell's and stay to dinner here, I shall be very glad. My sister-in-law, I think, you already know; but I believe she does not intend to join us this evening."

Lady Constance did not join us in the dining-room; but she looked in for a few minutes on her way from a dinner party to a ball, and, on recognizing the addition to our party, was pleased to say that surprises were always a blessing, and that if anything could have surprised her, it would have been the sight of her friend Mr Warren at Franzenshohe. "I thought you were too much of a John Bull ever to leave England for pleasure," she remarked; "but possibly you may not be here for pleasure, after all. Have you been knocking down any more innocent people lately?"

She and George then withdrew to the other side of the room and had a brief colloquy, at the end of which he returned, rather red, but looking pleased with himself. It was but too evident that there had been an encounter, nor could I entertain any doubt as to what had been the subject of that encounter; but I forbore to question George when we retired, and soon afterward my overzealous friend went to bed.

CHAPTER XX

GEORGE STATES HIS MISSION.

"THE ex-bear leader," said Lady Constance, "carries out his instructions clumsily. He does not want courage, but his system of tactics is deplorably crude."

I was sitting in her drawing-room on the morning after George's arrival, and she addressed these remarks to me from the piano, upon which, at intervals, she was playing fragments of one of Chopin's nocturnes. Outside, the snow was falling in small flakes; a strong wind from the north was piling it in drifts against the house on the other side of the street, and causing the sparse pedestrians to hurry, shivering, on their way; but in this bright, cozy room all was warmth and luxury. The cheerful wood fire (Lord Rowan abhorred the national white stoves, and would have none of them in his house), the stands of hot-house plants; the faint odor of sandal-wood, which was the perfume specially affected by Lady Constance; the strange accidentals and dissonances of the nocturne—all these things soothed my senses and filled me with languid contentment. Lady Constance was, I think, by far the best amateur pianist that I have ever listened to; but it was only upon very rare occasions that she cared to exhibit her skill. She was playing now in a dreamy, ill-jointed fashion, often repeating the same passage two or three times, and often breaking into soft chords and trills which probably could not have been found in the score; and it seemed to me that the contrast between the vague, poetical character of the music, and the observations by which it was interrupted every now and then was [illegible] characteristic of [illegible].

"What [illegible]?" I [illegible]

"[illegible]" I [illegible] "Why should he be [illegible]"

She played [illegible] a dozen bars before she replied. "I don't know why he shouldn't; but I am very sure that he hasn't. He has marched upon Franzenshohe with a purpose, and I should not be very much surprised to hear that your uncle had paid his travelling expenses."

Of course I knew what she meant; but I thought it better to say, "I don't quite understand you."

"Bend your mind to the subject, and you will probably succeed in comprehending it. For my part I think your [illegible] is quite right, only he should [illegible] choosing his emissaries. [illegible] a fresh [illegible] of an ogress; but to exhibit [illegible] is not one of them. The plan I should adopt myself would be to suborn the prettiest actress I could find, and get her to make advances to him."

I said, "You are very cynical."

"Do you think so? Some people might have the right to say that of me, but surely not you. And frankly I don't care much about accepting the rôle of an ogress, which some friends seem determined to force upon me. They have been very injudicious in throwing down the gauntlet; but their lack of judgment shall not harm them. [illegible] Antonio shall be told to say 'Not at home' the next time you honor me with a call."

"And will you refuse to speak to me when we meet every day at dinner?" I asked. "Even if you do you will not be able to prevent my seeing you, and I might content myself with that as a pis-aller." The fact was that I did not think her dismissal was meant to be serious.

"It is true," said she, her fingers still wandering over the keys; "I can't send you out of the house, though of course I can leave it myself, as, indeed, I was thinking of doing at any rate. But I don't quite like the idea of striking my tents and marching the moment that the redoubtable Warren takes the field against me. It would be curious if his coming here should have the effect of making me stay a little longer than I had intended."

"If it has that effect I shall bless the day of his arrival," said I; "but you make a mistake in thinking that he has been sent here by any uncle. My uncle is much too straightforward to employ stratagems, and too unsuspicious to think that they are needed; besides which, he knows very well that a word from him would influence me more than anything that dear old George Warren could say or do."

"Ah! then I think he would do well to speak that word. Yet, when all is said and done, it is not a matter of such tragic importance. In another year or two, at the very outside, you will wonder what you can ever have seen in me that was different from other women."

I got up and walked to the piano, and resting my arms upon it, looked down at her. "Do you honestly think that?" I asked.

She went on playing, without noticing me; but when I repeated my question she ceased suddenly, and raised her eyes to mine with a certain wistfulness. "I know it," she answered, quietly. "Neither you nor I wish to accept life like dumb animals, do we? Well, but if we want to understand it at all, we must begin by facing obvious truths, and one obvious truth is that we are all of us perpetually shifting and changing. It cuts both ways, don't you see?—it is half curse, half blessing. Everybody must have some moments of intense unhappiness. You would not like them to last forever, and you can't expect that happiness, or love, or fancy, or any other pleasant thing should last either."

"I won't make any protestations," I said; "I haven't much right to do that, because, as you know, I have changed once already. Still, I think a time may come when you will acknowledge that I am not exactly the same as all the other men who have felt your extraordinary attraction, and have shaken themselves free of it. I only wish you would give me the opportunity of doing some great thing for your sake. Then perhaps you would understand better."

"Take care!" she said, laughing; "I might put you to the test one of these fine days. It sometimes happens that I want difficult things done, and I am not always scrupulous."

I was about to answer that if she wanted a despot assassinated or a powder-magazine blown up, I was the desperate man to carry out her purpose; but I was preserved from taking such rash pledges by the entrance of Mr Sotheran, who was announced at this moment.

In the presence of that imperturbable bugbear I could neither talk nor feel at my ease, and I presently went away to look after George, whom I had left in my room an hour before, and who saluted my return with a touch of impatience, saying that he had begun to think I was buried under a snow-drift.

I apologized, and he answered, "Oh, never mind; I can guess where you have been. I hope that snow won't go on falling for twenty-four hours," he added, walking to the window. "I must be off home to-morrow morning, if I can manage it."

"To-morrow morning! You don't mean to say that you must go so soon as that!" I exclaimed; but, to tell the truth, my dismay was somewhat hypocritical. Only the day before I had been overjoyed to see him, but now I was relieved to hear that he did not mean to stay. Well might Lady Constance declare that man [illegible] subject to perpetual change!

"I haven't any time to waste, you see," George said, [illegible] about the room and looking a good deal embarrassed. "I wanted just to see you, you know, and—and to say a few words."

"Yes," I answered, "I know; and it's awfully [illegible] of you, old fellow, though you have had a long journey for nothing, I'm afraid. Anyhow, you have done your best for me, and no man can do more."

"Oh, well," said George, becoming more and more fidgety and disconcerted, "I should have been very glad to have got you out of this entanglement, Charley, and I can honestly say that I would have travelled a great many miles to do that, if it had seemed at all possible; but I mustn't claim to have come here with that object. I had another reason—" Here George came to a full stop, and after knocking over a pile of books, backed away from the table until the edge of a chair catching him behind the knees caused him to sit down with great violence.

"Well," I said, "out with it! What are you hesitating about?"

"It isn't so easy to come out with it," replied George. "I—I suppose you haven't formed any conjecture?"

I said, "Not the faintest; I am completely mystified."

"No, I knew you wouldn't have suspected anything—nobody would," sighed George; "and I have felt all along that it was a piece of almost indecent presumptuousness on my part to dream of such a thing. But then, as you said last night, one can't help one's self."

"Oho!" cried I, "so the murder's out, and you have actually lost that well-regulated heart of yours! Now I know why you have become so merciful to the failings of others all of a sudden. Don't talk about presumptuousness, my dear fellow; why, there isn't a girl in all Norfolk good enough for you!"

"Well, now," said George, brightening considerably, "I am very glad to hear [illegible] say that. You speak as a friend, of course, and I make all due deductions; still it's an immense comfort to be encouraged in this way. I wouldn't say a word to her, you know, until I had seen you and made sure of—of your approval."

It struck me that this was paying an unusually high tribute to the claims of friendship; but I knew that George had always had a greater respect for my opinion than it deserved, and I was quite ready to give him the benefit of it now. "If you approve of her you may take it for granted that I shall," I declared, generously. "But I should be better able to judge of her, perhaps, if you were to tell me her name."

"Eh?—her name?" ejaculated George, with a most chap-fallen air. "I thought you understood. Why, who could it be, you know? Of course—of course it's Maud—Miss Dennison, I mean."

THE BI-CENTENNIAL OF GERMAN-AMERICANISM.

Two hundred years ago, or early in October, 1683, the good ship Concord, nearly ten weeks out from London, entered the Delaware River, and on the 6th of that month came to anchor in front of the embryo city of Philadelphia. From her was landed a colony of thirty-three German immigrants, the first band of that vast army from the father-land, which now numbers five million souls, or one-tenth of the population of the United States. These first German-Americans, upon disembarking from their Mayflower, were welcomed by their leader, Francis Daniel Pastorius, who had come over ten months earlier to prepare the way for them; and under his direction they established themselves upon the fertile hill-sides and in the valleys watered by the Wissahickon and Wingohocking creeks, about eight miles from the newly founded town of Philadelphia. From William Penn himself the tract of country occupied by them received the name of German Township.

The coming of these Germans from the valley of the Rhine, and the founding of the State to which they and their descendants have given so distinctive a character, were almost contemporaneous events, for they arrived two years after William Penn had been granted proprietary rights by royal charter, fifteen months after the first location of the city of Philadelphia, and eleven months after the arrival of the founder himself. They came by direct invitation of William Penn, who had encountered the peculiar sect of Mennonites to which they belonged when travelling in Germany some years before. The similarity of their tenets to those of the English Quakers had attracted him to them, and when he was in the position to extend to the Old the hospitality of the New World, these Mennonites were among the first to receive and to accept his invitation.

Last week the two-hundredth anniversary of the landing of this little colony of Pastorius's was celebrated by German-Americans in all parts of the country, but particularly in those centres of German population, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, and Newark, New Jersey. In the former place the event celebrated was made more real by the historic surroundings and associations everywhere encountered in that portion of the city known as Germantown. Among these, illustrations are shown on page 660 of the "1690 House," the oldest in Germantown, the "Ship House," which, over one of its gable windows, bears the cast of a ship under full sail, supposed to represent the Concord, and the "Concord School House," erected in 1775.

The three days' celebration of the German bi-centennial, which was begun on Saturday the 6th inst., culminated on Monday the 8th in grand processions, the ranks of which were swelled by almost the entire adult male German population of the several cities in which they were formed.

The Philadelphia procession contained ten thousand men, and was divided into eight divisions, of which the first, or "Historic," was full of capitally conceived and ingeniously prepared effects. One of the several "floats," upon which the tableaux were grouped, bore the representation of the first rude log house of the German settlers. Upon another was seen a printing establishment of the last century. In it a master and his apprentices set up the clumsy type, inked the cumbrous press, and slowly worked off the printed pages of the first Bible printed in the New World as Christopher Sauer did in 1743. Between the floats were bodies of men on horseback or afoot, clad in the quaint costumes of past centuries. One group was dressed in the semi-military garb of the time of the Thirty Years' War. Lancers with steel helmets, heavily armed infantry bearing cross-bows and pikes, bodies of Continental troops in blue and buff with old flint-locks, Indians in war paint and feathers, and many other quaintly uniformed and armed bodies of men made the historic division the most interesting of the entire procession.

In Newark the procession was nearly as long and as imposing as that of Philadelphia, and was viewed by throngs of many thousands. One wagon in the parade bore a flaming banner with the inscription,

1883 we Own One-third of the City."

Judging from appearances the Germans owned the entire city, for German faces, flags, and gutturals were seen and heard on all sides, to the exclusion of almost all other sights and sounds.

The various industries that German-Americans have virtually monopolized were displayed in detail in wagons. Of these a procession an eighth of a mile long was devoted to the [illegible] of brewing, and exhibited [illegible] of the [illegible] from the [illegible] of [illegible] drinking of the foaming [illegible] tableaux [illegible] as Pas[illegible] gathering together a party of [illegible] on the banks of the Rhine, the Moravian [illegible] educating Indians, Pastorius declaring against slavery, Christopher Ludwig baking bread for Washington's army, [illegible], and [illegible], and Washington, Steuben, and Lafayette fraternizing and drinking beer, as, according to the vivid German imagination, they must have done in days [illegible] by.

In Trenton, Pittsburgh, [illegible], Providence, Erie, and many other [illegible] day was celebrated with [illegible] of guns, [illegible]

THE LUMBER INTERESTS OF CHICAGO.

On the south-western border of Chicago is another city whose buildings are the blackened piles of lumber, and whose busiest highways are the passages between, just large enough to afford entrance for a wagon. Through this district flows the sluggish water of the South Branch of the Chicago River, its current changing direction with the wind, and its places unvarying, except to grow a little more intolerable when some huge propeller is fast in the mud, and her puns screw, sailed by the tugs pulling at her, stirs up the ooty bottom.

Extending into the yards on either hand are long slips from which rise the graceful spars of the lumber schooners, or the stumpy and blackened masts of the barges. Some of these carry nearly a million feet of lumber. The "lumber shovers" who unload them wear a leather apron extending from the belt to the knees, and leather guards to protect the palms of their hands. During the cold, raw weather of early spring these men can be seen at work stripped to the waist, regardless of the freezing rain and the bleak lake winds which make such and havoc with weak lungs.

Almost as far as the eye can distinguish objects through the smoky atmosphere the vast expanse is roofed with the sloping tops of the lumber piles. Here and there rises a planing mill or sash factory, or more conspicuously the huge grain elevators, with their iron roofs and plate-covered sides. Tracks and sidings admit to the heart of the lumber district the locomotive with its string of cars of almost every road in the country, coming to be loaded with the rough lumber, packing boxes, or the finer manufactures of doors, stair rails, and the like. The trains make quite a study of color in the otherwise dingy prospect. Even the cars of the same lines are of different shades from varied exposure to the weather. The air resounds with the hum of the planing mills, the snorting of the busy switch engines, the jolting of the wagons on the corduroy roads, the rattling of tackles and the whistling of tugs on the river. Scores of chimneys and stacks fill the air with smoke, and the breeze carries with it the finer dust from the saw mills, which finds sure lodgment in the eyes of the visitor, whose efforts to relief include his cheeks with the damp soot deposited there.

Scattered about in other localities, generally along the river, are other yards, singly or in groups, aggregating as large an area as that of the "Lumber District" just described. Even at the mouth of the river, on artificial ground, the mills and lumber piles extend eastward half a mile or more beyond the site of the old Light-house and Fort Dearborn. The stock of lumber on hand carries from four to seven hundred million feet of sawed stuff and timber, one to three hundred million shingles, forty to seventy millions laths, with pickets, cedar posts, etc., in proportion.

The shipments sometimes reach two hundred million feet of lumber and one hundred and fifty million shingles in a single month. The local trade amounts annually to over five hundred million feet.

The town of South Chicago, at the mouth of the Calumet River, twelve miles south, has extensive yards, and, according to the interested parties, bids fair to rival the present city in the future. Many of the citizens of Chicago wish the lumber trade was transferred entirely to the Calumet, for they look with apprehension upon the acres of dry lumber, and fear a repetition of the calamity of 1871. A fire getting good headway in this locality, if fanned by the strong south-west winds prevalent in the summer and fall, could hardly fail to destroy the city as completely as before, despite the efforts of what is called the most efficient Fire Department in the world.

The region which produces this enormous quantity of lumber extends along the eastern shore of Lake Michigan and half the length of the western side. Reaching far into the interior of the State are streams which bring down the logs rafted together to the saw-mills at the river mouths. These lumber towns along the shores wooden to the last degree. Many are built upon piles driven into the sandy marshes, the buildings all frame, and even the roads made of sawdust, into which the foot sinks as though in dry sand. Then will water is frequently so very low as suffices from the decaying wood through which it comes. It seems almost a miracle that any of the inhabitants should escape if one of the forest fires which occasionally sweep through the lumber regions attacked their town. No precaution is being made to perpetuate the forests, but they are being cut down right and left, making it only a question of time when the middle-posse timber will be as rare as rose-wood. As a gentleman connected with the lumber interest remarked, "We are doing nothing for posterity except to decree that they shall not build wooden houses."

The lumber is brought to the Chicago market chiefly by schooners, propellers, and barges, the latter being towed two or three at a time by powerful tugs. The receipts of lumber by rail, except from the south, are comparatively light, although the Chicagoans think it would make a though the Chicagoans think it would make a comfortable business for what they facetiously call the "suburban towns," viz., Milwaukee, St. Paul, and St. Louis. The immensity of the lumber business of Chicago can not be realized except by taking a drive through the lumber district, and spending an afternoon in the rooms of the Lumberman's Exchange, poring over the statistics compiled by the secretary. There are two hundred and twenty firms engaged either as brokers, manufacturers, or dealers in lumber. Last year one firm alone handled one hundred and twenty five million feet, averaging in value about eighteen dollars a thousand.

Besides the trade in pine the hard wood lines are in increasing demand. The coarse hard woods, domestic and imported, and the cheaper hard pine from Mississippi, form no inconsiderable item in the years receipts. During the last year the receipts of lumber at Chicago made a grand total of 2,676,737,042 feet, and 1,215,455,496 shingles. Of this, three hundred million feet were of hard wood. The long leaf yellow pine, heavy almost as mahogany, and so pitchy that a sliver of it will burn like a taper, is rapidly growing in favor for interior work. Good selected stock has a beautifully figured grain, and when darkened a little by time is surpassed in effect by but few of the more expensive hard woods. The shipping trade in lumber from Chicago extends northwest, west, and south to the limits of the country, not always stopping there. Some of the lumber towns of Michigan are active competitors for the trade with the Eastern States; but, nevertheless, the city of railroads manages to forward a goodly amount into their markets.

Chicago, being in the centre of a vast system of water and rail transportation lines, is destined to become a larger dealer in lumber every year, although now the largest market for forest products in the world. The millionaires in the metropolis and the section based on one of the new western railroads both bar the sentential for their homes from her yards. The boards for the farmers' fences and the ties on the road-bed of the railway which carried him to his Western home pass through the hands of the Chicago lumbermen. The forests of Michigan are still enormous, and the undeveloped West demands their wood. The trade is guaranteed for years to come, and fortunes await those who can skillfully conduct it.

JAMES J. WAIT.

THE VALLEY OF MATRIMONY.

THERE is no more thankless task that can fall to the lot of a middle-aged spinster with quiet tastes than that of engineering a young woman of any considerable personal attractions across Europe. The trouble began on the ocean steamer in the shape of a captain in the United States navy. At Paris it was a big Frenchman with a nature like that of a Newfoundland dog; at Marseilles it presented itself under the guise of a dreamy-eyed German, at Rome it was a silver-tongued Italian; at Naples it concentrated itself in the most violent and virulent form in the person of a young American doctor.

Miss Sutherland was troubled with a cough—as entirely natural and appropriate thing to a young woman who exposed herself in all kinds of weathers on ship-board simply to know how the sea looked in a storm. The idea that that cough needed a physician's care was entirely preposterous, but, all the same, we had not been in Naples ten days before Miss Sutherland's lungs were as much the object of solicitude to Dr. Manning as if she had been in the last stages of consumption. What a delightful thing a cough is—one, that is, which is quite sufficiently slight, does not keep the sufferer awake at night, or otherwise interfere with the comfortable progress of existence! There was just enough reality to Miss Sutherland's cough to prevent her undertaking the fatigue of a journey up Vesuvius, but not sufficient to interfere with any number of small excursions to San Martino, Cajio di Monte, or anywhere else that might be accomplished within a reasonable number of hours. That cough contributed to Miss Sutherland just the one element of attraction she did not need. The rather firmly set lips took on quite a gentle piteous expression when the tortured throat was trying to relieve itself by a fit of coughing; a slight fever gave the usually colorless cheeks and clear eyes a brilliancy, and the exhaustion that followed reduced the young lady from her usual attitude of manly independence to a most fascinating condition of womanly weakness.

It very soon came to be understood that Miss Sutherland's carelessness in regard to her health, her ignorance, and mine also, of Neapolitan justice, the viciousness of donkeys, and the cupidity of guides, made a male escort almost a necessity in the neighborhood of Naples. Whether the necessity grew out of the ready provision to meet it, or the provision out of the necessity, it is not worth while to argue. Judging from the independence of other lady travellers, the former theory seems the more tenable. During the first of these excursions Miss Sutherland had something of a body guard about her. Three or four hands at least were put out to help her over every rock and up every height. Presently the number was reduced to one. Dr. Manning had, in fact, assumed the same jurisdiction over the rest of Miss Sutherland's movements that he did over the cough. That ailment had been his especial charge from the beginning, and he seemed to be rapidly assuming the responsibility of whatever else appertained to the young lady. Matters had been in this shape for about a month when it became apparent that something had begun to go wrong. Among the united intelligence and experience that have fallen to my lot I received at the conclusion that to Miss Sutherland had regained her health she desired to discharge her physician. I was not prepared, however, for the manner in which she undertook to do it. The plan was revealed in the simple announcement that she intended to change her quarters to the island of Capri.

Unhappily my relations to Miss Sutherland are such that for me to hear is to obey. I looked at the bleak mass of rock from my window and shuddered, it being February, and the vaunted climate of Italy being in fact as chill as an Englishman's May. The effect of the announcement upon me was, however, mild to that which it produced upon Dr. Manning. They were sitting very quietly when it came—she half buried in a big arm-chair, he playing with the tassels of her shawl.

"Agnes!"—it was a daring venture that with her first name—"you are not going over on that bleak rock." It will be absolutely dangerous for you. As your physician I will not allow it."

Now at this moment the doctor had an advantage. Had he pushed it, dusty Miss Sutherland, with her assumptions of dignity and firmly carved mouth, would have yielded that point and the rest. He blundered, for he added, very softly, "Don't go, dear!"

I left the room. I always do at this stage. Miss Sutherland is a thorough American in regard to her lovers. An English or a French girl would have fled after me. The young lady in question thought it quite proper that I should remain. The matter in question was quite personal to herself, and required no interference from outside parties. The doctor sent me blundering unquestionably, for an hour later, when she came into my room, we had the following conversation:

"Well?"

"Yes."

"Again?"

"I believe so." This with a yawn, after which, to all appearance, her whole attention was given to getting the hair pins out of her hair.

Capri is a beautiful island. The old Romans had good taste, and Tiberius built twelve villas on it wherein to amuse himself during leisure hours. At the same time middle-aged women will get the rheumatism in damp places. We had not taken more than a dozen donkey-rides, ascended Mount Solario, and made the trip to Anacapri, when certain twinges in my joints warned me of the probability of being laid up six weeks in a little pension perched on one of the steepest rocks in the Mediterranean. My experienced eyes also informed me that Miss Sutherland was not precisely herself. My diagnosis of the case was soon made out to my own satisfaction. She was trying to live up to the lines of her mouth, and at the same time giving way round the heart. The doctor's snapshot had undoubtedly cost him a rejection. But when a young lady flees to no almost desert island to avoid the proximity of an obnoxious suitor, and then spends most of her time gazing across the sea in the direction where he is supposed to be, it may explain the matter perfectly to say that she is admiring Vesuvius, but if it does, the person who accepts the explanation has not much experience of young women.

Is there anything in this world much more excruciating than an attack of inflammatory rheumatism? The case precisely what Miss Sutherland's experience in regard to her lovers had brought me to. For two weeks I lay upon my bed a hideous mass of red flannel, racked with pain, and hating Capri with the intensity of one of the captives of old Tiberius. During this time Miss Sutherland developed into one of the gentlest and tenderest nurses that ever took care of the victim of her own imprudence. The process of torture was going on six weeks being the allegued period for the inflammatory demon to hold sway, when one morning the familiar face of Dr. Manning appeared above my bed. For two minutes I positively lost sight of the pain in my joints so anxious if he had been sent for. Miss Sutherland took the very first opportunity to inform me that he had not. We were indebted for his presence to the fact that some residents of Capri had told him that both the English ladies at the pension were ill, the elder one very ill.

If anything will alleviate the pangs of acute rheumatism it is having two young people about one both of whom are clearly in love with each other, while each is ready to die rather than make the first sign. The attitude of the doctor was magnificent. He had clearly come to Capri to save if possible the lives of two women imperiled by the abominable willfulness of one. His recovery from the effect of Miss Sutherland's fascinations appeared to be complete. He administered a cough mixture which nauseated the young lady, but took no further interest in her ailments. He he nursed with an enthusiasm and devotion not to be described. I doubt if any rheumatic spinster in red flannel was ever so cared for before. For four weeks I was the object of the most assiduous attentions from two young people scarcely on speaking terms with each other. At the end of two weeks more I was able to walk about. Another fortnight and I was pronounced able to ride a donkey. By this time it might have been supposed that as Dr. Manning felt no interest whatever in Miss Sutherland, the attendance of a physician might have been dispensed with. The Baroness Burdett-Coutts had just married a man forty years younger than herself, to be sure, but the case was not parallel. Nobody on earth would have imagined for a moment that the doctor was in love with me.

There is nothing to do at Capri but make excursions on donkeys. My return to health was to be celebrated by a donkey excursion, and the arrangements for it finally brought out from the doctor that after the day was over he would betake himself to Naples. Up to this time Miss Sutherland's imperturbability had been almost equal to that of her lover. This announcement brought a feverish color to her cheeks, and from the magnificent repose of her usual manner she took to exhibiting what in an elderly woman would have been described as "fidgets."

The objective point of our excursion was the villa of Tiberius that is in the best repair. There is a great choice of them, one more like a mass of dilapidated brick cellars than the last. We started on a sunny morning, on two of the most obstinate and refractory donkeys that Capri produces. The doctor preferred to walk, which he did by our side. Each donkey was conducted by a peasant woman with immense ear-rings and no shoes. Now to these creatures had been given the direction by an obliging landlady to take us through the most beautiful portions of the island to the villa. The donkey women of Capri are an indescribable mixture of man, woman, and beast. They are as strong as men, as loquacious as women, as stupid and obstinate as their own donkeys. In this instance, however, they did as they were bid.

We had been riding an hour or more, Miss Sutherland in advance, and the doctor with his hand on my saddle, exhibiting all the devotion that a young man naturally feels toward a rheumatic spinster of fifty, when there was a halt in the part of the donkeys, and a chorus from the women: "Signora,' signora! Val di Matrimonio, signum' val di Matrimonio!"

Miss Sutherland had not caught the words, and indignant at the additional outburst of noise, inquired: "What is the matter with them? Is anything extraordinary?"

I have a wholesome terror of Miss Sutherland's moods, but the doctor had apparently survived his, for he answered, very coolly, "We are apparently upon the verge of the 'Valley of Matrimony,' and the donkey women are calling our attention to the fact."

There was a silence that under the circumstances was painful. Miss Sutherland tried to look dignified from the top of her donkey—as an elephant thing seen for her. The donkey ascended without trying to look any straighter than in his position at the tail of none.

To relieve the situation I opened fire:

"The so-called Val di Matrimonio, sometimes called Matrimony by the islanders, descends one ward to the sea at the base of the Tuoro Grande."

"Ah," said the doctor, "it certainly does descend eastward."

I went on:

"The Grotto di Mitromanna, or Grotto of Mithras, a shrine of the Persian god of the sun, to which one hundred and thirty steps descend—"

This time Miss Sutherland was made with a remark.

"We must see the grotto, by all means."

To this I objected on the score of the one hundred and thirty steps, and the doctor agreed with me.

I shall always think that it was the peculiar chilly and disagreeable tone of the doctor's voice that sent Miss Sutherland on precipitately toward the brow of the hill. In half a moment she was off her donkey and explaining in her choicest Italian to a group of women and small boys that she would not have either their assistance or the company in descending the rugged steps. The peasants shook their heads doubtfully, and grinned, half in warning, half in fun, as long disappointed of their souls. The doctor never moved a muscle, and in two minutes more the girl was out of sight. By any of rules of his kind not my own nerves, we began to discourse eloquently on Italian scenery. Finally the subject could not be avoided any longer.

"Doctor," said I, "find me if you can from those women how long it ought to take to descend to that grotto and ruins back again."

The labor of this investigation was dreadful. The doctor talked and the women screamed. Time enough was consumed to have lost a dozen lives, when he announced as the result of the struggles that Miss Sutherland should have returned long ago.

"Doctor," I exclaimed, "that girl has broken her neck."

"Well?"

"Well?" I shrieked. "Is it possible you don't care anything about it?"

"On the contrary, I am rather pleased at such an appropriate denouement. She has broken my heart, nearly lost you your life, and what could possibly be more suitable than for her to finish by breaking her own neck?"

This was a pretty speech from a man in love.

"Will you go down and look for her?"

"Certainly, if you will go with me. We shall probably find her strung on a rock pulpit indifferent to our feelings, and meditating on her own unworthiness."

He positively declined to go unless I went with him. Further solicitude on Miss Sutherland's behalf it was not in Dr. Manning's programme to bestow. Hand in hand, and assisted by a couple of peasant women, we scrambled down that horrible precipice. The shrine of the Persian god, a cave with arches and walls of brick, was passed, but no sign of Miss Sutherland's presence.

Presently, looking over a small cliff, we saw the young woman half sitting, half lying on a rock.

"Is anything the matter?" the doctor called out.

"No, nothing—not exactly." The words were exactly those Miss Sutherland would have liked to utter in her firmest tone. The tone she did utter them in was one that denoted an agony of suppressed pain.

The doctor heard it quite as well as I did, but he did not move.

"Will you come up, or shall I come down to you?"

By this time we could see the white face. The doctor took two steps forward and stopped.

Miss Sutherland, Spartan that she was, had barely all she could bear. Both arms were stretched out, and the weakest kind of a voice answered:

"I can not come. Come to me."

There was really "nothing—not exactly" the matter with Miss Sutherland but a broken ankle and a dislocated shoulder.

What a piece of work it was carrying her up that dreadful hill! And how ever did we manage to get her all the way back to the pension without killing her? Team stood in the doctor's eyes as he handed her foot to one and then the other of the stout peasants that helped him with her. Of the stout peasants that helped him with her garden. That was the only sign of weakness on either part.

The doctor manages his wife there is no doubt about that. Just precisely what system of discipline was inaugurated among the lines groves of Capri, when Miss Sutherland's ankle was fully mended and her shoulder settled in its rightful place, I don't pretend to understand. It is all very well for him, but no far me, when I undertake my next charge, I hope she will be a commonplace young person with red hair and cross-eyed.

MEXICAN INDEPENDENCE-DAY.

The seventy-third anniversary of Mexican independence was celebrated on the 16th of September. The festivities in the city of Mexico were unusually brilliant, and the military display was one long to be remembered by those who witnessed it.

Mexico has seen many changes since September, 1810, when the brave little parish priest Miguel Hidalgo, with his small band of patriots, made a stand for liberty and freedom from Spanish tyranny in Dolores, a little out-of-the-way town in the State of Guanajuato. Poor Hidalgo was captured and shot for his pains, but the fire he had kindled blazed higher and brighter. When the Spanish armies trampled it to ashes in one place, it sprang forth with renewed energy in another. It was the liberty of the New World combating the Old World rule of kings, and there was only one way in which it could end. Eleven years after Hidalgo's small beginning, what was left of the Spanish forces sailed away eastward, and Mexico was left to build up its republic. It has had a very hard time of it, for its population has not been an easy one to control. The bolting went on slowly—indeed, it still ever occasionally into an empire—but the true spirit has always lived, and the result is that to-day Mexico stands free as a large and flourishing republic, with liberal institutions, an extensive free-school system, and a rapidly increasing mercantile prosperity.

Free education is one of the strongest foundations for national welfare, and in this particular Mexico deserves the highest praise. Mr Bonner, in his admirable book on Old Mexico and her Lost Provinces, recently published by Messrs. Harper & Brothers, says: "Education is found to be provided for in a manner that awakens admiration and surprise. The primary schools are best looked after, but the pupils who pass through these with a disposition to go further have an array of advantages open to them at the capital superior to anything of a parallel sort in the United States. The government maintains national schools, respectively, of engineering, law, medicine, agriculture, mechanic arts, and trades (for both sexes), a Conservatory of Music, an Academy of Fine Arts, and a library provided with an edifice that New York well might envy. The schools are open without money and without price to all, and there are even funds to provide board, lodging, and pocket-money for students from a distance, who are selected on easy conditions."

"The principal text-books in the higher schools are studied in French or English, and the recitations are conducted in the same languages, so that, what is so rare with us, graduates emerge from these schools very tolerable linguists without ever having been out of their own country."

The writer remembers an incident which occurred in a small Mexican city several years since. A measure was before the Common Council for the improvement and better lighting of the Zocalo, or public square. The measure was finally voted down because there was not sufficient means on hand to carry it out without encroaching on the school fund, and on no account must that be touched. The schools in question were scattered over quite a large district, and were attended for the most part by Indian children. They were well sustained in all departments. I have often talked with the Indians in that locality, and have been astonished at their intelligence. The Indian in Mexico's greatest problem, and education appears to be the quickest way of solving it.

This Indian population, vastly outnumbering the whites, adds a strangely picturesque element to holiday festivities, for those dark shrewd people, despite their solemn countenance, have a keen love of excitement and display. Independence-day celebration in Mexico city begins at midnight; and at that hour on September 15, while bells were ringing cannon firing and the Presidente and other public officials were marching in the great meeting in the National Theatre, the Zocalo in front of the cathedral presented a curious sight. There were gathered Indians of all ages, while families who had tramped in from distant parts of the valley to be on hand at daybreak that they might not lose even the beginning of the sunrise cannon. Grouped around blazing pine-knot fires, built in pans balanced on tripods, they talked in their own mild language, ate tortillas, strummed guitars, sang and danced, while the flickering flame threw fantastic light on their forms enveloped in serapes and rebozos, until, overcome by sleep and fatigue, they sank down in heaps on the pavement.

At sunrise on the morning of the 16th all Mexico city was awake, preparing for the day. Bells rang from every tower, cannon thundered, and the green, white, and red banner floated from every balcony and house-top. Troops of soldiers paraded the street with bands of music. By nine o'clock the square in front of the palace was crowded with military. Officers mounted on mag nificent horses, gaily caparisoned, dashed up and down, Indians crowded around by thousands, Indian women squatted on the curb-stone before little furnaces, frying spoonfuls of mince-meat and pepper rolled up in a tortilla, or, with a bright-eyed pappoose strapped on their back, rushed from one side of the street to the other between the files of soldiers, like cows before a railroad train. At length the President passed from the palace to the grand stand in the Zocalo, while cannon saluted, and the cathedral bells rang a merry chime. There were [illegible]s, reading of poems, and music. The crowd surged to and fro. Finally a movement ran through the long line of infantry, and the procession began to march. Fine military bands, composed for the most part of Indians, struck up inspiring strains. Noticeable in the ranks were the artillery, with howitzers mounted on sturdy little donkeys capable of scaling the steepest mountain passes; the cadets from the military school at Tacubaya, handsome young fellows in neat dark uniforms, with black nodding plumes on their hats; the ambulance corps, the cavalry, and, most prominent of all, the Rurales, or country guard, which are perhaps the finest body of cavalry in the world. They are all picked countrymen, men born on horseback, and they stride their spirited chargers like centaurs. Mr Bonner says: "The Rurales here something in their cut—the buff leather jackets, crossed by ample sword belts, the white gray felt hats—of the troopers of Cuernavaca. Each has a rifle in his holster at the saddle-bow, and a gray and scarlet blanket strapped behind him. Nothing could be more spirited in color than these costumes dismounted beside a cactus-tree, or thrown out against the blue of distant mountains."

It is said that when these Rurales were organized by Porfirio Diaz, with the special object of breaking up the band of bandits which made travelling on the country at that time a thing of terror, the silly chief selected the leaders and many of the men from among these same bandits. Fed and clothed by government, and set to guard the very roads where they themselves had been the depredators, they were bound in honor to keep the peace, for every robbery which might occur it would be a sign of weakness on their part not to have prevented. However this may be, it is a fact that since the organization of the Rurales highway robberies in the rural districts have been few and insignificant.

As the procession winds in front of the cathedral, and gradually vanishes among the crowd in Plateros Street, one follows it, seeing to be a dream rather crowded than this powerful assemblage of 1860. Once this same ground, and following this same direction, rushed Cortez and his men in their terrible rout from the Aztec capital, followed by crowds of hooting Indians, whose descendants crowd the streets to-day. Later on—two centuries later—Plateros Street became the residence, by government decree, of the workers in precious metals, and received the name which it still bears, signifying plate-workers, and here are still clustered the richer jewelers' shops of the country. Up this street rode General Scott, galloping in front of his staff to take possession of the government buildings after the final defeat of the Mexican forces in 1847. And in the church of the Profesa, built a hundred years before the time of Hidalgo, how many stormy meetings have taken place, how many "pleas" and "pronunciamentos" have been matured!

It is to be hoped that these troublous days are soon forever for Mexico, and that long all coming time Plateros Street will remain, as it is now, a brilliant thoroughfare, where jewels glisten in the shop windows, where peaceful processions parade in gorgeous array, and where crowds of fair dames go a-shopping, or drive in handsome carriages on their way to the afternoon promenade.

HELEN S. CONANT.

AN UNPUBLISHED PAGE OF HISTORY.

In these days, when Italy is believed to have entered into a strong alliance offensive and defensive with Germany and Austria, a peculiar interest attaches to a hitherto unpublished letter of the Count Cavour, giving a detailed account of his interviews with Louis Napoleon, just before the war of 1859. This important and piquant recital is given in the Perseverant of Milan. It is printed in French, and was probably written in that tongue, and bears date at Rades, the 24th of July, 1858. The Count Cavour and the Emperor of the French met at Plombieres, in the Vosges, their first conversation lasted from 11 A.M. to 6 P.M., and at 4 it was renewed in the course of a drive, in which the Emperor held the reins himself over "a pair of American horses." At the moment of Cavour's entrance in the morning the Emperor plunged in medias res, with a declaration which a quarter of a century later conveys a striking impression of the peculiar light in which the sovereign considered himself bound to observe:

"He began," writes the Count, "by saying that he had decided to support Sardinia with all his power in a war against Austria, provided that the war should be undertaken for a cause that was truly revolutionary, and that could be justified in the eyes of the diplomacy, and still more of the public opinion, of Europe and of France." On this invitation Cavour entered on "the search for this cause." He suggested Austrian evasion of the commercial treaty with Sardinia. The Emperor found the pretext insufficient "for a war destined to change the map of Europe." The Count then brought forward certain claims of illegal extension of Austrian power in Italy. The Emperor said they had been produced and ignored in the Congress of Paris in 1856. "My position," the Count says, "was becoming embarrassing. I had nothing else very definite to suggest. The Emperor came to my rescue, and we set ourselves to running over all the Italian states, hunting for this cause of war or difficult to find. After having traversed the whole peninsula, we got, almost without suspecting it, to Massa and Carrara, and there we discovered what we had been looking for with so much ardor." The inhabitants of these provinces, subjects of the Duke of Modena, were to be incited to present their grievances. Victor Emanuel should support them in "a haughty and menacing note." The Duke, relying on Austria, would respond "in an arrogant manner." The King would occupy Modena, and "the war would commence." The Emperor thought that such a commencement of the conflict would be popular not only in France, but in Europe and England, "since, rightly or wrongly, the Duke of Modena was looked upon as the repugnant (sous emissaire) of despotism."

After this charmingly frank arrangement, the Count and Emperor proceeded to "regulate the future of Italy" by a plan which was not carried out, and which is is not necessary to describe. "Afterward," says Cavour, "the Emperor asked me what France should have, and if your Majesty would cede Savoy and Nice." The Count thought France "might have" Savoy, but that it would violate "the principle of nationalities" to turn over Nice. Thereupon the Emperor caressed his mustaches several times, and entwisted himself with adding that these were for him secondary questions, which there would be plenty of time to consider."

The afternoon interview was taken up mainly with the proposed marriage of the Prince Napoleon to the Princess Clothilde, daughter of Victor Emanuel. The King had received it with hesitation on account of the Prince's bad reputation. The Count in his letter argues strongly in favor of, and quoting the Emperor's remark that the Prince was "better than his reputation, and had a very good heart," remarks: "That his heart is good there is unanswerable proof in the constancy he has shown toward his friends and toward his mistresses." This droll plea for a suitor for the hand of a young princess throws a flood of light on the Count's remark, "History shows that princesses are exposed to the danger of a sad life." Happily there is now an Emperor who can, and no King of Italy who need, be party to such negotiations as Cavour's letter describes.

When the departure of the summer residents of Newport comes the return of winter resident of many seasons. For ten years on old sea-gull that has come to be known as Dick has made his appearance early in October at the light-ship. He remains all winter, goes his food on board the ship, and disappears in the spring. Nobody knows where Dick spends his summers.

Writing of the departure of President Arthur from Newport, a correspondent says: "We have a very novel and beautiful way of saluting Presidents and distinguished guests. Yesterday there were seventy-two torpedo explosions at the naval station on the harbor. Some of these threw a column of water at least two hundred feet in the air, from a very grand sight, especially at night, with the electric light thrown on the water."

The Toronto Globe finds in a list of the millionaires of New York the name of one who used to be a printer in the office of that paper at a dollar and twenty-five cents a week.

Mrs Beale, of Milwaukee, sued her neighbor, Mr Mehler, for the value of a gold ring which a goose raven belonging to him stole from a bench on which she had laid it while washing in her back yard. When the papers were served on Mr Mehler he asked the constable, "Vy dond you get dot pird taken in shail?" He was finally convinced that he was responsible for the bird's conduct, and he paid the woman for the ring, and settled the costs of the action.

It is said that boujo-playing is to be more fashionable this winter than ever before, and that the popularity of the accomplishment promises to open a field in which supernumerated negro minstrels will find occupation as instructors.

A writer in the Atlanta Constitution confesses himself puzzled by the question why the designation of "moonshiner" is applied to our wayward countryman who persistently evades the law, eludes the excisemen, and bereaves the Treasury. The operations of the moonshiner are never conducted by the light of the moon; indeed, there are seasons when the lunar influence is supposed to confuse his chemistry, sour his sweet-mash, and destroy the most valued properties of his popular product. It is probable that he is called a moonshiner for the same reason that has fastened the designation "moonlighter" to the individual in the petroleum regions whose occupation in the blind explosion of glycerine in the depths of oil wells in evasion of the patent laws. The moonlighter's aversion to moonlight is second only to his dislike for sunlight.

There are those who complain because the president of the Star Association of the District of Columbia wrote "your lordship" and "lord" twenty times in two brief notes to Lord Chief Justice Coleridge, one inviting him to a reception, and the other begging that he will consult his own convenience in naming the day.

Protab Mazoomdar, a learned gentleman from India, who is receiving the hospitalities of Boston, is quoted as having said that the memorials which the English would have in that country, should they ever depart, "would be beer bottles in the Himalayas, and half-burned stumps of cigars in the valleys."

It is authoritatively denied by a Roman Catholic organ in the West that Sitting Bull has come to the conclusion that he can not give up one of his wives as a condition of his being received into the Catholic Church. A bishop avers that that bothered child of the wilderness is "still under instruction," and that he hopes soon to have the pleasure of receiving him as a full-fledged convert. It is not stated whether there is to be a special dispensation in respect to his domestic arrangements.

For the past three months the Japanese Minister in Washington has been leading a very secluded life, and it is said that he is a victim of genuine homesickness.

Ruskin characterizes the soaking of "love matches" to "mob courtship," and says there are no words strong enough to express the general danger and degradation of the method.

The bi-centennial of the first arrival of Germans in North America was not celebrated in New York, although the German population here is larger than in any other city in the world except two. One of the speakers at the jubilee in Philadelphia recalled Pepys's description of the mother of William Penn—"a well looked, fat, short, old Dutch woman, but one that hath been pretty handsome, and, I believe, hath more wit than her husband."

It has been discovered that at the close of the Revolution George Washington was a good man, and weighed two hundred and nine pounds.

The Commissioner of Education has prepared a table which shows the number of men twenty-one years old, or older, in the Southern States who have not learned to write. The figures afford opportunity for interesting comparisons as to the relative illiteracy of the white and black races. In Missouri there are 40,035 white men who can not write, and 19,078 colored men whose education is similarly deficient. The figures for Kentucky are, 64,956 white and 48,177 colored; for Tennessee, 46,940 whites and 36,601 colored; and for Texas, 23,065 white and 29,669 colored. In the other Southern States the figures make a better showing relatively for the white citizens.

The music-loving people of Kansas City insist not only that the music which they have shall be up in their standard of excellence, but that the appearance of those who produce it shall be so keeping with their esthetic tastes. It is charged that Remenyi and De Celle recently came upon the concert stage there with mud on their boots. Said a critic: "Remenyi has been putting in several hot nights in Emporia and Council Grove, where he was allowed the luxury of playing in a flinan duster, and De Celle was permitted to remove his collar when he went for high C. But we are more exacting in Kansas City. We have a perfect art centre on most insist upon these little details."

MODERN CONSISTENCY. THOU ART A (PASTE) JEWEL.

THE HON. BUREN R. SHERMAN, RE-ELECTED GOVERNOR OF IOWA.

ALFONSO XII., KING OF SPAIN.

THE IOWA ELECTION.

THE Hon BUREN R. SHERMAN, who has been re-elected Governor of Iowa by a Republican plurality of from 25,000 to 30,000, is one of the self-made men of the West. He springs from good Eastern stock, and owes much to the qualities inherited from honorable parentage and the habits of industry formed early in life. He is a native of New York, born in Phelps, Ontario County, May 28, 1836.

In 1855 his family removed to Iowa, where his father engaged in farming. Young SHERMAN employed his leisure time in studying law, and in 1859 he was admitted to the bar. On the outbreak of the rebellion he enlisted in the Thirteenth Iowa Volunteer Infantry, and served with distinction, until honorably discharged, with the rank of captain, in consequence of severe wounds which disabled him for the field.

After holding several important civil offices with ability and credit, he was elected Governor of the State in 1881. His administration was eminently satisfactory to the people, as evinced by his triumphant re-election this fall.

In the South Congressional District the Democrats elect their candidate, Judge Cook, over the Republican candidate, Edward H. STILES. But as it was the population of the latter that the Democratic majority, which two years ago was 3000, was reduced to less than 100, fraud is charged, and it is thought that Mr. STILES will contest the seat.

THE KING OF SPAIN.

ALFONSO'S recent travels in France and Germany, especially the rather pressing unpleasantness in the former country with reference to his acceptance by the Empress WILLIAM of the honorary colonelcy of a German regiment, have drawn unusual attention to that sensible young sovereign, the King of Spain. ALFONSO XII. is now in the twenty-sixth year of his age, having been born on the 28th of November, 1857, and in the ninth year of his reign, having been proclaimed King in 1874. His romantic marriage with the unfortunate and beautiful Princess MERCEDES was terminated four years later, and his present marriage with the Archduchess Dowager, whom [as we mentioned last week] he publicly describes as "the Austrian princess who assists me in the duties of my royal office," was entered upon on the 29th of November, 1879. ALFONSO'S reign has been almost unclouded thus far, and the late inconsiderate conduct of the Paris mob has only served to illuminate it with a burst of sunshine, his Spanish subjects being eager to express their loyalty on all possible occasions with tropical exuberance. They might look worse than "Long live ALFONSO."

UNIFORM WITH DORÉ'S "ANCIENT MARINER."

"The illustrations in this superb volume—Gustave Doré's last complete work—are twenty-six in number, and rank among the most original and imaginative fruits of the great artist's genius. They form a wonderful pictorial paraphrase of the intense thought, passionate feeling, and fantastic imaginings of the weird American poem, the burden of which M. Doré conceived to be 'the enigma of death, and the hallucination of an inconsolable soul.' The drawings have been engraved by the ablest and most accomplished American engravers of the times."

KING'S EVIL

Was the name formerly given to Scrofula because of a superstition that it could be cured by a king's touch. The world is wiser now, and knows that can only be cured by a thorough purification of the blood. If this is neglected, the disease perpetuates its taint through generation after generation. Among its earlier symptomatic developments are Eczema, Cutaneous Eruptions, Tumors, Boils, Carbuncles, Erysipelas, Purulent Ulcers, Nervous and Physical Collapse, etc. If allowed to continue, Rheumatism, Scrofulous Catarrh, Kidney and Liver Diseases, Tubercular Consumption, and various other dangerous or fatal maladies, are produced by it.

Ayer's Sarsaparilla

Is the only powerful and always reliable blood-purifying medicine. It is so effectual an alterative that it eradicates from the system Hereditary Scrofula, and the kindred poisons of contagious diseases and mercury. At the same time it enriches and vitalizes the blood, restoring healthful action to the vital organs and rejuvenating the entire system. This great

Regenerative Medicine

Is composed of the genuine Honduras Sarsaparilla, with Yellow Dock, Stillingia, the Iodides of Potassium and Iron, and other ingredients of great potency, carefully and scientifically compounded. Its formula is generally known to the medical profession, and the best physicians constantly prescribe AYER'S SARSAPARILLA as an Absolute Cure

For all diseases caused by the vitiation of the blood. It is concentrated to the highest practicable degree, far beyond any other preparation for which like effects are claimed, and is therefore the cheapest, as well as the best blood purifying medicine, in the world.

RE-OPENING OF THE ART COMPETITION.

The judges appointed to award the prizes in the Art Competition for the illustration of ALFRED HOBBS'S "Christmas Hour" have reported [see HARPER'S WEEKLY dated September 1] that they "are not justified by the conditions of the competition in awarding any prize whatsoever." Three hundred and thirty-eight drawings entered into the competition, and twenty-three were received after the 1st of August—too late to be considered.

Pursuant to the intention given in their original "offer to young American artists," the MESSRS. HARPER have determined to reopen the competition, enlarging its scope and modifying the limitations as to age, in accordance with suggestions made by the judges.

For the best original illustration appropriate to a Christmas—the drawing to be available for publication in HARPER'S MAGAZINE, to be made especially for this competition, and to be the exclusive work of an American artist not over twenty-one years of age—MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS offer an award of THREE THOUSAND DOLLARS upon the honorable understanding that the successful competitor shall use the same for the prosecution of art study in one or more of the best American schools, including also a sojourn abroad of at least six months for the study of the old masters. The award will be paid in such installments and at such times as shall best suit the requirements of the recipient for the purposes specified.

The drawings must be received by MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS, at Franklin Square, New York, not later than March 1, 1884, addressed "Art Competition Harper's Magazine", and each must be designated by an assumed name or motto, which should also be given, together with the real name, age, and residence of the artist, in a sealed envelope securely attached to the drawing, and not to be opened until the result of the competition shall have been determined. The name of the successful competitor will not be publicly announced until the publication of the drawing.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK, September 6, 1883.

AN IMPORTANT QUESTION.

THE voters in New York are probably not generally aware that they are to vote this year "For the proposition to abolish contract labor in the State prisons" or "Against the proposition to abolish contract labor in the State-prisons." Such a vote, indeed, however it may result, will actually accomplish nothing whatever, but it will indicate a desire either that the present contract system of prison labor shall be renounced or continued. The proposition is not submitted in the interest of prison reform, nor as a well considered measure of public policy. It is merely the result of a Democratic attempt to make a little party capital out of a very grave question. The history of the proposition is short and simple. A year ago the Democratic platform declared that convict—not contract—labor ought not to compete with that of law abiding citizens. Having secured the Legislature, the party did not prevent that competition by a better method, but enacted merely that there should be no competition in hat manufacture, leaving the contract system itself untouched. The unexpired hat contract was transferred to clothes. The hatters were relieved at the cost of the tailors. Finally, to escape the pitiful contrast between their platform declaration and their legislative performance, the Democrats decided to submit to popular vote the proposition to which we have alluded.

The question is submitted in a most unfortunate manner. If the naked proposition of abolition of contract labor should be carried, the result would probably be accepted as a popular verdict against all remunerative convict labor, and as condemning the prisons to become nests of idleness and nurseries of corruption. The prison reformers might support the abolition in order to clear the way for the introduction of a better system of prison industry. But the vote for abolition would not be interpreted as the preference of a better system, but as the condemnation of all prison labor that can be brought into competition with other labor, and any productive industry in prisons must be brought into such competition. Yet there is no doubt that the present contract system should be abolished, not for the reason that it competes with other labor, but because it is destructive of the primary object of the penal system, which is well defined by Mr. BROCKWAY, of the Elmira Reformatory, as the prevention of crime by the reformation of offenders. The labor should be a part of the prison training, not directly for the profit of the State Treasury, but indirectly for that profit by tending to make the prisoners self-supporting and self-respecting citizens. For this reason, while the product of convict labor may be sold, the labor itself should not be farmed out. The present contract system, by the subversion of authority and discipline, and by the demoralization of convicts and officers, is constantly hostile to proper penal treatment. This is the almost unanimous opinion of those who are best informed upon the subject. Obviously the question can not be determined by the balance-sheet of the prisons, unless the object of the prisons be a surplus of actual earnings over actual disbursements. The report for the last year, which is just made public by the Superintendent, shows the surplus of earnings for the year in the three State-prisons to be $8296 08. But at what greater ultimate expense to the State, by baffling the real object of the imprisonment, does not, of course, appear.

A curious light is thrown upon the question by the fact that at this very time, while the 1296 cells at Sing Sing are forced to hold 1470 prisoners, the surplus earnings are about $54,000. At Auburn, the 1200 cells hold but 898 prisoners, and the surplus is $5,400. And at Clinton the 1200 cells hold but 490 prisoners, and the deficiency is about $50,000. While thus there is ample accommodation for all prisoners in the State, nearly two-thirds of the cells at Clinton and one-third of those at Auburn are empty, while the prisoners are "doubled up" at Sing Sing. The reason is that the opportunities for contract labor are so much greater at Sing Sing. The consequence is that the proper penal treatment of the prisoners is sacrificed to money-making by their labor. There is no question that the present contract system should be abolished, but not for the reasons alleged by the Democratic platform, and not in a way to abolish all convict labor. Mr. BROCKWAY thinks that the present opportunity for showing a desire for the abolition of the contract system should not be lost, and his opinion is of very great weight. But if a majority for abolition should be interpreted as a confirmation of the ignorant hostility to all convict labor, it would be a very serious misfortune. On the other hand if a majority against the abolition should be regarded, as it probably would be, as a popular approval of the present system, it would be not less unfortunate. Upon the whole, therefore, a proposition, however excellent in itself, when made for an ill purpose and sure to be perverted to that purpose, should be defeated.

GLEANINGS AFTER THE OHIO ELECTION.

THE Ohio election this year, like that of New York last year, is a striking illustration of the political situation. It was a Republican defeat, but not a Democratic victory. In both States it was an expression of Republican discontent. In Ohio there were evidently two forces that decided the result. One, and the chief force, was temperance; the other was the tariff. Yet, although the Republican party is really friendly to a tariff and to stringent temperance legislation, it was defeated by tariff and temperance votes. The protectionists and the prohibitionists combined against it from the same feeling of dissatisfaction. The protectionists were angry because a Republican Congress reduced the duty on wool; the prohibitionists, because the Republican party preferred high license to prohibition.

The wool grower voted directly or indirectly for the Democratic candidates, although he knew that they did not represent a tariff policy, and the prohibitionist voted against the Republicans, although he knew that his vote would gratify the liquor interest. The reasoning of both was the same. In the one case it was argued that Republican success would condone the reduced tax upon foreign wool, and in the other that it would strengthen license as against prohibition. The Republican party, therefore, in the opinion of these voters, must be taught that if it relaxes protection or evades prohibition it will be defeated. This is, of course, very significant. It is the position which was taken by the Liberty party in New York in 1844 and which defeated HENRY CLAY. That event showed that to an important part of the Whig party the restriction of slavery was a more vital question than any other, and in nine years from that election the Republican party was formed. The result in Ohio shows as plainly that to an important part of the Republican party high protection and prohibition are paramount issues, and that party success is endangered if the extreme position upon both issues is not taken.

We said last week that the result this year in Ohio does not show that the State will not vote for the Republican ticket next year. But the figures now disclose an immense prohibition vote, a vote which, while it shows no tendency toward Democracy, signifies plainly that prohibition is more important than Republicanism to an immense body of citizens. In Iowa this feeling is so strong that the Republican party proclaimed prohibition, and has carried the State by a large majority. In Maine, on the other hand, the prohibitionists have decided to abandon the Republican party as too sluggish upon the question. Thus the temperance issue has suddenly assumed a prominence which has not been anticipated, and may produce equally unanticipated results hereafter. The temperance voters, whether favoring license or prohibition, are generally Republicans. If the prohibitionists refuse to support the Republican candidates next year unless the Republicans declare for national prohibition, they may bring in a Democratic Administration, as the antislavery vote in 1844 defeated the party which, of the two parties, was the more antislavery, and brought in POLK and an extreme proslavery Administration.

THE LATE COLORED CONVENTION.

THE late National Convention of colored citizens at Louisville was a very interesting and pathetic assembly. It naturally made FREDERICK DOUGLASS, the most noted representative of the colored citizens in the country, its President, and his address was a vigorous plea for self reliance and united action. The object of the Convention apparently was to give formal and impressive expression to the feelings and demands of the colored citizens. But it proposed no definite scheme to secure the fulfillment of its wishes, and distinctly disclaimed the desire of class legislation, while it protested strongly against certain laws and customs which it holds to be injurious to the interests of the colored people. The Convention refused to sanction the Republican party or the Administration. Mr. DOUGLASS, who has always been a Republican, and, as has been sometimes thought, too blind a Republican partisan, exhorted the delegates to follow no party blindly, and "to compel the world to receive us as equals."

The New York Globe, which is the chief paper of the colored citizens, heartily commends the speech of Mr. DOUGLASS, and the address and acts of the Convention, but agrees that it is not yet ready to advise the formation of a colored party. It asserts, however, that so far as colored men are concerned, the law countenances violence by not protecting them against it at the polls, and it advises its friends to defend their rights when assailed by force, and, presumably, to defend them by force. That is, it would have the colored voters in the Southern States refuse to be cheated or to be driven from the polls, and to fight if necessary to secure their right of voting. It thinks that the Democratic party still follows toward the colored race the course "inaugurated years ago by that archbishop Chief Justice TANEY." It holds that the Republican party also is unfriendly, and that since 1876 the colored people have made no advancement in the party except the appointment of Mr. BRUCE as Register of the Treasury. The Globe advises its friends not to throw away votes upon a party which does not appreciate them.

No one will deny that the situation is extremely trying for the colored citizens. The real obstacle in their way is expressed in the word colored. CHARLES LENOX REMOND, a very intelligent and highly educated colored man, said forty years ago that he would willingly be flayed alive if he could emerge from the torture with a white skin. Mr. DOUGLASS exclaimed, with energy, "Down with prejudice!" That, indeed, is the enemy. There is no discrimination in law against colored citizens, but prejudice and the usages that spring from it are not controllable by law. Prejudice may affect the honest enforcement of the law and make it practically a dead letter. There is an unjust criticism current upon the recent demand of colored men for "recognition." They are accused of a willingness to sell their principles for place. But this is not the true explanation of their demand. As their general exclusion is doubtless due to the prejudice against their color, their election and appointment to office would show that the prejudice was declining. There could be no test so conclusive, and this is the meaning of the remark of Mr. DOUGLASS that they will know the prejudice to be disappearing when a colored man is made Vice-President or called into the cabinet. If any other class of citizens in the country lay under the kind of ostracism that rests upon the colored people, they would naturally and justly urge that their demand for equal consideration in appointment to public office was a sign of proper self respect and not of venal desire of place. The fact of the meeting of the Convention, and its dignified and serious protest and appeal, will be of undoubted service to the colored citizens. Those citizens need not regret the fate of the Civil Rights Bill. The wrongs under which they suffer are not to be remedied by law.

THE BUTLER GAME.

THE BUTLER campaign in Massachusetts is presented characteristically by the diffusion of BUTLER'S Tewksbury speech, which the chief Democratic journal in New England describes as "nasty," and by insisting that Republicans killed the State paupers and tanned their skins. This is an illustration of the Butlerism which, to the disgust of many honorable Democrats, now masquerades as Democracy in Massachusetts. This is the kind of argument which Butlerism offers to an intelligent and self respecting people. The management of charitable institutions in Massachusetts is especially careful and humane. But because some medical students have played tricks with the body of a dead pauper the Governor of the Commonwealth actually tries to persuade the country and the world that his native State starves its poor and helpless citizens to death, and makes merchandise of their skins.

At the late meeting of the Charity Conference in Louisville an attempt was made to play BUTLER'S little game of "reform," and to conciliate Southern feeling toward him as a Presidential candidate, by making it appear that his feats as a reformer were such that even his opponents were forced to admit them, and Mr F B SANBORN, long the Secretary of the Board of Charities in Massachusetts, was cited as having called attention to abuses which were neglected until Governor BUTLER took them in hand Mr SANBORN is probably more familiar with the conditions and requirements of the State charitable institutions than any man in the State. He is a thorough non partisan, and supported Mr TILDEN for the Presidency in 1876 But he has been the relentless exposer and critic of BUTLER'S efforts to humbug Massachusetts as a reformer, and to disgrace it by allegations of its corruption and inhumanity

To bring Mr. SANBORN as a witness for BUTLER was, of course, a capital stroke, if it could be accomplished. But fortunately he was present at the Conference, and he is always quite able to speak for himself, and as the last man to be bullied, in the State or out of it, by BUTLER or his satellites. Mr SANBORN stated to the Conference and to the people of Kentucky that in 1876 he did bring charges against the management of Tewksbury Almshouse. They were promptly investigated, and were either proved or admitted, and the evils that he pointed out were long since corrected. But he added, the BUTLER charges are not true, were never proved, and are not believed by any candid person acquainted with the facts. That there should be no misunderstanding, Mr. SANBORN ended a very striking and impressive speech by saying with the deepest consciousness of his responsibility, that "the accusations of Governor BUTLER against the mother that fostered him, the State that has honored him, and the charitable institutions that should have been under his protection, are, for substance of malignant theory and for allegation of malicious fact, infamously false." We suspect that Massachusetts, which is thoroughly aroused and indignant, will say the same thing in November, and show that wanton defamation of his fellow citizens, however smartly put, is not the way to win votes for a demagogue There is no question, also, that many Democrats who are unwilling to see their party merged in Bullerism, and who see that if BUTLER should be successful in a wholly personal campaign he would be a formidable candidate for the Presidential nomination, would not be sorry to see him defeated

MATTHEW ARNOLD

As Lord COLERIDGE goes, Mr. MATTHEW ARNOLD comes. A shrewd and accomplished scholar and a well-to-do English ambassador. "He does not represent the England that I know." This, certainly, could not be said of either the Lord Chief Justice or the man of letters who just now arrives. They are both representatives of that liberal and generous England which intelligent Americans gladly own as the mother country. They both acknowledge that the ocean separates, but does not sever, the English-speaking race, and that the same ancient traditions survive under different conditions, and mould civilization upon both sides of the sea.

Mr ARNOLD will lecture during his visit on this country, and those who have long enjoyed, in reading, his incisive epigrammatism, his wide scholarship, and his crisp, clear, and graceful style, will have a new pleasure in listening to a master of English speech. He holds positive opinions, which he is fully able to maintain and defend, and he has the detective eye which is always welcome to Americans, who carry the same weapon in other hands.

It is no secret that at last the curiosity and interest of intelligent England are fully aroused to see a country the controlling force of whose national life is drawn from the same sources as its own. England in the travelling season swarms with Americans, and the current of English tourism travel begins to set westward. The result will be agreeable and advantageous upon both sides, and we shall presently see distinguished American men in London equaling and continuing Englishmen with the same courtesy and insight with which Lord COLERIDGE spoke in New York.

ANTHONY TROLLOPE

THE Autobiography of Anthony Trollope, which is just issued in the "Franklin Square Library," is sure to be widely read, and it will deepen the public regard for the honesty, honest, industrious, and untiring story-teller who so long held an unchanging popularity, and in whose works as much of the characteristic aspect of English life during the last generation is more faithfully recorded than may where else. The autobiography is as frank and downright as any work that TROLLOPE ever wrote. It is confined strictly to himself and his own labors. There is no attempt whatever to "pose," or to do anything but to confide to the reader the writer's sincere view of his own life, which was that of a professional man of letters and an officer of the postal service.

The poverty and trouble of his early life were followed by the comparative comfort of later years, which was due to his literary industry. He recounts the circumstances under which each novel was written, and his writings in the public service. He states his methods of working, and defends them. He criticises himself, and holds his own opinion of his work against that of the world. He gives a chapter to the subject of novel-writing, another to his chief contemporaries in English fictions, and another to criticism. There is no attempt at effect in the book, but it is a very interesting and intimate glimpse of the life of a man who held that literature was a profession, like the law, or a trade, like that of the baker.

Mr TROLLOPE evidently wrote the work at different times, and occasionally revised it and added a few notes. Some inaccuracies of statement, rambling, dullness, from misinformation, are not surprising Thus, in arguing the international copyright question, he says that he is not aware that he ever received a shilling for American reprinted his works, but that he sold all foreign rights to his publishers, who received many trifling sums from America. Of course, therefore, Mr. TROLLOPE had no direct personal knowledge of the facts. If, however, he received nothing, it was not because nothing was paid Inquiry upon the subject would have apprised him that the amount of such payment was large, and that as much as £750 was paid for a single one of his works, although there could be no other protection than priority of publication. We can not here follow Mr. TROLLOPE into the general question, but we can warmly commend his autobiography as a thoroughly characteristic and entertaining work.

THE CORRESPONDENCE UNIVERSITY.

A NEW and interesting scheme of higher education has been recently organized which is well worthy general attention. For some years there has been a very successful association in Boston for the direction of private reading. Persons in every part of the country who wish to follow at home a general or a special course of reading are advised by letter as to the books to take up and the methods to pursue. It is obvious that this plan is susceptible of wider application, which has been experimentally tested. A college professor has conducted by correspondence the mathematical studies of advanced pupils, and with such satisfactory results that thirty-two professors in various colleges, from Harvard University in the East to the Johns Hopkins University in the South and the University of Wisconsin at the West, have united to form what is called for convenience the Correspondence University for the purpose of instruction by correspondence. The word university applies to the range of studies, which embraces a great number of branches, rather than to the organization, which is not chartered, and which has no authority to confer degrees.

This scheme of education, or university, is designed to supplement that of other institutions of education, and not to rival or oppose them. It is specifically intended to assist the following classes of persons: those who are engaged in professional studies which can be taught by correspondence; graduates of colleges engaged in advanced studies; tutors and younger teachers in schools, academies, and colleges; officers and men in the army and navy; young men and women employed in shops and upon farms who can not leave their daily work to attend school or college; persons who propose to try the civil service examinations; and persons of any age and occupation who wish to pursue any particular study at home.

This is the general plan and purpose of the Correspondence University, which is not a scheme in the air, but which, as we said, has been successfully tried. The details of method have been carefully elaborated. The probable limitations of the enterprise have been deliberately considered, and there is no good reason to suppose that a scheme which has been found so beneficial when applied to reading will not be equally serviceable in several study. Everywhere in the country there are persons, eager for knowledge and with especial opportunities, who would gladly study if the opportunity were offered to them, but who can not go to seek the opportunity. Such persons will find it in the Correspondence University, which will require reviews and examinations also, and will hold pass and honor examinations conducted by some eminent specialist who has taken no part in the instruction. The names of the gentlemen engaged in the enterprise are the guarantee of its competency and good faith, and all inquiries about details will be answered by Professor LUCIEN A. WAIT, Secretary, Cornell University, Ithaca, New York.

PERSONAL

One of the suburbs of this city has been electrified by the following announcement: "A humorous musical entertainment for the benefit of the Presbyterian vocalist will be given at the Lombardi Spaghetti Van Beuren on Friday evening, Jan. 18, 1889, by the Penal colony (consisting of the Pink Isle of Peaktown Scott of Alaska), assisted by the renowned Peake Dutchess who will render on this occasion some choice selections from the well-known and old-fashioned operas of Snore and Awake, etc. They will appear in their traveling costumes, with the usual appendages of handkerchiefs, umbrellas, etc. After the opera the guests will be glad to supply any of the audience with sarsaparilla at fifteen cents per saucer."

Exhibition Tilden's forty thousand dollar dining room, in carved satin wood and blue tiles, is at length entirely completed by the arrival of a massive brass chandelier, designed by Mr CALVERT VAUX in harmony with the general spirit of the decorations. The Governor is expected to entertain his friends in this magnificent banqueting chamber early next winter.

—The vast wealth represented in the exteriors and interiors of some Newport cottages and villas makes a deep impression upon most visitors to that charming watering-place. It is an unusual thing for a Newport cottager to be much better housed than when in his city home His guests feel that he has gone thither to stay, and the yearly intermission length of the season there does not surprise them. Miss CATHERINE WOLFE'S new music villa perhaps leads all the rest, but its sumptuous decorations are yet to receive their finishing touches by the introduction of brass chandeliers and sconces from England

—A theatrical manager of this city, who sometimes controls his friends of the delightful Mrs Malaprop, remarked, the other morning, as leaving a Fall River steamboat after a stormy night, "Thank Heaven, I am on terra firma again!"

—Specimens of a peculiar coral, called "alligator-coral," recently on sale in Broadway, attracted some attention; but a New Jersey lady who bought one of them for a curiosity was surprised, on showing it subsequently to her husband, to have him inform her that it was only a piece of the gum-tree, an arboreal variety which abounds on the Orange Mountains, and the deep red leaves of which in these autumn days are truly gorgeous

—The story of the committee of New York artists who once visited Mr GREELEY to remonstrate with him against the severity of the art criticisms then appearing in the Tribune is well known, but many persons have forgotten that the eminent painters Mr SAMUEL COLMAN and Mr WILLIAM H BEARD constituted that committee, and that Mr GREELEY requested Mr BEARD to send to the Tribune "a spicy answer" to the objectionable articles, assuring him that it would certainly be published if it was "spicy enough"

—"Our Children's Bodies" is a subject of considerable interest to that large class of readers who have been, are, or expect to become parents, and we are not surprised to learn that Mr WILLIAM BLAIKIE'S competent and candid discussion of it in HARPER'S MAGAZINE for November has brought him such numbers of letters of inquiry, but hundreds of invitations to lecture. The authors of these letters and invitations as well as fathers, mothers, teachers, and guardians in general, will not be displeased to learn that the same clever writer and conservative gymnast has written a bright little treatise on our children's bodies, called Sound Bodies for our Girls and Boys, which the Messrs. HARPER have now in press, and which will answer scores of questions that intermittently concern the parental heart.

—From the Ladies Pictorial, of London: "WILLIAM BLACK'S new novel, Judith Shakespeare, her Loves and Adventures will begin in HARPER for February It is to be illustrated by Mr EDWIN A ABBEY, and the scenes are laid in and about Stratford-on-Avon. If it is as good as Yolande, it will do, and how strange it is that the professional critic find so little to admire in that simple and beautiful story" A sweeter woman than Yolande Winterbourne has never been drawn by a novelist, but then she is neither pert, nor hoidenish, nor given to strange ways with men, or perhaps she is a little bore"

—A St Louis journal announces a forth-coming series of portraits of beautiful women, which will begin with the picture of "a celebrated lady of Virginia, now deceased, whose marvellously beautiful face is never to be forgotten by those who had the fortune to see it" We learn that the lady referred to is the late Mrs. OLIVIA J STRAWBERRY, née MAYRE OLIN, who several years ago was one of the belles of Richmond, and whose untimely death caused profound sorrow throughout that city. On each anniversary of that sad event her grave near Richmond is covered with fresh flowers by her unforgetting friends.

—An epitaph on a worthy Bostonian of the last generation relates that "he was a good and honored citizen, who adorned alike all private and public walks" Was he a prominent stake? In a Maryland church-yard stands a monument to a faithful wife and her husband, and under the inscription to the wife one reads:

"Like a bud nipped off the tree,
Death has parted you and me"

—The precise relation of the word "perfect" to the word "chic" has been variously explained. An esteemed correspondent of this journal writes: "'Perfect,' which has a lasting sound, denotes that indefinable attribute of things which is the superlative of 'chic.' For instance, a hack, a coal, an actress, a pair of boots, may be 'chic,' but they have not reached their apotheosis until they are 'perfect.'"

—Said an expert penman to another of the same guild who was examining two pieces of writing: "What has that 'that' that that 'that' that 'that' that you made resembles to do with that 'that'?" The other replied that he desired to answer by counsel.

—Dr THOMAS CLIFFORD ALLBUTT, of the Leeds General Infirmary, holds that as a rule private schools for girls are utter failures, oppressing the animal spirits, going on true educations, and developing neither mind nor body.

—For many years the authorities of the Sudan has been defied by the Arabs of the Syrian and Arabian deserts. This disaffection to the Sublime Porte is the only bond of union between those tribes; and among one of them the ordinary price for the purchase of a wife is whatever shall be captured from the Sultan's next caravan to Mecca

—Dress, says a contemporaneous philosopher, is but the outward and visible sign of character, and when all ladies become wise they will dress according to common-sense; that is, each will adopt the style of costume and the colors best suited to her face, figure and position in life

—Gentlemen who have ruthlessly promised to take a lady friend to Henry Irving's first night are just now anxiously but sternly considering how much the tickets for seats are going to cost them.

—Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, M P., publicly expresses his belief and hope that "there will be developed a spirit among Irishmen, and Englishmen too, of various shades of politics and religious conviction, who will stand up for the great cause of Christianity against atheism."

—An English journal describes the latest attitude of the Irish landlords toward the British government as like the application once received by MACAULAY from a lady who urged that as he had made so much money by abusing better people than himself, he ought to give a portion of it to her.

—A bundle of the ballads of the moment jobserves a recent writer] would be not unattractive to the politician, whom the mere man of letters would find in it almost the latest currents of popular songs that have a sensible effect on the popular judgment and the popular heart. All over Europe a cheap press is killing the occupation of the ballad-monger The people begin to take their news daily, and in prose. There are ballads and ballad-mongers, but the theme is rarely anything better than a bloody murder or a recent scandal, and the verse and diction are even poorer, if possible, than the paper on which the screeds are printed. They who "love a ballad of all things" must go to Roumania, or Bulgaria, or Russia, to find the popular song in its utmost perfection.

—Remarks by a cold-blooded voyager who occupied a state room with somebody else "I don't mind answering that I've not the slightest play for a seasick passenger Why couldn't the fiend have gone overland? And he was one of the most ravenous at dinner and tea time yesterday Had our part-body only been large enough, I should cordially have pushed this malefactor through to make his own terms with the fishes As it was, I could [illegible] as him, 'I hope, sir, you are not going to be sick again here.' 'No,' he replied, with a ghostly smile, and scrambled headlong into his berth."

—The occupants of the Women's Prison in Westminster, London, rise at five minutes after six, put away their bedding, and clean their cells At half past six they begin work, and at a quarter to eight eat breakfast, which consists of bread, gruel cocoa, or porridge, or a combination of two of these articles From 8 45 to 11 o'clock they work again, and at 11 45 file into the chapels for prayers, there being two chapels—the Protestant and the Roman Catholic—the Protestant the larger one, with a prayer conversation table, a good harmonium, and congregational singing It is considered a great punishment to be debarred from these services. At 12 dinner is served, consisting of [illegible] of bread, [illegible] potatoes, beef, or soup. From 1.30 to 4.8 work is resumed, [illegible] last—and hardest—which is the [illegible] from 6.45 to 8, work and [illegible] 8 o'clock the cells are locked for the night. THE GERMANIA MONUMENT.

On the banks of the beautiful Rhine, directly opposite the little village of Rüdesheim, where the "soldier of the Legion" who "lay dying in Algiers" came from, the German people have erected a magnificent monument, one hundred and ten feet high, in commemoration of the establishment of their unity and their Empire. The spot has the singular felicity of overlooking the place where Kaiser William, on his return from the victories of 1870-71, first saluted the famous river in his capacity of Emperor of Germany, and commands, besides, a landscape not only the most picturesque of Northern Europe, but the dearest to the Teuton heart. In all respects, indeed, it becomes the presence of the great memorial, which, in the language of the Emperor himself, has been erected "in memory of the dead, in praise of the living, and for the emulation of coming generations," and which with most imposing ceremonies—the manœuvres of long lines of fighting troops, the salutes of cannon that had made themselves heard on fields of victorious battle, the ringing of bells, the singing of the Prussian national anthem, the playing of military bands, and the delivery of patriotic addresses—was inaugurated on the 28th of September in the presence of the German sovereign, German princes, German warriors, German poets, and a vast concourse of the German people. To add that the immemorable popular fêtes held in the evening were worthy of the occasion is sufficient to describe them.

The monument itself, unveiled by the sculptor Herr Von Schilling, a bride the people sang the "Wacht am Rhein," consists of the imperial bronze figure of Germania, thirty-three feet high, and more than classically beautiful, standing on a pedestal which rests upon an immense quadrangular stone base, which in turn rests upon an extensive substructure. With her left hand Germania grasps her tried sword, and with her right holds aloft her proudly won crown of empire. Her noble and impassioned face, modelled after that of the sculptor's own child, suggests eternal youth; and the gems and eagles embroidered on her robe of state represent the splendor and the glory of her sway. It took three years to cast this majestic figure, and when the task was at length completed, the railway bridges were found to be too small to admit of its passage over them, and the services of a Rhine steamboat were called into requisition. The little finger of Germania's hand needs a man's arm hands to span it; the joint of her head will hold a man, and in the interior of her body twenty persons can execute a waltz.

On one front of the base of the monument is a grand relief of one hundred and thirty-three life-size figures—the Emperor William in the midst of his chief generals, statesmen, and allied rulers; on another front is depicted "The Departure for the War"; on still another, "The Return from the War." Around the foot of the pedestal, and above the inscriptions of the several German monarchies, appears the simple and eloquent inscription: "In memory of the unanimous and victorious rising of the German nation, and the restoration of the German Empire, 1870-1871."

BISHOP KNICKERBACKER'S CONSECRATION.

The consecration of the Rev. David Hutt Knickerbacker, D.D., late by rector of Gethsemane Protestant Episcopal Church, Minneapolis, Minnesota, as Bishop of Indiana, took place on the 14th of October at St. Mark's Church, Philadelphia, the Right Rev. Arthur Cleveland Coxe, D.D., Bishop of Western New York, acting as consecrator. The procession of surpliced choir and robed clergy and bishops approached the chancel ranging the hymn, "O day of rest and gladness"; and after the consecration service had been read by Dr. Coxe, a sermon was preached by Bishop Whipple, of Minnesota, from the text, "And Jesus came and spake unto them, saying, All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and, lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world." The words addressed by the venerable speaker to the new Bishop were impressive in the extreme. "My brother beloved," he said, "my heart is overfull, as I bid you godspeed to-day. For more than a quarter of a century you have been my own son in the Gospel. All these years I have watched you with a father's care. Your whole ministry has been given in the flock of which we were the first and only pastor. Always foremost in missionary labors, I was always glad to minister to the distant, the outcast, the dying. For men here have been permitted to so enter into the heart of the flock committed to their care . . . In the most solemn hour of your life forget these feelings, forget this gathering congregation; thank only of our blessed Lord, and think of yourself as receiving from His pierced hands this apostleship, that in the consecration of your whole self—body, soul, and spirit—by the power of the Holy Ghost which you receive this day in your apostleship, you may so fulfill your office that you may receive from Him the crown of life."

The presiding Bishop and the Bishops present laid their hands upon Dr. Knickerbacker's head, the presiding Bishop saying, "Receive the Holy Ghost for the office and work of a Bishop in the Church of God, committed unto thee by the imposition of our hands," etc., after which a copy of the Bible was given to the new Bishop. The very interesting service closed with the "Te Deum."

GEORGE EXPLAINS HIS MISSION.

I don't think I have ever in here or since been so entirely taken aback. At first, when I had leisure to consider things quietly, I did call to mind one or two of those incidents which might have prepared me for the news if I had not been so certain that George had no romantic side to his character, but for the moment I could only gape in stupid silence.

"Ah!" said George, mournfully, "I was afraid you wouldn't like it."

I didn't like it at all. I was indignant, I was disgusted, and I knew quite well that I had not the smallest right to be either the one or the other. Nevertheless I altogether disguise my feelings. I was conscious that my face was a hard and disagreeable one, and that I said at last, "You have developed this attack rather rapidly, haven't you?"

"Oh dear no," he answered, simply. "I have loved her ever since we were children, but I always kept it to myself, because, even when I was a boy, I could see what a hopeless thing it was. Afterward you grew up and fell in love with her, and then, of course, that was an end of my chance, supposing that I had ever had any. Whether I have any now or not I can't tell, but probably not. What do you think, Charles?" concluded George, looking at me with a timid appeal in his honest brown eyes which should have softened the harsh sentence.

It did not soften mine. "Well, if you ask me," replied I, chattily, "I can't say that I think you have much chance. I am sure it never can have occurred to her to think of you as a lover. It—it really does seem so absurd, you know."

"I suppose it does," observed George, not in the least offended. "Upon the face of it it is ridiculous, and no one often hears of beautiful and clever women who have the most homely kind of husbands. I have sometimes laughed at it a little to that thought myself sometimes. And as to her being taken by surprise, I am not sure that she will be that. Since you went away I have seen a good deal more of her than I used to do, and she has always been extremely kind, and not long ago my mother persuaded her to stay a few days with us at Haldeham, and—and—in point of fact, I think she may have an inkling of the truth. Though, of course, I can't say for certain."

"Oh, really?" said I, swallowing down with great difficulty the bitterness of my dissatisfaction. "I dare say it will be all right, then. Only, if it isn't indiscreet to mention it, what are you going to live upon supposing that she accepts you?"

"Well, really I haven't thought very much about that," George confessed, "it has always seemed such an impossible thing that she should accept me. But if she did"—here he straightened himself up in his chair and a wonderful brightness overspread his face—"if she did, I think I could earn my living as well as an other. Thousands have done it before me, and I don't feel much afraid of failing, somehow. For I have always found," he added, with pathetic humility, "that plodding industry tells in the long run; and though perhaps I am naturally more fitted for rational labor than for head-work, I can generally manage to master a subject by giving more time to it than other men would need to do."

"But isn't it more prudent and—more usual to begin earning one's living before proposing?" I know I ought not to say this, but I couldn't for the life of me help it.

George's patience was proof against any provocation. "No doubt," said he, "and perhaps I won't propose until I can see my way more plainly. But sometimes, you know, one is hurried into speaking a little sooner than one has intended, and to begin with, I wanted to be sure that I was not taking any unfair advantage of your absence. You had never actually told me that you had given up thinking of Miss Donelson, all I had to go upon was what I had seen myself at Naples, and what General Le Marchant said."

"You mean that day out shooting?"

"Yes, and afterward. He told on that Lady Constance was in Francmichbie, and that you were—" Here George broke off, evidently reciting about him for some form of words which should not be offensive—"in constant attendance upon her," was the expression which finally recommended itself to him.

"I do wish," cried I, with an irrepressible outburst of petulance, "that the General would learn how beautiful and becoming a thing it is to mind one's own business! I suppose he has been making an end of loose remarks about me before you all?"

George was obliged to acknowledge that he had.

"Dear, cheerful old creature, how I should like to have him here for five minutes! And what did Maud seem to think of it?"

"I can hardly tell," answered George. "She laughed. As far as I could judge, she took it very much as a matter of course; and naturally I was glad that it troubled her as little."

"Oh, nothing could be more natural; les absens ont toujours tort. You had the best of reasons for wishing her to laugh at me, too."

For the first time George looked decidedly displeased. "You ought not to say that," he returned; "it is unfair and untrue. If I was glad, it was more upon her account than my own. I was going to tell you that I didn't feel by any means convinced that you had so completely changed in such a short time, and that was why I came out here. Even now it is not too late. You have only to promise me that you will give up Lady Constance and return to your old love, and I'll engage not to interfere with you in any way. I don't admit your right to be heard first. All that I should stipulate for would be that if, after a certain time—say a year—you had either not asked or had been refused, I should be allowed to come forward again and take my chance."

There was an unthinking but magnanimity in answered George that I appreciated it, but scolded that, after what I had already told him, he would understand that I had neither the wish nor the power to take advantage of his offer. "Go on and prosper," I said, trying hard to show some magnanimity myself. "I ought to wish you every success; for I should like you to have the best wife in the world, and I should like Maud to have the best husband."

But, in spite of these brave words, I was far from being satisfied. Having been so blind to George's attachment, it was reasonable to conclude that I might have been equally blind as regarded Maud; and, although I had often reasoned myself of late into that she had never really cared for me except as a brother, there was something disagreeably humbling to the thought that she had attached an sort of importance to me were in had that night I thought over all our meetings and conversations. I thought in particular of that afternoon when I had fished her out of the Broad, and of the look which I had surprised—or fancied that I had surprised—in her eyes, and I am afraid I muttered to my pillow some very unwarrantable things about the fickleness of women. I was more than half disposed, in short, to play the dog in the manger's part; and I dare say some large-minded readers may find it within the range of their capacities to sympathize with me.

On the following morning George started for England, notwithstanding the snow, which was still falling. He was anxious to have another day or two in Norfolk before returning to London and work, he said, though not in any great hurry to learn his fate. I, on the other hand, was consumed by a burning curiosity to hear what Maud would say to his proposal, and urged him—with little regard, I am afraid, for his interests—to "get it over and have done with it." But he said No; he thought he would bide his time. "I had in a large stock of patience years ago, when I supposed I should want it for the rest of my life, and now that things have turned out differently, I find that I have still a considerable balance left to draw upon. Besides, as you very truly say, it would be more satisfactory to have an actual income to offer than only the prospect of one."

Then he promised to let me hear from him as soon as he had any good news to tell and so we shook hands, and the train bore him away.

CHAPTER XXI

FRANCMICHBIE IS DESERTED.

I EXPECTED that Lady Constance would catechise me as to what had passed between me and George, and as to the reason of his sudden departure, but she did not do this, nor did she say anything more about going away herself. Lady Constance seldom fulfilled expectation either in word or deed, and this was a constant source of trial to Mr. Sotheran, who hated surprises. Like George, however, he had laid in an ample store of patience, and bore the daily slights and vexations which were inflicted upon him with a stoicism which would have been sublime if it had not been so exasperating.

I, for my part, was more mercifully treated, though I could not flatter myself that my prospects were any better than his—if, indeed, they were as good. I don't know whether I was the only the laughing-stock of Francmichbie at this time; a little of each, perhaps. That three were many [illegible] and old who would gladly have changed places with me I have no doubt, but whether this circumstance prevented them from smiling at the parade which I made of my thralldom I am not equally sure. Miss Pemberton [illegible] me if I was not growing rather tired of pianoforte-playing; but I turned upon him so savagely that he formally withdrew the expression, merely observing that I need not bite his leg off in order to prove that I wasn't a poodle. "I used to fetch and carry for her ladyship myself once," said he, "and I got tired of it, or she got tired of me—I don't remember which. But of course it doesn't follow that the same thing will happen to you. If it is any comfort to you to know that you are having an inning of more than double the usual length, lay that comfort to your soul, and be happy."

Happiness is a term which admits of an absolute definition; therefore I can not say whether I was happy or not in the early part of the year 1859, but I suspect that I was a good deal less miserable than I should have been willing to allow. The daily round of life at Francmichbie provided me, at all events, with what I then considered excitement, and, oddly enough, Lady Constance too appeared to be tolerably satisfied with these, and to have no immediate intention of quitting them. But toward the season of the equinox, when a general stirring is observable both in animate and inanimate nature, she began once more to exhibit unmistakable symptoms of restlessness. First she took it into her head to decline all invitations, refused to see anybody, and absented herself even from the entertainments given at the Legation. Then she as suddenly appeared in the world again, and scandalized King Rudolf, who never talked politics, by telling him of the pressure of a large and distinguished circle that South-on would make an end of all German monarchies before the century was out—a remark, by-the-way, which his Majesty never forgave. Finally, in defiance of Lord Rossan's prohibition, she summoned back the shabby patrons whom she had so mercilessly sent to the right-about some months before, and was forever holding nocturnal conclaves to which they and only they were admitted.

In all these vagaries there was nothing to complain of, as far as I personally was concerned. The chorus of conspirators was often in my way, it is true, but one more or than the cavalry officers and attachés whom it had superseded, and I was thankful for anything that seemed likely to keep Lady Constance at Francmichbie. What I omitted to take into account was that subversive schemes, though they might serve well enough to amuse her for a time, would hardly fail to bring her into collision with her brother's authority before very long.

It was my privilege to be a spectator of the inevitable explosion. I was sitting in Lady Constance's drawing-room, one morning in the early spring, when Lord Rossan walked in, with his hands full of official papers, and a countenance frowning upon his brow. The moment that I saw him I guessed what was the matter, and I shrank in my chair; for I don't mind confessing that I had a wholesome dread of my chief's displeasure. Lady Constance, who feared nothing and nobody, maintained her composure.

"This is an unusual hour," said she. "Sit down and tell us all the news."

Lord Rossan took no notice of this invitation, but advanced to the low arm-chair by which his sister was reclining, and looked down upon her through his eyeglass. "Constance," he said, "what did I tell you when you first came here about the revolutionists whom you chose to preserve?"

"As far as I remember," answered she, "you told me you wouldn't have them in the house."

"In spite of which it appears that you have broken your word, and warmed them into the house."

"I never break my word, as you know," returned Lady Constance, curtly. "In the present instance I did not pledge it."

"I should have thought that you would have been above such quibbles as that. There was a distinct understanding that you should keep out of these silly intrigues as long as you were under my roof, and I remember that you have been guilty of a breach of faith. While you are much too clever to commit irresponsibly you can of course do as you please, and no one will dispute your right to engage in any woodenhead that may be attractive to you; but when you do me the honor to reside with me, you must put a curb upon your impulses. I was under the impression that I had made that clear to you at the outset."

"It is not such tomfoolery as you think," replied Lady Constance, quite good-humoredly. "Who was it that said you are the weather, with harvesters, except all on them? I grant you that [illegible] are to be things quite [illegible] an [illegible] to [illegible] [illegible] than that dreadful [illegible] into the armies of kaiser, and then the great crash will come."

Lord Rossan waved his hand impatiently. "You are begging the question. The history of the world is a history of great crashes, followed by great calms. Your regenerations don't know what they want, and will never get anything except what they deserve. But all that is beside the mark. What interests me is that, in consequence of your freaks, I have just received a smoldering dispatch and a private letter from the Secretary of State, in which I am told to exercise a little more control over my family."

"How annoying!" exclaimed Lady Constance. "Has I see his letter?"

Lord Rossan tossed it into her lap. "It may be very annoying," said he, dryly, "but I am completely fail to see the joke myself that I am determined to have no repetition of it."

Respect for the memory of the then Minister for Foreign Affairs forbids me to record Lady Constance's irreverent comments upon the epistolary style of that eminent statesman. "I wonder who has been telling him tales out of school," she remarked, as she folded up the letter. "Nay or rather! I can easily smooth down his ruffled plumage, and he shall make you an apology for having been so rude."

Then she got up and laid her head upon her brother's shoulder. "Don't be angry," she said, gently. "I acknowledge my sin, and I'll make the only reparation for it in my power by going away as soon as ever I get my things packed up."

Lord Rossan's features relaxed. He has, I believe, really fond of his sister, and I know that it went sorely against the grain with him to turn any one out of his house. "I wish you would try to be a little more like other people, Con!" he sighed. "And I don't mean that you need go away."

"I can't be like other people," she returned, laughing; "and it is certainly high time for me to go. You will be very much relieved when you have seen the last of me, and Elizabeth will jump for joy. Besides, I want to be in London. Can't I do anything for you there? Would you like an embassy, for instance?"

Lord Rossan burst out laughing. "Just listen to this woman, will you?" he exclaimed. "Wouldn't you think she had the whole world at her feet? After getting me the first sharp rebuke that I have had in my whole official career, she coolly proposes to select the favorable moment for pressing my claims upon the Foreign office. The best of it is that she'd do it, too!"

"And successfully," added Lady Constance.

"Oh, I have no doubt you think so. Maxwell, let me recommend this model for your study. Your discrimination will tell you where to imitate it and where to take warning by it, but it will at any rate teach you that both a heavy belief in yourself you may go far. As for me I am not ambitious; all I ask is to be allowed to perform my humble duties in peace and quietness."

Lord Rossan had recovered his good-humour, but I noticed that he did not press Lady Constance to produce her sapient to "smash;" and as soon as he was gone I broke out into lamentations.

"I knew how it would be! I knew I should lose you before very long! Now you will go away, and perhaps, when we meet next, you will have forgotten my name."

Lady Constance paid no attention to me. She had rung the bell, and was issuing hurried, peremptory instructions to Antonio. "I shall leave for London to-morrow morning. See that everything is packed up, pay all bills, and let the people at the railway station know that I shall want a reserved compartment."

"So soon?" I ejaculated, dolefully. "Must you really go so soon?"

Lady Constance seated herself at her writing-table and began rapidly scribbling off notes. It was not until she had finished these and had inclosed them in their envelopes that she marched up to the table into which I had sunk in a state of collapse. After commanding me to a naive me with knitted brows, she exclaimed, abruptly, "Do you know that you present a very pitiable spectacle?"

"I dare say I do," replied I, despairingly; "I don't care. Perhaps you would present a pitiable spectacle if the world suddenly crumbled into ruins around you."

"I abhor exaggeration," she returned, coldly, and walked away to the window.

Perhaps I neglect have been strong into some thing a little more the matchless to the keen ability, but the circumstances been other than they were. As it was, I was too much overwhelmed to realize anything beyond the dreadful fact that Lady Constance was going to abandon me. After a time I pocked myself up and moved toward the door. There was nothing more to be said, and from the impatient movement of her head I judged that she was anxious to get rid of me. But when my fingers were already upon the lock she recalled me.

"Come back," she said, with a little vexed laugh—"come back, and for Heaven's sake don't make such a deplorable exhibition of yourself! I positively thought you were going to cry just now. Do you know why I have liked you better than other people? Why, because I have always given you credit for more than an average share of penal good-sense. If you are going to fall into driveling imbecility now, the sooner we bid one another a final and final farewell the better."

"Scolding me will do me good," said I, with a dull pain at my heart. "Very likely I am incorrigible if I am, it is you who have made me so. I half believe that I am one of my maid. I only live for you: if I am to lose you, I should like to die. I haven't a wish or a thought in the world [illegible] with you, directly or indirectly. I haven't even the power now to hate me—if for being such an idiot."

Lady Constance looked at me curiously. "You are very fortunate," said she, "to be able to feel like that."

"Fortunate?"

"Of course," she returned, impatiently. "Isn't it better than feeling nothing at all? But I have no time to talk transcendentalism now. Let us come down to prosaic matters. I suppose what you would like would be to follow me to London, would it not?"

"It doesn't much matter whether I should like it or not, since it happens to be impossible," replied I, despondently.

"You are much too fond of that word. There can surely be no impossibility about getting a month's leave. But if a month won't satisfy you, why don't you give up Francmichbie and exchange with one of the Foreign-office clerks?"

"Do you think that can be managed?" I asked, eagerly.

"I can't see any reason why it shouldn't be managed. In fact, I dare say I could manage it for you."

"How good you are!" I exclaimed, with enthusiasm. But then I mentally projected myself into the future, and added, more soberly: "After all, though, you are sure not to stay long in London."

She shrugged her shoulders. "I shall be there until the end of the season in all probability. Please don't begin to be exacting as well as foolish. I have pointed out to you an easy way of getting what you want for the present: is that be enough. When you are tired of London, you have only to exchange back into the diplomatic service again. Mind, I don't say a moment of vise your taking this step, or any opinion a that you would act his more wisely by remaining where you are and courting oblivion. But I take it for granted that in your present state of mind you wouldn't listen to advice; so it would be a mere waste of time to offer it to me."

"I wonder," said I, meditatively, "whether your heart is on hand so your words."

She replied that it was to be supposed so to excuse she certainly meant what she said. I must keep you any longer now," she added presently. "I have a busy day before me [illegible] hope to have said good-by to everybody and to have cast off all fetters before night-fall."

This hope was not realized. Neither that evening nor on the succeeding day was Lady Constance free for one moment from the company of her disconsolate friends. They remained under her till long after midnight, then escorted her in a sorrowful procession to the railway station the next morning, they filled her reserve compartment with bouquets, and the air was inevitable endings. The only one among them who retained totally unmoved was Mr. Sotheran who announced casually that he himself would be starting for London in the course of a few days. As for me, I obtained little more than the others did to soften the pain of parting, not even the promise of a letter, though I begged hard for it.

"I think I told you once before that I never write friendly letters," Lady Constance said. "You know well you know me address as you and I have one, and I will try and find somebody to make the exchange with you that you will be."

Then she turned away to speak to some of the high official personages who had come to visit her a pleasant journey, and I was cleared out into the background.

After Lady Constance went away I had to [illegible] a long interval of suspense, during which I [illegible] nothing of her, and was grievously tormented by doubts as to whether she might not have kept her promise of contriving a transfer of appointment for me. My irritation became so intolerable at last that I wrote to my cousin Ivor, begging him to let me know whether he had seen Lady Constance, and what he thought I had better do under the circumstances. The return post brought me a long and friendly reply, in which I was advised to have patience, and was assured that I had not been forgotten, although the end-for exchange might not be obtained quite so immediately.

"It takes a little time to arrange these things," Ivor wrote; "and the difficulty of finding a man willing to leave London in the middle of the season is one of the worst. However, when there's a will there's a way, and I happen to know that she will be not wanting on Lady Constance part. She has secured a very smart little house in Mayfair, the interior of which she will soon familiar with, I hope, before long, and I need not say that she is, as usual, besieged by callers from morning to night. I know this to be true, because I sometimes have occasion to visit her on business, and because I am often kept waiting in her house or more in the dining-room before she can receive me. At Francmichbie, where [illegible] knew me, I was allowed in our own corporate people, as you may remember, but in London, little more discretion has to be exercised. So that I complain of this, it is not on account of avoid all risk of recognition. Lady Constance is generous enough and independent enough to excuse me at any time and in any company, whatever if she knew my honor I don't think she would alter her behavior because I am not be more common than polite, but that has been my experience. I have met a good many fairly just people in my life, but only two or three would properly be called generous. Lady Constance Wilmer is one of them. I won't offer you my [illegible] the [illegible]."

My speech, which had been greatly shorn of its [illegible], were still further pared down by the [illegible] later, when on envelope, directed in a bold hand writing which I knew, was delivered to me. It contained, it is true, nothing but a visiting-card, bearing an address in Hill street, with the words "At home every Sunday after the [illegible]" written under Lady Constance's name, but it answered clearly to imply an expectation that I should be in London at on distant date, and I was proportionately grateful for it.

Nevertheless, I had still a long time to wait before Lord Rossan went for an [illegible] and surveying me with shrewd eyes that promised some amusement, [illegible] remarked a good deal of amusement, said he [illegible] but [illegible] to understand that I wished to have diplomatic [illegible] for after work at home I intended to [illegible] eight-o'clock lectures, and he then added that he had fully considered the importance [illegible] I was about to do. "Because," said he, "[illegible] and on their Lady Rossans—I see [illegible] ing a great mistake. A member of [illegible] he added, obligingly laying on [illegible] these last [illegible], in that I might distinctly understand what the [illegible] I could only reply that I was sure [illegible] his advice, but that I had [illegible] wishing to be in London at that [illegible]

"Very well," he said [illegible] put yourself [illegible] communicate with [illegible] of the Foreign [illegible] [illegible] wire reasons for wishing [illegible] Then, that, I take it, means that [illegible] outrunning the constable [illegible] [illegible] Retrell, but [illegible] his own [illegible] I hope [illegible] you more dearly [illegible] giving up my present post, not on account of any dissatisfaction with it, but simply in obedience to the reasons which I had alluded to. I did not, however, hint at what these reasons were, partly because I was convinced that they were no secret to him, and partly because I feared that he did not wish me to be more explicit.

Lady Rowan, rather to my surprise, made no attempt to turn me from my purpose. Probably she knew that nothing effectual could be said, and I think, too, that she was a little hurt by my eagerness to leave those who had been so kind to me.

THE NEWBURGH MEDAL.

THE NEWBURGH CENTENNIAL.

THE latest of the long list of Revolutionary centennials, began with that of the battle of Lexington in April, 1875, was that of the final disbandment of the American army at Newburgh, on the Hudson, which was celebrated in that city last Thursday. It now remains for New York city to close the list by celebrating, on the 26th of next month, the British evacuation; and if her citizens exhibit half the enthusiasm that was shown in Newburgh, they will make it the grandest celebration of the series.

Everybody in Newburgh celebrated, and not only everybody in Newburgh, but in the whole middle valley of the Hudson, from Haverstraw to Catskill, and the result was such a pouring of people into the streets of the pretty, old-fashioned city as they have never seen before, and probably never will again. It is estimated that nearly 100,000 strangers joined with the 30,000 resident population in commemorating the event, for the West Shore Railway alone conveyed 30,000 visitors to the city, and its efforts were supplemented by those of several other railroads and a score of steamboats.

The day was bright and clear, but a strong westerly breeze blew the flags straight out, whirled the gay autumn leaves high in air, raised suffocating clouds of dust, and chilled to the bone thousands of spectators who were not as warmly clad as they should have been.

In the early morning a national salute from the heavy guns of the ex men-of-war anchored in Newburgh Bay, abreast of the city, announced sunrise. Answering salutes from the Washington Head-Quarters, Fishkill, Storm King, and West Point awoke the echoes of the cooperstown Highlands, and ushered in the memorable day. Soon afterward strangers began to pour into the city, and swell the crowds who were already on hand, having spent the night there. By eight o'clock the streets were crowded, and still the arriving multitudes choked every avenue of approach. From end to end, as I into its most hidden nooks, the city was draped and smothered with bunting, flags, shields, mottoes, pictures, and Chinese lanterns, and on every street a band played, or a body of uniformed men marched and displayed themselves to the gaze of the admiring crowds. At twelve o'clock, or only one hour after the advertised time, the procession was formed and started on its five-mile march up and down the hilly streets of the city. In it were many of the men, among whom were the Seventh Regiment (700 hundred strong) from New York, and the Twenty-third and Thirteenth Regiments from Brooklyn. Next to the Seventh the troops attracting most attention were the men in Continental uniform, marching as Baron Steuben had taught their ancestors to march, forming the Putnam Pinbarn of Hartford, Connecticut. The participants in the parade who realized most keenly that they were the cynosures of all eyes, and that the fate of the nation rested upon their shoulders, were the members of the nineteen local and visiting fire companies. As these, arrayed in preposterous leathern hats, red flannel shirts, black trousers, spanners, and stern expressions, marched through street after street, towing their little two-wheeled hose-carts and other gaudy paraphernalia behind them, one could not help recalling the set speech with which ex-chief of the New York Volunteer Fire Department invariably began the festivities attending Firemen's Balls, and which was, "Is the ten-sheen ready? We'al, let her go!"

The seventy-five bands of music and drum-and-fife corps, all braying, drumming, and squeaking at once, produced an overwhelming discord that defied analysis, and could not truthfully be described as a "jangle of sweet sounds."

In the intervals of marching, the hero of the Seventh Regiment contributed greatly to the fun of the day by their pranks and infinite jests, while members of the Brooklyn regiments sang choruses and glees as well as to receive the enthusiastic applause of all who were within hearing.

By two o'clock the parade was over, and its component parts were scattered to the four winds of heaven, or rather to the four points of the compass, to eat, drink, and be merry. Many people went to the cemetery to lay flowers on the graves of the soldiers who died in the service of their country, but the great majority made for the nearest eating-house, or, if they were provident, for the nearest grocery, and bought food to take to the nearest park or vacant lot, where they could eat it in the open air. Every park and lot was soon occupied, and the sidewalks were lined with people sitting on the curbstones and munching sandwiches, pies, and cakes, while the gutters were filled with empty bottles and broken glass.

The scene in the park was especially animated. Here, in addition to the crowds who had come to picnic, were the hundreds who had come to see the fireworks, and the thousands who had come to see the balloon ascension. Every available spot was occupied, and the multitude of spectators resolved itself into a gigantic picnic party, and taking possession of every available grass plot, opened and emptied its lunch baskets.

At three o'clock the ten acre enclosure in which stands the old Head-Quarters house was densely packed with a struggling mass of sweating, shivering humanity, who vainly imagined that they were going to hear something of the music and speech-making from the platform, which, with seating accommodation for two or three hundred people, was by courtesy termed the "grand stand." A few persons in its immediate vicinity heard the exquisite music of the overture to William Tell as rendered by the Seventh Regiment Band, or Gilmore's "Te Deum," sung by a chorus of 500 voices, Senator Ramsey's timely remarks, the melodious rhythm of William Ross's poem, and the eloquent oration of Mr. Evarts, but the brisk breezes took immediate possession of all these sounds, and bore them standing within a hundred feet of their source could catch them had borne them far away.

The firing of salutes from the ships was far more satisfactory, for not only could the sound be distinctly heard, but the flash could be noted, and the smoke or it gracefully floated away could be hailed with exclamations of pleasure.

The crowd beyond reach of the music and eloquent remarks also found much innocent amusement in corralling wandering barrymen, Arabs, gate, and fireworks, who with their attendant staffs struggled bravely to gain the sanctuary of the "grand stand." The gorgeous apparel worn by these gentlemen made them conspicuous objects for the fun, ridicule, and good-humored chaff of the crowd, which in this respect was as merciless as another personage who is said to "love a showing mark."

In the pyrotechnic display, which formed a pleasing part of the day's celebration, the society of fire-works to daylight was successfully introduced. The effects were produced by bombs thrown high in air, which upon explosion projected graceful patterns in parti-colored sounds, and quaint figures of birds, beasts, or fish cut from the brightest theme, which floated slowly earthward. This display was made from boats anchored in the river, and was supplementary to that afforded by the men-of-war, yachts, and merchantmen other craft with which the bay was filled, and from every available point, of which flags of the gayest possible combinations of color fluttered in the October breeze.

At night the gay flags were replaced by coarse lights of green, red, yellow, and white, and the smoke and those pyrotechnics of the day were succeeded by a grand display of genuine fire-works, to witness which was well worth the many discomforts endured by the spectators.

After all was over, when of the last rocket nothing remained but a broken stick, when the bands had exhausted themselves with their final efforts in the way of patriotic and theatre-overture tunes, the trials and tribulations of the multitude began in earnest. Hungry, thirsty, dusty, tired, cold, and impatient to get to their homes, many miles away, they thronged to the railroad platforms and wharves only to find the accommodations for their conveyance from the city totally inadequate to their demands. The small hours of the following morning found them much still waiting about the stations, without protection against the bitter chill of the night winds that swept mercilessly up the river, and daylight found many of the sufferers who had been unable to get seats or to procure lodgings wandering disconsolately through the city streets.

The Newburgh Celebration was upon the whole a very glorious and successful affair, but, as one of its results, the number of persons who may today suffering from boilerplate, sore throat, or rheumatism is probably much greater than the entire number of Revolutionary soldiers who were mustered out of service at the same place one hundred years ago.

THE ADVENT OF MR. ARNOLD.

MR. MATTHEW ARNOLD is the most distinguished man of letters who has visited this country for years, and there is naturally a great deal of curiosity [illegible] The time has gone by when the appearance of a British critic was hailed upon [illegible] for while we may [illegible] Mr. TAINE, Captain MARRYAT, DICKENS and others depicted us, we [illegible] We can only [illegible] as we were. We can only [illegible] the benefit of [illegible] and having [illegible] somewhat fairly, are prepared to be measured by others equally. What Mr. ARNOLD may think of us, therefore, or what he may say of us, does not concern us as it might have done forty years ago. What does concern us somewhat, however, is what we may think and say of Mr. ARNOLD, for that depends upon himself, and not upon us. He comes with a reputation that is superior to any preliminary he may have acquired, and he will be judged by that reputation. To the great body of the American people he is merely a name; to the thoughtful members of that body he is a thinker whom they respect, whether they agree with him or not, and a writer whom they admire under all circumstances. Literature has not been to him, as to many of the guild in England, a trade whereby they can gather a great heap of guineas, or a vocation whereby they can attain the notoriety they mistake for fame. It has been from the beginning a serious and laborious pursuit, undertaken from a sense of personal duty or well or a desire for personal distinction, and it has rewarded him and his countrymen—rewarded him in the satisfaction which must have grown out of the writing of his brilliant books, and them in the dissemination with which they secured these books, which forced them to think, whether they would or not, [illegible] which entitle Mr. ARNOLD to the gratitude of his countrymen, and letting out their diseased humors. Mr. ARNOLD's English readers have been bettered by his books, which have lengthened their mental vision until it now reaches beyond their own tight little, tight little island.

But whatever may have been his services on a social outlook, or an apostle of sweetness and light in things pertaining to dogma, his services to pure letters have been greater, and it is by these that he will be longest remembered. Thirty-five years have passed since the publication of The Strayed Reveller, and Other Poems, in which the advent of a new poet was as unmistakable as eighteen years before in TENNYSON's Poems, Chiefly Lyrical. Five years later came "Empedocles on Etna," and in the following year (1854) the first volume of verse to which he attached his name. If there had been any doubt as to whether "A." the author of "The Strayed Reveller," was a poet of great promise, that doubt was triumphantly decided by the great performance in "Sohrab and Rustum," that noble and pathetic episode in which the voice of Ferdousi speaks to us through the trumpet of Homer, in "Tristram and Iseult," which signaled the return of the medieval element to English poetry, and in "The Scholar Gipsy," which KEATS might have written in his graver moods. These poems were not the lucky accidents which sometimes come from young poets who build incorrectly better than they know; they were carefully planned and deliberately executed works, the act of one to whom poetry was a profound art, the purpose of which, and the subjects with which it should chiefly occupy itself, were duly set forth by him in a preface which recalled the famous preface of WORDSWORTH, and declared the critic as surely as the verse declared the poet. Mr. ARNOLD has a wider range of critical sympathy than any living English writer—sympathy which is rather French than English—and whether he is discussing HOMER or HOYE, MACIAVELLI or MARIUS AURELIUS, he is equally suggestive and equally delightful. He has attained style to his prose. It is the catholic critic and this thoughtful poet that we hope to find in Mr. ARNOLD, and if we find either, he has found friends, who, knowing him in spirit, are glad to see him in the flesh, and to hear whatever he may have to say. If we have a word of advice to offer him, it is that he should avoid that pest of modern society, the interviewer. "The rest is silence."

E. H. STODDARD.

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

THE present is the "game season" in many of the regions of summer resort, notably the Adirondacks, the mountains of Pennsylvania, and along the south shore of Long Island. On the shores of the Great South Bay the sunrise invariably gets up at an hour which most city people would consider abnormal, contrast with a good deal of coal thereabouts, and fatigue from which the majority of summer visitors would shrink. Yet the devotees of the sport are never without enthusiasm.

While waiting for a train, a Missouri sheriff, with a prisoner whom he had brought from Nebraska to be tried on a charge of horse-stealing, made many visits to an adjacent bar-room. The result was that while the sheriff's regard for the law was for the time being almost obliterated, that of the prisoner was greatly magnified. A policeman took charge of the sheriff, and the prisoner thereupon went to the depot master, and said, "Then ye arrested my sheriff, and I want to turn myself over to you." When the train came along, the inebriated sheriff was placed under the care of the partly inebriated prisoner, and the journey was continued.

The discovery is said to have been made that extensive smuggling of diamonds from Canada has been carried on by the employment of our race-pigeons. The story has it that a young farmer living near Ogdensburg shot a pigeon which had a tarlatan quill full of diamonds tied to its left leg. Detectives watched the trains going from this side of the river to Canada, and soon found a basket of homing pigeons addressed to a small Canadian station. They were on the look-out for the person to whom the birds were addressed, but he did not come. By accident, however, a lodger was found in a swamp which had evidently been one end of the aerial transportation line for precious stones. The smugglers had taken warning and fled. It is said that evidence has been discovered leading to the belief that diamonds worth between seven hundred thousand and eight hundred thousand dollars have been sent from Canada by this method. The rush of loss was very slight, or the birds fly at a great altitude, and are in little danger of being shot.

Nearly all of the weather sharps agree that the coming winter is to be mild. The veteran and observant hunters who have been examining woodchuck holes, and noting the doings of furthered creatures, agree with them.

"I heard at least one thing in the course of your sermon to-day that I never heard in a sermon before," said a Rhode Island man to a preacher who had detained his congregation till their patience was nearly exhausted.

"And what was that?" asked the minister, greatly pleased.

"I heard the clock strike twice," was the reply.

It is conjectured that the "bad lands" of Dakota once owe their condition to a process which may now be seen going on in the region between Bismarck and the Little Missouri River. Over a tract some two hundred feet square the ore quivers with the heat, sulphurous vapors make a crystalline deposit on the edges of crevices in the earth, and a reddish glow is given out. This results from the combustion of coal beneath the surface and it was going on when the region was first visited by white men.

In Brighton, near Boston, a building to be used as a home for horseless animals that would otherwise be homeless is in process of erection. Money for the purpose was given by a lady to the Massachusetts Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. Vagrant dogs and cats will be received and kept for a certain period, at the expiration of which, if they remain unclaimed, they will be gently removed from life through the agency of chloroform.

An item of society intelligence from Kansas says that elopements are becoming things of the past in that State. "It is becoming the rage now," says the writer, "for neighbors to take the bride's father into the next room and sit on him, so that he can't interrupt the wedding ceremony, and to get the mother upstairs discussing new styles of bonnets."

It is said to be fashionable this fall for American heiresses to wed young Irishmen of quality. German barons, it is learned from the same source, were in vogue last fall, and English noblemen two years ago.

Bat-land romances are becoming quite common. The latest that has found its way into print has a Connecticut girl for its heroine and a New Orleans man for its hero. The Southerner found a name written under the inner band of his hat, and found on address on the manufacturer's trade-mark. The hat was a year old when he made the discovery, and there was no telling how many other hats the name had been written in, or the consequences thereof. But he wrote to the possessor of the name, and the result was an engagement. The hero is wealthy, the wedding tour is to be extended, and hardly a hat goes out of a Connecticut factory now, it is asserted, without at least one feminine name concealed somewhere on the inside.

No. 7.—Old Perkyen having read about the Laplanders, and the use they [illegible] of dogs in locomotion, strikes on the above idea. He buys from a broken-down [illegible] of fox-hounds, has them trained so as to be led by the whip alone, and starts [illegible] on the road.

"Ah, Pa," says he, "the dog is a noble animal."

THE FIRST NATIONAL HORSE SHOW.

THE Madison Square Garden is in part a stable, in part a steeple-chase course, and in part a race-track. Horses are weighing, pawing, running, jumping, or tearing around the track and a fire-engine. Shetland ponies are drawing their hitchy coaxes, the Arab looks haughtily down upon the mule, and the Syrian ass stubbornly refuses to move out of his stall. People who were last at the Garden during the dog show or circus will hardly recognize it. The track is still there, but the centre is covered with loam and sand. This is for the hunters. Here Postguard, who shares with Dauntless and Jim McGowan the honor of being one of the greatest steeple-chasers in the country, and the hunters may be seen taking their daily constitutional over the water jump and hurdles. All the available space besides the rows of seats is taken up with stalls. In them you may find some of the magnificent animals you see daily on the streets, drawing immense loads; horses accustomed to move only to the best society, and seen only on Fifth Avenue, the Jerome Park award, or at Newport in front of the mansions of Mrs. Belmont, Mrs. Travis, and Mrs. Sanford, of the Misses Hargous, Miss Cutting, or Miss Constable; Bob and Bet, Dandy and Donald, lineal to all who have singled out Mr W. P. Douglass's coach in the coaching parade, any number of the Normans, Percherons, and saddle-horses which but a few days ago were posing or cantering up and down East Twenty-fourth Street in front of Mr Dahlman's stables, or favorites of the pupils at the up-town riding schools. In one stall you will see two powerful animals near a brightly burnished fire engine. They have tits in their mouths, turn only occasionally toward their cribs for hay, and then turn quickly again in the direction of the engine shaft, as though on the alert for a signal. Another part of the building will be found stuffed full with bales of hay and bags of corn. All that is wanting is a miniature pasture for playful horses to roll on. When you are through with the row of the stalls, and come in sight of the track again, you may see a mounted policeman in brand-new uniform, with glistening buttons, the metal harness trappings brightened up to the last degree of polish, making the dust fly, or another walking leisurely to and fro, his horse following him as he walks and turns. Perhaps the certain ass has graciously consented to leave his stall, so that the judges may compare him with the French donkey.

While in the stalls you may have seen some of the most famous horses in the country, you may see among the crowd some of the most famous sporting men. There are the Lorillard brothers, Mr Pierre Lorillard's son Griswold (who is to inherit his stables, and perhaps those of his uncle Mr G. L. Lorillard), Mr Winthrop, Mr James R Keene, General Grant, Mr William H Vanderbilt, and among the well-known writers on the horse the veteran Elliot and "Kirk."

The occasion of all this life is the first exhibition of the National Horse Show Association of America.

In order to insure as large a display as possible, the Association has been very liberal in regard to charges for entry and accommodations. It was decided to levy a fine of ten dollars in case a horse entered for the show should not be exhibited, unless there was a valid excuse, such as the physician's certificate with which the public has already become so familiar in the case of prize drama and sermon. The Association has also been very liberal in its offers of prizes, which amount to over eleven thousand dollars. The highest prize by the Association is two hundred and fifty dollars for the best and best trained five-engine horses, the prize to be in books or plate. For the best thoroughbred stallion, four years and over, it offers two hundred dollars, and the same for the best roadster stallion, and for the best coaching stallion, four years and over, one hundred and fifty dollars. Among prizes for draught-horses, one hundred dollars each are offered for the best Percheron and Clydesdale stallion, and the best heavy draught stallion not pure Percheron or Clydesdale four years old or over. Of exhibitors of hunters the Association requires a certificate from some master of a pack of hounds that the horse has been regularly hunted. To this class belong the ladies' hunters, "qualified" and "green," which are ridden by ladies. Prizes of one hundred dollars each are also offered for Arabs, roadsters, horses of all work, and saddle-horses, while a prize of seventy dollars is offered for ponies, of fifty dollars for the best horse and cowpé, and of forty dollars for the best pack, pound, or tank: and by Mr J. G. Heckscher, to the best and best trained police officer's horse, and best appointed and uniformed officer, one hundred dollars in money or plate. These and other prizes cover almost every familiar phase of horses excepting licensed cricketers' horses. The Association, it seems to me, made a serious omission in not offering a prize for the "shunister and bolter" licensed vendor's horse, or one for the licensed vendor's horse "which can best be strikered as a hat-and-cloak rack," or one for the "unfitted licensed vender's horse." These would have given a few humorous touches to our first national exhibition which our horse show has ever boasted. I doubt if any event would attract a greater crowd than a race between the horse of the man who sells oranges at thirteen for a quarter and the horse of the man who sells bananas at eight for a quarter.

Probably few of the visitors to the horse show bother their heads about the question whether or not the allusion in the sixth chapter of Genesis is to a horse or a mule, being in the former case the earliest written reference to the horse extant, or whether we must conclude from Jacob's remark concerning the horse and his rider that in his day already the horse was domesticated. Nor is it probable that the crowds who gather around the huge fire-engine horses, the Percherons, and Clydesdales, with their massive limbs and powerful muscles, realize that during a remote epoch the horse was as not as big as a fox, and instead five toes to each foot instead of a hoof, that in the next epoch he was as big as a sheep, and had only four toes, and that he went on from age to age increasing in size, while the number of his toes diminished, until he attained his present size, and the one on each foot were all consolidated into a hoof strong enough to sustain his weight. And I wonder if anybody standing amid that vast array of horses, and calling to mind the millions bred and now being bred in this country, can comprehend that there were no horses in the United States before 1537, when Cabeza de Vaca landed a few in Florida?

The popularity of the show with horse-owners and the public is due to the fact that both benefit by it. Annual horse shows will certainly stimulate breeders all over the country, and also raise the grade of horses, because the public, becoming acquainted through these shows with the points of a horse, will purchase with more and more discrimination. If the soldiers at this show will follow the judges in decisions, they will come out much wiser than they entered. They can learn in a very short time that a horse with a full forehead is apt to be intelligent; such large arteries, good minded, a rich, clear eye, gentle and even-tempered, that a horse "short above and long below," and with oblique shoulder-blades, can be relied on for speed; that a horse with an upright shoulder-blade is bad for the saddle, because there is no elasticity in his step, but good for one's harness and draught. If a young fellow who looks like a greenhorn comes to a horse-dealer next week to purchase a horse, and insists that the length from the shoulder point to the back of the quarters shall be greater than the height at the withers, the dealer may know that the young fellow has been to the horse show.

The most novel feature to nearly all the visitors to the show is the exhibition of fire-engine horses. Being fire-developed, intelligent, heavy draught-horses, they are beautiful to look at. Then the results of their training are interesting to watch. A loss of a second causing sometimes a loss of thousands of dollars, each captain whose engine is late at the fire has to give the cause of the delay in his report to the Fire Department. For this reason the companies have practiced hitching up until they can be effected in an extraordinarily short time. Exhibitions of hitching up are given three times a day at the show, viz., 11 A.M., 4 P.M., and 9 P.M. The stalls for the engine and horses are arranged like the ground floor of the engine-houses. The harness is suspended on either side of the shaft on pulleys. The reins are clasped to a bit in the horse's mouth, the same current of electricity which sounds the gong sublimates the boilers, the horses walk to the shaft, and the harness is dropped on to them—which is fastened, and away they gallop. Engine Company No. 24 has so far the best record, having hitched in a little over a second after the alarm began to sound, but it may be surpassed by some engine company of the show.

The most aristocratic horse in the show is undoubtedly Lindentree, the beautiful Arabed U. S. Grant, Jun. This magnificent stallion was presented to General Grant by the Sultan. He stands fifteen hands, is eight years old, and has a pedigree of several centuries. Cleanup of both noble sire and dam, he belongs to the highest breed, which the Arabs call El-Hor. The story runs that once Mohammed, to try the mettle of his mares, had them locked up two days without water. When nearly mad with thirst they were let loose and were rushing to the river, he ordered a charge sounded. Five mares cleared the trumpet call, forgetting their thirst. The greatest Arabian breeders are said to be descended from these mares. Like all true Arabs, Lindentree has a remarkable width across the forehead, a thick cut muzzle, a sparkling eye, and a beautifully arched neck. It is asserted that the English and American thorough-breds owe their present success to Arabian blood, the best stock being descended from the famous Darley Arabian. It will be noticed that the thorough-bred of the show have a decidedly Arabian cast of feature, a finely set on neck, and angular quarters. Compare them with Lindentree, and the resemblance is revealed in certain points, though the English and American thorough-bred has been greatly changed from the parent stock by a finer and breeding, still retaining the Arab's staying powers, but surpassing him in speed. But if surpassed in speed, the Arab remains the gentleman among horses by reason of his grace, beauty, and gentleness, and his promptness to resent any affront. Lindentree is extremely gentle. He has a number of colts also promising to turn out fine trotters. Mr Grant keeps him at the Morrisania Farm, near North Salem. General Beale's handsome Arab is also in the show.

I pass directly from Lindentree to the Percherons (see illustration), exhibited by Dahlman, because, curiously enough, the Percheron is said to come of Arab stock. But there is certainly no trace of the swift Arab in the strong, muscular, stalwart, heavy draught horses among the Percherons at the show. If Arabian at all, the most be Arabian peasants. Yet the claim that they were descended from Arabs captured by Charles Martel when he defeated the Saracens is permanently made. Their color—gray—is urged in support of this theory. But Arabs may be black and chestnut as well as gray. The Percherons, usually from fifteen to sixteen hands high, form a magnificent picture of power in repose as in sounds in his stall. His ancestors gained those splendid muscles and open nostrils carrying heavily armored knights. He is now very mild and laborious. The Percheron, though a distinct breed coming from the old division of Perche, in the northwest of France, is often confounded with the Norman. But there is a difference. The Norman makes a capital farm-horse. The Percheron is his superior in speed, looks, brains, and endurance.

The Clydesdales, another order of heavy draught-horses, attract attention by their magnificent appearance. To some their legs may appear rather short, but they are deceptive, owing to the length of the horse, which usually takes long strides. It is said that Clydesdales can draw heavier loads in single-harness carts than any Cleveland, as matter what is said of the Clydesdales. Clevelands have been known to draw seven hundred pounds sixty miles in twenty-four hours, and nine hundred and two pounds a distance of three miles. The Shetland pony, which is the smallest variety of the British horse, is as strong in proportion as the heaviest dray horse.

Trotting being essentially an American sport, a word should be said about the trotters. Those at the show, like the vast number of Americans trotters, can be traced back to two horses—imported Messenger and Justin Morgan. Humble, Conn, the founder of the famous breed of that name, is a son of Messenger, and Messenger arrived here in 1788. This horse's value to the country can not be estimated by hundreds of millions of dollars. Justin Morgan's sire was ridden by General Isaacey during the Revolution. It is noteworthy that none of the trotters bred from wild horses have come up to the descendants of Messenger and Morgan.

Showing all these classes and others of interest, giving the public a chance to see those horses which boast of speed in full caution on the track or over the course, stimulating breeders and educating the public, the horse show must be put down a great success—so great that it may be looked forward to as an annual event. Its promoters are to be heartily congratulated.

GORDON KING.

TOM KILROY.

ROMANCE is generally thought to dwell in exceptions and extremes, but everyday life has its full share of heroes, of tragic or of chivalrous stuff. Tom Kilroy's youth knew no exceptional circumstances. His father was a master mason, steady and industrious; his mother loved him with that sober, wise affection which keeps strict guard over lessons and clothes; he was, in short, one of those numberless sons of respectable mechanics who keep the public schools busy in their youth, and are kept busy by the world all their life afterward.

Tom had been destined almost from his cradle to learn his father's trade. His elder brothers were carpenters and builders. Mason work would descend naturally in with wood work and the brothers would then be enabled to throw many a profitable job into each other's hands. There was no disposition in Tom to quarrel with this device, the limit of his ambition was to be a good tradesman, and marry the girl of his choice. He had not even settled on the girl yet and the pleasing latitude and uncertainty he allowed himself in this matter was the one bit of romance that leavened Tom's life at nineteen.

Evidently there was a very common lad in very common elevens-and-sevens, and yet there was often in his possession a single ply strange which might discourage the steadiest and most conventional of plans. Tom was exceedingly handsome—that is, he was going to be. Just at that age he was freckled and immature, managed his great frame awkwardly, and was shy in consequence.

But, after all, it was Tom's inches and his bright, handsome face, crowned with short brown curly hair, that prevented him taking permanently to bricks and mortar. Old Kilroy had a job of work to do for the great importing firm of Scott & Donaldson, and one day while Tom was having lunch and whistling with a great deal of spirit "The track of the foxd," Alexander Scott took a liking to him.

Men do take these impulsive likings just as readily as women do, and for the most part they commender themselves at liberty to indulge them. At any rate, Mr Scott did. He had a talk with young Tom, and liked him better still, and then a had a talk with Tom's father, which resulted in Tom's throwing down the trowel, and taking a desk in the outer counting-room of the great firm.

The Kilroys were absolutely proud of the change. The elder boys going off to work with their tools and the younger ones with their books were still very fine fellows in the mother's eyes; but Tom in a stylish business suit, with kid gloves on his hands, and a cigar in his mouth, did them a lofty kind of credit. All of them felt this, and the carpenter remarked one morning, as they watched him down the avenue a block: "All right, mother. It is a poor family that can't have one gentleman—isn't it?"

No one doubted that it was "all right" Tom gradually became the oracle of his father's house. Why not? He spent his days among grave, wealthy men, among great interests and great trusts, and unconsciously he got the air and assumed the tone of the wealthy classes. In the course of two years he was conspicuously promoted, but he was treated even beyond his position. Mr Scott's liking, though progressing at a cordial rate, still kept steadily increasing. He had said often during those two years that "Tom Kilroy was a little uncommon," and Alexander Scott was always ready to maintain what he had once said.

In the method incidental to a New York business life time passes rapidly. Tom's life went on as the clock does for the next four years, but in them Time gave everything and took nothing from him. His splendid physical beauty had matured, and his business aptitudes had been thoroughly developed. Even John Donaldson, who had always smiled at his partner's fancy for the "young mason," at length admitted that "Kilroy was a fine fellow, and would do the firm credit."

It was just after this admission from Mr Donaldson, and a hot, glowing day in early July, Tom, busy among sundry bales and boxes heard Mr Scott call him. When he answered the summons, he found the senior partner in a very anxious and perplexed mood.

"Mr. Kilroy," he said, hesitatingly, "I am to go home, as I intended, to-night, and a matter happen that I shall have to go to Liverpool by the next steamer. What I want now is that you should take my usual train, and carry Mr Stone this letter."

"Very well, sir; how soon shall I serve?"

"You have fifteen minutes to catch it."

So in fifteen minutes Tom was at the Erie depot. He observed the order as he would any other order from Mr. Scott, but it did not much please him. He had half an engagement with a very pretty girl for Thomas's garden that night, and he liked stem berries and roses with ice accompaniments better than in their native simplicity.

He was in a severely gentlemanly temper when he stood on the platform of the late dinner depot. There was the usual gathering of loungers and light wagons, and he looked round for Mr Scott's which that gentleman had described to him as "a nice little turn-out with a pony team of grays."

The only vehicle answering to this description was driven by a lady—a very lovely lady indeed, who peered among the crowd with a wistful, anxious face. Tom took heart of grace, and with his very best bow and smile, made some inquiry or remark, the only intelligible words of which were, "Mr. Scott."

"Yes, sir," said the lady, blushing, and handling the reins rather unnecessarily, "I came to meet papa, and you see he is not coming. And you have a letter? Will you allow me to drive you to the house?"

Tom was obliged to allow himself to be driven. He knew nothing about horses, and he was exceedingly mortified at his ignorance. But even ignorance has compensations. His perfect illness gave him leisure to watch his driver's power of motion, to note all the changes of her face, and all the coaxing intonations with which she flattered and encouraged the "pretty team of grays." He had literally fallen in love without being at all aware of the plunge he had taken for the sensation was so charming it was hardly likely he would pause to analyze the feeling.

Mrs Scott was quite aware of Mr Kilroy's antecedents and position, but women never were very handsome men in the same exact balance as they do ugly ones. There was a very charming tea, during which Tom got so far in Mrs Scott's favor as he had got with Mr Scott in four years. So far, indeed, that when she retired in the library to manage her husband's letter she left Mr Kilroy to be entertained by her daughter Alice.

Did you remember what a dangerous entertainment wandering through the second story in the twilight garden was? When Alice lingered behind Tom's among the elsewhere vans, did she call plain the words? Or had she as fear of the bewitching summer moon that sat there two sitting in sweetest silence beneath the drooping branches on the piazza?

Perhaps her letter had given her other material for anxiety. She did not seem to think of Tom and Alice, and Tom was glad of it. He wished this night could last forever. He went back to town in a kind of intoxication. After gave him a genuine spray at parting and the coming Season of the counting house was just as foolish about a flower as one lover, either before or since the flood, has ever been.

He had an plan about Alice, but its were planned for him. Mr Scott went to Liverpool by the next steamer, and for six weeks, on every Saturday afternoon, Mr Kilroy went out to Mrs Scott's with a certain sum of money from the firm, and often certain commissions to books and fine goods with which the firm had no particular concern. In these six weeks love grew, both on Tom's and Alice's part, to perfect stature.

But this delicious dream of youth had how a rapid awakening. In six weeks Mr Scott returned, and then the pleasant interests for Tom's weekly visits ceased. Mr Scott never alluded to them, and it rather mettled the handsome lover that his prospective mother-in-law seemed tolerate completely forgotten them.

There was, however, some consolation in Alice's letters, and in her assurances of unalterable affection, and for a short time these satisfied him.

But at length, after a somewhat injured reflection on the matter, he resolved to speak to Mr Scott. Youth, in its strength and power and boundless hope, is so apt to remember all things as it own that more excuse must be made for the slight tone of self-assertion to which Tom rehearsed one evening on his confession.

Mr Scott heard it with perfect gravity and politeness. "You have, of course, done us much better the greatest honor any man is capable of, Mr Kilroy," he said, coolly, as he turned the paper cutter over and over on his desk. "May I ask if you still reside with your parents?"

"Yes, sir, I do," answered Tom, feeling a momentary flush of shame as he thought of the plain little two-story brick house in a down-town street.

"And where or how do you propose to live when you are married?"

Tom frankly confessed that he had not thought of that subject, but he evidently had the usual faith in love and cottages.

Mr. Scott rose with the air of a man finishing a discussion. "Mr Kilroy, I am obliged to you for your honesty. I will be equally plain with you. Business affairs have not gone well and me lately. I have been thinking all day of retrenchment, you and Frank Mayhew will either have to leave your desks or retain them at very much reduced salaries. I am sure you love Alice too well to subject her to poverty. It is true, I have always intended to give her a fortune, but then no man of honor would ask her hand, under such circumstances, unless he was able to count at least dollar for dollar with her. Your business talents are exceptionally good: I expect on ere you words a million, but when you are worth fifty thousand of it I will cheerfully consider your proposal."

He said a polite "Good-night" to he left the office, a courtesy which Tom found himself quite unable to return. If the man had been angry and uttered all kinds of hard words, Tom could have borne it better. He had a salary of one hundred dollars a month: if he was to wait for Alice until he was worth fifty thousand, the probabilities were hardly worth counting. Besides, there was that coveted threat of dismissal. That would never do: he must resign his desk voluntarily. He saw very well that Mr Scott would never like him again, and Tom's open, candid nature instinctively dreaded a dislike which would well itself under polite forms and "disagreeable necessities."

He was so excited that he could not endure the tedium of the street cars; he got out of them, and walked rapidly up Broadway until he struck Eighth Street. He generally crossed to the east side of the city by this route and he took it naturally, but at the Cooper Institute reading-room he paused a moment. He had not yet thought of what he should say to his father and brothers. He went upstairs and drew a paper toward him; he had an idea of reading, but he wished to think without attracting observation.

Vacantly at first his eyes wandered over it, but at length he began to read with a curious avidity. He followed a certain column to its close, read it again and again, and then looked at the heading of the paper. It was the Rocky Mountain News. In those few minutes Tom had been inoculated with the gold fever, and he was sure that he now saw a clear and sure road to Alice. True, it might be a rough one, but all the same he was quite determined to take it. He was only impatient now of delay, and he entered the little homely sitting-room as elated and positive as if the Rocky Mountains were somewhere on the line of street cars, and his purse as perfectly heaitsed as the United States Mint.

"I am going to the Rocky Mountains, father," he said, with that impetuosity which often characterizes enterprises about whose wisdom we are doubtful.

"You have been in some very queer place already to-night, Tom, to make you talk in such a dull-like manner."

His brothers looked curiously into Tom's face, while the women folks present paused in the midst of their chatter and work for the same purpose. The men evidently thought Tom had been drinking, the women divined at once his absolute sincerity. The pause was followed by a long and eager discussion, in which there was no lack of hard words, but the end had been determined in Tom's mind before it began, and in a week's time he found himself crossing the dreary plains which guard the approaches to the treasure-houses of the mountains.

But alas! Tom soon found that the keys to these treasure-houses were cunningly hidden from him. His behavior and tactless tact were of no avail here. Labor led to nothing, and simple luck seemed to laugh science and probabilities to scorn. Yet though he had no luck it was curious to see how the mine-madness ruled him. He knew men who had searched for ten and even twenty years, and then found in a moment mill-lions of treasure. He knew a man who had wandered over Nevada, and sifted the Black Hills for nothing, and then just stumbled over a Rocky Mountain silver mine that had made him a modern Crœsus. Such tales were in every camp, and in hunger, cold, and wretchedness of every kind they kept Tom's courage high.

Yes, though he was locked up in those dreary fastnesses, and heard only at long intervals of the world outside them. In fact, the only news after the first two years had little or not for him. He had not written home at first, partly because "his hand was unfit water," and partly because it was really a difficult matter to post a letter, and still more difficult to get the reply; and then gradually his whole being became absorbed in one idea. The mountains held him in their spell, and he knew that nothing but the discovery of some rich lode would break it.

One night, after long years of this strange life, he met a little party in the Platte Cañon who had lost their way, and were in the greatest extremities. Tom guided them back to safety, and made a warm friend of their leader—so warm that the man offered him a share in a large smelting and assaying work which he was going to establish near the Silverton Mines. Tom hopped to be unusually hard up, with a long winter before him, and he accepted the offer. Of course he told himself that just as soon as the money matter he should begin his "prospecting" again; but he never did.

In the stir, bustle, and method incident to the conduct of a great work, his old passions lost their re-asserted their power. He found himself making money as rapidly that he resolved to go on making and saving until he could buy a mine, for to be the possessor of a veritable gold as silver mine still charmed and ruled his imagination.

Then the years went by. Few people would have recognized in the stalwart, ironand, bearded man, clothed in leather and flannel, the once stylishly dressed and scrupulously shaved and gloved member of the great firm of Scott & Dunbridge, Water Street, New York. For full ten years had passed away, and though Tom was only thirty three, he looked and felt a great deal older.

Sometimes now, alas, when he counted up his balance in Golden City Bank, he began to think of his old life, and to have sudden yearnings which made him turn his face lovingly eastward. But the gyves of great trusts were upon his hands, and the spell of money-making on his heart, he stirred, indeed, occasionally under the nightmare, but his memories were not powerful enough to thoroughly arouse him.

It happened that in his trade manner his partner went East to bring home a daughter whom he had left there at school, and his return was quite an event to Tom. The man had walked Broadway within a week, and had brought back with him the fa-ion and the very language of the place. Tom had not guessed how dear his native city was to him until one familiar name after another awaked all the wards of memory, and a passionate longing for the old scenes and haunts, the old faces and friendships, seized him.

"John Ambrey," he said, "I must take a run East for a few weeks. There is very little quartz on the hill, and the banks are up to date. I've got the home fever, John, bad. I think I'll start to-morrow."

So in a few days Tom Kilroe stood at the foot of Chambers Street, wondering if he should go home without warning; wondering, indeed, whether he had any home. Yes, there it stood, just as he had left it, the little red brick house with its bright green blinds outside. But inside there had been changes. His father was dead, his eldest brothers married, and the little sister he had left in short dresses just going to be. But love is always the same, and these simple souls made a great festival over their returned wanderer, without once asking whether he had saved a respectable sum, or some house with empty pockets.

Sitting alone with his mother that night, he at length ventured on an inquiry very near his heart.

"Where is Alice Scott now, mother?"

"I don't know, Tom. Things have changed for her."

"She is married, then?"

"That is past one telling. I have heard nothing at all about her for eight years—never since her father failed. They went somewhere up the river to live. I saw her mother's death in the papers some after."

It was a great tragedy in a few words—failure, poverty, death, and isolation. Tom's reveries were not devoid of remorse that night, but the next day he started out early to do what his heart told him ought to have been done years ago.

It was not hard to find Mr Scott's retreat, and he came upon it just at noon. Mr Scott was leaning over the little wooden gate, looking listlessly down the long dusty lane, and he recalls entered into conversation. Tom was smitten with pity at the change to his old patron. He had sunk in very small interests, and talked now of his little patch of corn, his couple of cows, and his eggs and chickens as he had once talked of richly laden barks, and bills of lading, and checks, and balances. Then Tom led him on to speak of his old business, and he was glad to see that the merchant-mantle assorted himself. "He must be taken out of this," thought Tom, and he asked himself to dinner.

He entered the house with a beating heart. Would Alice be there? Would she know him? Mr Scott had not enquired who he was, but Alice ought to have keener eyes. She was laying a very humble table for one as they entered, and after a glance and a movement of courtesy she went calmly on with her household duties.

Tom had a good deal to do to eat a few hot potatoes, and drink a cup of tea, but it was a tragic feat nonetheless. Her figure, its movements, her every gesture thrilled him to the heart. Everything occupied him, and she was taller than ever than she had been even in that animated hour when she had first driven him from the lot at the Jersey depot.

Then sat opposite to each other at table and when he answered her first enquiry, she looked eagerly at him, but Tom suddenly lowered his eyes. In a moment, however, the truth flashed across his heart, and in a quick articulate voice she cried out, "Oh, Tom! oh, my dear Tom!"

Then Tom was to her side, kissing her cheeks and lips and hands and whispering, unheard what between his kisses. Mr Scott had risen at once and was supporting himself on the back of his chair, hardly able to understand the good fortune that had come to him, until Tom said

"You promised me Alice, sir, when I had made fifty thousand dollars. I am worth nearly nine hundred thousand to-day: will that do?"

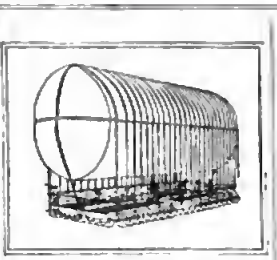
"Good gracious, Mr Kilroe!" and the old man sank into his chair, and covered his eyes with his trembling hands.

There was only a beefsteak and some potatoes and a cup of coffee at that betrothal feast, but it was a wonderful one, and after it there was a business talk in the garden, which made a new man of Mr Scott. For Tom was bent on refounding the old firm under the name of "Scott & Kilroy," and though there was necessarily some delay, a million of money can work miracles, and before many months were over the senior partner of the new firm was marvelling again all his old authority and business acumen.

For Tom remembers his father-in-law's claims, and has forgotten no word of that kindness which altered his whole destiny when a mason lad, and which for many years encouraged and rewarded his youthful efforts.

Tom's youngest brother occupies Tom's old position in the house now; but it is not likely that he will follow Tom's footsteps westward; for whenever Tom hears him talking of his big brother's "good luck" in the raines, he always says:

"Easy—easy, Harry; Good luck needs good looking after; and gold is easier made than found."



RITCHEL'S AIR SHIP.

A NEW AEROSTAT.

In one Scalliger, to the best of our recollection, who thanked God that He had put it into the hearts of some men to make dictionaries. The practical utility of people who believe that they have solved the problem of aerial navigation is not as yet quite so clear as that of lexicographers, although when we go to Chicago by balloon, or, more properly, when we are able to get away from Chicago by balloon, we shall no doubt be breaking the blessing of Scaliger upon the series of experimenters who bear made that result possible.

The cause of aeronautics has not advanced in proportion to the time expended on it. The other day it was called as a surprising feat that an aeronaut had crossed the French Channel in a balloon, whereas that same feat was performed almost a century ago, in January, 1785, namely, by Blanchard and Jeffries, less than two years after the first ascension in a balloon had been made (October, 1783), by a person who was afterward killed in an attempt to cross the Channel, and not much more after the Montgolfiers had discovered that a light long with the open end down would rise if a fire were built under it. The first crossing was in "the infancy of aeronautics," and we are in the infancy of aeronautics still. Although the intervening century has been the most fruitful in mechanical successes of any the world has seen, on real progress has been made. The vision in which the laureate remains hitherto all in the laureate's eye. Nevertheless the problem has been so successfully solved by birds, with a vehicle capacity of beam pany unintelligent compared with that of man, that it is no wonder it should continue to provoke the ingenuity of inventive and enfeathered bipeds.

Saw "the nations' airy navies grappling in the central blue,
Saw the hansom-balloon with commerce, argosies of magic sails,
Pilots of the purple twilight, dropping down with costly bales,"

Mr C F Ritchel, of Bridgeport, Connecticut, in the latest of the insurgent aims whose hearts it has been put on solving the problem, although his efforts appear to be rather toward aerostatics than toward aeronautics—to enable a man to hover rather than to fly. However, the successful solution of the problem of aerostation would take us a long way toward flight. The great need of the aeronaut has been a tissue light and not transpirable, which will retain his gas in an efficacious state without destroying the buoyancy of the balloon in a few hours by leakage. Mr Ritchel uses for his balloon, which is a cylindrical reservoir of gas, Scott's gingham rendered with rubber and sulphur. By this composition he claims the advantage that it will not rot the balloon as the ordinary coating of linseed-oil does by generating an acid that eats the vegetable fibres. The composition in their case is pressed into the fibre with heated rollers, and then vulcanized.

The balloon—that is to say, the cylinder—is 85 feet long by 35 in diameter, and has then a capacity of 85,000 feet of gas. Pure hydrogen gas having a lifting capacity of seventy pounds to the thousand feet, this cylinder is expected to carry a load of 5670 pounds. The weight of the cylinder itself is 1200 pounds, of the frame and machinery 1000, of the ballast (water) 600, and fifteen men, crew and passengers, are estimated for at the low average of 120 pounds each, making the total weight 3400 pounds. The fans, four in number, are three feet in diameter, with three blades set at an angle of thirty degrees from a horizontal plane.

There are no valves in the cylinder. Reliance is placed for lowering the balloon upon the fans, which are to be worked by two men at each wheel, and, for raising it, upon a series of shutters under the car, worked by a lever within the car, so as to open out like a parachute, as rather like a brake, so as to slacken motion in either direction by increasing the area of resistance. The inventor believes that the material employed in the balloon will enable him to retain his supply of gas much longer than has hitherto been possible. The ballast is meant only to compensate for the loss of gas by decomposition or leakage, the latter being reduced to a minimum.

It must be owned that this looks a good deal like an undertaking that a man shall not merely lift himself, but soar, by tugging at his waistband, but Mr Ritchel avers that by applying the principle used in the construction of his air ship a man weighing ninety-six pounds raised fourteen pounds of shot to the ceiling of a room every half-hour, working a fan of fourteen inches diameter, making 3000 revolutions a minute. But the fan is intended to be used to [illegible] the machine only, the lifting power of the gas being virtually a constant quantity. This is a step beyond Archimedes, who required a place to stand on a condition precedent to moving the world.

FLY-CASTERS' TOURNAMENT.

At the Harlem Mere, that bit of water at the upper extremity of Central Park, the fisherman's contest of the Rod and Reel Association was held on the 16th and 17th of this month. There can be no prettier locality than this smooth sheet of water. The difficulties of entangling lines from branches of trees or the want of standing ground for casting may not exist on the Harlem Mere, to the same degree as under natural circumstances, but for all practical purposes the place chosen is an excellent one. With few exceptions, all the most celebrated of American anglers were present, and amongst-men the Mr Reuben Wood, the gentleman chosen by the United States Fish Commission to represent American skill with the rod and line at the present International Fishery Exhibition in London. The following were the contests, for which handsome prizes were awarded, the previous in certain cases limiting the weight of rods and their lengths, with no permission of entry to those who fished for a living, who were guides, or engaged in the manufacture or sale of fishing implements. Class A was for amateurs, without limitation as to weight of rods, and was handsomely won by Mr H C Tompkins, with an eight-and-a-half-ounce rod, who made a cast of 80 feet, with a high average of points for delicacy and accuracy.

In the amateur class B, with rods not to weigh more than nine ounces, Mr W F Hassam was first, with a cast of 78 feet. In the C class of amateurs, which allowed all lengths of rods, no different as to weight, Thomas Pattinson won, with a cast of 80 feet and over. Class D was one which excited most attention on the first day, as it was to be contested for by known experts, rods not to exceed eleven feet nor to weigh more than five ounces. The women was Mr H. W Hawes, who made a famous throw last year, but also beat his record this season by three feet, the total measurement of his skill in throwing the delicate line being 85 feet. This day, the 16th, was exclusively devoted to such graceful Fly-casting as is appropriate to trout fishing. On the 17th, which was a very serious day, expectations were at their highest pitch, as all the circumstances were best adapted to such line-throwing as is employed for salmon and bass fishing. The first contest was for amateurs who had fished for salmon, subject to the rules governing the amateur entries, rods not to exceed eighteen feet in length, both hands to be used if desired, with only one fly. The same points, twenty five each, as on the light fly-casting, being allowed as a maximum for delicacy and accuracy.

The contest between Ira Wood and E. Kessler was a fine one, and was won by Wood, he just measuring 144 feet, delicacy being 20, and accuracy 16. For the class II, under the same rules as the first, distance only being counted, there were eight entries. The winner Mr Hobart L. Parkhurst, his cast being 124 feet, and Mr H W Mann's three being 115 feet. Last year Mr Hawes was with 116 feet. As this gentleman was ill, this may account for a less cast this season. For the bass casting there was a very numerous attendance. The difficulty in this match is to throw the line out straight, on a lake of water the width of which is marked by buoy lines. Each contestant was allowed five casts, only those within the lane to be counted. There were three entries in this match—Messrs. J. A. Roosevelt, E. Van Horn, and William M'Leay. It was easily won by Mr. Roosevelt, whose striker flew out with his best cast a distance of 165 feet, all his throws being more than 135 feet. For light bass casting, the rods being the same, but the sinkers to weigh one and a half ounces, there were five entries, Mr H W. Hawes coming first, with a total of 301 points, winning, however, only by two points, Mr W M'Cleay scoring 302. Mr Hawes's average was the best, though his adversary made one cast of 115 feet, the differences between the two in the total casts being, for Mr Hawes 1064, and for Mr M'Cleay 1062.5. For the final contest, single-handed Fly-casting, rods not to exceed eleven feet six inches, distances only to count, Mr H C Leonard was first, with a throw of 97 feet, two feet more than the next best, Mr H W Hawes. The [illegible] rods in fly-casting is not only on instance, but accuracy, and in this not alone is increased skill, but to the excellence of American rods and reels.

THE METROPOLITAN OPERA-HOUSE.

The largest auditorium in the world is that which was occupied by the paving public for the first time on Monday night. The fact of its enormous size, with the usual lines of a theatre which are graceful if they most their practical purposes, would alone make the interior of the Opera-house impressive. But the one house would be impressive, even if it were not much smaller again, by the decorative treatment of the interior. The five tiers—three of boxes [illegible] of galleries—" swing [illegible] in graceful curve, and the light [illegible] bright tion of the fronts—all in ivory [illegible] and gold and the gold-tinted upholstery of the boxes give the place a very festal aspect, even without the presence of the resplendent evening toilets, which is the picture of which the interior architecture is but the setting.

The stage-picture is to most habitual opera-goers rather a subordinate matter. The habitual opera-goer goes not to [illegible] the opera, but [illegible] habitual [illegible] unobstructed [illegible] who [illegible] by [illegible] on in the [illegible] hour interval from the first [illegible] ceptions, at $20,000 ach, were obtained with o trouble to build the ew Opera-house, that pera has a strong hold pon the affections of illionaires. But that a most rash conclu- ion. The millionaire oes not, in most cases, ant opera, he wants n opera box. The per- nity proprietary boxes o the new Opera-house are as many large pa- per copies of an edition strictly limited to ov- enty. They are tokens not merely of revenge pon, but of triumph over, the of fete stockholders at the Four- enth Street house, which is now doomed, as the stockholders of the new house firmly believe, to hold much the same relation to the new that the humble Stadt Theatre in the Bowery used to hold to the Academy. The performance at the humbler place might be as good as at the more fashionable. But it was not The Opera. There are those, however, who retain their faith in the old house. Others there are who, being at once flush of money and pru dent of disposition, have hedged by securing boxes in both houses, and with tranquillity await the event of operatic war.

The Muse, however, need not sing of the in advance. Unless all social signs fail, she will have enough retro spective work to do before the winter is over, and had better confine herself to the facts of the new theatre. The frame of the stage picture is a pair of pilasters running through to the top gallery, and sustaining an entablature. The spaces above the pilasters are occupied by Mr. Maynard's graceful figures of "The Ballet" and "The Chorus," one on each side, painted in high key of color, and harmonizing very prettily with the bright and light decoration, for which the coloring of Mr. Lavastre's central allegory of "Apollo and the Muses" seems rather too stark and sombre. The pilasters themselves are of a bright yellow, with profuse ornamentation of gold, and this is simply a more intense tint of the prevailing color of the interior.

The stage itself, though not, like the auditorium, the largest in the world, is much the largest in New York, and perhaps the highest anywhere, having 150 feet of available space between the cellar floor and the roof, and all of this available space the supports of the stage are all movable, and a trap can be made anywhere on short notice. Nothing like the facilities of this stage for scenic pageants has ever before been supplied to this country to an opera house.

The most impressive work of the architect is perhaps that of the rear wall, on Seventh Avenue—the building has a street-reach of its four sides. This is a vast blank gabled wall [illegible] or more in breadth, by 120 [illegible] above its height, pierced by only one very tall door for scenery, broken only by two massive buttresses five feet deep, and relieved by a light mock arcade below the gable. The sides necessarily consist chiefly of blank wall, with its monotony relieved by a simple treatment of large relieving arches concentric with the arches of the openings. The light buff brick which is used throughout, in combination with terra cotta slightly darker in tint, needs a more vigorous relief than has here been given to it to produce the impression of mass and weight which in the rear wall is secured by the heavy buttresses, and the architecture generally invites the criticism that it looks emphasis, although the detail is of satisfying delicacy. The centre of the Broadway front, which contains the principal entrances, is an elaborate and elegant composition in Italian Renaissance, with some very pretty reliefs of terra-cotta in panels, which unfortunately can not be appreciated from the sidewalk opposite by reason of the minuteness of their detail. The strictly architectural detail is also too delicate to be effective in a general view of the front.

The Metropolitan Opera-house owns nothing in its architecture to any recent European example, and its delicacy is in as striking contrast to the loud self assertion of such a building as the New Opera in Paris as is the pastoral simplicity of the sculpture here to the riotous group of M. Carpeaux in the front of the latter building. Whatever else we may think about the Paris Opera house, we must admit it to be the most Parisian thing in modern Paris, the most characteristic monument of the Third Empire. If we were to adopt Guerin's nomenclature of fanciful comparisons we might call that building and architect structure to from Mey- erbeer, while the sweetly and modestly and more tenuous reeds of the older Italian composers, and give it an architectural analogy to the music of BELLINI.

THE PASTORAL OF THE ROMAN CATHOLIC BISHOPS.

BY THE REV. GEORGE B. CHEEVER.

There are passages in the pastoral letter of the Catholic bishops of the province of New York which will commend themselves to every unprejudiced mind. Since the last assembling of the Provincial Council, twenty-two years ago, many changes have been wrought in American habits and thought. The growth of skepticism, the looseness of opinion with regard to the obligations of marriage, are evils which have undoubtedly increased, and are set forth in the pastoral letter with force and skill. The arrangement of our public school system, however, though naturally to be expected, will not be favorably received by non-Catholic citizens. The Catholic bishops reject the well-worn phrase, "godless schools," and warn the members of their flocks against the contaminating influence of public school education. They still assert the injustice of taxing Catholics for the support of schools which they can not conscientiously use. On these two points most Americans will join issue with the authors of the pastoral.

What, then, is the fruit of the American public school? How does it compare in its result with the Roman Catholic parish school? Is not the practical result of New England largely the product of New England's public school system? On the other hand, are not the majority of the adults in our great cities arrests of persons nominally Catholic, who have presumably passed through the Catholic parish schools? Is not a great part of the [illegible] population and crime thrown upon our cities a burden thrown upon them by the membership of the Roman Catholic Church? We are to judge of systems of education by their fruits. If so, let the fruits of the Catholic parish school system be shown, and their superiority to the fruits of the American public-school system demonstrated. The Catholic [illegible] must prove as a matter of fact that their system is producing better moral and other women than are to be found elsewhere on the land, or they [illegible] to make out their case.

But what do these prelates mean by a "godless school"? We should infer from their language that they class every school as "godless" which is not under Roman Catholic direction. But such a classification would exclude from the category of Christian schools many which are under the [illegible] of Protestant churches. And if the public schools have in fact ceased to be "godless," that result is due to the attacks upon them of Catholics themselves. The common schools began their career with the Bible as the chief text-book in morals and in religion. In point of fact the Catholics have done their utmost to drive the Bible out of our schools, and them have turned upon us and reproached us for maintaining a godless system of education. To the best of their ability they have tried to expel the very evil upon which their animadvert. In the petition of the Catholics of New York to the Aldermen of the city in September, 1840, the petitioners denounce the reading of the Scriptures in the public schools as sectarian. The war which Bishop Hughes waged with the Public School Society of New York was waged with the object of overthrowing [illegible] society, and obtaining the support of Catholic parochial schools from the public funds. The Public School Society had permitted schools for the Catholics which were certainly not "godless," and it ill becomes the Catholic to hound our public schools with such a name, when they have using their best endeavors to put religious [illegible] tion out of them. Nor is the claim that Catholics are taxed to support schools which they can not conscientiously use of any validity. The non-Catholic citizens of New York are taxed largely for the support of public institutions, many [illegible] tained [illegible] the use for which there would be but moderate use were it not for the influx of Roman Catholic immigrants. But the principle that we are not to be taxed for what we can not use is an assumed one in law. Citizens who will never be sent to prison pay taxes to support prisons; citizens who will never ask alms pay taxes for the maintenance of homes for the poor. And as the state has the right to require that every boy and girl shall be educated, so it has the right to lay taxes for paying the cost of public education. Its right to educate is unquestionable, and its right to tax is equally unquestionable. If Roman Catholics desire a denominational system of education, they can follow the example of Presbyterians, Methodists, Baptists, Congregationalists, and other Protestants, who maintain their own denominational schools, while they cheerfully pay the taxes levied for the public schools. A Roman Catholic American owes something to the state, and if the state is not willing that all education shall be Catholic, he should bear his part in the support of the system which the state thinks best for the general welfare. If Roman Catholics obey the pastoral of the bishops, they will be put in the position, as regards schools, of caring wholly for themselves, and not at all for the state's welfare.

The public-school controversy, for the present, is at rest. The Catholic Church gained from it only the arousing of a determination in the American mind to protect the public-school system by constitutional amendments. No one desires to see the controversy re-opened, but if it should be, the public schools will issue from it more thoroughly protected than ever before.

AMERICAN ART INDUSTRY IN EUROPE.

(From N. Y. Tribune of Oct 6.)

One of the most gratifying signs of European appreciation of American products of Art Industry is the steady and constantly increasing export of first-class American Pianofortes and Reed Organs, which are, on account of their superiority and lasting qualities, preferred to home-made instruments by musical Europeans.

The Hamburg Steamer Bohemia, on Sept. 15, took out a Steinway & Sons' Concert Grand Piano, bearing the number 50,000, purchased by Baron Nathaniel de Rothschild of Vienna, who, having in May, 1882, purchased a Steinway Parlor Grand, now acquires the fifty thousandth Piano manufactured by Messrs. Steinway & Sons (and said to be their grandest production in the shape of a Grand Piano ever achieved by them) for his Music Salon.

Until the year 1862, little was known in Europe of American Pianos, but quite a sensation was created in musical circles when, at the World's Fair at London in that year, the Pianos of Messrs. Steinway & Sons, New York, were exhibited and awarded a first prize medal. (The Grand Piano bearing the No. 4607.)

The crowning triumph, however, Messrs. Steinway & Sons achieved at the Universal Exposition of Paris, in 1867, when the first of the Grand Gold Medals for American Pianos was awarded to them, and their new System of construction unanimously endorsed by the Jury on Musical Instruments in their official report.

The Grand Piano exhibited, No. 13,227, was purchased by the Baroness de Rothschild of Paris, for her Chateau Ferrières, Messrs. Lionel and James de Rothschild of London, afterwards also acquiring Steinway Pianos.

Of the reigning families of Europe who purchased Steinway Pianos for their own use, may be mentioned the Queen of Spain, in 1868, the Empress of Russia, in 1871, the Sultan of Turkey, in 1875, the Queen of England, for her Castle in Balmoral, in 1879. Grand Piano No. 25,901 (the advent of which was celebrated by Steinway & Sons and their 1000 Employees, May 4th, 1872) was purchased for the Czarowitz (now Emperor) of Russia; together with two more Steinway Grands for members of the Imperial Court through the Russian Embassy at Washington.

Among the many most prominent names in the World of Art, owning and using Steinway Pianos, such names as Franz Liszt, Richard Wagner, Professor Helmholtz, Adelina Patti, Etelka Gerster, [illegible] From the London (1862) and Paris (1867) World's [illegible] [illegible] the export of American Pianos to Europe [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] that no [illegible] than 70 per cent the [illegible] of the manufacture of Steinway & Sons, New York.

To those who delight in figures, it [illegible] interest to know that Messrs. THE COUNTY DEMOCRATIC BARGAIN.

The bargain of the County Democracy of New York with Tammany Hall … has more … significance. The fact that … the County Democracy … a particular candidate … in three local tickets does not … These … nor the County Democracy of the … leaders showed their entire … abandon their principles, and they … acceptance of the obnoxious can… bargain was morally consummated, and … the quarrel about the terms, which … point. The County Democracy is the … organization of Democrats expressly de… protest against the corrupt politics of … which were asserted to be a disgrace to … Democratic name, and constantly to challenge public distrust and condemnation of the Democratic party. The more intelligent and honest members of the party enrolled themselves in the County Democracy, and the organization was cited as conclusive evidence of the power of the party to reform itself. It was declared by the State Committee and by the State Convention to be the "regular" Democratic organization, and the utmost effort was made to produce the impression that the Democratic party of New York was bent upon reform, and repudiated Tammany Hall. Tammany Hall, however, laughed and said that it controlled party success absolutely, and that the party should succeed only upon the terms that Tammany Hall chose to prescribe. This, of course, would make the political morals and methods of Tammany those of the Democratic party, and to support the Democratic party would be to support Tammany Hall.

Yet, after all the fine protest of the County Democracy, it ended by making a bargain with Tammany to secure the spoils of patronage in the city. Its purpose was betrayed and abandoned, and morally it has ceased to exist. But while it forswears all its principles and purposes, and practically confesses that the Democratic party is merely a vast conspiracy for political plunder, as CHARLES FRANCIS ADAMS said that a generation ago it was a conspiracy against human rights, it turns upon the Republican party with a cry of rascal, and exhorts the country to reform by bringing the Democratic party into power. Now the Republican party may be responsible for many offenses during its long term of power, but if it is to be superseded by another party, sensible voters will inquire whether anything will be gained by the change. Change is often desirable if it does not produce a very much worse result. But voluntary change is folly, or even criminal, when it is tolerably sure to produce that result. There are Republicans in New York who have been justly angry with Republican offenses, and who are still inclined to be indifferent to the result this year at the polls. A good rebuke in the form of defeat will be serviceable, they think, for there are many things yet to be corrected. But they can not deny that a good rebuke was administered to the Republican party last year, and that, in response to it, much has been corrected, and that a disposition has been developed which will continue and is continuing the good work.

They will also admit that the bargain between Tammany and the County Democracy, consummated since the Ohio election, strips from the Democratic party all pretense of a … Tammany Hall in N… achusetts now … ing to obtain … The Democratic … whatever upon … ple. Its sole … reform element, if it … County Democracy … has totally … can vote directly … success in New York … lican defeat would … It would undoubtedly … year much more difficult … probable. THE INEVITABLE …

The meeting of Congress will … the Democratic party. It must … the Republican party must … Democratic party should con… credentials and its capacity … for instance, with the necessity … financial legislation. The … cy, consequent upon the … banks, is already great, and … Democratic Congress must devise … and this necessity alone will test … tical statesmanship, and show what … from a complete Democratic control … ment. The Democratic politicians … coquetting with serious financial question … to catch votes, that Congress will meet … knowledge upon the part of the country … tion or policy of the majority upon the … tant question with which it has to deal, and … any consciousness upon the part of the … it has any principle or policy upon the question … ever.

This is a result of the refusal of the Democratic party to take any position upon important issues. It will find another at the very opening of Congress, when the majority will encounter the tariff question. Is the Democratic party a free-trade party, a revenue-tariff party, or a protective-tariff party? It does not dare to say, because it knows that it is divided. In a general way, it is called a free-trade or revenue-reform party; but its State conventions this year generally declared for the encouragement of domestic industry—a phrase which was meant to be evasive and to conciliate protectionist support. In its caucus for Speaker it will probably select Mr RANDALL, who is felt to be due to … but his position, which is felt to be due to the emergencies of his residence in a strong protectionist State, fairly represents that of his party. It is an uncertain and doubtful position, and its apparent insincerity forbids any intelligent forecast of the probable action of the party.

Aid given to Democratic success in New York this autumn is therefore necessarily stimulating a leap in the dark. The business situation is at least grave, and the issue must depend largely upon wise legislative treatment of the currency by Congress. But there was certainly nothing in the Democratic course in the Forty-sixth Congress, or in its general conduct since the war, or in the tone of its more eminent leaders, with the exception of Mr. BAYARD, Mr. HEWITT, and a few others, or in the general tone of its representative press, which shows that it will probably deal wisely with a very serious financial situation. Every voter is bound to take this fact into consideration before giving or withholding his vote in New York this year in a way to aid Democratic success next year. Let every voter wait until he can see what Democratic success means, and for that purpose let him await Democratic action in Congress.

CENTRAL PARK THREATENED.

The indignant and universal protest of the press against the proposed devastation of one of the loveliest parts of the Central Park, in New York, by the Park Commissioners themselves, has for the moment prevented the removal of the Menagerie to the Meadow. But the public must remember that the vote still stands which authorizes the outrage, and that should the expression of opposition be relaxed, the wrong would be accomplished. It is the great misfortune, not only of the city of New York, but of every part of the country, whose citizens, coming to the city, naturally seek its chief resort, that it is in the charge of those who, either from ignorance, or design, or weak good-nature, permit such tricks to be played with it as the proposed destruction of the Meadow or the erection of the huge hotel upon Mount St. Vincent.

It is equally … ic members of … project with ridicule … aggressive wing of … was hostile to Mr. P… HOADLY because of their … Mr. GROESBECK'S speech … the Democratic side during … York Legislature the Democratic … PITTS'S resolutions at the opening … ed the same essential hostility; … very last moment a good bill was p… be honestly called a Democratic measure … same would be hardly claimed to be such … few Democrats in the Legislature who sincerely … ported it. We do not assert, of course, that … were not Republican opponents and scoffers in the Legislature, but only that the bill represented a distinct and mature Republican conviction and demand, and that no such demand has appeared with any force in the Democratic party. Indeed, as the new State law does not go into operation until the 4th of January, we presume that the honest Democratic friends of reform would not be surprised, in the event of the election of the Democratic candidates, to see them make a clean sweep in their offices between the … and 4th of January.

The actual position of the Democratic party upon this subject, despite the vigorous and zealous support of some Democrats, and the contrast with the party attitude of the Republicans upon the question, is shown by the vague and evasive declarations of the State Democratic platforms of the year, by the open scorn and denunciation of Democratic orators, and by the undisguised contempt of the Democratic press either for the principle of reform, or for what they call Republican reform. But with all this affectation of contempt they can not show a single instance of Republican official betrayal of the rules that … adopted. They have been … good …

have been appointed under them. In view of the public approval of the reformed system, it is a much more cunning trick to denounce the practical enforcement as a fraud. But as yet no Democrat, to our knowledge, has shown that examiners have been bribed, or that fear or favor has controlled the selection of the successful candidates. The reform is probably no more agreeable to the machine of one party than to that of the other. The difference is that one machine recognizes the reform sentiment of the party, and the other sees nothing that can be called a party sentiment upon the subject.

THE NEW CROTON AQUEDUCT.

THERE are two routes proposed for the new Croton Aqueduct, and the choice is a question of very great interest to the city. The Department of Public Works and their advisory board of engineers prefer the line parallel to the present aqueduct, along the western slope of the uplands toward the Hudson. The apparent reason of this preference is that it was the first line suggested to the board and approved by it. But there is strong objection to it upon very reasonable grounds.

The first is its proximity to the present aqueduct, which is very weak, and may be damaged by the blasting. The second is the necessity of three enormous structures of masonry to span valleys, and the cost of their maintenance and the risk of accident. The third is the necessity at the earliest possible use of the aqueduct by connecting it with the lake, without the delay consequent upon awaiting the completion of the proposed dam at Quaker Bridge. Should the river line be adopted, four miles of temporary flume must be built, at the cost of half a million of dollars. Lastly, the river line passes through the most expensive villa property in the country, and the land damages will be enormous, and the delays of baffling litigation incalculable. The only advantages of this line are two miles less length, some fifteen natural openings, which will save as many shafts in effecting headings for the tunnel, and probably less trouble from water. The last point, however, is of small moment, as pumps will have to be used to keep the work free upon any route.

The other route proposed for the aqueduct is that of a line from the lake requiring no flume to secure proper connection, and passing along the east side of the Sawmill Valley, through a farming country where the land is worth $200 an acre instead of $3000. It would be wholly a tunnel, and would encounter no opposition from land-owners, and it would have neither embankments nor culverts to maintain. The only objections are possibly that the line would be two miles longer, and that more shafts must be provided, and possibly more water encountered. The first cost, considering the difference of real estate damages and the flume, would probably not greatly exceed that of the river line. The subsequent cost would be largely in favor of the Sawmill Valley route. The question should not be hastily decided, and the manner in which it is decided will greatly affect public confidence in the general conduct of the Commission, unless the superior advantage of the river line should be clearly demonstrated.

"ONE GOD, ONE FARINELLI."

THE admirable and exhaustive article in the November HARPER'S upon the new Metropolitan Opera-house will be read with great interest at this time, which sees the opening of the house, and an unprecedented concentration of operatic attraction in New York. No city in such a nest of operatic nightingales. The three as four chief living prime donne contest the palm here night after night, and the mild extra-agance of this luxury was never more signally shown. "One God, one Farinelli," is the motto of the hour.

For every evening that she sings it is stated that PATTI will receive five thousand dollars. NILSSON and LUCCA are also munificently paid, and SCALCHI, CAMPANINI, and others are not beggared by their efforts. The prices that box-holders and seat-buyers must pay are obvious. The entertainment is a kind of frenzy in which fashion, entertainer, profession, extravagance, and an artificial and factitious taste have the chief part, grouped about the Italian opera, which is played and sung not as in the incomparable days of GRISI, MARIO, PERSIANI, TAMBURINI, and LABLACHE, but as well as it can now be sung.

The splendors and successes of the rival opening nights have been fully described in the daily papers. But in the brilliant contest, so far as it is musical, youth and fresh zeal and the fullness of power and skill kindle the truest enthusiasm. It is a fatal moment when the terrible word "mature" is applied to a "lyrical artist," and when we read of another that he was wisely cautious under the new circumstances, and that he will undoubtedly presently, etc., etc. This is intolerable. All abatement and qualification merely announce that the idol is not quite what it was. Alas! it is not esteem which the votary wishes to feel, but rapture. The old habitué reads with a smile the voracious report which declares that such dies surpassed the other. But he knows the difference between a ripened charm of voice and an untouched bloom.

THE CONTEST IN MASSACHUSETTS.

ELSEWHERE in this paper an article upon the political contest in Massachusetts presents the situation with an intelligence and clearness which will show to every reader its great significance. The interest of the election in that State is twofold. It lies first in the fact that it will determine whether the character which has so long placed Massachusetts among the first of intelligent and progressive communities has disappeared in the morasses of mere ignorant and silent obscurity; and second, whether the whole body of Democrats in the state, which includes soon of the highest character and standing, will be led by sheer party spirit to accept Butlerism as Democracy.

Politically speaking, BUTLER is a mere soldier of fortune, and he is as well known to be such to hundreds of honest Democrats as to Republicans. The contest has been purely personal from the nature of the case, because BUTLER represents nothing but himself. He stands for no principle or policy whatever. His sole object, as Democrats do not deny, is his own aggrandizement, and his campaign as all its methods and pretenses shows the degradation of merely personal politics. Mr. ROBINSON is an able, experienced, conscientious, courageous man, an admirable representative of the "self-made," sturdy, and upright character which has given Massachusetts her peculiar distinction.—But let the reader turn to the article.

THE STATE SENATE.

ONE of the most important objects for New York Republicans in the election is to secure a State Senate which will maintain the advanced position of the party. Among such Senators would be Mr. MCMILLAN, who has been nominated by the Republicans of the Erie district. In ability and character he would be a worthy successor of men like Senators GARDEN, CARLETON SPRAGUE, and SHERMAN ROGERS, and he is an admirable representative of the best Republican spirit and purpose. To men like Mr. MCMILLAN the selection of a United States Senator to succeed Mr. LAWRAN might be intrusted in the most assured confidence that no steps backward would be taken.

THE NEW RAILWAY TIME.

THE agreement of railway companies to use a common time is a very important movement. The companies represent about half of the railway mileage in the country, and their steadfast and successful adhesion to the new system will not only compel the acquiescence of other railways, but it will probably produce a general conformity of public time to the railway standard.

The new scheme establishes four standards of time, the seventy-fifth, ninetieth, one-hundred-and-fifth, and one-hundred-and-twentieth meridians, and the changes from one standard to another will be made at the end of roads or of divisions of roads. The greatest difference of true time from railway time at any point will be about half an hour. But the convenience of the change will be so great that it is quite certain to be generally adopted, and to become generally popular.

FREE WHISKEY.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Cincinnati Commercial Gazette, who is evidently a "thoughtful observer," makes some significant comments upon the late result in that State. The conviction that if the prohibitory amendment were adopted a Democratic administration would practically nullify it as uncontrasted the liquor support upon HOADLY. But there was no fear of its passage, he thinks, because a law which was passed twenty-five years ago, forbidding the sale of liquor to be drunk on the premises, has never been, and in the present state of public opinion never will be, enforced.

There is danger that the Supreme Court will irreversibly veto the SCOTT law by declaring it unconstitutional. This would leave the liquor power triumphant, and reveal the deplorable nature of the Democratic victory. The writer, who is a strong Republican, but a personal friend of Judge HOADLY, points out that his success must be inhibitered by the thought that it rejoices every low den of vice and degradation in the State, and that although Judge HOADLY advocated a license law, he knows that it is unconstitutional, and that "the conscience of Ohio refuses the moral sanction of law to the dram-shop." He begs the new Governor to gladden the heart of his old Republican associates by maintaining the SCOTT law.

The writer attributes the Republican defeat in Ohio primarily to the Republican reformers throughout the country. But this is the old error of attributing the civil war to the Abolitionists. It is true that if the Sons of Liberty had held their tongues, America might still be an English province. If the antislavery men had been silent, there might have been no civil war. So, if the anti had not risen, there might have been no day. Except for Republican reformers the Democrats would have carried the country three years ago, as they have carried Ohio now. Nonsense, says the writer: no shoulder. We certainly shall. But if the Republican ship should sink, it would not be the reformers who have scuttled her. It is not the thermometer that is responsible for the weather.

PERSONAL.

WE are permitted to make the following extract from a private letter just received in this city from Manchester, England. The writer, a young American merchant, says: "The funniest episode of my present trip to Europe was a nearly two hours' chat last night with OLIVER WILDE. He comes and I had been to hear him give his 'Impressions of America,' and just as I got back to the hotel he came in, and at once wanted to know what I was doing here. I replied that my last thing was listening to him, and I wanted to know whether he had been talking down to what he supposed to be the level of a Manchester audience, or whether he thought he could insult them with that kind of stuff. He replied 'Yes, I see you there, and wondered what you were thinking. These people have very little imagination, and no doubt many of them will take all I said for the truth.' But he is wrong about most of them, I know. I asked him to come up into my room, and we sat sipping his favorite tipple, gin and seltzer, while he expounded in the most wonderful fashion. One of his flights was imagining an existence into which the New York Herald should never enter, and to which Lewis Mumford could not damn a play by not knowing how to embrace the heroine; in which no woman would pretend to be intellectual, or would wear unbecoming colors or man millinery-made dresses, but where all the fair part of creation would devote themselves to the delectation of the exquisitely educated senses of an aesthetic race of men. It was very funny to me. I must say that I enjoyed it all very much."

"And did the ladies leave when the cigars were brought in?" asked a Baltimore lady of a gentleman who was describing a dinner to which he had recently been invited. "No, madam," was the reply. "How nice!" responded his fair questioner.

—There is a sadder in a large publishing house in this city who for fifteen years has never once been known to leave his desk at luncheon-time. His privileges are the same as those of his associates in the building, but he does not care to lunch. He gets along without it. One of the stoutest, ablest, and redundant editors of the Metropolitan press has long indulged the habit of omitting the mid-day meal. He neither eats nor drinks between breakfast and dinner. Says he doesn't want to.

The Genesee lover who shouts himself in the moonlight, while his false mistress pees at him in the presence of his rival, may be a no more heroic personage than the crazy youth who, using his lady walk off with a soldier, scrawls on a paper, 'This is thy work, Penelope Ann,' and walks into a pond in the neighborhood."

Such a writer was Captain MAYNE REID, whose thrilling narratives of adventures among Indians share the vitality and strength of personal experience. The captain has the son of a Presbyterian clergyman in the north of Ireland, and of late years had resided near London. His age was sixty-five.

—A distinguished physician of this city, whose habit is to smoke five or six cigars every evening, but none at all during the day, has long pursued the plan of not smoking during the month of October. His idea is, he says, to allow his system to recuperate thirty days annually. The effect of tobacco, in his case, is a slight acceleration of the movement of the heart. This acceleration becomes clearly defined by the end of every September, but ceases entirely at the beginning of November, after his period of abstinence, leaving him in good condition for another year's wrestle with the weed.

—It is to be hoped that American art is not to lose Mr. E. A. ABBEY, whom the English artists seem disposed to consider a settled citizen of "Artistic London." He has been credited, by general consent, with having reached the high water mark of black-and-white illustration, and though his work is usually given to the public through the HARPER periodicals, the English art publications are willing to take all they can get from him at his own terms. He is now busy in working up the studies made in company with Mr. WILLIAM BLACK in Stratford-on-Avon for the illustration of the latter's new serial, "Judith Shakespeare," and has recently finished a series of illustrations to Poe's tale "The Gold Bug," which will be one of the striking features of the Christmas number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE. One of the pleasantest episodes of Mr. ABBEY's career has been his close association, in work as well as in friendship, with his English comrade, ALFRED PARSONS, to whom his HARPER book is dedicated.

—The Cologne Gazette tells how it came to pass that King ALFRED became honorary Colonel of the Uhlans stationed at Strasburg. There were two regiments of Uhlans available, and the uniforms of both were submitted to the King, who preferred the one with yellow cuffs to that with white cuffs, and the one he preferred happened to be quartered in Strasburg.

—A man of letters was smoking and chatting with a physician on a Hudson River ferry-boat, when a stranger stepped up and asked for a light. "Let me give you a match," replied the man of letters, adding, after his petitioner had withdrawn, "I don't know how you feel about it, doctor, but, for my part, I very much dislike to put the end of my cigar back into my mouth after it has been fingered by Tom, Dick, or Harry. I always carry matches with me, and make it a point to offer one of them instead." "And quite right you are," said the doctor. "I believe that some of the worst diseases can be conveyed by one man to another through the contact of his fingers with a borrowed cigar. I personally know of a case where carbuncle was transmitted by means of a two-dollar bill, and I firmly believe that varioloid and things much worse can pass from a man's fingers into a cigar, and thence into the smoker of it."

BEE-HUNTING.

"Bee hunting," writes an enthusiast, "is the poetry of sport." The rich warm days of September afford the best season for the sport, as then the bees are compelled to roam far and wide in search of food, as the honey bearing flowers are nearly gone. The first thing in bee-hunting is to catch your bee. Practised hunters capture the little forager in a box with a glass lid, in which a little bit of honeycomb is inclosed. After Mr Bee has taken his fill, he is allowed to escape. He rises a few feet in the air, circles round two or three times, and then makes a bee-line home. If the tree in which the hive has taken up its abode is within half a mile, the bee usually returns in a short time, and brings with him one or three friends, to whom he has communicated the interesting fact that he has found a box of honey. In a short time a line of bees may be established. But in many instances a second line of bees has to be established. A second base of operations is selected some distance from the first, another bee caught, disinclosed, and traced. Then, where the two lines meet, the hunter may be sure the prize is not far distant. The inexperienced sportsman is troubled at first with the difficulty of tracing the little wanderer. In some countries the hunter attaches some white cottony substance to the bee, which makes it more conspicuous as well as slower in its flight. Some experts sprinkle the captive with flour, others with sulphur, before he is released from the trap to wing his homeward flight, and become an involuntary betrayer of his queen and the body-politic. The sulphur sprinkling is said to cool the bees in a perfect operar, so that they can be followed by ear as well as by eye. The tree in which the nest is located is usually an old one, with a top more or less decayed. To obtain the honey, the tree is in most instances felled, and then, if it is much decayed, the comb is badly broken and much of the honey wasted. The bees, at the first stroke of the axe, would pour forth, ready to make war on everything, unless due precautions are taken. The plan, therefore, is to stop up all openings but one, and [illegible] insects out; a puff of tobacco soon deadens them and renders them harmless. THE BAY STATE CAMPAIGN.

THE present political campaign in Massachusetts may well be termed extraordinary. It is that in every sense of the word. The contest does not turn on well-defined local or national issues. Nor is it a struggle directly and solely between the parties as such, in which so-called party principles are concerned. It is primarily a personal contest over Governor BUTLER, the man who has disgraced his position and the State, rather than the representative of the party whose organization he has captured; and secondarily a struggle for the overthrow or retention of those vicious political methods and the worst phases of the spoils system which have fastened themselves upon the politics of the State, and am expressed in Massachusetts by the comprehensive term of Butlerism—akin to Grantism in national politics, but even more vicious and dangerous, as at present practiced by the politicians of the BUTLER stripe, than their vicious lam. That Massachusetts, presumed to be one of the most progressive of the States, a pioneer leader in the great and far-reaching movement for civil service reform, should have elevated to the Governorship this man of all men, whose political record is covered all over with stains, and who had for years stood as one of the most conspicuous representatives of the things to be reformed, is one of the marvels of the time. Various explanations of last year's remarkable election in Massachusetts am given, but none are satisfactory. It is a problem the solution of which perplexes even the most astute of Massachusetts observers, who differ widely in their conclusions.

Whatever may have been the causes which led to the uplifting of BUTLER last November, the result is sufficiently clear, and the uppermost question in the State now is not how it all happened, but how it can be most successfully remedied.

It so happens, as a result of BUTLER'S course in embracing the Democracy and making it his willing tool, that the Democratic organization in the State, in the present contest, stands for him and for Butlerism, and that the Republican organization stands for the anti-Butlerites and for purer politics. But though the victory will be recorded as a Republican or a Democratic one, as BUTLER is defeated or elected, the lines are drawn more sharply between BUTLER and anti-BUTLER men than between Democrats and Republicans. Men of both parties are found on either side. Acting independently — some professedly and some honestly so — are several organizations, and citizens not organized. Among the organized side parties are the radical Temperance men, the irreconcilables, who as Prohibitionists or nothing, stand out by themselves, at war with both the leading parties; the Labor-Reformers, so called, acting with the Greenbackers—the relics of a dead-and-buried issue, who keep up their organization solely to work it politically for what it is worth; the so-called "Butler Independents," a set of politicians with a few followers who formerly trained with the Republican party, but who are wedded to BUTLER and Butlerism largely because of past political favors received or of a lively anticipation of favors to come with BUTLER'S further successes; and the true Independents, who represent a large body of Massachusetts men, whose numbers and strength can not be estimated, who believe in party as a means rather than an end, and whom political principles are so clearly defined that the most obtuse machine politician can readily and unmistakably comprehend them.

With the Independents, organized and unorganized, possibly lies the balance of power. Among them are the men who made the successful Independent canvasses in the Massachusetts Fifth and Seventh Congressional districts last year, resulting in the defeat of Benjamin Rowman and Caneman, the regular Republican candidates, whose records as reformers did not come up to the required standard. These men are organized, and it was under their leadership that the recent conferences were held at which the principles of the Massachusetts Independents were defined, and their position taken on the BUTLER issue and the question of anti-BUTLER candidates. With them, unorganized, the most, if not all, of the pronounced civil service reformers, attached to the several civil service reform clubs of the State, are acting. These embrace the leading men in this State whose independence has long been recognized, and whose influence has been felt in the politics of the State; and in their ranks are hosts of young men, ardent and honest, men of sentiment and convictions, who are coming forward to take their part in the work of politics with reform and honest methods as their watchword. Of the other organizations, the Prohibitionists are expected to throw a handful of votes for their own ticket and more for BUTLER, withdrawing just so much from the anti-BUTLER ticket, for Massachusetts Prohibitionists are reared almost exclusively from the Republican ranks, and the support of the Greenback Labor party and of the "BUTLER Independents" will go almost solidly for BUTLER, a remnant only of the former following the anti-BUTLER bolt led by E. Mackay Bowman, the erratic Essex County Greenback leader, who has removed for a seat in Congress, and who is now out with BUTLER largely because of this latter's forgetfulness of him and because of the Greenback party as soon as they had served the purpose, and he had concluded that he had no further use for them.

The present situation in Massachusetts, then, is this: Congressman Rowman, the head of the Republican ticket, represents the opponents of BUTLER and Butlerism, and is receiving the support of the entire Republican party, of the great body of the honest Independents and the sincere reformers, and of those among the weightiest classes in the community who are denominated progressive men, and who seldom—more's the pity!—interest themselves in the politics of the State, except when they believe that there is a crisis in its affairs demanding their attention; while BUTLER is receiving the support of the reckless and the ignorant classes, whose prejudices he loses no opportunity to foster and inflame, of the machine men wedded to Butlerism, and whose leaders am under obligations to him for political favors received or place obtained, and of the Democratic masses, who fall readily and obediently into line under whatever leader or whatever banner their bosses provide.

With the issues so clearly defined and the lines so sharply drawn, it would seem that the outcome of the earnest and spirited canvass now proceeding in the State could not be difficult to foretell. To people outside the State, with their familiarity with Governor BUTLER'S record, their knowledge of the scandals and the outrages of his administration, and their respect for the general good judgment and intelligence of the Massachusetts people, it is surprising that there should be any question about it. But in the State itself, where the attention is most clearly comprehended, it is not so surprising. It is a party pretty firmly intrenched, and with an active machine well in hand, that is to be dislodged. BUTLER and the men in league with him, trained professional politicians, adepts in the art of political warfare, have been exceedingly industrious during the months of his administration. They have strengthened their organization throughout the State; political workers who have been appointed to office, large and small positions, State and city, out so much in payment for political work done as to be where they could do the most good for the further advancement of political schemes, have been busy "fixing things", registration has been followed closely and systematically, and the voter-making mills have been coining briskly, and the city of Boston, well under the BUTLER grip, has been Tammanyized to such an extent that to-day the Republican and anti-BUTLER leaders find themselves threatened with an election contest to which fraudulent methods of the kind familiar to the people of New York am to be practiced to swell the BUTLER majority. It has come to this in Massachusetts, that the result of a political campaign is to turn less on the square trial of issues than upon an honest ballot and a fair count.

The encouraging features of the situation are the character of the anti-BUTLER canvass, and the thoroughness with which the anti-BUTLER leaders are conducting their work, prosecuting the public campaign, and preparing to check fraud and protect the ballot box. This campaign began, brilliantly and earnestly, promptly upon the completion of the work of the Boston Convention—that most remarkable gathering, superior in personnel to any political convention held in the State since the war times—and it promises to be so conducted to the end. Its tone, too, has been high from the start, inviting at once the support of the best element in the State, and winning its confidence. Congressman Rowman, the head of the ticket, has proved himself to be one of the ablest and broadest of public men; and from the moment of his public acceptance of the nomination, which he did not seek, but which sought him, he has steadily grown in public favor, because of his manly bearing, his frankness and straightforwardness, the character of his public utterance, and the clearness and strength of his record. He has been speaking nightly, sometimes twice a day, and his speeches have been most effective. He has met every issue brought into the canvass by the BUTLER party, disclosed the burning and scandal of the BUTLER administration, and shown the utter worthlessness of the claim of the Governor that he has reformed abuses, checked extravagance, and exposed corruption. He has also displayed both the pluck and ability to meet the Governor on his own ground, and expose his demagogisms as fast as he exhibits it. He is strong in an argument, quick at retort, and a match for BUTLER on the stump, but the contrast between them is sharp, for the former maintains the attitude of a gentleman, and does not descend to misrepresentation, personal abuse, vulgarity, and blackguardism to make his "points." With Rowman on the stump is an army of speakers, including the Senators and leading Congressmen, ex-Governors — none of whom make more effective speeches than ex-Governor (now Congressman-elect) Long, who, next to Rowman, is, of all the campaign speakers, in the greatest demand—the old leaders, veterans of many a closely fought campaign against the same evils which beset them now, and a brilliant array of younger men who are coming to the front and taking the leadership. At the head of the State Committee, HENRY CABOT LODGE, as chairman, is doing effective service in directing the details of the canvass, and also performing his share of work on the stump, and volunteer committees of citizens in different sections of the State, and especially in Boston and the other cities where the BUTLER hold is the strongest, are aiding the regular organizations in many ways.

On the BUTLER side the chief work on the stump is doing by the Governor himself. He in supported mostly by the men he has appointed to office, or who are under obligations to him for past favors. Chief among these is the ex-Collector of the Port of Boston, WILLIAM A. SIMMONS, a creation of BUTLER'S, who now cools for his chief within the Democratic ranks while holding a position under the BUTLER administration in the city of Boston. Another is Mayor PALMER, of Boston, also a former Republican, who left that organization and joined the BUTLER party because as a Republican he failed of appreciation, and was defeated in his ambition to become President of the State Senate. Of the old Democratic leaders only a handful are found in his wake, so at any rate willing to take the stump for him. Several am courageous enough to oppose him openly, but the most of them are content to stand aside, keeping or quiet or possible lest they be singled out for attack by their party's boss and his followers, while he forges ahead with their party machinery, of which they fondly hope to regain possession by-and-by when his grotesque race is run.

The Massachusetts contest is of national importance both because of the fight against bad political methods and the vicious spoils system which is involved, and of the attitude of BUTLER toward the Presidency. It is now virtually acknowledged that his campaign is but a preliminary canvass for a Presidential nomination of some sort. Ever since his inauguration as Governor he has addressed himself to the country at large. All his state papers—the most remarkable set of documents that has ever lumbered the State archives—have been directed to the great public beyond the borders of the State, and all his sensational performances have been before this large audience. He has used his position solely for his personal ends, and he has defamed the State to make political capital for his own use. His agents, too, have been abroad in other States, newspapers and organizations have been worked in his interest, and his campaign literature, conspicuous among which is the scandalous and filthy illustrated pamphlet on the so-called Tewksbury almshouse exposure, has been, and is still, circulated far and wide. In his appeals for support he points to the record of his administration here this year, claiming to have accomplished much in spite of a hostile Executive Council and an opposing Legislature. But, in point of fact, he has accomplished nothing but mischief.

The in the record upon which this arrogant demagogue pleads for further confidence in Massachusetts, and upon which he proposes to go to the country as a Presidential candidate if he is re-elected in November. I pen it alone, if there were on other consideration, he ought to be rejected by the people of his State. The result of the Massachusetts canvass will be awaited with much concern by the great body of citizens who am demanding purer politics, real reform, and the retirement of the bosses.

THE RETIREMENT OF GENERAL SHERMAN.

In yielding up the command of the army on the 1st of November, preparatory to final retirement a few months hence, General WILLIAM T. SHERMAN substantially closes his military career.

Such an event must recall to many of his countrymen the brilliant services of that eminent officer, and may perhaps also suggest the query whether those services were exaggerated in the war enthusiasm of twenty years ago, or whether they lose nothing even when viewed critically in the perspective of years. No doubt SHERMAN'S soldiership was one of gradual growth, and there was a vast difference between the brigade commander who for the first time at Bull Run "saw canaan-balls roll men and crash through the trees," and the General who led his victorious armies through the Carolinas. Yet from the outset he showed soldierly insight and instincts, and took broad views of the art of war. It seems strange to recall that he was thought crazy because he told how many troops he needed in Kentucky, where he had charge of a department in the autumn of 1861. On many a battle-field SHERMAN'S quick intelligence and inexhaustible energy retrieved the mistakes of others as well as his own. "To his individual efforts" General GRANT generously ascribed whatever was saved from the first disasters day at Shiloh, where the inexperience of officers, from highest to lowest, caused the onset upon the camps to prove so nearly fatal to the Union arms. To SHERMAN'S part in the campaigns of 1862 and 1863, which unfettered the Mississippi, and left the great river to run rejoicing to the sea, GRANT paid this tribute: "The siege of Vicksburg and last capture of Jackson, and dispersion of Johnston's army, entitle General SHERMAN to more credit than usually falls to the lot of one man to earn. His demonstration at Haines Bluff in April, to hold the enemy about Vicksburg while the army was securing a foot hold east of the Mississippi, his rapid marches to join the army afterward, his management at Jackson, Mississippi, in the first attack; his almost unequalled march from Jackson to Bridgeport, and passage of Black River; his securing Walnut Hills on the 18th of May—attest his great merit as a soldier."

Now do we believe that too much stress has been laid upon the service rendered by SHERMAN when, precisely twenty years ago, he moved from Vicksburg to Chattanooga, to succor ROSECRANS there beleaguered, took part in the victory of Missionary Ridge, and thence hastened to the relief of BURNSIDE at Knoxville. It was soon after these events that GRANT, on receiving his well-earned promotion to the revived grade of Lieutenant-General, with magnanimous impulse, wrote to his favorite subordinate: "I want to express my thanks to you and McPHERSON as the men to whom above all others I feel indebted for whatever I have had of success. How far your advice and assistance have been of help to me, you know. How far your execution of whatever has been given you to do entitles you to the reward I not receiving, you can not know as well as I." Yet, undoubtedly, the greatness of SHERMAN'S soldiership only fully appeared when he was intrusted with the responsibility of the Western campaign. For, looking back upon the extraordinary marches from Chattanooga to Atlanta, from Atlanta to Savannah, from Savannah to Raleigh, and coupling with them THOMAS'S splendid overthrow of HOOD'S army in Tennessee, we see on day more clearly than ever how these achievements added General GRANT'S crowning triumph at Appomattox to become also the end of the war throughout the South.

It was SHERMAN'S happy fortune, indeed, that the campaign in which he was called to take part proved to be of prime importance. "The possession of the Mississippi River," he once said, "is the possession of America. It was vital to us, and we fought for it and won it." A fit sequel to this bisection of the Confederacy was the conquest of its eastern belt, from the great river to the Atlantic coast, and there is no more impressing picture in military annals than that of the Western army fighting its way down from Cairo to capture Pemberton at Vicksburg, and sweeping over after another the Border States, sending its invincible columns hither and thither through the Mississippi basin, pressing into Northeastern Georgia to the Alleghanies to attack Hood, and sweeping southward again into the heart of Georgia, then dividing, one part to crush Hood's army at Nashville, while the other should offer Savannah as "a Christmas gift" to the nation, then gathering into its garner Charleston and Wilmington, and finally, having overrun the Carolinas, pausing itself upon the routes of retreat from Virginia, where is heard the glad tidings of the capitulation of Lee.

History, then, we may conclude, will accord to General SHERMAN as high a rank among the soldiers of his age as the partiality of his contemporaries may have decreed for him. So to eulogize him, or some do, chiefs as a military gist, does injustice to the comprehensiveness of his soldiership. He certainly displayed no less skill in organizing, feeding, transporting, and maneuvering his army than in planning operations. He had a genius for topography, which at a glance turned a landscape into a military position, and took an inventory of its natural features of strength or weakness. The character istic of his work was illustrated by his habit of making himself familiar beforehand with the agricultural and other products of even region through which he was to march. Such familiarity no be made were mainly those that grew out of the quickness of judgment and alertness and the self-dependence which are of powerful value in a military leader. It certainly was another luck not the possession of any ordinary skill that enabled him to move his hundreds of thousands of miles through the heart of a hostile country with the exactness of mechanism. Many of him that he possessed for greater resources of man and material than his adversaries is to say only what is true of other great Union leaders, and was the admitted ground of any attempt to grapple with the insurrection.

General SHERMAN will take with him into private life the consciousness that in he never failed to make the interests of the army during the fourteen years he has stood at its head the burden of his eloquent tongue and pen. The striking picturesqueness and vigor of his speech and writing that will give his Memoirs an enduring place in American literature, whether apart from their value as a military chronicle, have already been at the service of he manifold a cause. The respect and affection of he fellow citizens will follow him into his retirement.

ON THE YUKON RIVER.

THE Yukon River, supposed until the recent discovery by Engineer Serdat to be the longest river in Alaska, presents many points of great interest to the traveller. One of these is the trading station at Ikog mouth. The house, which is quite picturesque, is built of roughly hewn spruce logs, the tops and bottoms being rounded in such a manner as to fit tightly into each other. Fastened with wooden pegs, and well calked with moss, the building, while but of rude construction, is eminently suitable to shelter its occupants from the rigorous winter winds and cold weather of the arctic. This style of house is similar to many seen in Russia, and was introduced into Alaska by the Muscovites when they first came in the Territory. The room with which they are covered and the comfort they afford have led to their adoption by American traders. One portion of the erection serves as a kitchen and living room for the trader and his squaw, while a more neat and long room occupy the remainder. The left of by these traders is a solitary one for June when the annual vessel arrives at St. Michael's from San Francisco, until the June of the next following, he receives no news from the outer world, his monotonous existence being only broken by his winter sled journey to St. Michael's to drive his fur and obtain supplies.

Ikog mouth it also the head quarters of the aged residence of the priest belonging to the Russo-Greek Church—a Church whose tenets are held by numerous converts throughout the Alaskan Territory.

Residents on the island of St. Michael's and the numerous villages surrounding Norton Sound are people whose language and general habits are closely allied to the Esquimaux of the more northern portion of the North American continent. In the winter, when the seas and rivers of the higher latitudes become are in the grasp of the ice, these hardy people prosecute long and arduous journeys over the frozen expanse of waters in search of hides to the sea, where the quest seal come up to blow and bask in the sun. For hours and hours they sit, muffled in furs and moments of reindeer and seal skin, patiently awaiting for the least sign of a seal appearing. The black monster appears, when, after killing the seal, which is effected by means of a spear harpoon, which is connected to the end, the wounded animal is hauled to the edge of the ice, and with a knife thrown the carcass upon his sled, and with the dogs, has been stationed behind him, he hamstrings the animal, and proceeds homeward. At a distance of a thousand miles from its mouth, and at a point where the width of the river is upward of a mile, the Yukon is bounded on the north by a parallel of latitude—the arctic circle—on the south by lofty mountains. These mountains are perpendicular red and gray granite, clothed on the sides with beautiful mosses ens, and straggling berry bearing bushes, while on their summits may be seen a seemingly impassable forest of elegant spruce-trees. The water runs over hidden rocks and numerous breakers, tumbling and tossing in its impetuous course, and that at a rate which causes the little vessel-wheel steamers of the trading companies to pant and put forth their utmost power to stem the current. At the Southern limit of these rapids the Yukon expands to a width of some five miles—a broad stream of water, with numerous islets.

During the latter part of May, when the river is clogged with immense sheets and lumps of ice, the scene to this point is grand: the huge masses of ice are dashed against the rocks, and piled up to every imaginable and fantastic form, rendering the navigation dangerous, while trunks of trees of an incredible size are swept down by the long imprisoned waters on their way to the sea.

The trading post of Nuklukayet is situated on the Yukon River, a short distance from the point where its largest tributary, the Tannanah, flows into the main stream. In common with all the erections throughout the northern portion of Alaska, the buildings are of hewn logs, the interspaces filled in with moss, serving to keep the residents warm and cosy in the severe winter. The natives on this section of the Yukon partake in their physiognomy of the North American Indians. Many of the males are over five feet six inches in height, well built, and athletic. Generally speaking, they are nomadic in their habits, resorting to the banks of the rivers during the summer, when they lay in a supply of salmon for winter use, and living in either drill tents or huts made from branches of the spruce trees. In the winter they reside in moose skin tents, which are erected to seal from the hunting grounds on the backs of the women, the men disdaining to degrade themselves by the performance of any labor whatsoever other than that of hunting and trapping. Consequent upon the rigorous climate and hard work which falls to the females, women are in the minority among these people. They grow old rapidly, a woman to thirty having the appearance of being over fifty or sixty, with bag gard, wary looks. Their modes of subsistence and livelihood are entirely from the chase and fishing. In exchange for their furs—beaver, marten, wolf, lynx, fox, and moose skins—they receive tobacco, American clothing, sporting guns, powder, lead, and reindeer-skins for their winter overshirts. So far as their conduct toward whites is concerned, the traders report that with but few instances they are very violent-tempered when excited, are tyrannous liars, and harm scarcely any good qualities, but are brought to a sense of good behavior by an exhibition of stern and firm determination. They are armed cowards, attacking only in a body, and, as a rule, are devoid of the better traits possessed by their Indian brothers of the Eastern Territories.

From its mouth to Nuclus bound to the village or trading post of Andreavsky, nearly two hundred and fifty miles, the Yukon runs between low-lying alluvial grounds. The soil of these banks and of the surrounding country is a chocolate-colored loam, but of a slight depth, the strong current which runs during the months of May and June carrying away enormous quantities of the earth, and exposing to view the underlying sheets of what may be truly termed ancient ice. Upon the lower portion of the Yukon and its delta remains of the mammoth elephant are often found, the natives using the bones as runners for their sleds. This portion of the river abounds in islands, sand bars, and banks, upon which there is a stunted growth of alder, willow, and dwarfed cotton-wood, which piles of spruce-trees brought down by the stream are drifted in to the banks, serving as fuel and building material for the natives. Upon these bars and banks myriads of wild fowl rest on their annual flights to the arctic regions in the summer, depositing their eggs, which are eagerly sought after by the natives.

One of the most ludicrous sights imaginable may be seen during the month of August, when the birds have lost their feathers. Being unable to fly, the natives go along the shore knocking the geese, swans, or ducks upon the head with sticks, while the birds waddle along, uttering discordant cries, as they strive to gain the waters of the river, whom, gaining a refuge, they dive to elude their pursuers. The flesh of wild fowl in the arctic and subarctic regions from June to September is extremely delicious, the birds, having fed upon the luscious wild berries that cover the interminable swales and marshes, are wonderfully fat, and when prepared for table are a welcome addition to the menu of the residents on the river.

HENRY W. OGDEN.

HENRY IRVING

However widely critics differ concerning Henry Irving—and they differ very widely—the fact remains that he comes to us the foremost actor of England. Every dramatic production to the Lyceum of late years, whether comic found it excellent, indifferent, or bad, has been carried to the height of success by a steady tide of popularity. Adverse criticism has been directed mainly against Mr Irving's delineations of Shakspearean characters, yet the popular success of his Shakspearean revivals in spite of adverse criticism, is too great to be overlooked. It seemed to me, when I attended a performance of Romeo and Juliet in the Lyceum, that I had never been in a theatre where what may be called the worship of the hero too was carried so far. A sense of authority exaggerated pervaded the atmosphere. The dim lights of the auditorium, the music, the scenic accessories—all seemed arranged to steep the audience in the very luxury of woe. When the curtain rose on certain scenes, only Shakspeare's lines, properly spoken, were needed to produce an unprecedented stillness of grief. But it seemed to me that the void was not always filled. Every now and then found me almost decided that Henry Irving's Romeo was an animated mannerism. Then suddenly he would electrify his hearers with a fine burst of passion or despair. By carefully following his performance I discovered that wherever melodramatic methods could be applied to the interpretation of Shakspeare, Mr Irving rose to the height of the situation, but that during the interim his voice was pitched in a key of monotonous exaggeration, and his gestures were stilted. I could, however, easily tell that, whatever his shortcomings in Shakspearean characters might be, to an actor of melodrama he must be unsurpassed. And herein seemed to me to lie the secret of his extraordinary success. His first great hit was as Matthias in the melodrama of The Bells. That was a genuine, startling success. One melodramatic hit was added to another, until the ever-swelling tide of popularity carried him beyond melodrama, and landed him safely in Shakspearean tragedy. But he applied to it the methods which had made him popular in melodrama, and his friends, recognizing the familiar methods, stood by them and applauded them, failing to perceive that he was applying them to the wrong material. Thus attempts to make Shakspearean tragedy as if it were melodrama. Not being by nature gifted to soar to the heights of those plays which move in an atmosphere above all that has been written before or since, he unconsciously drew them down to himself. Hence it is that strangers and critics complain of his mannerisms, though they do not know exactly how to explain them, and at the same time account for his popularity. Here is the solution: they see plays which have always been acted as tragedies now acted as melodramas. This is repugnant to them, but not to the public, which has, as it were, grown up with Mr Irving, for to the latter career has made his methods natural. Consequently what startled and bewildered strangers call mannerisms, the Lyceum public calls individual traits. Thus may be solved the problem presented by the curious coexistence of intense adverse criticism and intense popular enthusiasm.

I do not know if Mr Irving feels himself that the novelty of his Shakspearean performances may strike a strange audience as too novel, but at any rate his decision to open here with The Bells was eminently wise, for The Bells belongs to a line of plays in which he is supreme. His supremacy in this line must be clear to the careful observer of even his Shakspearean delineations, and consequently it is natural that even the severest critics of the latter unite in praising his melodramatic characters. Matthias, in The Bells, was, I believe, the first character in which he exerted over a London audience the marvellous fascination springing from that subtle something of indefinite value known as personal magnetism. Since then there has existed between him and the Lyceum audiences an entente cordiale perilous to the unprecedented in the annals of the drama. It has made the elaborate Shakspearean reverals and fine setting of other plays possible. The success of The Bells was immediate and overwhelming. Such a weird, wild portrayal of horror had never been witnessed on the London stage as Mr Irving's portrayal of the vision-haunted murderer Matthias. The element of terror is brought out in bolder relief by his capital assumption of an concern in such moments as when he argues with Christine that his efforts to discover the murderer of the Polish Jew will prove futile. Mr Lewis's adaptation of Erckmann-Chatrian's Le Juif Polonais is a one-character play. In the hands of Henry Irving its strength lies in this one-character feature. No greater evidence of his power as a melodramatic actor is needed. A bit of by-play will be remembered to show the ease with which he commands his audience, and how at times the pathetic is made harmonious with his conception of the character as a whole. As Matthias takes a bottle of wine out of his pocket he carelessly puts the strong aconite on cork, a moment later he shivers with terror and snatches it off.

Henry Irving's success was achieved by remarkable perseverance under circumstances discouraging to mediocrity as much as by his undoubted genius. A famous theatrical author once advanced the dictum that genius was merely the power to persevere. The absurdity of the dictum is too apparent to be dispelled by its sage gravity, but certainly in many cases genius of a certain order succeeds with perseverance where a higher kind of genius without perseverance fails.

Henry Irving, whose real name is John Henry Brodribb, was born near Glastonbury, February 6, 1838. He was sent to London as a youth to be fitted out for mercantile business, but his fondness for the stage led him to give up his desk in an Indian merchant's office. He first appeared in public as an actor when eighteen years old, September 29, 1856, at Sunderland, as Octavian, in Rochelieu, and continued, with a brief intermission, until 1866, to play in the provinces.

From this hard, grinding, but thorough school he graduated to London. The credit of first appreciating Mr Irving to his full value belongs to a manager who, if not American born, was long enough here to be called an American manager. Mr Hayman, who was then the manager of the Lyceum, engaged Mr Irving for his theatre. The first part he played on the stage which his successes have rendered famous was Landey Norhouse, the date, September 11, 1871. Hayman died in 1875, and after that his widow managed the Lyceum until September, 1878. On the 30th of December of that year, the play being Hamlet, the bills announced Henry Irving "sole lessee and manager." Miss Tabby, whom he engaged immediately on assuming the management, played Ophelia. At the conclusion of the play, acknowledging a call before the curtain, he said "To produce the Hamlet of to-night I have worked all my life, and I rejoice to think that my work has not been in vain." What Henry Irving and Miss Tabby have made of the Lyceum is known to the world. It has made the establishment to London of a national theatre like the Théâtre Français unnecessary.

Mr Irving's many personal graces have won him entrance to the highest social circles, and he has steadily used his influence to raise the social standing of the profession, while by upholding in public addresses and in private intercourse the moral influence of the stage he has broken down in many the prejudices against which liberal education and criticism had protested in vain. Of his genial personal qualities Edwin Booth, John McCullough, Lawrence Barrett, and other American actors can testify. That he can hold his own very nicely to point of satire in personal intercourse is shown by the following neat anecdote related by the anonymous author of a recent Irving biography: In a burlesque, The Corsican Brothers & Co., which came out when the melodrama was carried at the Lyceum, Mr Rorer gave an imitation of him (Irving) which was almost too faithful to deserve the name of burlesque, and not long since a young actor mimicked him with much success in another burlesque. Mr Irving, who can not take such mockery in very good part, went, nevertheless, to see the performance. Not long after he met the culprit at dinner, and made himself as insultingly agreeable that his new acquaintance began to feel some qualms of conscience, till presently, a bore mutton-chestnut came under discussion, Mr Irving turned to the younger man and said, in a tone of bland inquiry, "And are you an actor too, Mr Z——?"

Mr Irving is most careful in matters of rehearsal, but his short-sightedness once caused the introduction of an unrehearsed effect. It occurred on a performance of King René's Daughter, in which Miss Tabby played the blind daughter, Mr Irving, Count Tristan, and Mr Cooper, Sir Geoffrey. Mr Cooper is as short-sighted as Mr Irving. At the moment when Tristan is directed to hand the blind girl a talisman, Mr Irving dropped this property.

"Pick it up—pick it up, Cooper," said Mr Irving.

"I can't see it," was the reply.

Finally the blind princess was obliged to pick up the talisman, she alone being able to see it.

With Mr Irving comes Miss Tabby, who can claim with him an equal share of the Lyceum honors. When he played with her for the first time he promised her that if ever he became a manager he would engage her as leading lady. I remember very well the fervor of her passion and the music of her love talk and her grace of bearing as Juliet. Of her Ophelia an English critic writes thus: If anything more intellectually conceived or more exquisitely wrought out than Miss Tabby's Ophelia has been seen on the English stage in this generation, it has not been within his memory. Miss Tabby, who first burst at Coventry on the 27th of February, 1847, first appeared at Hull, while yet almost an infant, in a pantomime. At the age of ten she played, in Charles Kean's production of the Winter's Tale, the part of the child Mamillius. Her progress was steady until she began at the Lyceum to share with Mr Irving in the successes of that theatre.

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

At the recent meeting of the Maine Pedagogical Society a paper was read on "The Relation of the Common School to the College." It is generally understood that the common schools turn out the raw material out of which the colleges make finished curve pitchers, ninety pound cranks with fifteen ounces of strategy to the pound of consonants, and accomplished kickers for foot-ball purposes.

More than seventy-five million copies of a certain spelling book have been sold in America, it is asserted, and all of them contained that absurd monosyllable of six letters which becomes a word of two syllables when one-third of its letters are taken away—plague.

It is charged that the Chinese government does not act wholly conscientiously in respect to the law of the United States restricting Chinese immigration. Of 152 Chinese who arrived in San Francisco recently, nearly half had certificates setting forth that they were tradesmen, and therefore not "laborers." The ratio was about the same in another ship-load. It is claimed that fully ninety per cent. of both lots were laborers within the meaning of the restrictive law.

It is solemnly asserted by a Southern newspaper that there is a calf in Virginia which "eats chickens carnivorously." This, however, even if true, is less remarkable than if the calf were to eat chickens herbivorously.

Near Bismarck, Dakota, three thousand buffaloes were slain in one day recently by one thousand Sioux Indians. The red man can occasionally equal the English hunting tourists in the wanton destruction of game, but it can be said of them no extenuation that they are untutored.

It having been printed in an English journal that many rich families in London prefer boarding in hotels to keeping house, an American newspaper adds, "No wonder; it gives them opportunities to converse with the clerks."

Monsignor Capel says that in Baltimore the Archbishop took him to call on a lady, who called up her four-year old boy and said, "My son, speak to the Archbishop." The urchin extended his hand in a frank and hospitable way, and greeted him with, "Howdy, Arch?"

Mr Labouchere learns, and prints it in Truth, that the Queen has issued a private memorandum enjoining the occupants of "a certain royal palace" to abstain from gambling, especially in the early hours of Sunday mornings. It is asserted that enormous sums have been won and lost by players in the royal apartments; but never put forth in terms so indefinite as not always to be taken with several grains of allowance.

The Queen never was greatly astonished at the smallness of our army. Probably he was only the private. But if the smallness of the army astonished him, what would have been his emotions had he seen our navy?

If Mr Hobson, of Indiana, is a handsome man, he has been singularly unfortunate in his portrait-makers.

An English journal mentions the hanging of a negro woman in the South recently who wore upon the gallows a large sunflower pinned on her dress. Black satin, says this journal, went to it of fashion for some years because a certain notorious murderess was hanged in a dress of that material, and the question is raised whether the favor shown to the sunflower by this negro woman will make that flower unpopular. The English writer seems to have forgotten that the sunflower's popularity has withstood the test of even Oscar Wilde's anomalous preference.

A REMINISCENCE OF THE HORSE SHOW.

"Ah, bonjour, chère Madame De Shetland, and how's the baby?"

"Many thanks, dear Monsieur De la Poodle, the baby's all right, to you one. I'm taking it out for a little trot."

"For the fun of the thing, just to see what the old man will do." Look!!

The Puritan Governor "Prythee Captain, what manner of thing is this, that so disturbeth the colony?"

The Puritan Captain. "In truth I know not, your Excellency, but in my time fun of that kind was done by a Mountebank."

THE PARTIES AND FREE TRADE.

The joy of the Democratic leaders over the victory in Ohio is not unmixed. The methods by which the victory was obtained, and the results which will probably come from it, are calculated to disturb the complacency of such Democrats as Mr Watterson, who still cherish the vain hope that their party is the party of reform. Mr. Randall's speeches at Cleveland and elsewhere, in which he defended high tariff duties, and of vocated the repeal of the internal revenue taxes and the distribution of the surplus revenue among the States, was some votes for Hoadly. So did the clever trick of the Democratic State Central Committee, who, by the distribution of circulars on the eve of the election, persuaded some wool-growers that John Sherman was a statesman of strong free-trade tendencies. These votes were dearly purchased. Democrats who are insisting that their party is a free-trade party were not pleased with the spectacle of Mr. Randall vociferating for protection in the iron and coal districts, while Mr Mc Donald was piping a weak treble for "tariff for revenue only" in the Miami Valley, and Mr Hoadly, leaving the manufacturing districts, was making petty-fogging protection speeches to the wool growers.

Is it surprising that a party so led makes few converts among young free-trade Republicans? The young men of the country who read the best books and do their own thinking have come to believe with Garfield that the great majority of the ablest writers on political economy favor the principles of free trade. They also believe that all our tariff legislation should tend in that direction. As Garfield expressed it in a speech delivered in Congress in 1870, they favor that sort of protection which ends in free trade, while they favor free trade which is to be reached through protection. The principles of Republican free-traders are based on the conviction that there is a moral wrong in any legislation which unnecessarily taxes the many for the benefit of the few, and that the plan that the general welfare demands that all consumers shall contribute to the profit and support of those who owe and work in the protected industries is unsound in morals and false in fact.

Whatever criticism may be made upon the Republican party, it must be conceded that when confronted with great issues it has manifested a capacity for generating within itself an amount of moral force which has resulted in the enactment of just and wise laws. Witness its solution of the grave problems which came with and after the war. It dealt with the war, with slavery, with the public debt, with the currency—in fact, with every question that touched the integrity or honor of the nation—as if it were the organized conscience of a Christian people. It is not a matter of surprise that such a party should win and hold so many men who, though exercising the largest liberty of criticism of their party's policy, are loath to ally themselves with a party led by such men as Tilden, Bayard, Randall, Thurman, Mc Donald, Hendricks, and Voorhees—leaders who have put their party on the wrong side of every question that has been before the country for twenty-five years. It is the honor and strength of the Republican party that it is mainly composed of men who think for themselves, and who compel obedience on the part of their leaders. These men demanded civil service reform, and many Republican Senators and Congressmen who secured at civil service reform three years ago are sounding its praises to-day. These leaders do not stop to inquire, nor do they care, what their followers may think, if they think at all. They are quite sure they will go wherever they are led, as they have been taught in times past. What hope is there for tariff reform, or any kind of reform, from such a party under such leadership? Is Watterson's platform palaver about "tariff for revenue only" in palaver and nothing more. Well meant it may be, but it has no force, for it has no backing.

There are some honest free trade Democrats, and there are some free trade Republicans equally honest. What assurance can Mr. Watterson or the Democratic party give a free-trade Republican that a Democratic Congress and a Democratic administration will enact and enforce free-trade laws? When in power, a few years ago, the Democrats showed neither inclination nor ability to take a step in the direction of free-trade or tariff reform. It became the duty of the succeeding Republican Congress to deal with the questions presented by our increasing surplus revenue, and it accepted the responsibility, and by means of the Tariff Commission and the law enacted by the last Congress made some progress in the right direction. And while it is true that free-trade Republicans are disposed to criticise that law with severity, they are not quite ready to transfer their allegiance to the Democratic party. Before doing so they wish to have some assurance that they are allying themselves with something better than "an organized appetite"—an appetite in the presence of which the question of what to do with our surplus revenue would become a "—— herren likelihy." Free-trade Republicans who see invited to join the Democratic party may prefer to wait and see what becomes of Mr Randall in the pending contest for the Speakership. What Democratic Congressman dare say that he will bolt the caucus nomination of Mr. Randall shall occur it? With what face can a free-trade Republican be asked to join the Democratic ranks and march under the leadership of such plate-glass and steel-rail protectionists as Randall, Voorhees, and Hendricks, while over in Ohio Democrats are chuckling over a victory which will most likely result in the election of Henry B. Payne, a strong protectionist, to the United States Senate, and which was won because the protected wool-growers were made to believe that the Democrats were protectionists and John Sherman a dangerous free-trader. The Democratic party must in some manifest a capacity for a bold and manly policy before it can reasonably expect recruits from a class of men who have faith in the ultimate success of same things because they believe them to be right. Judge Thurman, in speaking recently of Mr Pendleton's civil service law, said that if the Democrats came into power and got possession of the White House, he would be in favor of opening the doors and letting the boys in to warm their toes. Wh question whether there is a disposition on the part of Republican reformers to aid in bringing about such result.

Luther was accustomed to boast that he was a peasant's son, and that all his ancestors were peasants. He was born at Eisleben on the 10th of November, 1483, just four hundred years ago. His father was a poor miner, working with his pick in the copper mines of Mansfeld; his mother cut and carried wood to the small cottage where the reformer was born. It was a hard life upon which the young child was ushered; often his parents beat him for little faults; their tempers were harsh and severe. Yet no tender and loving was the heart of the great reformer that he remembered only their real kindness, and wept bitterly, like Mohammed, over his mother's grave. He was the oldest of seven children. His father sent him to school at Eisenach, and sometimes he sang carols from door to door to pay for the cost of his education.

Soon his powerful intellect, that was destined to influence all mankind, began to show its rare strength. Like Burns or Shakspeare, he rose as easy to notice. He was a musician, a poet, a rich scholar, a young man of pure and noble impulse, when he passed through the University of Erfurt with applause, and began to study law. His father had now grown wealthy, and was evidently anxious to see his gifted son rise to eminence and power. He would make him a lawyer. But suddenly a great change passed over the mind of the young student, and he fled forever from the allurements of the outer world. A friend, it is said, was killed at his side by a stroke of lightning, and the sight of death awoke Luther from his gay dream of pleasure. He vowed to St. Anne to become a monk. He entered as Augustinian monastery. His honest father opposed his sudden resolution. He thought it "a trick of the devil," and was evidently no firm believer in the conventual system. But Luther persevered, and with terrible penance and endless prayers, with whip, scourge, and sackcloth, strove to wash away his fancied sins and fit himself for another world. He little knew how much he was destined to do and suffer and enjoy in this.

Honest, fearless, enthusiastic, he went to Rome full of faith, and came back from the Holy City shocked and terrified by the enormities of the papal court. The sale of indulgences not long after aroused the conscience of Luther and all Germany. He spoke, and half Europe seemed to follow him. Convents were broken up, ancient rites abandoned, the whole world was transformed at Luther's powerful voice. History has no similar example of so swift a conversion of whole nations. The simple words of the honest German got to rout a host of errors. Saxony became his protector, all the people his friends. Soon Switzerland caught up the German sentiment of independence, and Zurich and afterward Geneva became the centres of Swiss nationalism and progress. The old Italian influence—and Zwingle had once been a pensioner of Rome—was thrown off forever. In Germany, Hesse and Würtemberg, Brunswick, Brandenburg, and Saxony, by the year 1529 had become openly Protestant. Then Denmark, Sweden, and Norway, next Holland and the Low Countries, secretly joined the German league for freedom of faith, so the face of the Inquisition and the edicts of despotic kings. France was stirred by a vain impulse of reform. Austria, Bohemia, and Poland followed. Spain was held in check forever, like France. Last came Saxon England and Saxonized Scotland to unite in faith and sympathy with their Continental relatives. And before he died, Luther, surrounded by deadly foes, must yet have seen with wonder and grateful joy nearly the whole Teutonic population of the north joined in a common sentiment of progress and reform.

So thoroughly was the Reformation a German movement that soon all the eminent reformers were driven to take refuge in the shelter of Germany, and in its towns and cities were forged the intellectual arms that ruined Europe from its feudal barbarism. Wittenberg, Strasburg, Geneva, Amsterdam, became the chief seats of Protestant influence, the shrines of powerful and contending sects. From France the reformers fled before the persecutions of Francis I; from Spain they were wholly extirpated; from Italy they came in crowds to Switzerland and the North, pursued by the Jesuits and the Inquisition. For a century the great heart of Germany formed the asylum of the oppressed. The reformers—founders of modern history—were not fanatics. Luther, Calvin, Knox, and Cranmer had much to learn. Fierce disputes raged between these great intellects. The world was shaken by their clamor. Some painful exhibitions of honest but ex wise enthusiasm, some cruel acts of intolerance, were the fruits of their early severity. Yet, compared to their persecutors, the first reformers seem singularly humane, and Germany received within its borders the fugitives of every land. The Latin races drove out the new opinions, the Teutonic cherished them. Germany, Scandinavia, Holland, England, resounded with the clamorous outcries of modern thought. Strasburg and Geneva, London and Copenhagen, Amsterdam, Leyden, Berlin, became the centres of the world's material and mental advance. The Gothic and German races rose to rare prosperity at the touch of Luther's genius; the Latin races, because they rejected his teachings, here for three centuries slumbered in dull reaction and decay.

His countrymen have not been as grateful, and no name is so honored among the Teutonic races as that of Luther, the peasant's son. He is studied with intense interest. The works that treat of his memory are numberless. In the British Museum six volumes of its index are devoted to Luther, only two each to Shakspeare and to Milton. Every noted act of his life has become a part of history, and is more memorable than a battle or a siege. His beggar songs at Eisenach, his visit to Rome, his conversion, and his faith have helped to guide the course of nations. He stands before the church door at Wittenberg (October 31, 1517) and nails fast the famous theses that were to begin a new era of thought. Modest, learned, uncompromising, he did what no other dared: he defied the covetous and cunning churchmen who would despoil his country. Next, in 1520, he burned the papal bull, and began the irrevocable conflict. He is summoned to appear before the princes, the priests, the Emperor of Germany. On the 16th of April, 1521, the reformer entered the ancient city of Worms, famous in German history and song, to defend himself and Germany against a spiritual and temporal tyranny. The countless hosts of Germans gazed at him with love and admiration from the high-ways and the house-tops as he passed along. On the 17th he began his defense before the crowded and hostile assembly of prelates, emperor, and Spaniards, the daggers of the German princes alone saved him from the malice of his foes. On the 18th he spoke with matchless eloquence on the rights of conscience and of humanity. "God be my help," he cried, "here I take my stand." He spoke for all future ages; he saved Germany; he created modern history.

He fled from Worms to hide for many months in the castle of Wartburg, and in his solitude his conflicts with Satan were fierce and terrible. He came out to live for twenty years at Wittenberg, to marry, to find happiness in his modest home, to labor with ceaseless energy in the cause of reform. His ponderous intellect moved incessantly, like some immense engine, pouring out no endless list of publications. The press was Luther's strong tower of defense; incessant toil, a cheerful nature, no intellect so vigorous as Aristotle's, were the human sources of his boundless influence. At length, in 1546, he died, at sixty three, peacefully and hopefully, the master intellect of the Teutonic race.

CHAPTER XXII

LADY CONSTANCE IN LONDON.

For all my eagerness, I did not get away from Framcombe so soon as I had expected. Much time was consumed in leisurely preliminaries and formalities, and it was not until the beginning of June that I reached London. Harry, with whom I had kept up a brisk correspondence during the intervening weeks, had good naturedly volunteered to look out for quarters for me, and had finally secured a set of rooms in Sloan Street, where I found him awaiting my arrival.

"I've turned over a new leaf, Charles," he said; "I've given up—some bad habits that I had fallen into, and I hope I shall have the strength of mind to keep clear of them now. You think it rather odd, perhaps, that a little tradesman should make such a difference in a man's life; but then you haven't been kicked and cuffed during very nearly twenty years."

"You won't be kicked and cuffed much longer," said I, hopefully.

He threw a quick glance of apprehension at me. "I do trust you haven't said anything about me in writing home," he exclaimed.

I replied that I had not done so—that I agreed with him in thinking that a favorable opportunity should be awaited, or created, for making the disclosure. I was wondering whether it would be at all possible to put Harry in the way of performing some deed of heroism, when he diverted the current of my ideas by asking me when I meant to call upon Lady Constance.

"I don't know—as soon as possible—to-morrow, perhaps," I replied. "When should I be most likely to find her at home, and alone?"

"Ah, when indeed? From what I hear, she is pretty constantly engaged. But you need not sigh so profoundly about that; one can talk just as well in a crowd as in a desert."

"Perhaps so," said I; "but at present I don't quite see how I am to find my way into the crowd. I know hardly anybody in London."

"Oh, you will get into society easily enough. Especially as young men have been at a premium since the declaration of war and the departure of the Guards. I got up early in the morning to see my old battalion march out," added Harry, in a low voice. "The fellow who commands it now was a subaltern in my day. Ah, well, I should like to have been going out with them."

"Why don't you go to the East?" I exclaimed, with a sudden inspiration. "Hy Jove! Harry, I believe it would be the very best thing that you could do. I wonder I didn't think of it before. You will never have such another chance of distinguishing yourself."

"As a full private, do you mean?" he asked, smiling. "Perhaps, if you knew as much of Tommy Atkins and his habits as I do, you wouldn't suggest that road to glory, even to a proscribed man. Also, I doubt whether the Medical Board would pass me."

"Well," said I, as willing to give up my idea, "I dare say it wouldn't be pleasant to enlist as a common soldier; but couldn't you get a commission in some irregular corps?"

"I can't fancy myself a Bashi-bazouk, and I am afraid those picturesque warriors are too likely to see much service. Besides, I am much obliged to you for the hint; but, all things considered, I think I will remain where I am, so as to be ready to defend my native shores in case of an invasion."

This levity disappointed me. It seemed to me that Harry should have been only too glad to carry a musket and bear the hardships of a campaign, if, by so doing, he could hope to wipe out the memory of the past. I said nothing, and presently he resumed, quite good-humouredly:

"I see you set me down as a coward. Well, consider me so, if you like; you have the right to believe me incapable of any virtue."

I could not help thinking that on recent occasions I had carried this particular form of plain speaking to the verge of abuse. "You know I did not mean to accuse you of being afraid of wounds or death," I answered; "only from what you said, I fancied you might be a little afraid of discomfort."

"But that would be a worse kind of cowardice, wouldn't it? However, we needn't discuss the point, and it is of no great consequence. If I had the courage of a lion and the fortitude of a martyr, I couldn't learn London just now. I have ties and occupations, like other men, though it would be rather inconvenient to me to mention exactly what they are. Lady Constance will tell you that I am a useful member of civil society in certain obscure nests."

With that he got up, saying that he must be off, but that he would look in upon me again one day or two, if I would allow him.

I assured him that he could not come too soon or too often. "Or shall I go and see you?" I asked.

"That would entail rather a long walk," answered Harry, laughing. "I am not a very swell who can afford to live in Sloan Street, as a member. At present I have lodgings down in Richmond; but I won't ask you to come and see me there, because I am generally in town all day; besides which, my abode is no fumble a one for you to be seen entering."

I could not, of course, insist, neither could I give expression to the thought which occurred to me then, as it had occurred several times before, that it was difficult to reconcile the apparent poverty with the fact, for which both my uncle and Mrs Farquhar had vouched, that Harry was in receipt of a liberal allowance. Whatever certain was that he was obliged to take refuge in the suburbs, while I was lodged in Belgrave, and his cheerful acquiescence in our respective destinies only made me the more determined to see justice done.

I did not see him again for more than a week. During that time I was busy familiarizing myself with my new duties, and leaving cards upon various friends, whom I thought it as well to acquaint with the fact that I was in London. Naturally, I lost no time in calling at Lady Constance's house in Hill Street, but I was not fortunate enough to find her at home, although I made three attempts, and it was only at the end of a week that I was rewarded by a formal invitation to dinner.

That evening my host honored with the company of a cabinet minister—a brisk, merry old gentleman, who arrived very late, apologizing for the bad cold which had prevented his wife from accompanying him. Notwithstanding this disappointment, which made us a lady short, and obliged me to descend the staircase all by myself in the tail of the procession, the party was a very pleasant and lively one. The dinner was excellent, as were also the wines. Lady Constance exerted herself more than usual to amuse her friends, and was undoubtedly successful in so doing, and if every body must know rather early, it was not because we had sat down late, and because many other entertainments were appointed to take place in the course of the evening.

I lingered after the rest of the guests, thinking myself entitled to venture upon that liberty, and as soon as the last of them had vanished, Lady Constance threw up her arms above her head and yawned so loudly that the footmen put the heavy pad in at the door, and, on being asked what he wanted, replied, looking rather foolish, that he had thought he heard a cry for help.

"He was not far wrong, poor man, if he had only known it," Lady Constance remarked, with a slight laugh. "I am drowning in an ocean of weariness, and nobody will hold on a hand to save me. Yes—thank you; I know you have a large hand and a strong arm, but I should only pull you in after me if I were to clutch it. I must endeavor to swim as long as my strength will hold out; after which, I shall go under, and nobody will miss me. So you have come at last."

"It hasn't been my fault that I have not come sooner," said I.

"Nor mine. I hope you will have the goodness to acknowledge that. And now that you are here, what do you think of it all? Wasn't Framcombe a great deal pleasanter?"

"I don't know," answered I, "I never think of whether places are pleasant or unpleasant in themselves now. There are the places where you are, and there are the places where you are not; that is all."

"I wish this was one of the places where I was not," said Lady Constance, with another yawn. "Did you ever in all your life meet with such a set of insufferable bores as we had here this evening?"

"I must confess," [illegible] them very amusing."

* Begun in Harper's Weekly No. 1391.

"And I found them as stupid as owls. It is bad taste to speak against one's own couple; but I must say that I think the stupidity of the English people is only equalled by their sanctimonious self-complacency. Whoever can make the stuff that is published every morning in the form of leading articles, one doesn't know whether to laugh or to hide one's head. Because we set up a glass house in Hyde Park three years ago, and chose to play at universal peace, we are overcome with righteous indignation when we find that, after all, the Millennium hasn't begun yet, and that people still continue to throw stones. It is agreed by all thoughtful British merchants that war is an anachronism, and therefore it follows that the Emperor of Russia has provoked the present war, and that he ought to be denounced as the enemy of the human race. Yet Russia must have Constantinople some day, and England must have Egypt: these are geographical necessities, as any one may see by looking at the map. But it would never do to recognize the truth, so we join in an absurd expedition, which we shall be very lucky if we escape from without a crushing defeat, and in the mean time, by way of showing that war is an outrage upon civilization for which we were utterly unprepared, we send out an army that isn't fit to take the field, and allow it to starve."

"We shall lick the Russians, all the same," said I.

"How do you know? I don't think we shall, and I see better acquainted with Russia than you are. Anyhow, I must be allowed to relieve my feelings by abusing those people, who are mere infuriating in private life than they are in public. After all, I see as Irish woman, see an Anglo-Saxon; so I have a right to despise them and their hypocrisy and humbug. I do despise them from my heart; but, for all that, I am ruining myself in purse and patience by trying to become a social power amongst them, and hastily a day passes that I don't stoop to flatter some foolish old woman in order to get asked to her parties. How do you account for that, now?"

I shook my head, not having an explanation ready.

"The game is not worth the candle," she went on. "I know that perfectly well; yet I can't resist playing it. I often wonder why I should take such pains to secure what I don't want, and don't care much about when I get it—if I ever do get it."

"Well," I said, "I suppose it is the pursuit that you enjoy. There is no grander sport than riding after a fox, but one doesn't want to carry his body home, one doesn't even care much about his brush."

"Really," said Lady Constance, "you have gleams of intelligence. I think I will stay at home and talk to you for a little, instead of going on to a ball. Now tell me—hate you requested of coming to London on?"

"No," I answered, "who should I repeat? I came to London to be near you—and here I am."

She laughed a little at this succinct reply, and presently I remarked, "What a pretty house you have got!"

"Oh yes," she answered, carelessly. "I me in funds just now, you see, thanks to your friend Chapman. His information turned out to be most timely, and I believe he has profited by it, though not, of course, to the same extent that I have. He tells me, however, that he has been able to pay some outstanding bills."

"You often see him, don't you?" I asked, wondering whether she had any suspicion of Harry's identity.

"Not very often, but oftener than I like, for I still think him a rather despicable little person in a certain sense, though, I am under obligations to him, and since it seems to give him pleasure to be admitted into the house, I don't need him away. When he comes, he generally talks about you, and passes you up to the skies. Have you paid him to blow your trumpet?"

I said I believed he was mainly attached to me.

"He may be. Indeed, I think he must be," Lady Constance agreed, "for the other day, when he said how kind you had been to him, his eyes became quite watery. Of course that may have been only the effect of drink, though."

"He has given up drink; he told me on himself," I said.

"That, perhaps, is not absolutely convincing proof of the fact. Still, I dare say he is your friend—or means to be so." And then a peculiar smile overspread Lady Constance's face, and lingered there as long that at last I asked her what she was laughing at.

"I was only thinking of some things that he said," she replied. "I believe he imagines that I might be induced to marry you, and he is evidently very desirous of bringing about this suitable match. What he expects to gain by it I don't know, but his wishes are clear, and he shows his appreciation of the qualities that are likely to weigh with me by dwelling constantly upon your prospect of coming into a nice property eventually."

I was half touched by this evidence of Harry's good-will, half vexed to hear it spoken of so jestingly, and wholly embarrassed by the prohibition which he had laid upon me, and which prevented me from doing him justice. I said nothing, and Lady Constance went on:

"You are not a very dutiful nephew. Why have you not been to see that indulgent uncle of yours?"

I explained that it had hitherto been impossible for me to leave London, but that I should certainly run down to Norfolk as soon as the exigencies of the public service permitted of my absenting myself for a few days.

I had, indeed, written to Thirlby in this effect, and had received my uncle's assurance in return that he quite understood how I was situated. What I had not received, and what I had for a long time been impatiently awaiting, was a letter from George. I could only suppose that gentleman had once more asserted its usual nice impulse, and that he had not written simply because he had nothing of importance to write about. Whether, when he did make up his mind to speak, Maud would accept him or not seemed very doubtful. I could not quite bring myself to wish that she should do that, yet I felt that I would almost rather hear of her engagement to George than be kept much longer in suspense. I don't know what association of ideas prompted me to ask Lady Constance suddenly whether she had seen any more of Mr. Sotheran.

"I see him every day of my life," she answered, with something between a laugh and a groan. "There is a malish obstinacy about that man which would have raised him into high places if only it had been a little better directed. By-the-bye, did I tell you that he had honored me with an offer of marriage?"

"You have never told me," I exclaimed, my heart coming up into my mouth. "Have you refused him, then?"

"Oh yes, but he appeared to take that quite as a matter of course. I knew he would. Otherwise, perhaps—"

She did not finish her sentence, and presently I said, "I wish you would tell me whether you really mean to marry a man whom you dislike and despise."

"How you I tell you what I don't know myself?" she returned. "My fate must be decided by circumstances, not by my own will. Now go away, please, and when you next come here try to avoid offensive subjects."

CHAPTER XXIII

I MEASURE THE DEVIL.

One day in a moment of confidential despondency I told Harry that I felt sure that Lady Constance would end by marrying the odious Sotheran—a prophecy which made him look grave for a minute, but which he presently assured me would never be fulfilled without my connivance.

"Why, what can I do?" I asked, despairingly; "what influence have I with her? I am utterly powerless; I can only stand and look on, though I would cut off my right hand rather than such a horrible thing should happen."

Harry smiled, and said he didn't think that there was any need for such alarming sacrifices. "As far as I understand the case, you have only to lift up your little finger, instead of chopping off your hand. Would you mind if I spoke in plain language about Lady Constance?"

I said, "Not in the least."

"Well, then, I presume we may take it for granted that, if she marries at all, it will be because she is so hard up that she can't get on without more money."

I nodded, and Harry continued, "Very well. I presume we may also take it that she would rather marry you than Sotheran, supposing that you could see your way to supporting her."

"Yes," I assented; "she told me so herself once. But if you are going to say that I am no uncle's help, I can only request to say that I am one that, and will never consent to be that."

"Not even to save Lady Constance from Mr. Sotheran?" asked Harry, with that faint ironical smile of his.

"Look here, Harry," I rejoined, with some heat, "Lady Constance put that same question to me one day at Thirlby Parsonage. I don't know whether she meant it—perhaps she didn't. But for the moment I thought she did, and almost hated her. Please never say that again. It's a temptation—it's a temptation that I might yield to perhaps; for I are such a helpless wretch where she is concerned. But I know very well that, if I ever did yield to it, I should be t have another moment of happiness for the rest of my life."

"All right, old fellow," said Harry, looking rather surprised. "I didn't know you had such a strong feeling about it. The unfortunate thing is that, as I have told you many times already, my father will never leave Thirlby to me, and so you will have Lady Constance and gain nothing, except the approval of an misguided conscience. I should have liked to see you two married, because you have both been friends to me, and because I think you both wish it now; but if you won't, you won't, and I suppose it will be all the same ten years hence."

"You agree with me, then, that she will marry Sotheran," said I, miserably. He shrugged his shoulders. "Well, I am bound to say that it looks like it. She is living at a deuce of a pace, and it isn't every day that one can count upon doing a good stroke of business in the City. All I can answer for is that she won't marry him if she can help it, and that you know already."

For some time after this conversation the devil was at my elbow. When I met Lady Constance in society, as often did, when I saw her riding in the Row, with Mr. Sotheran jogging along on a fat gray cob beside her, when I was lying awake at night trying to persuade myself what my life would be after all that made it worth having had been taken out of it, I could not help asking me, self whether it wouldn't be a very simple thing to hold my tongue. "Your uncle is in possession of his faculties," urged the devil; "he knows all the circumstances as well as you do, if not better. Why should you attempt to influence him against his better judgment? Besides, it seems very much as if you would have to choose between injuring one of two persons, and which of those two do you love the most?"

To me rose from these torments, I resolved at last to go home and disclose the truth, whether Harry liked it or not. I said nothing to him of my intention, but merely wrote a line to my uncle announcing that I was coming down for a day or two, and departed.

It was evening when I reached my journey's end, and climbed into the dog cart, which had been sent to the station for me. The red sun was sinking in the west, and converting Thirlby Broad into a sheet of flame, just as he had done two years before, when I had surprised Maud sitting in the punt among the reeds. In the quiet peacefulness of the landscape, in the soft whispering of the bullet fields, in the silent stillness of the woods, showing black against the fiery sky, in all the familiar features of the broad and pleasant acres which I had come down to renounce, there was, to my fancy, something of a gentle reproach. "We are unchanged," they seemed to say; "but who and what are you? and what have you done with our old friend Charley Maxwell?" Ah! what indeed?

When I drew near the edge of the Broad I saw, bending over the water, a figure clad in brown velveteens which three was no mistaking. I hauled the reins to the groom, told him to drive on, and jumped down to seek a change of thought in the conversation of old Jim Bence. Bence had just hauled in his net, full of silvery little bream, and was picking them out of the meshes. He scrubbed his wet hand violently upon his trousers before he would take mine, which I held out to him.

"Well, now," he said, "this do put heart into a man! Oh'y this mornin' I says to Squire, 'Look 'ee here, sir,' I says, 'if we don't get Mr. Chawls home now, what's the good of or bein' a boindar?' I says. And Squire he laughs, and says he, 'You've very impotent, Bence,' says he. But, Lord bless ye! soon as ever I seed his face I knowed you was comin'. Better late than never, and better now than last week! When the cat's away, the mice 'll play, as they say. Dear, dear! what a age them cats do reach, to be sure! Talk about men lives!—why, you might as well say ninety, and ha' done with it!"

"Do you mean that Mrs. Farquhar is away?" I asked, guessing to whom this elegant metaphor referred.

"Ah!" answered Bence, nodding several times, and drawing his hand across his chin, which gave forth a rasping sound. "Gone off to Scotland for change of air. 'Ain't you heard?"

I said, "No."

"She've got bombagee, that's what's wrong with she," Bence continued, in a tone of undisguised satisfaction, "and I know what bombagee is. Lord! I've seen folks in their beds with it for six weeks, and couldn't move hand nor foot without screechin' the whole blessed time. She 'ain't got so bad as that—not yet, but, come to her time o' life, she didn't owt to expect for to get rid of it no more. I never heard tell of any one as died o' the huntagee, though," added Bence, reflectively, "but there' it don't do to question the ways o' Providence, as my old mammy says. Mashup we couldn't work things much better ourselves. So you've had enough o' furrin parts at last, Mr Chawls?"

"Yes," I said, "I'm settled in London now."

Bence grunted, and observed that he didn't hold much with London, but that it was better than Germany, anyhow.

In order to effect a change of subject, I remarked that Bence's old regiment had been sent to the East, and that, as I had expected, started him on a succession of reminiscences which lasted until we reached the house, whither he accompanied me. Entering the back door, we encountered Cooper and Peters and many other old friends, all of whom were as kind in their welcome of me, and had so many questions to ask, that it was a good half-hour before I could get away from them, and pass into the quieter regions of the house in search of my uncle.

I found the dear old fellow sitting in his library, surrounded by open books, and looking more like himself than he had done some the mid-day when Mrs. Farquhar descended upon him from the North to worry his life out. "Well, Charles," he said, quietly, looking up at me with a great kindness in his eyes; and then I forgot all about Harry, all about Lady Constance, and all about the follies and fatalities that separated me from the old days that could never come back any more. I sat down beside him in the same ancient leather-covered chair that I had been used to sit in long ago, when he patiently taught me the Latin grammar before I went to school—I sat down beside him there, as of old, and we had a good long talk.

I have always been a very poor letter-writer. My uncle, on the other hand, was an admirable correspondent of the old fashioned type, but he had me precisely the gift which some people possess of talking upon paper; and therefore when we met we had a great deal to say to each other which was not of the smallest importance or interest to any one but ourselves. Important and disagreeable topics might very well be postponed until a later period of the evening, I thought, but in truth I scarcely thought of them at all as to the sound of the dinner bell caused my uncle to remark. "By-the-way, Dennison said he would come in to dinner. He is all by himself just now." And then he added, "You know that my mother left for Scotland a day or two ago?"

"Yes," I said; "Bence told me. Long may she remain upon her native heath!" My uncle smiled, and observed soothingly that a little change was always a good thing, but did not meet to my further proposition that more change was a better thing, and permanent change best of all. "My mother is fond of affirming that all troubles are blessings in disguise," he said, and I am inclined to think that she is right, though I don't so please that you and Tom could be brought to admit it."

I went upstairs, thinking to myself that Mrs. Farquhar was the most successfully disguised blessing I had ever encountered, and wishing that I could see any way of applying her theory to my own mishaps. Upon the whole, it seemed more easy to derive comfort from Harry's philosophical conviction that "it would be all the same ten years hence."

We dined in the library for the sake of old times, and, as the Rector said, were "as jolly as three school-boys out on a spree." He himself was overflowing with the genial jollity which a good dinner and a good conscience engender, and in listening to his rambling discourses I almost forgot that I was one at Thirlby for the purpose of catching fish or shooting down the rabbits. Unfortunately, as it was Saturday night, he was obliged to leave early, in order to brush up his sermon for the morrow, and this left me without any excuse for postponing my self-imposed task. I didn't want to spoil a pleasant evening, but there was no help for it. The thing had to be done, and not seeing how the subject was to be led up to, I attacked it without preface as soon as my uncle and I were left together.

"Uncle Bernard," said I, "I wanted to tell you that I have seen Harry."

His face changed at once. His lips became compressed, the fine lines about the corners of his mouth deepened, and he straightened himself a little at his chair. But all he said was "Oh!" in rather a chilling tone.

"We met at Frannenhube," I went on, "and since then I have seen a good deal of him. I didn't write to you about it, because he wanted me to keep it secret, but—"

"To keep what secret?" asked my uncle.

"Well, the fact of not having met. It was be the merest chance that we did meet, and as he was in a sort of way entitled to impose conditions, you see."

"Did you recognize him by his name or by his features?"

"I didn't recognize him at all," answered I, thinking that the question of name had better not be entered into, he told me who he was."

"I should have thought that nothing compelled him to do that. So you believe that your meeting was the result of mere chance?"

"I am sure of it," I answered. "What else could it be? You don't mean to suggest that he went out to Frannenhube on purpose to make my acquaintance?"

"Experience has made me suspicious," my uncle said, with a sigh. "Well, what does he want?"

"He doesn't want anything," I answered; "it is I who want you to give him another chance. He has said all along that it wouldn't be the least use speaking to you, but I thought I knew you better than he did. Hasn't he been punished enough? I quite understand that you don't mean to punish him, and that you only disinherited him because you thought it was your duty, and—and all that, but as a matter of fact it is a punishment, and a severe one. Don't you think we should all be much happier if it were put on end to it?"

"I believe," said my uncle, "that I gave you my reasons ten years ago for acting as I have done. You have told me nothing as yet that should make them seem less cogent."

"I know I haven't," I acknowledged, "but I don't think it is quite a case for cold reasoning. I want you as how Harry down here. If you were to see him, I am sure it would be all right."

"I can't consent to see him."

"Why not? You are fighting against yourself all this time. You are so determined to be just that you will commit a cruel injustice rather than do the natural thing, which is, after all, the right thing. Your reason for refusing to see him is that you are afraid of yielding."

My uncle shook his head. "You either do not understand the point at issue or you shut your eyes to it. Dennison, who at one time thought much as you do, used to attack me continually with arguments which had no bearing upon the question, and if he had quoted the parable of the Prodigal Son to me once, I suppose he must have quoted it a hundred times. It was impossible to convince him that such talk was wholly irrelevant. I don't want to go over again all that I said to you before about Harry, but I will just put the case before you baldly and distinctly. What you ask for him, and what I think I may assume he asks for himself, is not that he should be forgiven, but that he should be reinstated. I refuse to reinstate him, simply because I can not. I can't make the county receive him, and he has done nothing to show himself worthy of being received. You say his punishment is a heavy one. I admit that it is so; but I maintain that it is not inside."

"If people wouldn't receive him for his own sake, they would receive him for yours," I urged. "and as for his not having shown himself worthy, what opportunity has he had of doing that?"

"We shall do no good by discussing this, Charley," said my uncle, with a quiet smile. "I give you every credit for a generous intention, but I can only say to you, as I have had to say to others, that you are dealing with a subject which I have pondered much longer and more deeply than you have, and that you can't bring forward a single plea that will be new to me."

"It seems a great pity," I said. "Harry is really a good fellow, if you would only believe it, and he didn't send me down here to plead for him, though I know you think he did."

My uncle did not defend himself from this charge. He remained silent; after [illegible] am I asked, "Is [illegible] no one of sending you to alter your [illegible]?"

"I think I remember telling you," replied my uncle, "that there are two considerable events which might cause me to alter my mind—or at least me will, which is, perhaps, more to the purpose. He might marry and have children, or he might make some public distinction. I have of nothing else that would move me. My [illegible] ing him certainly would not."

"You are very hard upon him, I exclaimed.

I suppose I must appear to be so. [illegible] theless, I can only repeat that I don't believe

It was evident that persistence would be useless, and after one very unsuccessful and constrained attempt at small-talk we both went off to bed. DR. TOBIAS'S VENETIAN LINIMENT

Has given universal satisfaction during the thirty-five years it has been introduced to the United States. After being tried by millions, it has been proclaimed THE PAIN DESTROYER OF THE WORLD.

Pain cannot be where this Liniment is used. If used as directed, it cannot and never has failed in a single instance. As an external remedy in cases of Chronic Rheumatism, Headache, Toothache, Chapped Hands, Bruises, Stings of Insects, Mosquito Bites, Pains in the Limbs, Back, and Chest, Cuts, Burns, Sprains, Stiffness of the Joints, and Contraction of the Muscles, its wonderful curative powers are miraculous. Taken internally in cases of Sick Headache, Bowel Complaints, Cholera, Dysentery, Colic, Vomiting, Sea-sickness, and Dyspepsia, its soothing and penetrating qualities are felt as soon as taken. Sold by the Druggists at 25 and 50cts. per bottle. The family medicine to be used among us. Dr. Tobias's Horse Liniment. Depot, 43 Barclay St.—[Adv.]

A CLERGYMAN'S CURE.

The Rev. E. J. Gharar, Presiding Elder of the U. B. Church at New Haven, W. Va., writes that he had been a sufferer from dyspepsia for twenty years, when he was advised to try AYER'S SARSAPARILLA as a remedy for it. He did so, obtained relief before he had used half of the first bottle, continued taking it, and, when he had used three bottles, found himself completely cured of the harrowing disease. This was after he had, unavailingly, tried many other remedies, and had the treatment of many leading physicians.

AYER'S SARSAPARILLA

Is the most perfect blood-purifier known to medical science. It
Purifies blood corrupted by Hereditary Scrofula, poisoned by Mercury, or tainted by the acquisita of Diphtheria, Scarlet Fever, and other Contagious Diseases;
Exhilarates from the blood the germs of disease engendered by carelessness in living, and by disorder of the digestive functions;
Invigorates the system, enriches impoverished blood, re-establishes the harmonious working of all the machinery of life; and Cures all maladies resultant from vitiation of the blood, the most fruitful cause of disease.

Anthony Trollope's AUTOBIOGRAPHY.
AN AUTOBIOGRAPHY. By Anthony Trollope. With a Portrait. Library Edition, 12mo, Cloth, $1 25. Also, 4to, Paper, 15 cents.

It is most interesting and delightful reading. If Trollope kept his secrets with friends and acquaintance while he lived, he has been absolutely conserved in this posthumous confession. The style is, of course, unmistakably his own, even to the mannerisms which we begin to like now that we have lost him, and the fulness of his self-analysis, with the candid opinions he expresses as to his work, give some such personal charm to the narrative as lens immortalized Boswell's "Life of Johnson." Carried on and terminating from chapter to chapter, as can almost imagine that we are once more chatting with the man, while in agreeable contrast with other biographical works which have recently entered a doubtful notoriety, there is nothing at all to tell long that is unpleasantly personal.—London Times

Twin Foes to Life

Are Indigestion and Constipation. Their primary symptoms are among the most distressing of minor human ailments, and a host of diseases, speedily resultant from them, mutually aggravate each other and assail at once the whole machinery of life. Nausea, Foul Breath, Sour Stomach, Dizziness, Headaches, Bilious Fever, Jaundice, Dyspepsia, Kidney Diseases, Piles, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Dropsy, and various Skin Disorders, are among the symptoms and maladies caused by derangement of of the stomach and bowels.

A Thorough Purgative medicine is the first necessity for cure. Then the cathartic effect must be maintained, in a mild degree, just sufficient to prevent a recurrence of costiveness, and at the same time the liver, kidneys and stomach must be stimulated and strengthened.

Ayer's Pills

Accomplish this restorative work better than any other medicine. They are searching and thorough, yet mild, in their purgative action. They do not gripe the patient, and do not induce a costive reaction, as is the effect of other cathartics. Withal, they possess special properties, diuretic, hepatic and tonic, of the highest medicinal value and

Absolutely Cure

All diseases proceeding from disorder of the digestive and assimilatory organs. The prompt use of AYER'S PILLS to correct the first indications of costiveness, averts the serious illnesses which neglect of that condition would inevitably induce. All irregularities in the action of the bowels — looseness as well as constipation — are beneficially controlled by AYER'S PILLS, and for the stimulation of digestive organs weakened by long-continued dyspepsia, one or two of AYER'S PILLS daily, after dinner, will do more good than anything else.

Leading Physicians Concede

That AYER'S PILLS are the best of all cathartic medicines, and many practitioners, of the highest standing, customarily prescribe them.

great bitterness. The attack was, of course, intended to injure Mr. Evarts in the pending election, and was an uncalled-for interference with elections which is happily very unusual in this country. It, however, it should become common, if clergymen or clergymen should engage during election contests in opposing and advocating candidates upon sectarian grounds, the violence of odd religious disputes would be aroused, and the situation would soon become intolerable. Bishop McQUAID, on a citizen of New York, ought to remember that to introduce sectarian controversies into political debates, however artfully it may be done, is wantonly to promote public disturbances, and to invite the severe condemnation of all intelligent and patriotic citizens.

There is but one plea to be urged for such a course, and that is that the man who takes it is convinced that religious differences should be submitted to party judgment at the polls. This opinion, honestly held, would acquit a man of insincerity, while it would convict him of incredible want of common-sense and common humanity, and an absolute infidelity to the fundamental American principle of civil and religious liberty. In preaching such a debate on this question involves, Bishop McQUAID seems to us to show neither sagacity as an ecclesiastic nor patriotism as a citizen.

HENRY IRVING.

THERE was no doubt of the impression produced by Mr. HENRY IRVING upon his first appearance in this country. It was that of a consummate master of his art, of a trained and resolute ability to overcome even natural obstacles, and to extort an almost protesting admiration. That the effect of his acting was very great is undeniable, and it was the more striking that it was achieved in a melodrama of accumulating horrors in which the whole weight and interest are sustained by himself.

It is, indeed, always fair to assume that a man does not rise to the chief position in his profession without unusual gifts. There may be characteristics and qualities which are not universally acceptable, but there must be a commanding force which is undeniable. This is especially true of the theatre, because the canons of criticism upon acting are undefined. As with oratory, the most simple and colloquial style and the most elaborate and artificial are vindicated by the genius of the actor.

In the influence and perfection of the stage machinery, and of the accessories and appointments, Mr. IRVING's drama will suggest WAGNER's opera. His idea of proper histrionic effect is an ensemble. Acting is largely a realistic art, and when the interpreter transfers the arena from a reading-desk to the stage, he invokes new conditions, the reason and force of which he must thoroughly master. In a hall, seated at a table, Mrs. KEMBLE, by modulation of voice and subtle suggestion of memory, sets common the persons of As You Like It. But if the drama is to be represented, the forest of Arden must be seen by something else than the mind's eye. This principle, carried out fully and logically, is the principle of Mr. IRVING, the scenic, however, dominated always by an imperious and adequate personality. Every one must wish well to such artistic skill, fidelity, and comprehension.

LORD LORNE LEAVES CANADA.

LORD LORNE and the Princess LOUISE have gone from Canada, and are probably heartily glad that their exile is over. The Princess has evidently never liked Canada, and the unfortunate accident which befell her these two years ago can not have propitiated her regard. The appointment was a piece of the BEACONSFIELD pyrotechnical statesmanship, the tawdry ornamentation of which intelligent Englishmen who then thought DISRAELI an "educed clever" must be now a little ashamed.

If Lord LORNE had not been a quiet and sensible gentleman, who was content to fill a perfunctory place as head of the government, but had conducted himself in the BEACONSFIELD spirit and fashion, he might have made a great deal of mischief. "Showy" and "dashing" and "brilliant" statesmanship, especially when undertaken for personal or party aggrandizement, in dangerous statesmanship. BEACONSFIELD was praised as the savior of British prestige. But much of his work is already undone. England under BEACONSFIELD is already like a story of John Bull in the hands of CAGLIOSTRO, and the contemporary caricatures in Punch throughout his long career are still the shrewdest and best comments upon the clever politician.

Lord LORNE has been apparently a satisfactory Governor, and leaves with the good wishes of Canada. But doubtless the country would prefer that the old way be followed hereafter, and that the experiment of royalty in the province be not tried again. It may be true, as BEACONSFIELD believed, that Englishmen in the provinces like to be humbugged, but the particular humbug of a second-hand royalty they have certainly outgrown.

RATS VERSUS THE CAT.

THE Cincinnati Enquirer, a Democratic paper in Ohio, has latterly opposed Mr. PENDLETON for his advocacy of administrative reform, and objects to the expense of the Commission as adding to the public burdens. The Poughkeepsie Eagle, a Republican paper in New York, attacks the Democratic party in this State for entailing a similar expense upon the tax-payers. As a shrewd cattle well says, the rats object to the master's feeding a cat.

A little reflection would show the Eagle that the necessary tendency of the spoils system is to the multiplication of offices and emoluments. GARFIELD pointed this out, and the records of the service are full of the proof. A committee of experts reported that in some divisions of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, at Washington, the force was sometimes twice and sometimes three times as large as was necessary, and they recommended that half of the whole force employed should be dismissed, and evading the plain conclusion that the extravagance was due to the system of appointment by political favoritism. The JAY commission of inquiry at the Custom-house in New York recommended that one-fifth of the persons employed be dismissed. Their view of the cause of the situation was the same.

The money paid to the physician by a hard-working man is not wasted. It is returned to him and his family a hundredfold. The small expense to the public Treasury of the State Commission will be returned in the same way. Republicans may honestly hold that on a reform party the Democratic is less promising than the Republican; but to attack it as passing the reform bill in New York, and the Democratic Governor for signing it, is to imply that Republican arguments or Republican vote were ashamed.

A GLIMPSE BEHIND THE SCENES.

A CAREFUL and detailed account of the political situation in Maryland will be found upon another page, written by a person who is thoroughly familiar with the secret and dark ways of Democratic politics in that State. Maryland has been so long held firmly in the Democratic vise that it is well to study this article, and to reflect that this is the kind of domination to which that party hopes to subject the country.

Wherever an effort is made within the Democratic party to change this system, it is speedily crushed. In Ohio the mere identification of his name with reform has fatally injured Mr. PENDLETON with his party. In New York the party depends for success upon the favor of JOHN KELLY. In Massachusetts its effort of a few years since for reform ended in the supreme dictatorship of BUTLER. In Maryland Governor HAMILTON has been ostracized because he ventured to denounce Democratic dishonesty.

The article is an interesting and valuable chapter in current political history.

MR. MATTHEW ARNOLD ON NUMBERS.

MR. MATTHEW ARNOLD is a man whose words are worth hearing. In the highest sense he is a critic, a man who looks at human society with shrewd insight and sympathy, and with great familiarity with human experience and thought as recorded in literature. The disposition to "nag" such a man because he has said some things about this country which are not agreeable, and which were said abstractly and without personal observation, is amusing, but not especially creditable. It is a sign of that peculiar sensitiveness which was so malignant with Mrs. TROLLOPE that it went far to justify her taunts.

Mr. ARNOLD's lecture upon Numbers was a plea for the toleration of the minority, and against the doctrine that the majority, as a majority, must be right. The rule of the majority is a convenient and necessary device, as an alternative of brute force. When argument is exhausted, and a decision must be made, the majority shows simply the preponderance, not the correctness, of opinion, and it may often appear that the majority decided wrong.

There is no magic, but a possibly dangerous deception, in numbers. This Mr. ARNOLD pointed out with that clearness and charm of style and richness of illustration which belong to him. His word, indeed, was no friendly, and of much the same import, as that of Lord COLERIDGE at the Academy of Music. Size is not in itself a virtue, said the Chief Justice. Numbers are not inspired, said Mr ARNOLD. Doubtless Mr. ARNOLD's experience at Chickering Hall, which is a much larger room than those to which he is accustomed, will show him the necessity of a louder tone, for no hearer would willingly miss any part of the discourse of one of the great living masters of the English language.

PERSONAL.

The present rage for yellow gowns and other yellow articles of dress leads an esteemed correspondent of this journal to observe that ladies who are indulging in the mazy might remember that the women whom Rembrandt and other masters have given to the world in yellow gowns and yellow locks do not change their complexions. Everything is permanent in those fine old portraits, once in harmony with its surroundings, a face is always in harmony. But a living woman's complexion is of various shades at various times, and sometimes does not harmonize at all with fashionable Mandarin yellow.

—An accomplished woman, whose rather life was spent as a missionary in Africa, tells this story: "A Zulu chief, with six or eight wives, was invited to embrace Christianity. After ascertaining the range of Christian precepts to the extent of his ability, he asked if the Bible expressly asserted that a man should have but one wife. The missionary was compelled to confess that his sacred book did not contain any injunction in so many words, adding, however, that Christians practiced monogamy for very good reasons of their own. "I think they are right," replied the tawny son of Africa, "it makes more peace in a house to have only one wife." His conversion to Christianity was soon consummated.

—Some Oxford dons were discussing the sex of George Fleming, author of the novel Kismet, and step-daughter of Mr. ERNEST RENAN, of Rome. They decided that certain passages in that work could have been written only by a man, and, in order to be confirmed in their opinion, they sent an invitation to dinner to the writer through her publishers. At the appointed time she floated into the room, a sweet and charming vision in claret silk and luxuriant blonde tresses.

—A distinguished editor and author of this city remarked the other day that last winter he never spent a single evening at any social gathering or place of amusement outside of his own house. He was too busy, and most nights he worked in his library till ten o'clock in the morning.

—After achieving the incomparable success that attended his first appearance in this country, Mr HENRY IRVING is not likely to restrain himself to commonplaceness by heeding the injunctions of those unmusical critics who affect to despise what they call his idiosyncrasies. It is melancholy to consider what an actor of his singularly ripened genius would become should he put himself through a course of newspaper dramatic training.

—A New York merchant relates an incident concerning the last hours of Margaret Fuller, who perished at sea, not far from Fire Island. His summer residence at that time was on the Long Island shore, and after the wreck of the ill-fated vessel, a passenger who had been washed ashore said: "The last I saw of Margaret Fuller she was standing on the deck just before the ship went down, her baby in her arms, her husband at her side, and her hand upon the head of a beautiful Italian girl, who, kneeling beside them, commanded the cruel tide that was to prevent her from being buried in consecrated ground. 'But,' said Margaret Fuller, 'you believe in prayer; my poor prayers, and everything will come right.'" A few hours after hearing the incident, the merchant instituted a search for the body of the Italian girl, and found it wrapped in a sea-cloak, the right hand grasping firmly the beads that she had piously counted. He caused her to be buried with the ceremonies of her Church, in a plot of land specially set apart for the purpose, and Margaret Fuller's prediction was fulfilled.

—Mr. SAMUEL HOSLEY, M.P., agrees with JOHN WESLEY that an idle Church is a dishonorable Church, and does not believe "in resting merely upon the doings of the pulpit, for the world would thus never be converted. I rather look for a large accession of the lay element, particularly of woman's service in its unobtrusive yet powerful form."

—One of the charming features of the Christmas HARPER's will be a Christmas poem, "The Kingdom of the Child," by Mrs. FRANCES L. MACE, to which Mrs. JESSIE C. SHARPLESS adds one of her delightful pictures of children. Mrs MACE, who lives in Portland, Maine, is not a lately known as a poet because she has published no volume of verse; but she has contributed to HARPER's MAGAZINE within the last few years several poems which reach a very high mark.

—It is said to be very noticeable how the politics of the poor who have new politics at all consist of ideas bearing on the practicability of getting at the wealth of "the upper classes." The first glimmering of political interest among thousands of people takes just this form of rapacious greed.

—In Southern Russia, when a cow dies of the plague, its owner is compelled under heavy penalties to take the dead animal to a public crematory, together with the refuse and fodder of the infected stable. Both the cattle plague and diphtheria are permanently established in that country.

—The Vegetarian Society, which consists of men who eschew meat, has issued from Manchester its thirty-sixth annual address, in which it sends hearty greetings and earnest thanks to all parts of the globe where vegetarians are assembled. "We can say that as usual we progress. We are advancing on the whole line."

—The annual "lion sermon" was preached in a London church on the 19th of October. The service originated two hundred and fifty years ago, when the Lord Mayor was suddenly confronted by a lion while travelling in the East. Being unarmed, the distinguished civilian fell upon his knees and prayed for deliverance; whereupon the beast eyed him calmly, and left him peaceably. The Lord Mayor resolved to commemorate his escape by bequeathing a sum of money for such an annual service, and this year the preacher's text was "The lions do lack and suffer hunger, but they that seek the Lord shall not want any good thing."

—The Paris burglar is said to prefer music to the drama, and often to be a member of the claque at opera bouffe, sometimes being able to whistle the Mascotte from the first note to the last. He finds little difficulty in wheedling the average concierge, who, though lonesse, is lazy, careless, and saucy.

—In the Hungarian dance called the Csardas each couple dances apart, and scarcely moves from its position. The gentleman holds his partner with both hands by the wrists, turns her rapidly around, and finally lets her go, when they dance face to face. The music is slow at first, but becomes faster and faster. On the last public occasion that the Emperor of Austria saw this dance he said to the crowd in the ball-room, "I thank you very much; these have been delightful days, which I shall ever remember with pleasure."

—At the annual meeting of the Evangelical Alliance, in Norwich, England, the Rev J H SHARPSTONE created some interest by announcing that he was not altogether orthodox either in his younger days as a Quaker or in his present days as a Churchman. To a certain extent he hated orthodoxy, "for it is often a parasitic plant that grows on the vitals of Christianity."

—Though conducted with utmost decorum, TURGUENIEFF's funeral, with its two hundred thousand witnesses and participants, was regarded in St Petersburg as a successful demonstration against the authorities. The gorgeous car that bore the great novelist's body had a canopy of cloth of gold surmounted by plumes of ostrich feathers, and the coffin was covered with a golden pall strewn with wreaths and flowers. The wreath-bearing deputations from all parts of Russia made a procession a mile long.

—"Ireland needs to be informed," writes Mr JOHN BRIGHT; "but a large portion of Ireland is not willing to learn. I believe in just measures, and in their effect, but in time and patience, and I am ready to hope, and even to believe, that within a reasonable period we shall see a change for the better in Irish affairs."

—An esteemed foreign contemporary, in its review of the Crystal Palace Cat Show, notes incidentally that the exhibition may possibly help to dissipate the notion that keeping cats is a weakness or fondness peculiar to old maids, for the list of contributors shows that spinsters are not so many as one in six of the whole number.

—The Bishop of Lincoln declares that in his judgment no act of the last session of the House of Lords was more pleasing to God than the rejection of the bill authorizing marriage with a deceased wife's sister. "It was really a bill for the separation of church and state, and its adoption would have been subversive of purity and of the peace of families, and disastrous to the safety of the national institutions, and perhaps of the monarchy itself."

—After his six years' service in command of the fortress of Gibraltar, the citizens of that rock desired to present a testimonial of their regard to Lord NAPIER. In vice, however, of "the difficulty of finding a suitable present to his lordship," they gave his wife, Lady NAPIER, a handsome gold bracelet, on which monogram band set ornament appear in brilliants and pearls. The proceeding, in this shape, met with the approbation of the entire family.

—Poe is said to have been but twelve years old when he wrote the poem, one a household word, beginning which is variously called an "Ode on Solitude" and "The Quiet Life." Mr ARTHUR, however, also has made for the Christmas number of HARPER's MAGAZINE a series of a dozen drawings for this twenty-line poem, in these its spirit in making the happy man an elderly gentleman of several times twelve years old, for the child-poet had indeed a "prophetic soul" by which he projected himself into mature life. The illustrations are, in fact, episodes in the rural life of England, perhaps not the less characteristic because seen through an American eye.

—That Roscoe Bruns (observes a late writer), in his pursuit of social intercourse, sometimes drank to excess, can not be denied, but that he was a habitual drunkard is the reverse of the truth. The best proof of this is founded upon the fact—to which his wife and those who best knew him testify—that he was never known to drink to excess in his own house. No one who goes to Demfries, and who drinks to the immortal memory of the lord in the Globe Tavern, need be troubled with "compunctious visitings" on the ground that he is commemorating the fanatic orgies of a one Stroud Bacchanalian. CHAPTER XXIV.

I AM PLACED IN A PAINFUL POSITION.

The next day being Sunday, my uncle and I, of course, went to church in the morning. The old square pew in which we sat, with its worm-eaten boards, its green baize curtain above them, and its shabby cushions and hassocks, the faint, musty smell, for which partly damp and partly the remains of our decaying ancestors were responsible, the village choir in the gallery, bawling out "I will arise" to the accompaniment of various musical instruments, which had always been dimly associated in my childish imagination with King Nebuchadnezzar and his image of gold—all these things brought back vividly to me the days of my boyhood; days that seemed far more remote then than they do now. I am afraid my mind was a good deal more occupied with memories and vain regrets than with the prayers and the Rector's subsequent homily.

This, like all his discourses, was constructed upon time-honored and unvarying lines. Firstly, What was so-and-so? Was it this?—No. Was it that?—No. Was it something else altogether improbable?—Again, no. What, then, was it? Which led to the agreeable discovery that, after all, it was very much what the untutored mind would have pronounced it to be at first sight. Secondly, How was this doctrine illustrated by examples from Holy Writ? Examples from Holy Writ, numerous, and more or less apposite, followed. Finally, brethren, how did this great truth come home to all of us? The unsatisfactory conclusion being that it ought to come home to us in many ways, but that, by reason of the hardness of our hearts, it didn't. Then there was a great scuffling of hobnailed boots, a great sigh of relief, and we were dismissed.

Week after week, and year after year, the same routine was gone through in that sleepy hollow. I wonder whether it died out by degrees, as whether it vanished suddenly to make room for the new ways which are so different? Sir Digby and Lady Welby were always waiting for us in the porch, and Sir Digby invariably remarked that the weather was seasonable, while Lady Welby as invariably informed us that she had a headache; "but not one of my bad ones to-day." Then they got into their yellow chariot and were driven away, and my uncle and I walked down the churchyard path to our more modest equipage.

This was a very ancient and almost springless vehicle, known among the servants as the "phenayton," which, for some reason or other, was always used on Sundays, though I never saw it out of the coach house on any other day in the week. Upon the present occasion it was drawn by a young horse, who had become fidgety, owing to the attacks of the flies and a quarter of an hour's waiting, and who broke into a gallop the moment that we had taken our seats; the consequence of which was that we made an abrupt and undignified exit, clutching our hats and bouncing about upon the slippery leather cushion, while John coachman, purple in the face, tugged at his reins, and used words that he ought not to have used. When we had passed through the park gates, and the "phenayton" was progressing at a less dangerous rate of speed, my uncle reproachfully asked John whether he wanted to kill us, which gave me a good opportunity for mentioning an idea which had occurred to me during church-time.

"That horse wants exercise," I remarked. "Would you mind my putting him into the dog-cart this afternoon?" I was rather thinking of driving over to Hailsham to look up George Warren."

"Eh! to look up George Warren?" said my uncle, fixing a disagreeably steady gaze upon me.

I felt myself reddening under this inspection; for I had been informed overnight in his presence that some one else was staying at Hailsham, and I did not know how far he might be disposed to connect my activity with that circumstance. However, I met his eyes, and answered steadily, "Yes; I am afraid I shall have to go back to town to-morrow, and I should like to see George, to say good-by."

"To be sure," answered my uncle, with a certain dryness of intonation; "it is the least that you can do, considering that he went all the way to Franzenshöhe to see you last winter."

It was pretty clear to me from this that George's intentions and my own defection were no open secret, yet I shrank from acknowledging the truth in so many words. My uncle, who never invited confidences, ruled on more, and neither then nor at luncheon afterward did I recur to a subject which was perhaps best left alone.

Certain ill-conditioned persons, who can not be brought to allow East Norfolk has any natural advantages, ought to be compelled to drive from Thirlby to Hailsham on a June afternoon. Their course—that is, if they took the short-cuts—would lead them by pleasant devious ways through a country made fertile by good farming, a country of gentle swells and depressions, of thick hedgerows, and spreading oaks and hazel copses. Every now and again they would catch glimpses of well timbered park lands and solid mansions of an unpretentious order. I assert—not, indeed, without fear of contradiction; still, I will go so far as to assert—that there is no county in England which presents a more cheerfully prosperous and home like aspect to the eye than East Norfolk in fine weather, nor any that produces a healthier or better grown race of inhabitants. I am aware that the ill-conditioned persons aforesaid account for the latter circumstance by declaring that all wealthy members of the population are killed off in early youth by the dreadful climate, but this is a mere ex parte statement, unsupported by evidence.

After that it must be acknowledged that the peasantry of this district are for the most part as ugly as the seven capital sins, and that their manners leave something to be desired. It must be acknowledged, too, that the weather, even in June, is seldom very warm. But that only makes the fine days seem all the finer when they come. The breeze that rushes to meet you has a fresh, salt smell; the snowy gulls, driven inland before it, hover overhead, tottering their shrill, yelping cry; the outlines of the distant woods and of the farm-houses and church towers are cut out sharply against the blue sky, and where within the four seas will you find an air more pure and invigorating?

If I did not enjoy all these good things as much as I might have done, it was because I was bothered by a pulling horse, and by sundry misgivings as to the prudence of the step that I was taking. When I had started for Hailsham I had had it strongly in my mind that I should like to see Maud; but now I felt quite convinced that I should like nothing of the sort. All that I wished was to hear from George what progress, if any, his suit was making; and I was not so eager even about that that I should have been very much disappointed to be told that the whole family had gone to church.

The family, as it happened, had gone to church; but probably they had been let off with a short sermon, for I overtook them marching homeward in a formidable troop, headed by the chief of the tribe, and whipped in by George, who said all that was proper in the way of surprise and gratification on recognizing me. I got down and shook hands with a number of persons of all ages (of whom Maud was not one), and accepted Mr. Warren's invitation to stay and take supper with them when I saw that he would be offended if I refused.

As soon as I could do so consistently with politeness, I fell back to the tail of the procession to join George, whom I took by the arm and led away toward the neglected wilderness which in more prosperous times had been one of the chief glories of Hailsham Hall. It was a damp and doleful pleasure ground enough now—the alleys all moss-grown and choked here and there by tangled undergrowth, the rotting arbors festooned with cobwebs, and the benches falling into the last stage of decay, like the fortunes of their owner. Seating myself with precaution upon one of these, and finding that it did not crumble away under me, I requested George to do likewise, and to give an account of himself.

"Why have you never written to me, as you promised you would?" I asked.

"I was only to write if I had some good news to give, you know," answered he.

"And have you none?"

He shook his head.

"You haven't asked her, then?"

"Yes, I have; but it was no use. I might have known that it would be no use. I did know it really all along; but it was just as well to make perfectly sure, I suppose."

George spoke in his usual calm, level tones. He was prodding holes in the moist earth with his stick, and was to all appearance much interested in this occupation.

"I'm awfully sorry for this, old fellow," said I.

He glanced up at me for a moment. "I suppose you mean you are sorry for me. I don't think you ever much fancied the idea of my marrying Miss Dennison."

This was so undeniably true that I thought we would leave that point in abeyance, and proceeded to inquire when he had made his proposal.

"Oh, ever so long ago," he replied; "soon after I saw you at Franzenshöhe. I couldn't make up my mind to go back to London without knowing the worst."

"But she is staying with you now, isn't she?" said I, thinking it rather odd that she should be at Hailsham, under the circumstances.

"Well, yes; that was my mother's doing. My mother has been a good deal upset by all this, and by my change of plans, and she took it into her head that, if I would try again, it might all come right. Of course I knew that there was no hope; but as she persisted, and as Miss Dennison very kindly consented to come to us, I thought I ought to do my part. I asked her again yesterday, and I need not say that I got the same answer as before, only it was rather more emphatic. She told me that if I were the only man in the world she couldn't marry me."

"That wasn't a very kind thing to say," I observed.

"It was not said unkindly," answered George, "she only meant to make me understand that I was asking for something that she couldn't possibly give me. I don't mind her putting it in that way."

I was really sorry for poor George; but it was difficult to show any sympathy with him, though I knew that, in spite of his cut-and-dried manner, he would have been glad of a friendly word or two. After we had both remained silent for a time, I asked him what was the change of plans to which he had alluded.

"I am going to Australia," said George, quietly; "I forgot I hadn't told you."

"You don't mean that?" I exclaimed.

"Oh yes. I have a cousin out there who is doing very well, and he has often suggested to me that I might join him. You see, my father can't afford to make an eldest son of me. When he dies, this place will have to be sold, and even then I don't know how my mother and sisters are going to live, I'm sure. I have a small capital, left me by my grandmother, with which I may manage to make my way in Australia—at all events, my cousin thinks so. I might, perhaps, have succeeded to the bar here after some years; but it would have been a long up-hill grind, and I haven't much heart for it now. So it's all settled," concluded George, drawing a long breath, "and I'm glad of it."

"I expect you are right," said I, after a little consideration. "I don't believe in the cui-sous, sous-sous, theory, and if things won't go on right in the Old World, it's well worth while to give the Antipodes a trial. I'm on better off than you are, you know. By Jove! I wish I were going with you."

"Two love-lorn swains starting off to seek their fortunes together—it would be a new kind of 'Sentimental Journey,' wouldn't it?" said George, smiling. "No, my dear Charley, matters haven't come to such a crisis with you yet that you need contemplate emigration. You must stay where you are, and— Shall I tell you something?—I shouldn't wonder if one of these fine days your troubles came to an end, and if you married your old love, who, after all, has been your only love, whatever Lady Constance Milner may assert to the contrary."

Ah, if that were only possible! I thought to myself; but I knew, though George did not, that there were insuperable obstacles in the way of such a happy issue. I did not, however, mention the most obvious of them, but contented myself with pointing out to him that he seemed to be making rather too sure of Miss Dennison's consent to the arrangement. "Did she—er—say anything that led you to suppose—er—" I inquired, with discreet incoherence.

"I must confess," answered George, dryly, "that when I spoke to her upon the subject of marriage I was more anxious to find out what my own chances were than yours. No, she said nothing about you; it was only a fancy of my own. Shall we go in now?"

We walked up to the house, and entered the faded old drawing-room, where Mrs. Warren, who was old and faded too, was holding a sort of Sunday-school class, composed of the junior members of her family. Mrs. Warren had not received the stings and arrows of outrageous fortune in a philosophical spirit. She was peevish and plaintive; she talked in a melancholy voice which was almost a whine, and she generally looked as if she had been crying. The pleasure which she publicly declared that she experienced in seeing me was not very visible upon her face, and from the uneasy glances that she cast at George I concluded that she was appealing mutely to him to take me away. He, however, apparently misinterpreted these signals, for he busily slipped out of the room, leaving me in the lurch; whereupon Mrs. Warren, with an evident sense of injury upon her, remarked that she had supposed I had gone to evening church.

"Those of us who stay at home in the afternoon generally attend the evening service," she said. "I should like the children to go, but their father thinks once is enough for them. The task of keeping them out of mischief all day does not fall upon him, and perhaps he does not know how fatiguing it is. Would you mind very much if I went on hearing them their Catechism now? I really dare not turn them loose."

I begged her not to let me interrupt the proceedings, and added that I thought I would go out and smoke a cigar—a suggestion which seemed to comfort her.

Outside the drawing-room windows there was a long verandah, where several wicker chairs had been left. I seated myself upon one of these, lighted my cigar, and lazily contemplating the light and shade of the flat landscape, wondered what had become of Maud. Long shadows from the sinking sun lay across the grass, the air was warm and motionless, the silence of Sunday hung over the deserted fields. Only from within came, every now and again, the querulous questionings of poor Mrs. Warren, struggling with her refractory troop.

"Tommy, what is thy duty toward thy neighbor?"

"Duty toward my neighbor is to believe in him, to fear him, and—"

"Nonsense, child! you know very well that it is no such thing. Answer me at once: what are your duties to your neighbor?"

"Two only, on necessary to salvation—"

"Thomas, you do this purposely to annoy me, and you will drive me to complain of you to your father. I do think, Jane, that you might try to help me a little, instead of sitting there giggling. Can't you make Tommy understand what will happen to him if he won't learn his Catechism?"

The voice of Jane, thus appealed to, responds with startling clearness and absence of peri phrasis, that in such a case Tommy would infallibly go to hell.

"Jane, I am ashamed of you! How can you say such dreadful things? I meant you to tell him that his father would give him a whipping. Of course, though, he wouldn't have believed you. Really I can not endure this much longer! Now, Tommy, begin all over again. What is thy name?"

This dialogue went on, with variations, for half an hour or more, at the expiration of which time Mrs. Warren's patience appeared to give way suddenly. A tumultuous shuffling of feet and slamming of doors made themselves heard, and the much-tried lady stepped out on to the verandah, and sank into one of the chairs beside me.

"Oh, Mr. Maxwell," she exclaimed, "I hope it isn't very wrong to say so, but I do sometimes wish I had never married. If people only knew what worried life was, they wouldn't be in such a hurry to rush into it."

I made the profound observation that nobody ever supposed that his own married life would resemble that of his neighbors.

"Ah, there it is! They have it all before their eyes, and yet they will fall in love and ruin their prospects and break their mothers' hearts if some tiresome girl or other won't accept them. You have heard about poor George, of course?"

I intimated that I had

"I can't tell you how unhappy I was about it," Mrs Warren went on, tearfully. "It does seem so hard that he should be sent away to the colonies, poor boy, just as if he had done something wrong—and he has always been such a good, steady fellow, too! And all because Maud Dennison does not know her own mind!"

Not being disposed to agree with the latter statement, I only remarked, "Well, you must take comfort from the thought that he has escaped the miseries of married life for this time."

Mrs. Warren retorted with some indignation that she had not expected me to be flippant, but, upon being reassured that such had not been my intention, she was persuaded to resume her tale of woe. "I don't mean to say that I am anxious that George should marry, but naturally he will do so sooner or later, and his heart seems to be quite set upon Maud Dennison. She will have a very comfortable little fortune, too, when her father dies—one can't help thinking of that, and I suppose he would make liberal settlements on her marriage. I do think she might very easily be brought to consent."

"George thinks differently," I ventured to observe.

"George is so difficult, poor fellow! Don't you think, Mr Maxwell," Mrs Warren added, in a persuasive voice, "that you might be of a little assistance to him?"

"?—well, upon my word, I don't see that I could," I answered, considerably taken aback.

"Ah, I think you could if you would. You will set you down as impertinent, I am afraid, but if you will remember that my son's happiness, not to speak of my own, is at stake, perhaps you will forgive me. Don't suppose that George has betrayed any secrets of yours, but one thing and another has come out, and—and—in short, Mr Maxwell, I think if you would tell her that you wished her to marry George, it would have a great effect upon her."

"I certainly can't tell her anything of the sort; and if I did, it would have no effect at all upon her," I answered, curtly.

"Mr Maxwell, do you want to marry the girl yourself?"

I began to experience an intense desire to arise and flee away, but I resisted it, and said, "No, since you ask me, I don't."

"Then surely you can not object to putting in one word for your friend—if you refuse, I shall think you most inconsiderate, most selfish, most unkind."

Mrs Warren was sobbing about by this time, and I was frightened out of my wits. To pacify her I said: "Very well, very well; I'll do it, then I'll will be horribly disagreeable, but I'll do it. Do be calm"—here they all came, back from church. Now do, please, Mrs Warren, stop crying."

Probably Mrs. Warren's new relations were more accustomed to seeing her in tears than I was. At all events, not one of the half-dozen persons who presently crossed the lawn and joined us seemed to be in the least surprised or affected by her distress, though she continued to blow her nose in the most heart-rending manner for some minutes after their arrival. As for me, I was so utterly discomfited by the woman's behavior, and by the thought of what I had so rashly promised to do for her, that the ordeal of meeting and shaking hands with Maud sank into insignificance by comparison, and I found myself talking to the latter with as little embarrassment as she herself displayed.

How I got through supper, and what occurred during that meal, I have no idea; I only remember that the period of respite passed with astonishing rapidity, and that so sooner was it at an end than the whole company appeared suddenly to seek away, as if by preconcerted arrangement, leaving me alone with Maud. It was in the garden, whither we all had adjourned from the dining room, that she and I were thus abandoned, and I perceived that the moment had come for me to redeem my pledge. Shivering on the brink was not to be thought of, and I plunged recklessly into the very midst of my task by saying: "George has been telling me about his disappointment. I was very sorry to hear of it."

Maud made no answer. She was leaning against a low iron fence, with those beautiful eyes of hers looking out at the far horizon. As I watched her furtively, the irony of the situation manifested itself to me with such breathtaking distinctness that I felt as if I could not have the impudence to say one more. Nevertheless, I had to speak, since she would not, and after a long pause I resumed.

"He is awfully cut up about it. I suppose you know that he is going out to Australia?"

"Yes," she answered, shifting her position a little, so as to face me; "but I can't see any great misfortune in that. I am sure he will be much happier shearing sheep, or whatever it is that people do in Australia, than pleading in stuffy law courts, and he is far too sensible to go on crying long for the moon. I am sorry that he should have been caused any pain through me, but he will console himself, like everybody else."

I felt bound to say that I differed from her. "Whatever George may be, he is not fickle," I declared, "and there is no better-hearted or honester fellow breathing."

"Really?" said Maud. "That, of course, is a discovery which I should never have made without your help, and naturally it alters the whole aspect of the case. Are you extolling his virtues out of pure, disinterested friendship? or is it possible that Mrs Warren has commissioned you to plead for him?"

I confessed at once that the latter surmise was correct, adding that I was fully sensible of the absurdity of my advocacy. "I refused as long as I could, but when she began crying, what was I to do?"

"Oh, don't apologize; you had no alternative. Perhaps it was not very wise of Mrs Warren to imagine that you could persuade me when George could not, still, if she wanted to convince me of the unalterable constancy of vous, I admit that she couldn't have made choice of a more suitable ambassador. One bright example is worth any amount of arguments."

I wished the earth would open and swallow me; I wished I had allowed Mrs Warren to cry her eyes out before I had consented to lay myself open to this inevitable taunt. "I haven't a word to say for myself," I stammered out at last; "it would only make things worse to try and explain."

But Maud broke into a perfectly natural and good-humored peal of laughter. "Poor Charley!" she said; "it was too bad to take such a mean advantage of you, but I couldn't resist it. Don't look so woe-begone. I have always considered myself a sort of relation of yours, and, you know, almost all boys begin life by a harmless passion for one of their cousins. It would be in very liberal sort of cousin who would take those early vows in sober earnest."

"That may be the pleasantest and most convenient way of putting it," said I, "but it isn't the true way, and I had rather you understood the truth. I recollect every word that I said to you that evening by the Hread, and it was as much sober earnest as anything in this world can be. I think you know it was, too. If I have changed since, it isn't because I was a boy then, but because I am a miserable weak fool who never could have been worthy of you. I dare say I was a blackguard as well. I know I should call any other fellow a blackguard who had behaved as I have done."

"Oh, what ugly names! Do you think he may abuse that I am breaking my heart over your inconstancy? Do I look broken-hearted? Then don't exhaust your vocabulary of remorseful epithets, or you will have none left to offer Lady Cecilia—is her name Cecilia?—when you take your next step on the road toward matrimony. The future Mrs Charles is probably at this moment under the care of a nursery governess. When you bring her to me to be introduced I shan't tell tales, and I shall be too aged to excite jealousy by the mean sins. I wish you would treat me like a sister and not like an enemy. I assure you I don't bear malice."

I was too sore and ashamed to answer her. My soul—by she went on, in a rather graver tone: "There was something much more serious that you mentioned to me that same evening. I wonder whether you remember it?"

"No," I answered, staring at her in surprise. "And then—" Oh, you mean about Harry?"

She nodded. "I think he is coming to the ford again, and I feel less and less sure of Mr Le Marchant. My father tells me that Mrs. Farquhar has changed her note, she doesn't praise you any longer, and she has begun to throw out uncular hints about 'poor dear Harry' and his misfortunes. You ought to have kept friends with Mrs. Farquhar."

"I haven't quarrelled with her," said I. "I haven't seen her for an age. As for my uncle, I doubt whether anything will make him alter his mind; but if he does, I shall be very glad. Didn't you yourself tell me that you thought it was my duty to take Harry's part?"

"Well," she said, "duty is one thing, and expediency is another. If he makes his appearance here, I don't say that you shouldn't take his part; but, in the interest of everybody concerned, I shall take yours. It all rests with Mrs. Farquhar, whom I am ready to cajole or to fight, according to circumstances."

I hesitated whether to tell her that I find met Harry or not, but decided that perhaps I had better keep my new counsel for the present. I only answered that I believed the control of future events rested more with Harry himself than with Mrs. Farquhar or my uncle, and before anything further could be said, George came out to tell me that he didn't want to send me away, but that the dog-cart had been waiting for half an hour, and the brown horse was dancing about on his hind-legs.

I little suspected, when I said good-by to George and Maud, how and where I should next see those two together.

CHAPTER XXV

LADY CONSTANCE TESTS THE EXTENT OF MY FOLLY.

The first person whom I saw on arriving at my rooms in London was Harry; and the first thing that Harry said was: "So you have been down at the old place! Why didn't you tell me that you were going?"

He spoke with a perceptible degree of petulance and impatience, and I saw at once that I should have to tell him what had taken me home.

"Oh! I ran down for a couple of nights," I said. "Was there any reason for my informing all my friends of my movements?"

"None whatever," answered Harry; "but I have had an uncomfortable sort of feeling that you ought have spoken about me to my father. I hope you didn't do that."

"Well, to tell you the truth, I did," said I. "I am sorry if you are angry about it," I added, noticing the flush which overspread Harry's pale cheeks; "but I acted to the best; I thought it could do no sort of harm to say that I had seen you."

"I am not angry," Harry declared; "but I am a little annoyed, I confess. From one point of view, your having spoken will have done neither harm nor good; because, as I have told you times out of mind, my father will never be influenced one way or the other by anything that you or any of me, but though you may not have spoken to my prospects, you have hurt my pride. Perhaps you think I have no right in my claims to such a article of luxury."

He am walking up and down the room in quick, impatient steps, and for a moment or two thought he was going to quarrel with me; but presently his ordinary serenity returned to him, and he threw himself down into an arm-chair, laughing good-humoredly.

"I know you meant well," he said, "and can't be helped. I think you hadn't done it, at all. I need not ask how my father received advances on my behalf. Of course he spoke to you."

"Not exactly that," I answered. "I think he admit that he was not very encouraging."

"And no doubt in accused me of having litigated you to make this unwise attempt."

This, again, I was unable to deny, and he continued: "You see now that, supposing I a little pride left, I might not altogether desire accusations being brought against me. However all, I don't care. What does it signify? At least this will have the effect, I hope, of convincing you that you had better submit to be miserable, and the inevitable has been known take some forms than that of an unmerciful estate."

"I don't consider myself beaten yet," I said. "I still think you have a chance. Indeed, told me so himself."

"What chance?" inquired Harry, with a frosted smile.

"Well, he said that if you could distinguish yourself—"

"Oh! the old story. I wonder he does that he will be prepared to shake hands with as soon as ever I am appointed Archbishop Canterbury. Suppose we talk about something else. Have you seen Lady Constance since?"

"Of course not. I drove straight from the station."

"Were you to do me the favor to call on her what you have been about these last days. I think she will consider it good news. Don't look so indignant. It is good news for and good news for you. Come! I'll go further, and say that it's good news for me, though, to be sure, I can hardly do it while you would believe that I don't care for by my more than I want the Archbishop Canterbury. I should like you to have Sir. I should like you to marry Lady Constance; should like a little more money for her; believe that pretty nearly expresses the by my cordially desires. No, there can no that I should like. I should like it as well the least possible, to make no further mention that I was not using you as a cat's-paw to my chestnuts out of the fire. For your chestnuts way some, and if I had a taste after them, I should prefer leaving as we gers to letting you burn yours. But I asking you rudely to ask him to believe so."

"I am afraid," said I, pertinently, "that made rather an ass of myself."

"To be quite frank with you," answered ry, laughing, "I think you have. Hang Lady Constance doesn't think so, I assure little what anybody else may think."

I had an opportunity of ascertaining Constance's views upon the subject the evening, when I met her in a large party Foreign Office. She was dressed with her usual magnificence, she wore a necklace square of diamonds which must have been a small fortune, and, as she revealed to conference, with a cloud of satellites about thought I had never seen her looking to advantage. The distinguished statesman a that time presided over the Department sign Affairs paid her marked attention political personages observed on another peer her, she seemed quite surprised as humble as individual as myself. I to favor with a thrill of gratified pride, her, after a time, detach herself sufficiently from the groups with which she had been gaged in conversation, and make straight corner where I had been admiring her afar.

"You may take me though the room like," said she, placing her hand lightly arm. "You have been following me about visiting your relations I hear."

"How did you know that?" I asked, moved on through the crowd.

"Oh, the well-informed Chaperon. He called yesterday and told me you gone down to Norfolk. I think you called for the purpose of telling me. As very little else to say, and he is not an people whom I generally reserve a for the-way, what is this angelic Chaperon a phenomenon, do you suppose or a human

Feeling myself upon dangerous ground returned, cautiously, "How do you mean?"

"He must be the one in the other a disinterested friend of ours, he is that, mon: if he isn't—which is a great deal is—he is playing some game that I don't out at."

"I believe," I answered, "that you do him credit for being disinterested. I other way this because he has been good-nature ing to dispose you a little in my favor."

"There was no necessity for that. I in trying to do, in the most open and straightway, is to convince me that I should be rry you instead of Mr. Fotheram. I am that he has succeeded, as far, but I rather his coolness."

"I wish I had half his audacity," I sigh

"You have a fairly good supply of it, I think, half Mr. Fotheram's [illegible] good deal more to the purpose. Does it make you any happier to know that I would marry you to-morrow if you had me thousand a year?"

"I am not sure that it does," I answered. "That is only equivalent to saying that you would marry anybody who had me thousand a year."

"Not exactly anybody," she returned, complacently. "there are some people from whom I should require at least double that price. What a foolish fellow you are!" she went on. "I am several years older than you; I am neither pretty nor good; I hold some odd opinions, and have not always the courage of them—how thankful you ought to be that you have not ten thousand a year!"

"You are yourself," I said. "All the rest means nothing to me, even if it were true. You are quite right to call me a fool, but my folly is all that I care to live for." And then I broke out into passionate phrases which I don't care to reproduce at this time of day, and to which Lady Constance paid very little heed.

"How far would your folly carry you?" she asked, all of a sudden. "Far enough to lead you into doing something really foolish to serve me?"

"Try me!" I cried, eagerly. "The more difficult and the more dangerous it is, the better I shall be pleased."

"Oh," said Lady Constance, with a short laugh, "I am not going to ask you to slay a dragon, my requirements are much more commonplace. Perhaps some other time I may tell you what they are. Meanwhile, here comes an elderly relative of yours to save me from talking into bathos."

I followed the direction of her glance, and became aware of the General bearing down upon us with a countenance irradiated by smiles. He took Lady Constance's hand, bowed over it, gave it a perceptible squeeze, and then favored me with a slap on the shoulder.

"You're a nice fellow, Charles!" said he. "What do you mean by never letting me know you were in town? Too busy dancing attendance upon the ladies, eh? Ah, Lady Constance, these young gentlemen cut us out in all directions, but they're not to be trusted, take my word for it. Here to-day and off to-morrow—butterfly business, you know. If you want a steady, respectful adoration, warranted to last, you must go to the middle-age division. I'm middle-aged myself," he added, modestly, "as I ought to know."

But Lady Constance had already turned her back upon us, and was conversing with a dignitary of the Church, whose arm she presently took. As she moved away, she looked over her shoulder and said to me, "You are going on to Brentford House later, I suppose," in a tone which seemed neither to imply a command than a question.

The Duchess of Brentford was giving a great ball that evening, to which all London had been bidden, and I among the rest. Thither I now repaired, in obedience to Lady Constance's hint; and there, very soon after my arrival, I came upon the object of my search. She saw me at once; but it did not please her to take any immediate notice of me, and while I was patiently awaiting her summons I was led away and made to dance. When I was free again, which was only after a considerable interval, I was unable to discover her, and so it was not until early morning that she suddenly appeared at my elbow, and told me that she wished to be taken down to the garden.

The Duke of Brentford, as everybody knows, inhabits a big, isolated house, with pleasure-grounds attached to it which, for London, may be called extensive. These had been prettily decorated with Chinese lanterns, and, as the night was warm, a good many people were strolling over the grass, or lounging in the marquee which had been stretched outside the ground-floor windows. Lady Constance seated herself upon a vacant bench, made room for me beside her and—"Let us see," said she; "where did we leave off? Hadn't you been protesting that you were concerned with a desire to do something, possible or impossible, to serve me?"

"Whatever I said, I meant it."

"Very likely. Well, I are going to put your devotion to the proof. Do you like asking favors? I suppose not. No one does, although most of us have to come to it once or twice in the course of our lives. And perhaps it is just as well that such necessities should arise, because there are very few other ways that I know of by which one can so easily find out what one's friends are worth. The lady in the ballad who flung down her glove among the lions and told her lover to fetch it took rather a long time to find a real loyal hero when she saw him drop down into the arena. Why he should have behaved in the horrid manner he did afterward I never could understand. No doubt he had sworn heaps of oaths that he was ready to die for her; and what business had he to lose his temper, and throw her glove in her face, when she took him at his word? You will say that he never meant his precious skin to be put in jeopardy out of mere wantonness; but I can't admit his right to make reservations. The moral of the tale is that it is a very foolish thing to accept vows literally."

"I make no reservations," I declared. "If you want me to jump over London Bridge, you have only to say the word. I'll do anything that you tell me to do, and I can't claim much credit for it either, because you can make me do anything."

"Really!—anything?" she repeated, with an odd smile. "I wonder how you feel now, or rather how you will feel presently? Suppose I were to ask for Mr Sotheran's head upon a charger?"

"Well, then, I should have to refuse. I forgot to say that I must draw the line at crime."

"Come, we are getting on," observed Lady Constance; "I thought we should hear of some reservations presently. Do you draw the line, for instance, at carrying a letter to Warsaw which will certainly bring about your death if the police catch you with it in your possession?"

"No," I answered. "I'll do that gladly."

"But I don't want you to carry a letter to Warsaw, as it happens."

"Would you mind," I asked, mildly, "telling me what you do want of me?"

"Yes," she replied, laughing and sighing. "I asked very much, but I'll tell you, nevertheless. I want you to raise a couple of thousand pounds for me. Now, are you disgusted?"

Shall I confess that I was? In the abstract there seems to be no reason why a lady to whom you have just sworn unquestioning obedience should not ask for your money as much as your life; yet I suppose that on such an occasion a demand without at the same time experiencing a disagreeable shock. You may accept anything from your friend but his money. You may drink his costliest wines, you may smoke his choicest cigars, you may work his horses, his carriages, and his servants, and feel or overwhelming sense of obligation; but you would be equally astonished and displeased if he offered to pay your railway fare. In some houses one finds a box of postage stamps on one's writing-table, but I imagine that few people make use of them. For my own part, I always have an uncomfortable dread that the house-maid will abstract them after my departure, and that I shall be held responsible. This, no doubt, is a highly artificial sort of scrupulousness; but we live under artificial conditions of society. As Mrs Gamp justly observes, "We are born into a wale, we were brought up in a wale, and we must take the consequences of such a situ'ation." Therefore, since I am on more philosophical than my neighbors, and since at that time I desired to think of Lady Constance as being, in certain respects, very superior to hers, I wished with all my heart that she had asked me for anything else. However, I made shift to conceal my feelings, and said, cheerfully, "Is that all?"

"That," answered Lady Constance, dryly, "is all. Observe, please, that I am not asking you to lend me this sum; where truth is possible, I always prefer to employ it. I may repay you in a month or two; but I may not be able to repay you at all. In the mean time, I hope you understand that I have paid you a compliment in risking this request, if I never pay you anything else."

I said I understood that thoroughly, and thanked her, after which there was a pause.

"Perhaps," resumed Lady Constance by-and-by, "you may think it rather odd that I should be in such straits, but it is hardly worth while to enter into explanations. As a matter of fact, I am in short of ready money just now that I am actually in danger of getting into trouble with the butcher and baker. It may be only a temporary difficulty, but it is an unpleasantly real one."

I could not help glancing at the magnificent diamonds that she wore; and she immediately read my thoughts. "All paste!" she whispered, behind her fan. "See what a slave I am, in spite of me love of truth! Nevertheless, I have a sort of excuse. These jewels are assumed to dazzle the butcher and baker, who will lose of them through the servants, they are not intended to delude you, me society at large, whose opinion is of less importance for the moment."

Then she rose abruptly and vanished with undeigned weariness. "Oh, how tired I am!" she exclaimed. "Will you go and look for my carriage, please? And don't come and tell me me for two or three days—I am going to have one of my attacks of suicidal mania."

MARYLAND POLITICS.

AN INSIDE VIEW.

A Democratic newspaper of Washington, D. C., remarks, as to the nomination of Robert M. McLane for Governor by the Democrats of Maryland, that "the selection of such a man is too easily good for his State and for the interests of his party therein, but it is such an example as the country has needed. Maryland has done the country a service by calling on a veteran and honored statesman to lead his party to victory." Nothing could be much further from the truth than this. Mr McLane is not a statesman in any proper sense of that much overworked word, and his selection as the Democratic candidate for Governor was not due in any respect to what will be "good for his State," or even to the general "interests of his party thereon." He was chosen because he is the most admirable figure-head for the piratical craft of a political machine which United States Senator Arthur P. Gorman, chairman of the Democratic State Committee, is just now navigating toward what he hopes will be a safe mooring at the public crib on the 6th of the present month. To this and the national reputation of his party, the welfare of his State, and the judgment of the disinterested members of the Maryland Democracy have alike been disregarded and flouted by this Senatorial machine leader.

The starting-point of the existing political situation in Maryland is Governor Hamilton's truthful and terrific arraignment of the actual administrative majority of his own State government. This picture of business waste and public dishonesty was unfolded in order to promote Governor Hamilton's desire for a re-election, and was distinctly no forth as an effort to secure reform "within the party." But all its assertions of fact remain, and no one has ever questioned their substantial accuracy. The Democratic State machine, under Mr Gorman, closed its eyes, took the blow, and went on as before. He and his followers had already made up their minds that worthy Farmer Hamilton of Washington County was of on further use to them, and his appeal to the business sense and disinterested sentiment of the Democratic party only served to stiffen their resolution. Accordingly the measures for carrying the primary elections for delegates to the State Convention and for local candidates went on as before. The Democratic expenditure of about a thousand dollars for each law requiring newspaper publication had prepared the local press in the various counties for the task of "moulding party sentiment" in favor of the existing system; the multiplicatum of officers of all kinds and degrees to the extent during one legislative session of providing 111 constables with 245 officers and attendants had filled the State with a horde of active and obedient agents ready to shape every detail precisely as it was determined at headquarters; the deficiency of $173,736 in the accounts of tax-collectors, sheriffs, clerks, registers, and incorporated bondsmen—the total revenues of the State running under $2,000,000—furnished nearly a hundred men, distributed among the twenty-three counties and in Baltimore, whose pecuniary circumstances forced them to efficient service as sergeants and corporals of the machine forces; the legislative lobby, which the prevailing system has brought to organized proportions, furnished another contingent, and when all these personal and trained instruments failed to coerce genuine public sentiment, money, obtained by increasing office-holders and from private contributions, was poured in to purchase the votes that remained unaffected by any other consideration. This machine was brought to bear upon a party that cast 93,706 votes for Hamilton in 1880, and 78,587 votes for the Democratic candidate for State Comptroller in 1881, in a State whose family relations are of great account and very numerous, where, out of a population of 933,364, the number ten years of age and over who can not read is 111,587, under the name of a party that has been in uninterrupted possession of every branch of the State government more 1867, and by a machine leader who unites great personal suavity to practical political skill and undaunted resolution. The result was almost inevitable. Governor Hamilton, as an advocate of reform "within the party," barely got the delegates in his own county, and in the Convention, when it was proposed to recognize his work on Governor, the resolutions to that effect were contemptuously voted down. It may be thought odd that a man of Governor Hamilton's character did not, during his administration of four years, impress his own purposes upon the active political forces of the party, but the fact is that the Democratic machine organization is too perfect to allow of any such catastrophe as that would be. The political patronage of Maryland is mainly in the hands of the Board of Public Works, consisting of the Governor, the State Comptroller, and the State Treasurer, or a majority of them, and the machine holds two of these offices as of right. Mr Gorman insists upon this point for his own security, and his several followers agree with him as a guarantee that they will get their reward.

Mr McLane's nomination for Governor was the political product of the packed Convention. He is an intensely respectable gentleman, who has been known as "poquehanna Bob," because of the premature remark, ascribed to him in 1860, that if the slave-holders began war, the Susquehanna would be made the battle line, and not the Potomac. Politically he regards the Democratic party precisely as the personal followers of the late Comte de Chambord regarded the public pretensions of that estimable gentleman; and, provided other people will do the dirty work, he is always ready to accept with pride any political honors that may fall in his way. He is a perfect type of that large class of Southern gentlemen, so they are in respect to hospitality, courtesy, breeding, and taste, who will wink at the waste of public funds, the multiplication of unnecessary officers at the cost of the tax payer and the rent-payer, bribery, and even the interruption of criminal justice, provided all these things are done for the good of the Democratic party, without the slightest conception that their personal honor, as individual Democrats, is concerned in the matter. Mr McLane knows that he was nominated by a predatory gang of corrupt and conscienceless scoundrels, who are getting their living and their whalser at the expense of the honest industry of the State, but he announced while the political cards were being packed for his benefit with patronage, bribery, and promises of office, that he was ready to take whatever Mr Gorman's Convention had to offer him.

The forces united on the Republican side against this order of things are very considerable. At the Congressional elections of 1882 the Democrats cast 82,314 votes, the Republicans 74,630. This gave a Democratic majority in the whole State of 7794. But in Baltimore the Democrats cast 41,838 votes, and the Republicans 33,405, a Democratic majority of 8504, showing that the Republicans had a majority of 710 votes in the State outside of Baltimore. Since then the registry system of Baltimore has been improved; and provided a tolerably honest election can be secured there (it is believed that J Menzies Hannan, the Republican candidate for Governor in 1879, was "counted out" in Baltimore in favor of Governor Hamilton, who is now one of the prophets), it is certain that the Republican city vote will be able to take care of itself, with perhaps a little to spare. The Maryland Democrats themselves fixed the data of the State election appeals from Congressional elections, as an to avoid Federal interference in any shape, and the new civil service law has deprived Federal Republican officials of those promises of patronage which they have sometimes scattered with great profusion, to the utter confusion or disorganization of the Republican lives. This year the Republican forces stand mainly upon solid public grounds, and the life-blood of honest party sentiment is running freely through their veins. This is a most encouraging circumstance, and gives consistency and force to all their efforts against the Democratic State machine. Honest and hard-working Democratic tax-payers are coming to see that a party name does not lighten the burdens of maladministration, and they want a more efficient and less costly government.

On the affirmative side the Republicans have a good candidate for Governor. Hart B Haynes is a man who has come up from small beginnings; he is a man of affairs, both private and public, and he represents in his own career that new tide of industrial activity and material growth that is now sweeping into the Southern and border States. In 1882 he was elected to Congress from the Fifth Maryland District, carrying five out of the six counties (excluding the part of the district lying in Baltimore) by a majority of 2249, coming out of the six rural counties with a majority of 1999, as against in the same counties in 1880, a majority of 916 for Hancock, and carrying the whole Congressional district by a majority of 1556, as against a Democratic majority on the Congressional ticket in 1880 of 1746. Mr Haynes accomplished this political revolution by means of his known fitness for public life and his zeal in behalf of better administration, and under political conditions which, while they raised no antagonisms between him and factional leaders in Federal office-holders, made it clear that his political strength was his own, and that he was free to serve the people according to his own judgment. His associates on the State ticket are men of like quality. Fortunately the rivalries of Eastern Shore and Western Shore have not entered into his nomination for this higher office, while the adoption by the Republican Convention of the resolutions for the purification of the State government, which were rejected by the Democratic Convention, shows that the fight is to be pressed upon grounds of serious moment to every tax payer in the State.

In a State like Maryland, where all public property is regarded and treated as if it belonged to the Democratic party, it is not difficult to suggest worthy and needful ends for political effort, but the hopeful fact to this instance is that the means proposed for securing these ends deserve public respect and confidence. The Republican canvass will gain some strength from the growing public conviction of the need of civil service reform as the scare of economy. In Maryland one main question is as to whether the taxing power can be employed for creating and maintaining offices designed and used solely for party or factional purposes without bringing the State into financial danger. The Democratic State machine has carried office-mongering so far that the plain people begin to see the close relation between bad politics and their pockets, and if enlightened self-interest has fair play in the canvass, undisturbed by the old and irrelevant prejudices to which the Democrats will appeal, it is a pretty safe prediction that Farmer Haynes will succeed Farmer Hamilton on the next Governor of Maryland.

LUTHER AT THE WARTBURG.

By JOEL SWARTZ, D.D.

At Wartburg still the ink they show
Which Luther at the Devil threw
In those last days we're learned to know
He fought more wisely than he knew

For this far more than flaming tongue
The poems of evil filled with fright.
The bastard to the printer flung
The Prince of Darkness put to flight.

Now silent lies great Luther's tongue,
And palsied is the hero's hand;
But that black thunder-bolt it flung
Still rolls and smites from land to land.

The martyr's stake and prison cell,
The tyrant's yoke and scourger's rod,
And other engines of hell,
It smites on with the wrath of God.

E'en when consenting captives lay
In Superstition's ghostly halls,
This bolt has thrown the light of day
Between the thunder-riven walls.

With Argus eyes, Briarean hands,
And envied tongues to curse or bless,
There walks the earth's enlightened lands
One king of all—the Printing-Press.

His royal form is wrought of steel,
His spirit is the steam's hot breath,
Before him Power and Genius kneel,
His smile is life, his frown is death.

The harnessed lightnings are his steeds,
His hands are on the darting wires,
Each current every whisper heeds,
And shouts to honest all his fires.

His hand is on the telephone;
The light electric burns his path,
He speaks his thought from zone to zone
In tones of love or peals of wrath.

If sometimes with a backward fling
He smites when he should help instead,
Yet mainly alone this noblest king
His intrigues at the Devil's head.

His Wartburgs crown a million hills
The walls are all of paper made,
His ink, which countless measures fills,
In on these walls must deftly laid.

And whether by his hot breath
Or seized with all
The whole around the world is
To blaze and bright

King of the inky sceptre bold!
We own thy sway, vast thy control
Thy power shall more and more
Until spread from pole to

TO HENRY IRVING

By GRACE GREENWOOD.

Sent with some Roses on a Benefit Night, Lyceum Theatre, London.

We dream of moon-lit roses, dashed with dew,
From Belmont's terrace waving welcome sweet
To Belmont's mistress, speeding through the night.

We dream of resident roses, trimmed with sun,
In gay Messina, by the woodbine bower,
Where crouches, blushing, Leonato's niece.

We dream of whitest roses, showering down
In tender royal largess, to atone
For maimed funeral rites, at Elsinore.

We dream of sumptuous roses, which prepare
With languid sighs and glow of wondrous bloom
A garden in Verona, where Love waits.

We dream of roses by a mossy well,
The centre of a humbler scene of joy—
The rustic garden of Ann Hathaway—

Where in the twilight once two lovers stood,
And eyes smiled into eyes, and hand sought hand,
When all unconscious, in the kiss of truth,

The simple maiden on her brow received
The chrism of Fate—the soul sublime and sad
Of Fame eterne, of love that touched—and passed.

Yet, rarest roses of the land of song—
Roses that brightened Portia's wedding day,
Or laughed and listened with gay Beatrice,

Or hid with sad Ophelia in her grave,
Or sighed with Juliet on that night of nights—
Or English roses of our Shakespeare's time,

Could scarce have been more gorgeous in their tints,
More bounteously bejewelled with sun or dew,
Than these, their kindred of a prosaic day.

Time has not strained from out the royal flower
The splendid dye which gladdened Shakespeare's eyes;
As golden still the clustered stamens, set

Deep i' the crimson. So from age to age
Wise Nature sends her rarest life-drops down,
And so, heart within heart, hides, to reveal

Her golden secret—Genius! Thus it is
We find thee, loving, in an alien time,
After the wane of centuries, allied

By mystic ties, by something "more than kin,"
To thy Great Master; thus as true, as fine,
As are these flowers to roses red and pale

That sweetened all the summer ways and days
Of dear old Stratford, seems in life, thy life
Of grave high thought, of pure intent in art;—
Like in the worship of a loyal mind;
Like in the passion of a noble toil.

MISS ATKINSON'S OPINIONS.

"Oh, Will, I am so glad!" and pretty Mrs. Danvers, quite forgetful of the soft balls of many colored worsteds in her lap, rose hastily to meet her husband. "I had a very, very, very important letter to-day—from London!"

"From London, Fan? I did not think that you knew any one in London."

"I was three years in a London boarding school, sir! Do you think it is only men who make bosom-friends at school? John Lawrence and you were chums at school, and are ridiculous about each other yet. I suppose I can have a school friend too."

"Nonsense, Fan! David and Jonathan have no sisters. Women get a husband, and then there is an end of 'my darling Angelina,' and 'my darling Fanny.'"

"Her name is not Angelina, sir, and she always called me Frances. If there is one thing Elizabeth detests, it is nicknames. She used to say, 'If your name is Frances, don't allow any one to call you anything else.' She is quite a remarkable woman, Will, I assure you."

"And her name is Elizabeth!"

"Yes—Elizabeth Atkinson. She is very rich—very rich indeed, and I thought, Will dear, if I could get her to be baby's godmother—she's an old maid, Will—she might leave baby something, you know."

"You mercenary little mother! You would lay the weight of those two dreadful names upon baby for the sake of a possible legacy? Elizabeth—Atkinson—Danvers. The little table could not bear it, Fan."

"We could call her 'Bessie,' Will; her godmother would never know. Bessie is pretty; don't you think so?"

"No, I do not think so. I am for calling her Lily, or Violet, or Grace, or something flowery and pretty."

"I never knew a girl called Lily that did not grow up fat and red, or one called Violet that was not loud and vulgar, or one called Grace that was not ill-tempered and gawky. Now there is something very stately about Elizabeth."

"And very likely baby will grow up a little fluttering, frizzly-haired fairy, all curves, and ringlets, and ribbons."

"I am ashamed of you, Will, talking about your own dear, darling little daughter in that way. And after all the trouble I have taken to select a proper godmother for her! And Elizabeth so delighted, and coming all the way to New York to see her goddaughter, too, and everything else. I must say I expected more appreciation from you, Will. Lilian Morris was here this afternoon, and she of course opposed Elizabeth. I expected that. She is all for those horrid Saxon names, like Maud, and Elfrida, and Bertha. But a man of the world—a sensible man like you, Will! I am astonished."

"Oh, don't scold, Fan. I think Elizabeth lovely; and, as you say, we can call her Lizzy."

"No, Will, I never said Lizzy. Lizzy, indeed! I said Bessie."

"Yes, dear, Bessie. I beg pardon."

"And I shall write to Miss Atkinson to say that we will have the christening in May, if that suits you, Will."

"Yes, yes; that suits me very well. John and I are going to the Adirondacks in June, but it will be all over by that time."

"All over, Will! I must say that is not flattering to baby."

"I dare say baby will be glad enough to have it all over. But is this lady really coming here?—to New York?"

"She is really coming. I was going to ask you about refurnishing the blue suite of rooms for her."

"Why, they were refurnished when we were married, two years ago, and nobody has used them but John Lawrence."

"And he smokes. Elizabeth is very sensitive on that subject."

For a short time Will held his ground about refurnishing; but after Fanny shifted the point of attack from her rocking-chair to his knee, the resistance grew fainter and fainter, and finally the weak husband not only agreed to the carved oak furniture upholstered in rich wood colors, but also professed to see the necessity for looking after the carriage.

"That Mrs. Lorimer has had hers lined with dark purple satin, Will, and it is really an effective background for light hair," skillfully suggested Fanny. "And I am as sick of those gray horses! Can't we have bay ones, Will? They are more English and stylish."

So the oak furnishing, the new carriage-lining, and the bay horses were determined on, and, what is more, Will Danvers had no sense of having suffered a defeat.

Will Danvers heard a great deal of Miss Atkinson between March and May, and was allowed to read specially wise and lofty paragraphs in her letters. He affected a great admiration for the lady, but in reality he was quite sure she would prove a tremendous bore. "But John and I can get out of it," he reflected; "that is one comfort. And if she manages to put Fan under her thumb, she is cleverer than I am, that's all. I don't believe Fan will give in—much. I never knew her do it. I'll bet twenty dollars they have a civil fight before a month is over, and that Fan comes out ahead."

In a week after Miss Atkinson's arrival Will had modified that opinion. Her appearance was not formidable—quite the contrary. Indeed she was so petite, so gentle, so appealing, that Will had not at first thought it necessary to guard one of his prerogatives. But gradually he found himself abandoning his dearest rights. "Miss Atkinson was not well; would Mr. Danvers kindly breakfast alone, and allow darling Frances to have a quiet talk and cup of tea with her?" Mr. Danvers politely consented, and in a week the favor had become a custom, and Mr. Danvers breakfasted alone as a matter of course.

It was the same in everything. Miss Atkinson took possession of his wife, his child, and his house. Her cool, calm, authoritative way was irresistible, and she delivered her opinions with such an air of settled conviction in their infallibility that few cared to dispute them. "She was really sorry to find so much to disapprove of in New York society, and she wished she knew how to pass it over; but it was her nature to speak the truth, though it was often a very disagreeable duty."

And even Will gave her the usual credit for this unpleasant characteristic. "It is just her honest, straightforward nature that makes her say this kind of thing," he said to John Lawrence one night; "but I wish she was not so fond of 'plain truths.' Fan is made to see faults in me she never would find out by herself."

"'Plain truths!'" answered John, spitefully. "I have always noticed that these people who are so fond of 'plain truths' never feel called upon to tell pleasant truths. I have not refused to meet the lady, Will, because I like women who are not above nice little hypocrisies to please us; but I declare a woman who proposes to accompany us into the woods, and turn our private pleasure into a public picnic, must be a character. I'll go home with you to-night and see her."

"Oh, John, thank you. I sha'n't feel so helpless against Fan and her then. Poor Fan! She hates the woods, and can't endure a dinner without entrées and dessert; yet this English woman has absolutely persuaded her that she is looking dreadfully ill, and that nothing but a pure natural life will save her from consumption."

To say that John Lawrence had no curiosity about Miss Atkinson would be false. He had heard about her continually for a month; she was always doing or saying something which contradicted his ideas of what a woman ought to do or say; so that going home with Will was not committing himself to any great act of self-denial.

It was a lovely June evening, and just dusk, as they entered the parlors. They were empty, and they walked through them on to a balcony latticed with vines that overlooked the little plot of city garden. Miss Atkinson was standing in the very centre of a small lawn. She was quite unconscious of any observation, and John stayed by an imperative motion Will's first movement to announce their approach. "Let me look at her," he said, in an agitated whisper.

As she stood there in the June twilight she was worth looking at. A woman about twenty-eight years of age, of the most delicate type of English beauty. Her small, slight figure was exquisitely robed in fawn-colored silk and grenadine. She had a pink rose at her throat, and another in her hand, but, even as they looked at her, she dropped it from her listless grasp. For a moment she regarded it pitifully, and then there passed over her face an expression of such hopeless sorrow or weariness that Will was quite startled, and turned to his friend:

"She does not look very bad-tempered now, does she? Why, John, what is the matter? Do you know her?"

"I can not tell, Will. Either I know her, or have been dreaming about her for eleven years, that's all."

Half an hour afterward they were sitting side by side in the gas-lit parlor. Every trace of sensibility had left Elizabeth's face. That womanly melancholy that had made her so lovely in the twilight garden had quite vanished. She was now only a keen, clever little woman.

But somehow John felt sure that she had assumed a character, and was playing up to it. "She is a clever actress, and enjoys interpreting her rôle; but why she chooses to do so is a question." And from this evening forward John Lawrence fell as completely under the spell of Elizabeth Atkinson as Fanny had done—with this difference: Elizabeth soon became aware that in this case her slave was also her conqueror.

Will was disgusted with the whole position. He took a couple of servants and set off to the Adirondacks without John, who did not now want to go fishing. He seemed, indeed, to desire nothing but to idle away the long summer days in Fanny's garden or parlors. Necessarily Elizabeth and he were often left alone, and it was a noticeable thing that after the first two weeks of their acquaintance they found nothing to dispute about in their interviews. Elizabeth sat quietly rocking and pretending to sew, and John watched her and pretended to read.

Sometimes they glanced at each other, sometimes they said a few words, but John was really gaining a silent victory. Then there would be days in which Elizabeth rebelled against this growing power over her, and at such times she resolutely refused to leave her own room; but such struggles only left her more weak and impressionable. John conquered by his absence as surely as by his presence.

The first really hot weather had sent the Danverses out to their country home—an old stone house among great pine woods—and John spent most of his time with them. But not one word of love did he say during those charmed weeks of hot summer-tide. They wandered through the pines, and played with the baby, and sailed down the river in the cool mornings and the moonlight nights, and John said nothing beyond the pleasant, courteous words of an intimate acquaintance. In those days Elizabeth was often very weary. "I must wear my mask," she thought; "he must not know how really weak and tender I am. Once! ah! once— But what did it bring me? Contempt! If women show they have a heart, they invite a betrayer."

It was the last day of August, and Elizabeth was to return to England early in September. It had been a still, hot, exhausting day. Fanny had a bad headache, John was in the city, and Elizabeth was slowly walking her little namesake to sleep in the darkening parlor. By-and-by John came home, and sat down. Elizabeth smiled faintly at him, and continued her monotonous walk and lullaby. John followed her every movement. Then the child was asleep, and she was leaving the room.

He stood before her, all his soul in his face. "You will come back, Elizabeth? I want to speak to you."

It was the first time he had ever called her Elizabeth. She knew what he wanted to say, and yet she answered, almost in a whisper, "I will come back."

He was awaiting her return with the greatest impatience. Now that he could no longer withhold speech, he was eager for his opportunity. He met her as she entered, and drawing her passionately toward him, said: "Oh, Elizabeth, you must not leave me now. I have loved you, darling, loved you and sought you, for eleven years."

"Oh, John, I love you too! But you must know the truth. I have loved some one else the greater part of those eleven years—some one who basely won my childish heart, and then left me to such hopeless misery as makes me tremble yet to think of. I was a simple, loving, romantic soul, and he thought it but a holiday to take all the glory out of my life, and all the trust out of my heart."

"Are you sure of that, darling?"

"Quite sure. He left me in Rome one 1st of November; I never saw him again, and he never wrote me a line."

"He was killed three days afterward, dearest, in a pass of the Apennines. There was a long letter to you in his pocket, but it was unfinished and had no address. I have it here. Will you read it?"

"No, no, John; it is too late now. You knew Stephen?"

"He was my dearest friend. We were travelling together. I knew that he was deeply in love with a young English girl, but he was very secret and jealous about this matter. I did not care to irritate him with questions, for he regarded the subject as too sacred a one for common conversation. Sooner or later I was sure he would give me his confidence. Alas! he had only strength after he was stabbed to whisper some words which were quite inaudible, and explained nothing. The brigands who had attacked us suffered me to redeem my friend's body and my own life, and I kept as a sacred trust and relic the letter he had intended for you, and your picture. The lovely face gradually became a dream and a hope to me; I sought you all over Europe; I have not found you now only to lose you, have I, Elizabeth?"

She answered at first by a passion of tears and sobs. It was a gracious rain, and washed away all the sense of wrong that had embittered so many years. It was just, also, that she should first give this tribute to the memory of a lost and wronged love. John understood the feeling, and shared it. After all, it was a short sorrow, from which was to spring for them long years of confident joy.

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL SHERIDAN.

In parting with its honored and illustrious General, under the law of retirement for age, the army is fortunate in being able to call to its head so distinguished a successor as Lieutenant-General PHILIP H. SHERIDAN.

As this officer, in the prime of manhood, reaches the highest prize open to the soldier's profession in America, a backward glance is naturally be cast upon his career with a view to anticipate his probable conduct in his new position. In that dashing soldiership, it has been asked, which gave SHERIDAN his fame, compatible with the cautious, wise stability suited to the head of the army? It might be briefly answered that the impetuosity of youth not infrequently becomes steadiness in the veteran of fifty, but the true response is that SHERIDAN was never a mere dare-devil. The qualities that made him a popular hero were fiery energy in the field; the qualities which have brought him to his present exalted place are staunchness and great prudence, combined with whatever other qualities are necessary for a general officer. This his history will show.

In the first stages of the civil war Captain SHERIDAN was CURTIS's quartermaster somewhere in Missouri, and one muses what his subsequent career might have been save for a lucky chance that left him idle, and free to become Colonel of the Second Michigan Cavalry. As Colonel his conduct during [illegible] raid upon Booneville, in May, 1862, led to his command of the brigade, and a month later his fight at the same point elicited this encomium from [illegible]: "The coolness, determination, and fearless gallantry displayed by Colonel SHERIDAN and the officers and men of his command in the action, deserve the thanks and admiration of the army." At Perryville the coming General distinguished himself for good judgment and coolness. But it was in the subsequent three days' engagement among the cedar brakes of Stone River, which saw the old year out and the new year in, that SHERIDAN first clearly exhibited his tactical skill in the stress of battle and a splendid steadfastness. "For hours," says a historian, "he held the Confederates at bay—hours precious, priceless, wrenched from the foe and an exultant foe by the skill and nerve of this officer, and bought by the blood of valiant men. All to his right had gone like reeds torn by waves from jutting crags, but the swelling surges dashed in vain against the rocklike resistance of this division. He had lost, in the first onset, [illegible] erward SCHAEFFER—all his brigade commanders killed. He had lost 1796 men, and with [illegible] of their heroic blood had won three hours [illegible] ROSECRANS had been using to the best advantage. 'Here is all that are left,' said he, as he joined his chief." At Chickamauga [illegible] was offered a like stubborn front [illegible] fury, there fell another brigade commander, the lamented LYTLE. In the ever-memorable storming of Missionary Ridge—that famous battle in which the soldiers of the Army of the Cumberland forced their way to the foot of the ridge [illegible] the orders of the General commanding, and then swept over its summit "by their own" [illegible] "the centre of SHERIDAN's division," [illegible] tells us, that "reached the top first, at the [illegible] nearest the crest," instantly [illegible] whole line, breaking almost simultaneously over the heights. Such was the close of SHERIDAN's career at the West.

HALLECK, who is entitled to the credit of having commended Captain SHERIDAN [illegible] head-quarters, to the Governor of Michigan, [illegible] that magistrate applied to him for an officer to command a cavalry regiment, [illegible] other good service. For when General GRANT was planning his Virginia campaign of 1864, [illegible] of his anxiety to find a suitable head for the Cavalry Corps of the Army of the Potomac. "Why not take SHERIDAN?" suggested HALLECK, and GRANT answered, "The very man." The result of this choice, made known from the first step throughout the campaign from the Rapidan to Appomattox, is familiar history.

The combination of good soldiership and good fortune found in nearly all great military successes is visible in SHERIDAN's Virginia [illegible]. Had not his troops confided so absolutely, [illegible] have safely trusted to his star; but they believed in both. Of his cavalry operations with the Army of the Potomac, and his conduct of the campaign in the valley of the Shenandoah, a distinguishing trait was the extreme precautions he took to insure victory before offering or making an operation. Few, if any, Union generals ever fought less at hap-hazard, or with more careful preliminary study, or accomplished great results with less loss. Even when baffled by the enemy he had the art of putting a bold face on the situation, and of persuading others that, on the whole, the outcome had been success. [illegible] most temperaments," writes a former staff officer, "disaster is disheartening, but it seems to [illegible] General SHERIDAN as an [illegible]. Doubtless it is true of SHERIDAN as of every other Union leader in the Virginia campaign, that were he to conduct them again, with the light of present knowledge, he would here and there pursue a different course; but it can not be said that he has any [illegible] or that any conceivable change of method at the time would have added to his present renown as a popular hero.

There is ground for believing that the career of SHERIDAN has not yet reached its climax. [illegible] while there can not fail to be wide-spread satisfaction in seeing at the head of the army a soldier who rendered the country services so brilliant in days of need, and perhaps also a certain feeling of confidence in the propitious influences [illegible] have hitherto attended his public career [illegible] crowned it with success.

SUGAR MAKING IN NEW JERSEY.

In this country we have been dependent for our supply of sugar almost absolutely upon sugar-cane, and as this requires long continued heat to perfect its growth, our "Sugar States" have been only those on the Gulf of Mexico. We have been compelled to import the very great proportion of sugar needed for consumption, but there is much reason to believe that a change in this respect is speedily coming, and some are sufficiently sanguine to assert that the United States will within a limited number of years be able to export sugar, as well as to satisfy our own requirements.

All this is founded on the fact that men are to produce sugar with facility and with certainty from sorghum-cane as well as from sugar-cane, and inasmuch as the sorghum grows readily and successfully as far north as Indian corn can be depended on for a crop, it follows that our sugar States have suddenly become immensely increased in extent.

This it is which gives interest and importance to the sugar-making at Rio Grande, otherwise it would concern none but the owners, now it is really of national importance, and we will state briefly what we have seen, and confine ourselves entirely to what our personal observation has shown.

The Rio Grande Plantation is at the southern end of New Jersey, the company having bought a tract of 3000 acres, the lower border of which is within two miles of Cape May. The land, like most of that between Delaware Bay and the ocean, is level and sandy, being what a farmer would call of poor quality for making a crop. They had, however, learned that sorghum thrives well on land so poor as not to be desirable for the growth of corn, and they selected this particular region as being little liable to injury from early frosts.

They began the cultivation of sorghum on this land in 1880. The whole matter was new, much of their work was experimental, and their apparatus rough and imperfect in its operation; but they have made constant improvements, until now it is no longer an experiment; it is a sugar plantation and a sugar factory in full and successful operation. They planted in April and May of this year 975 acres in sorghum, the fields of it through which we rode extending about two and a half miles. Two varieties were employed, Early Amber and Orange, these two being the only ones of extent, though others were planted in small lots for trial. The Amber matures most quickly, and cutting was commenced about the middle of September, and most of this variety has been already cut and worked.

Chemical research has demonstrated within the last few years two points in relation to sorghum, and on these the great change of which we have spoken entirely depends. The cane must become fully mature, and it must be worked promptly after being cut. With these two conditions, sorghum yields sugar freely and richly; failing in them, it yields only syrup from which no sugar will crystallize. Here is the solution of the difficulty, and at Rio Grande we see the result of attention to the points mentioned. The cane is cut and hauled by mules on a narrow gauge rail track to the mill, and crushed at once. All the operations at the mill are precisely like those for sugar-cane. The company claim several items as points of their own introduction, for which we believe they have, or hope to have, patents, but the fact remains that the juice of mature sorghum-cane will produce its sugar as readily and as surely as that of sugar cane.

The sugar already made this year amounts to about 350,000 pounds; the molasses, over 40,000 gallons. Assuming that the remainder of the crop yields at the same rate, Rio Grande will sell in the neighborhood of 1,000,000 pounds. The wise legislature of New Jersey appropriates a grant of one cent a pound for sorghum sugar and one dollar a ton for sorghum cane produced within the State.

THE LACROSSE CHAMPIONSHIP.

The third annual tourney, given under the auspices of the United States National Lacrosse Association, which took place at the Polo Grounds in this city on October 27, developed the fact that our leading lacrosse clubs had made rapid progress in playing skill within the past year or two, in fact, no exhibition of lacrosse playing seen on the United States at the hands of American club teams has ever equalled in excellence of team work, as well as of individual effort, that which marked this tourney. The prize for which the contesting teams struggled was the Dalrich Challenge Cup, the emblem of the Association championship. This cup was won by the New York Lacrosse Club in the tourney of 1880, but in 1882 the Harvard College Club won it. On this last occasion—the tourney of 1883—the New York Club regained possession of it, but not without a more exciting series of contests with stronger opponents than the victorious team had previously encountered in the same arena. The fourteen contestants this time included the club twelves of New York and Baltimore, and the college twelves of Harvard, Yale, Princeton, and the New York University. The first match brought together the Yale and New York University teams, and the former won easily by the appended score: Goals secured—Yale, 3; New York University, 0. Goals taken—by Spencer, 1, in 5 minutes; McElmury, 1, in 3 minutes. Referee, F. B. Wheelst, of the New York Club.

The second match introduced the team of the Druid Club, of Baltimore, and the Harvard team, the latter having the week before defeated the local rivals, the Unions, of Boston. This encounter proved to be a surprise in its result, as the Druids played in very strong form, and easily defeated their college opponents by the following score: Goals secured—Druid, 3; Harvard, 1. Goals taken—by W. H. D. Pemulman, 1, in 5 minutes; Wrech, 1, in 8 minutes; Other 1, in 8 minutes; Woods 1, in 7 minutes. Referee, J. R. Plummer, of the New York Club.

The next match of the tourney was that between the Princeton and New York teams, and the collegians found their opponents to be a far superior team to the New York twelve they defeated at the tourney of 1882, as the appended score shows: Goals secured—New York, 6; Princeton, 0. Goals taken—by Ritchie 2, in 5 minutes and in 4 minutes, Burns 1, in 7 minutes, McClafferty 1, in 5 minutes. Referee, R. R. Brown, of Baltimore.

The six teams having now faced each other in the first round, the second series of matches was begun, and as Yale drew a bye, the Druids were called upon to face the New York twelve. The result of the contest was a victory for the New York team by a score of two goals to one. Ritchie capturing the first goal for New York and Flannery the second, Wreck taking the single goal for the Druids. This left the final contest for the cup between the New York and Yale teams, and the latter entered the field after an hour's rest, while the New Yorkers had to play their third game in succession with but ten minutes' breathing-spell between each contest. This is the game taken as the subject of our illustration. It proved to be the closest contest of the tourney, the Yales making a gallant struggle for success against them more experienced opponents. The result of the match was the success of the New Yorkers by the appended score: Goals secured—New York, 2; Yale, 0. Goals taken—By Ritchie, 2. Time of goals—first, 25 minutes, second, 4 minutes. Referee, Mr. R. R. Brown, of Baltimore.

MOOSE HUNTING.

The time is close at hand when the moose will become extinct. Pursued at all seasons of the year by roving Indians and hunter troops, in any nothing of the common rank of sportsmen, bulls, cows with young, and half-grown calves are killed indiscriminately at all seasons. These creatures are the largest of the deer family, measuring, when full grown, five feet eight inches or more in height, and weighing twelve hundred pounds or more. They have a coarse, erect mane, while under the throat dangles a long tuft of hair. Animals indigenous to these high latitudes usually assume a white fur during the winter months, that on the moose, on the contrary, becomes much darker in color. Their antlers are palmated and of immense weight and size, averaging six feet from tip to tip, and weighing upward of sixty pounds. These they shed in January. By the month of June they have again attained the normal size. Their hare legs are so disproportionate in length as to seriously interfere with their gymnastics, consequently, when feeding upon grass, they will, if possible, pasture upon a slope. Their hind feet are splayed, and furnished with long, loose, horny points, which rattle as they shamble along. Notwithstanding their awkwardness and great size, when alarmed they travel with astonishing speed, seemingly impossible in an animal crowned with such immense and weighty antlers. His head gear, however, gives him, when in flight, less trouble than his legs. The latter, carried on high so as to prevent him from seeing the ground directly in his front, causes him to trip and stumble over the fallen trunks and branches which may lie in his path. The cow moose is somewhat smaller than the male; her coat has a more reddish tinge. Early in life she gives birth to but one calf, as she advances in years the number is increased to two.

"Crusting" for hunting with snow-shoes), "driving," "creeping," and "calling" are the various methods employed to hunt the moose. "Crusting" is the method employed when snow is upon the ground. It is, moreover, the most certain and deadly manner of killing the animal. In great weight and the formation of its splayed hind feet under it comparatively helpless when struggling and pursued in the crust of the snow. At every step it breaks through the surface cutting its legs, so that its tracks are marked by trails of blood. Even when taken at the dead-line which crosses a officer's cigarette runs on snow-shoes must put forth all his power of endurance in order to overtake it, its strength enabling it to flounder for a considerable distance at great speed. In consequence of the difficulty which the moose experiences in travelling in the snow, they form what are termed "yards." Large numbers congregate together in the depth of the forest. The trampling of their feet soon beats down the deep snow. This forms a compact all about them. As they move in a circle or trotting, this track is always about them. The wolves hover on the edges, ready to pick up any disconcerted old bull which may be expelled by his companions. They know better than to enter the portals, in a moment they would be torn to pieces by the sharp hoofs of the moose.

In the spring and summer the moose frequent the edges of sedgy lakes and lagoons buried deep in the forest. To the waters of these they submerge themselves until only their heads are visible, in order to escape from the tormenting attacks of the black fly. Moreover, they find in these shoots of water aquatic plants on which they delight to feed. At this season they may be approached in canoes much more readily than in the forest.

More reprehensible still is the "calling" of moose. It is, however, often every other form of shooting, whether for large or small game, the most interesting and exciting. It is a sketchy way, however, but no man, on matter who he may be, and how thoroughly equipped with the exalted sporting principle, can resist its most potent attractiveness. "Calling" is practiced during the rutting season. It consists in imitating the call of the cow-moose by means of a birch-bark cone. On a clear, still night the caller, armed with his trumpet, ascends to the top of a high tree. From his lofty perch he projects to a great distance in the still air of the night the lesser of the cow moose. For a long time he repeats the call without a response. At last, in the far distance, the answering cry of the bull is heard. The caller now descends from the tree and joins the hunters at its base. The bull, in response to the call of the guide, approaches nearer and nearer. The success of the stratagem now depends entirely on the skill with which the caller imitates the low deep grunts of the cow. If he makes a single blunder, the male hesitates in his advance, takes alarm, and hurries off. If, on the contrary, his call is up to all the requirements of the occasion, the hunter is rewarded by the sight of a magnificent animal, his crest elevated, and gross wreathe of vapor issuing from his distended nostrils. There is not a moment to lose. The hunter shoots at once. The animal lingers but an instant, for his instinct tells him that where he stands the cow-moose should be.

COLORADO MINING LIFE.

When the snow has disappeared from the passes in the Colorado ranges, so that the mule trains can push their way up the rocky defiles, the miners leave the comfortable log camp where they have spent the winter, and prepare to explore the highest regions in search of the precious metals. Pitching their tents on some desolate plateau where the indications are favorable, they proceed to "prospect," sometimes with success, but oftener with disappointment. Even a promising "find" may lead to nothing, and another winter may send the miners back to their log camps as poor as when they started out in the spring.

For weeks and perhaps months the miners remain in their mountain ranges without news from the outside world, until the passes admit of travel by stage, when tourists invade the picturesque solitudes. The arrival of the first stage-load is always an occasion of great rejoicing and hilarity among the miners. It brings them intelligence from the great world from which they have been secluded, and newspapers weeks old are read with an eagerness of which we can have little conception, and for a few days serve to enliven an existence that is dreary and monotonous beyond comparison.

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

According to a correspondent in London, there is considerable interest there in the question as to what shall be the reward of the Marquis of Lorne on his return from his five years' service as Governor-General of Canada. Governors returning from the office of Governor-General are usually made peers, and peers are ordered in rank. But Lord Lorne is a marquis, and is heir to a dukedom, and it would not be in accordance with custom to give him rank equal to that of his father. It has, therefore, been thought that he would be made a Knight of the Garter, but one of the two vacancies at the disposal of the Queen has been given to the Duke of Argyll, and the other is not likely to be given to her son. There is ample precedent, however, for giving as the marquis a seat in the House of Lords under the present "courtesy title," a notable example being furnished in the case of the late Earl of Derby, who was created a Peer in Parliament under his courtesy title of Lord Stanley, while his father was yet living.

It was a North Carolina paper that entertained an especially kindly feeling toward a Democratic candidate because he "is not better looking than the rest of us, and does not offend our self-love when we look at him." This confession, however, suggests an explanation of the Holman "boom." By common consent Mr. Dana is recognized as one of the handsomest men in the country.

It is fairly astonishing to see the immense crowds that every afternoon and evening fill the great Institute Hall to enjoy the beautiful and well-ordered Fifty-second Annual Exhibition of the American Institute, the largest and most interesting it has given for many years. Whether it is the delightful promenade, the magnificent display, or the fine music that attracts so many thousands it is difficult to say, but certain it is that the house is filled every night. There is something to interest everybody. The farmer will find new mowing-machines, reaping-machines, and all sorts of farm implements; the merchant, new conveniences for his counting room and warehouse; the mechanic will find many evidences of the skill of his companions; the manufacturer can examine the goods his competitor is making; the good housekeeper will discover an every-side house of moments and home comforts for the parlor, the kitchen, and the chamber; and the epigrafic young damsels and happy young wives will find any number of beautiful articles to please their eyes and to bother their lovers and husbands for.

It is said that the name of the Bag o' Nails Inn, in London, was a puzzle to everybody till an antiquary construed one of the old signs, and discovered that Bag o' Nails was a corruption of Bacchanals.

Some of the wealthy patrons of the opera in this city take their valets along to stand guard at the box doors, and so make the applause for the party. But it will be a long time before the most servant will be trusted to go out between acts and procure the shoes for the head of the family.

The difference between a farmer and a planter has been explained by a Southern newspaper, after nearly twenty years' patient and magnanimous waiting on the part of the victorious North. A farmer raises diversified crops, while a planter cultivates cotton or sugar chiefly.

The Episcopal Convention to Philadelphia having inserted the word food in the prayer for deliverance from evils, a Western man desires to have an extra session called in order that cyclone may be included also.

The Saw-Mill Gazette is a new paper which has hope of being considered worthy to be filed.

American aptitude for finding short names for things that must be often mentioned has already provided the designation "seven-five time" for the new standard of that longitude, which is the time of the seventy-fifth meridian.

Men should be too broad, liberal, and sensible to entertain intense hatreds, says a Kansas paper. "In they always result in misery—and occasionally in shooting."

Resolutions have been adopted by the local law-makers in a Kansas town in which the goat is characterized as a "terror," a "curse," and a "ruthless destroyer." The Western goat's fatal gift is his appetite for circus posters.

A gentleman of Fall River who testified before Senator Blair's committee as to the cost of living in Massachusetts succeeded in attracting the attention of mathematicians. He declared that he earned only a hundred dollars last year, of which he paid seventy-two dollars for rent. "Now," says the Boston Herald, "as the records show he paid forty-seven dollars in fines for drunkenness during the time, he had nineteen dollars less than nothing left with which to support his family and buy whiskey; and if he spent it all for whiskey, there is still a frightful disproportion to be explained between nineteen dollars less than nothing's worth of whiskey, and forty-seven dollars' worth of fines."

No. 8.—"At last would have it, however, a grand old Porkyne [illegible] out one day with his dog team. Ho! to see the joy of the hounds; to hear the [illegible] and barking! The old instinct was there, and off they went at a break-neck [illegible] country."

THE YELLOWSTONE GEYSERS.

The geysers of Iceland and New Zealand, wonderful as they are, sink into insignificance when brought into comparison with those of the Yellowstone. None to equal these, either in variety or size, have been found in any other part of the globe.

These magnificent geysers were visited last summer by our artist, Mr. J. W. ALEXANDER, and the picturesque results of his sketches are given in the series of illustrations on page 713. They belong to the upper basin, where the phenomena attending their eruptions are more remarkable than those of the geysers of the lower basin. Prominent among these geysers is one which has received the prosaic name of "Old Faithful," from the regularity of its eruptions. At intervals of about an hour it throws a column six feet in diameter to the height of one hundred and thirty feet, holding it up by a succession of spoutings from four to six minutes. On the subsidence of the eruption the water sinks out of sight within the basin from which it springs. The crater is a conical mound about twelve feet in height, and measuring fifty-four by twenty feet at the top. The eruption makes a splendid spectacle.

The "Bee-hive Geyser" is a smaller mound, on the other side of the river, and when in action, which takes place once in about twenty-four hours, it sends up a column of water about three feet in diameter to the enormous height of two hundred and nineteen feet. The eruption lasts from fifteen to eighteen minutes. Dr. HAYDEN describes [illegible] as assuming a fan shape toward the top, and says that, during the eruptions which he witnessed, it was resolved into fine spray, which appeared to evaporate as soon as formed.

The "Grand Geyser" is one of the most powerful in the basin. Each eruption is announced by a rumbling and a trembling of the ground, followed by a column of steam. Then the water bursts forth in a succession of jets, which rise to the height of from one hundred and seventy to two hundred feet, while the white cloud of steam floats upward [illegible] feet or more. The eruptions take place at intervals of about twenty-three hours, and last about twenty minutes.

The "Giant Geyser" has a rugged, irregular crater, shaped [illegible] like a broken horn. It is eccentric in [illegible] terable but spouting away at [illegible] sometimes throwing water to the height of one hundred and [illegible] greater elevation [illegible] play for hours [illegible] spouting for a few minutes only.

What makes even a very good smoking tobacco bite your tongue? The presence of nitrates. Analysis by Dr. A. Voelcker, F.R.S., consulting Chemist Royal Agricultural Society England, shows only a trace of nitrates in Blackwell's Durham Long Cut. The soil of the [illegible] North Carolina, in which this tobacco is grown, doesn't supply nitrates to the leaf. That is the secret of its delicious mildness. Nothing so pure and luxurious for smoking. Don't forget the brand.—[Adv.]

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS, 1878.
BAKER'S Breakfast Cocoa.
Warranted absolutely pure Cocoa, from which the excess of Oil has been removed. It has three times the strength of Cocoa mixed with Starch, Arrowroot or Sugar, and is therefore far more economical. It is delicious, nourishing, strengthening, easily digested, and admirably adapted for invalids as well as for persons in health.
Sold by Grocers everywhere.
W. BAKER & CO., Dorchester, Mass.

PURDY'S PERFECT PEN.
The "EVER READY"
Is an excellent gold pen with a fountain holder that carries ink enough to write 8 to 30 hours continuously. "The ink begins to flow the moment the pen touches the paper and continues, with even regularity, until the writing is done."—Rev. Alfred Taylor. It is warranted not to clog or get out of order, and to give satisfaction on 30 days trial, or the money will be refunded. Agents wanted. Send for circulars.
JOHN S. PURDY, 304 Broadway, New York.

A Great Conflagration
That sweeps away a whole city, starts from a flame so small that a glass of water would extinguish it. In like manner, the most painful and fatal maladies of the throat and lungs ordinarily develop from small beginnings, not difficult of cure if promptly treated with the proper remedy. But their progress is insidious and delay may be fatal. Colds and coughs lead to Laryngitis, Asthma, Bronchitis, Pneumonia, and Consumption. The only medicine certain to cure every bronchial and pulmonary affection not absolutely incurable is
Ayer's Cherry Pectoral.
During 40 years it has steadily grown in popular estimation, and is now a household remedy in many thousands of families. Persons whose lives were preserved by AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL when they were young, are now saving the lives of their children with it. Leading physicians extol its virtues and prescribe it in their practice. Intelligent druggists everywhere report noteworthy cures effected by it, within their personal knowledge.

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.
EPPS'S COCOA.
BREAKFAST.
"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected Cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately flavored beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.
Made simply with boiling water or milk. Sold in tins only (½ lb. and lb.) by Grocers, labelled thus:

DUPLEX CORSET Manufactured only by the BOSTON CORSET CO. Why these corsets have conquered all competitors. They are adjustable over the hips by strap and buckle, and can be made to fit any form instantly. They have no bones to break over the hips. They are made with double seams and will not rip. They have double bones and double steels. Money refunded for any corset not satisfactory. Beware of imitations and infringements. Be sure the word DUPLEX is on every corset. The great popularity of the Celebrated Duplex Corset has tempted unprincipled manufacturers to sell worthless imitations. We shall prosecute all such manufacturers and dealers selling such infringements to the full extent of the law. For sale by all dealers in Corsets.

THE ELECTIONS

THE result of the election of the 6th of November was a singular vindication of the good sense of the people, and a striking illustration of the independent character of the Republican party. Last year, in New York, the Democratic Governor was elected by nearly two hundred thousand majority, and the Legislature was wholly under Democratic control. This year the head of the Democratic State ticket is defeated, and the Legislature is Republican by a large majority. In Massachusetts BUTLER and Butlerism are overthrown. In Pennsylvania the Democratic success of last year is reversed. In Maryland the result was warmly contested; and in Brooklyn Mayor Low is re-elected. The significance of all this is not to be mistaken. The insolent Democratic contempt for the intelligence of the people has been sharply rebuked. As we have often said, the result of last year did not indicate preference of Democratic rule; it was a protest of Republicans against Republican abuse. The people naturally prefer Republican ascendency, and as the Republicans during the year have shown plainly a disposition to reform, and the Democrats have shown nothing but a contempt for political character and principle, and sought to hustle the country by a careful evasion of any positive policy, and a silly cry of "Turn 'em out," the people have now spoken, and the Republicans are substantially victorious.

Any other result would have been discreditable to a popular system. For what was the attitude of the Democrats? In Massachusetts they had selected BUTLER as their representative. In New York they had practically surrendered to JOHN KELLY. In Maryland their own Governor had exposed their dishonesty. In Brooklyn they had sought by a mere party appeal to secure the defeat of the ablest and most incorruptible Mayor, who wholly abjured partisanship in municipal administration. In the First District of New York they supported for Senator a man who had been removed for bribery by their own Governor; and everywhere they had sneered at reform. There was no policy advocated, no principle asserted; and no intelligent man upon a survey of the situation could seriously have supposed that the public welfare was to be promoted by Democratic success. The re-election of BUTLER, the defeat of Mayor LOW, an emphatic majority for the Democratic State candidates and the Legislature in New York, would have revealed a public indifference which would have been alarming.

The great moral of the result is obvious, and it is most encouraging. It is not that the Republicans are sure to elect the President next year, but that the national election will be decided intelligently and deliberately. The Democrats have learned that the Presidency is not to be caught by a trick or a cry. The Republicans have learned that the old methods of party management are fatal, and that the hope of success next year lies in Republican identification with honest politics and progressive reform. Those Republicans who have secretly felt that the overthrow of the machine was the downfall of the party have now seen that the suspicion of the restoration of the machine last year defeated the party by the largest majority upon record, and that the practical disappearance of the machine this year has totally reversed the result, and secured a Democratic defeat. The elections of this year show quite as plainly as those of last year that the balance of political power is now held by independent voters. They incline generally, no doubt, to the Republican party; and the same good sense which has marked the course of that party during the year, with a frank declaration of the logical Republican position next year, and the nomination of a representative candidate, now plainly promises Republican success.

THE GOVERNOR'S MISTAKE.

GOVERNOR CLEVELAND made one great, but certainly not an irremediable, mistake during the recent political contest. He wrote a letter to JOHN KELLY in which he said that for his own personal comfort and satisfaction he did not wish Senator GRADY to be re-elected, and he appealed to MR. KELLY to prevent it. As politics are usually managed, it is not unusual for an intimation to be given out in a way which is known to be authoritative that this or that nomination will be or will not be agreeable to the Executive. But he does not personally appear. The very fact of the letter, therefore, shows the sincerity and simplicity of the Governor. He goes openly and directly to his object. But he should not have had such an object, as he now doubtless sees. It was a signal error to write the letter. But he must now perceive it as clearly that the error will not be repeated.

If the Governor had sent a circular into every Senatorial district in the State, or had published a proclamation, announcing his desire to have certain persons elected to the Legislature or defeated, the storm of public censure would have been an overwhelming tempest. But this is precisely what he did in one district. He wrote to the person who, as he supposed, represented its voting force, and told him that he did not wish a certain person to be elected. The Constitution, however, vests the election of members of the Legislature in the people, not in the Governor. If the Governor should dictate the selection of the Legislature, the two branches of the government, which are purposely separated, would be united, and the executive and legislative powers would be blended in the hands of the Governor. The letter was an extraordinary error.

But it threw great light upon the actual political situation. The Governor did not address himself to the district, but to a single voter in it, thus recognizing the fact that that voter, and not the people, elected the Senator. This, unluckily, is true. MR. GRADY represented MR. KELLY in the late Legislature, not the people of a district. This most dangerous system the Governor acknowledged by addressing his letter to MR. KELLY. But we attribute the great error of the Governor to inexperience and want of thought, not to any discreditable motive. Under a constitutional system, however, executive acts which proceed from thoughtlessness are sometimes as mischievous as those which are designed.

EX-JUDGE-ADVOCATE-GENERAL HOLT

THE prominent actors in a great civil war will always be the victims of bitter calumny and malignant falsehood, and the leaders in the American contest of twenty years ago do not escape the common fate. JACOB THOMPSON, a member of BUCHANAN'S cabinet, and a Southern leader in the war, but unknown in the field, and notorious only as one of the emissaries in Canada to plot the burning of Northern cities and to spread mortal infection through the loyal States, recently took occasion to malign ex-Judge-Advocate-General JOSEPH HOLT, who is now living quietly in Washington, retired from all public activity, and seeking no controversy. The unprovoked attack of THOMPSON made no public impression, and has not been noticed by the press. But General HOLT, unwilling that statements should pass unchallenged which, if not summarily and promptly refuted, may be hereafter accepted as authentic, has issued a complete and conclusive exposure of THOMPSON'S calumnies, which refer not only to the conduct of General HOLT during the war, but to the circumstances of his appointment to the cabinet of BUCHANAN. The details we do not cite. It is enough that the answer shows completely the falseness of the charges.

But one of THOMPSON'S accusations is made important by a recent article of Mr. BURTON N. HARRISON'S, the private secretary of JEFFERSON DAVIS, who, in discrediting DAVIS'S capture, speaks of a charge against him as "the charge invented by STANTON and HOLT of participation in the plot to murder Mr. LINCOLN." And again he says: "STANTON and HOLT, lawyers both, very well knew that Mr. DAVIS could never be convicted upon an indictment for treason, but were determined to hang him anyhow, and were in search of a pretext for doing so." Mr. STANTON is dead, and his patriotic energy and public service in the suppression of the rebellion were such that a hostile feeling which would easily credit any injurious charge against him is but natural to any man who shared the fortunes and aided the enterprise of JEFFERSON DAVIS. For General HOLT we have no other right to speak than that which belongs to every loyal citizen who sees a steadfast friend and honorable and patriotic servant of the cause of the Union most unwarrantably assailed.

The assertions of Mr HARRISON, which accuse General HOLT of the most devilish malignity—"determined to hang him anyhow"—are wholly unsustained by evidence. They are mere assertions, yet they are made as if they stated matters of common knowledge. But the real position of General HOLT may be gathered from his reply to a similar allegation of JACOB THOMPSON'S that General HOLT tried to implicate him in the assassination. The facts are of record that a man named CONOVER offered to procure evidence for the investigation; that upon consideration his offer was accepted, that witnesses were produced by him, that nothing occurred to excite the slightest suspicion of CONOVER'S integrity until two witnesses confessed that they had sworn falsely, being suborned by CONOVER, upon which General HOLT promptly and thoroughly investigated the matter, and convinced of the truth of the confessions, he instantly prosecuted CONOVER for perjury and subornation of perjury, convicted him, and sent him to the penitentiary. This throughout was the course of honesty, of humanity, of justice, and legality, and it is a far candid way to decide whether a public officer, and that officer General HOLT, who took this course, was a mere "inventor" charges against JEFFERSON DAVIS, or to be "determined to hang him anyhow," by hook or by crook justly or unjustly. We do not propose to enter upon any controversy. The allegation against General HOLT has been made, and we submit facts a reply. It may be possible to relieve the favor of the circumstances of DAVIS'S capture as they have been hitherto understood, but it is not necessary to that end to assume as of course the truth of the most disgraceful imputations upon loyal citizens and faithful public servants. The lost cause will certainly not gain by re-opening controversy, nor by assailing honorable and patriotic men.

A USEFUL RECORD

JUST before the election the civil service reform associations in New York, Brooklyn, and Buffalo in this State, asked the views of candidates upon the enforcement of the State law, which provides rules for the municipal service. A large number of answers were received, and almost all of them express the intention of supporting the law. It will be observed that this is very different from a vague declaration in favor of reform in the abstract and of good government in general. It is a distinct pledge to support an actual law.

The replies received from the successful candidates will be published, and the little pamphlet which they will form will be a convenient manual for reference when any proposition affecting the enforcement of the law appears in the Legislature. We are glad to say that many Democratic candidates adhered unswervedly in their replies to the soundest principles of reform. But, for some reason, none of the Democratic candidates for the State offices responded. This was exceedingly suspicious, because in that case silence was peculiarly expressive. The State law establishing the new system does not go into effect until the 4th of January, which leaves time for "a clean sweep" in every department by the newly elected officers. They will be carefully watched to see whether they propose to respect the spirit and purpose of the law. Should they do so, we shall gladly record the fact; if we shall certainly point out a disregard of the law.

In the omission of which we speak, as in their general treatment of the whole subject since their return to power became possible, the Democrats have foolishly alienated the friends of reform and the whole body of independent voters, whom it is not wise to alienate. They have done nothing whatever as a party—although individual Democrats are among the most efficient friends of reform—to persuade the country that Democratic success means anything more than a distribution of the spoils among Democrats. The whole influence of the reform sentiment, therefore, will probably be against the Democratic party next year, and of the actual power of that sentiment the polls the elections of this year are very significant.

THE RETIREMENT OF GENERAL SHERMAN

THE retirement of General SHERMAN from the command of the army is a very important event, achieved so quietly as to be almost ignored. But the attendant circumstances of the change have a most agreeable Republican simplicity. We quote the account from the Herald:

"General SHERMAN was in his office at twelve o'clock, when General SHERMAN, accompanied by the three members of his staff, entered the building. The former was still the general commanding the army, while General SHERMAN was still the commander of the Military Division of the Missouri. General SHERMAN and his staff engaged in conversation for half an hour talking about old times, matters that were likely to come before the latter as commander. A few minutes later, when it was twelve o'clock, or Congress, the official order of General SHERMAN relinquishing his old command was promulgated. General SHERMAN arose from his desk, and General SHERMAN at once occupied the seat as the commander of the army. That was all the formality or ceremony observed. The official orders announcing the transfer of the command and its assumption were in keeping with the simplicity of the act of the two great Generals."

General SHERMAN retires with the universal regard and respect of his countrymen after an illustrious military career which has placed him among the great soldiers of his time. His march to the sea will always rank among the most masterly [illegible] and the most [illegible] and striking episodes in military history. [illegible] "good times" has personal qualities will [illegible] contribute, as they have [illegible] him to his [illegible] contemporaries. His [illegible] and plicity, his quaint humor and fluent, racy speech, even his bluntness and want of tact, add a certain original charm to his character and personality, upon which the camp and the mess-room will long fondly dwell, while for his signal service to his country, history will always honor his name.

General SHERMAN is the one great and successful General in this country who has played no political part. The leader of the Revolution was most justly and fitly the first President, in no sense, however, as a politician, but as a patriot. General JACKSON, the hero of the second war with England, General TAYLOR, the chief figure of the Mexican war, and General GRANT, the General of the civil war, were all called to the Presidency, while SCOTT was called, but not chosen. SHERMAN in military genius is certainly the peer of any of them. But thus far he has declined the contests of politics. For his own peace and renown he should still decline. His temperament is not that of a politician, and he would be ill at ease in the fierce personal controversies from which he could not stay his voice and his pen. Meanwhile he enters upon his retirement with unabated vigor, and with the grateful affection of his country, which turns with confidence and admiration to his successor.

THE BROOKLYN VICTORY.

THE re-election of Mayor LOW in Brooklyn is a subject of national congratulation, and for any party reason, but on an illustration of the ability of individual citizens to rise above party. The best qualities of American citizenship were shown in his support, not only in the great shill with which the work of the canvass was conducted, but in the character and activity of his supporters, and in the principle involved. The opposition to him was desperate and untiring, and it was carefully and skillfully organized. It relied solely upon the party machine and spur.

But in the dead pull between a mere partisan and an honestly non-partisan municipal government the people of Brooklyn have beaten the most unscrupulous and clever politicians. Among these were machine Republicans who would gladly have seen Mayor LOW defeated, because his success would be the victory of honorable and decent political methods. As Brooklyn is a Democratic city by a considerable majority, and as such Republicans undoubtedly voted against the Mayor, his majority is clearly due to Democrats who are independent enough to vote according to their convictions and not according to orders.

Mr. ALFRED C. CHAPIN, the late Speaker of the Assembly, and the successful Democratic candidate for Comptroller, was most one of these Democrats. He lives in Brooklyn. He was first elected to the Assembly to a strong Republican district by independent Republican votes. But as Speaker of the Democratic Assembly his course was strongly partisan. As President of the Democratic Convention at Buffalo, he claimed for his party the laurels of civil service reform. It would be interesting to know why Mr. CHAPIN, as a State candidate, returned no answer to the inquiries of the Reform Association, and why during the late contest his voice and influence were thrown in favor of a movement for a mere partisan control of the city government, confessedly for a partisan purpose, against one of the most honorable and successful practical endeavors ever made to carry on municipal administration upon business and non-partisan principles. It is against Mr. CHAPIN'S efforts that reform has triumphed in Brooklyn, and both his silence and his speech in the campaign will be remembered. But however individuals falter and fail, the proof which the re-election of Mr LOW affords of the sound political health of an immense city is most gratifying to every man who believes in popular intelligence, and it is of the utmost encouragement to those who hold that honest and clean politics are not always unsuccessful politics.

THE MASSACHUSETTS VICTORY

THE result in Massachusetts is of the same general kind as that in Brooklyn. They are both triumphs of honesty, intelligence, and ability over mere partisan demagogery. In both cases there was the same appeal to class hatred, the same endeavor to excite prejudice, in the one case against Mr ROBINSON, who is a poor man and the son of a poor farmer, as a "silk-stocking candidate," and in the other against Mr. LOW as a millionaire.

If it be a crime to be rich, General BUTLER and Mr. TILDEN and hosts of their supporters are guilty, and industrious and intelligent Americans everywhere are trying to be guilty. The appeal was worthy of its Democratic origin, and Mayor LOW a treatment of it was one of the best incidents of the canvass. "I am accused of being a rich man. Well, fellow-citizens, a man's a man for a' that."

In both cases the victory was that of the sturdy, industrious, intelligent, moral, and self-respecting people, who are the strength and the hope of the American republic. Bolterism won the lowest form of demagogery, and its support by the Democratic party in Massachusetts is a revelation of the spirit and character of that party which will be carefully remembered next year.

AMERICA IN GREECE.

AT a recent meeting of the Archæological Institute at Boston the latest accounts from the American classical school at Athens and from the explorations at Assos were announced. The school was established by the co-operation of fourteen colleges, including Harvard, Yale, Columbia, Cornell, Johns Hopkins, the universities of Michigan, of Virginia, and of California, and each of the fourteen colleges is to provide for one year a director of the school, which will train classical students upon the spot, in the air, surrounded by the relics and the language of Greece.

Professor GOODWIN, of Harvard, was the first director, and his report speaks most favorably, not only of the design, but of the results of the school. He is of opinion, however, after his experience, that a permanent director is indispensable, because of the desirability of local knowledge, which can not be adequately acquired in a year.

The news from Assos, of which Professor NORTON gave an interesting account in New York last winter, shows both how valuable the work at that point is, and at what disadvantage it is prosecuted, owing to Turkish dominion, a bad and trying climate, a wretched population, and imperfect communications. There are, however, the results of two years of excellent work to be prepared, and the report of it, with the publications already issued by the Institute, are among the best monuments of American scholarship.

CONVICT LABOR.

THE large vote in the State of New York at the late election for the abolition of the contract system of convict labor is a mere expression of opinion, and effects no change. It will, however, influence legislation, and the question assumes an immediate practical importance which gives peculiar significance to Mr. SANBORN'S admirable article elsewhere in this paper. No man in the country is more competent to discuss the subject, and his paper is exceedingly instructive and suggestive. He favors, upon the whole, Mr. BROCKWAY'S view, and the policy which Mr. BROCKWAY and Mr SANBORN both approve has the strongest claim upon public favor.

THE PEDESTAL LOAN EXHIBITION

IT is a pity, and it is a little shameful, that the subscription for the BARTHOLDI pedestal fund still lingers. But it is not so shameful as the long delay in raising the funds for the Bunker Hill Monument fifty years ago. WEBSTER delivered the address at the laying of its corner-stone in 1825, and he celebrated its completion, but not until 1843.

The committee upon the pedestal are indefatigable. They have touched every chord which ought to respond. Their diligence and activity are the illustration of what should be the general disposition. If coal and refelligence will build a pedestal, the BARTHOLDI pedestal will be built. The present device is a great art loan exhibition. The committee has laid all the best collections in New York and in other cities under contribution, and loans are open the way from England. Moreover, the great New York galleries will be probably thrown open to the public for a few during the month of December.

The character of the ladies and gentlemen in charge of the details of the exhibition, and the resources at their command, are such that there is promise of a collection such as has not been seen since the Metropolitan Sanitary Fair. It will be an exposition of much of the best art treasure in the country, not, of course, in paintings alone, but in every form of decorative art, old china, old lace, coins, medals, arms and armor, embroidery, carving, costume, and all things beautiful and rare. The exhibition will be held at the National Academy of Design, and any one who is willing to contribute should address Mr. MONTAGUE MARKS, 23 Union Square, New York.

DORÉ'S STATUE OF DUMAS.

A BRONZE statue of ALEXANDRE DUMAS, by GUSTAVE DORÉ, has just been erected in PARIS. As EDMOND ABOUT said at the unveiling, it is the first statue obtained in France by a simple novelist. In the evening, says the report, of some of the theatres his dramas were played; but "to-morrow DORÉ'S statue alone will recall the memory of the great entertainer."

The statue represents DUMAS sitting wrapped in a loose robe, the right hand holding a pen and hanging over one arm of the chair, the left hand holding a manuscript volume; the face is turned to the right with a pensive smile, as if half amused with the fancies that he is about to record. Upon the pedestal is a bass-relief of a young woman and an artisan listening to the reading of one of DUMAS'S romances, and upon the other side is a figure of D'Artagnan.

D'Artagnan was a favorite character of THACKERAY'S. He classed him with Leatherstocking and other prize heroes of fiction. THACKERAY had the true love of the novel, a delight in story telling. Yet he once that he could not himself tell a story without preaching little sermons by the way. Nevertheless he greatly admired those who could, and his admiration of DUMAS as a generous and sincere. EDMOND ABOUT'S little speech at the statue was a sparkling panegyric of the novelist, the prodigal he left a princely heritage, the egotist who gave his life to kindred and country, the fond parent who survives in no immortal son. It was a gay and glittering tribute, not to the most profound, no significant, or elevating, but to the most fascinating and entertaining of French story-tellers.

PERSONAL.

THE young artists of this country may work under unusual stimulus this winter. In addition to the prize of $3000 offered by the Messrs. HARPER, prizes of $300, $200, and $100 have been instituted by Mr JULIUS HALLGARTEN, and a further prize of $300 is the gift of Mr. THOMAS B CLARK. The National Academy of Design will arrange for the distribution of Messrs. HALLGARTEN and CLARK'S prizes, and Mr. T. ADDISON RICHARDS, corresponding secretary of the institution, will give information to applicants.

—The Japanese are not altogether destitute of a sense of personal dignity, as was illustrated recently in a school in New Haven. A small Jap, aged fourteen, feeling that he had been insulted by one of his comrades, surprised his teacher by gravely asking permission to kill the offending lad. It is to his credit, however, that he seemed entirely satisfied when told that such was not the custom of the country.

—Among the copies of old masters now in the loan collection of the Metropolitan Museum of Art are several works by MR. WILLIAM PAGE — among them one of RAPHAEL'S Madonnas (in which the American artist has taken the liberty to change the color of the child's shirt from a positive yellow to white) and several examples of TITIAN. It was while painting these latter pictures that Mr PAGE established his scientific method of treating flesh-tones and color. A correspondent of this journal writes: "I have a diary, written by Mr PAGE, mostly at dictation, while he was copying the 'Venus' of TITIAN, containing an analysis of his own methods, even in the matter of the ultimate glazings. I wish that two or three of Mr. PAGE'S own 'Venuses' could be placed beside these copies; but they would all need the richest surroundings and the most elevated appreciation. I wait with curious anxiety for the effect of this startling advance in the exhibition of the nude. Mr PAGE has never been able to exhibit his 'Venus' as freely as its art might demand, though he modelled it strictly from the antique, and designed by it to express a purely ideal character. If our people are ready to appreciate this high art, it is a great advance."

—Mr THOMAS NAST has been very seriously ill with pneumonia at his residence in Morristown, New Jersey. His friends throughout the country will be glad to learn that he is recovering.

—The portraits of Messrs. NILES and HAVES, the successful Republican candidates in Pennsylvania, appeared in HARPER'S WEEKLY for July 21; that of the Hon. JOSEPH H CARR, re-elected Secretary of State in New York, in the issue for September 29, and those of the successful Democratic candidates in the issue for October 9. The portrait of the Hon GEORGE D ROUSSON appeared in this paper for September 29.

—The Empress of Germany has honored herself by sending to Mrs ANNA OTTENDORFER, of this city, a beautiful silver decoration in recognition of her noble and great charities. The gift is inscribed with the words, "For Merit," and shows the monogram of her Imperial Highness, surmounted by a crown. The following letter accompanied it: "To Mrs ANNA OTTENDORFER, New York: — I have learned with special gratification of your humanitarian works, especially in favor of our countrymen and women in America, and desire to show to you that works of charity done abroad are also gratefully remembered in our native country by sending you herewith a token of merit. — AUGUSTA.—Homburg-vor-der-Höhe, September 18, 1883."

—A marriage notice in the Baltimore American of May 22, 1802, reads as follows: "Married at Guilford, on the 24th ult., Mr. JAMES DENNIS, a Revolutionary pensioner, to EDNA DENNIS, after a cruel and distressing divorcement of more than two years."

—Captain CORNHAM left Dover on the 26th of October for Calais, at eight o'clock A.M. on a raft that was provided with a log-sail and four oars. A light wind from the northwest soon became a strong breeze, and at two o'clock the captain had sailed across the Channel, and was greeted by an enthusiastic crowd on the Calais docks.

—Mr EDWARD CLARKE, Member of Parliament, advises college students to study short-hand sailing, and to try, "at least for a time in their lives, the experiment of totally abstaining from alcoholic stimulants." The president of a college in Wales informs his students that it is a bad error to suppose that the study required of them is for the sake of the examinations; "on the contrary, examinations are for the sake of the study:" and that "athletic exercise of the body is necessary to render the mind healthy."

—From the London Times: "Those who know Mr MAPLESON will readily believe that an experienced an impresario would not enter the arena unless he were to some extent secured from pecuniary loss. Mr ABBEY, on the other hand, is believed to be supported by the enormous financial prestige of the name of VANDERBILT. That American CROESUS might say with BERTRAM, in CHARLOTTE'S Old Bachelor: 'Why, 'tass I sung and danced; I gave music in the voice, and life to the measures. Look you here, Stivia' [pulling out a purse and chinking it], 'here are songs and dances, poetry and music. Mark! how sweetly our guineas rhyme to one another, and how they dance to the music of their own chink!' Upon the question whether he or the rival financiers at the other theatre will the sooner grow tired of producing this agreeable but very expensive 'chink,' the final verdict of the Metropolitan Opera-house or the Academy of Music will largely depend."

—Field-Marshal VON MOLTKE, now eighty-four years old, is in the habit of rising early. He works till the hour of his simple dinner, having always his small bed near him, as was the custom of FREDERICK the Great. He smokes some too, but usually only in the forenoon. His afternoons are given to paying or receiving visits, and his evenings to whist, a favorite pastime which the old soldier did not intermit even in the smoke of the Franco-German war. Next to the Emperor, the Field Marshal is the most popular man in Germany.

—The survivors of the memorable charge at Balaklava have been eating an anniversary dinner, and it is believed that some of them were less spry after the dinner than after the charge.

—Many missions are now established on the banks of the Congo, and the slave-trade has become too hazardous to be carried on. STANLEY'S discoveries have shown that the river, with its many tributaries, is of more interest to European settlers than to slave-dealers. Several European governments are now deeply interested in the region, and a simple operation among traders might result in a European war.

MASSACHUSETTS.

"ONE MINUTE, MR. ROBINSON, WHILE I SWEEP OUT THIS RUBBISH."

AFTER THE STORM.

WILL HE EVER BE ABLE TO FIND THE TRAIL AGAIN?

THE LATE GOVERNOR RANDOLPH.

NEW JERSEY loses an unimpeachable statesman in the death of ex-Governor THEODORE F. RANDOLPH, who suddenly succumbed to heart-disease at his home in Morristown, on the 24th of November, in the 61st year of his age. A descendant of the RANDOLPHS of Roanoke and the son of a member of Congress, the traditions of his house were closely allied to the service of the State, and after reading proof on a newspaper office, and studying a fortune by dealing in coal and iron, he became successively a member of Assembly, a State Senator, Governor of New Jersey, and Senator of the United States. While President of the Morris and Essex Railroad Company he caused its stock to double in value. While Governor he secured the abolition of the tax on gross receipts upon every passenger who travelled through New Jersey, under the State person self-assessing and self-collecting and promptness presented a threatened riot against the Orangemen.

LORD LANSDOWNE.

THE new Governor-General of Canada has an illustrious lineage. HENRY CHARLES KEITH PETTY FITZMAURICE, Marquis of Lansdowne, traces his origin through the Earls of Kerry to WALTER FITZ OTHO, Castellan of Windsor in the eleventh century. His grandfather, an eloquent public speaker and distinguished statesman, was Chancellor of the Exchequer and Lord President of the Council. His father was a Lord of the Treasury and Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. One of his ancestors, the first Earl of Kerry, had the honor of being selected for undertaking a survey of Ireland, and in 1666, the years after his gaining experience had completed the measurement of 2 millions acres of Tipperary land. The present Marquis is no stranger to public life. Having survived the rumor that the dynamiters were to pay him attentions, he was brilliantly inaugurated in Quebec on the 25th ult. The walls of the Government Building were gayly hung with bunting, and the canopied throne draped with crimson cloth, and decorated with the arms of Louise and Lansdowne. On his way to the ceremonies the Marquis, in Governor-General's uniform, with Lady [illegible] by his side, acknowledged the frequent appearance of the crowd that lined the streets. The Royal Commission appointing him to the office was read, and the oath of allegiance administered in the presence of a multitude of distinguished spectators. To the Mayor of Quebec, who had presented an address of welcome, Lord [illegible] expressed thanks, trusting that his cordial reception [illegible] a happy augury of the relations that would [illegible] and the citizens of Quebec. "I accept the [illegible]," he continued, "in the name of the illustrious sovereign whose commission I have the honor to hold, and toward whom the people of the Dominion entertain feelings of loyalty and devotion not less profound than those of her subjects on the other side of the ocean." The citizens of the United States will wish Lord Lansdowne a pleasant and prosperous administration.

CHAPTER XXVI.

HARRY HAS A LITTLE SURPRISE.

AFTER I had helped Lady Constance into her brougham, I walked slowly back to Sloane Street in the gray light of the summer morning. The sun had already risen by the time that I reached my rooms, and I was so hopelessly broad awake that it was ridiculous to think of going to bed. I dropped into an arm-chair, lighted a cigar, and reflected over all that had passed during the night. I was not altogether satisfied. There was a certain vulgarity about the service which I was required to perform. Like Naaman the Syrian, I should have been instinctively pleased if I had been asked to do some great thing, and an idea of the extreme juvenility of my temperament at that epoch may be gathered from the fact that I spent a good hour in idle imaginings and introspections before I realized that the raising of £3000 would not, after all, be a task of the easiest kind. In fact, upon further consideration, I didn't in the least see how the thing was to be done. Unfortunately, the small capital which I had inherited was left, under my father's will, in the hands of trustees until I should have reached the age of five-and-twenty, and was consequently not available; to ask my uncle to advance me the sum was out of the question; and of the ways and requirements of money-lenders I knew next to nothing. It seemed tolerably clear, however, that I should have to seek out some accommodating Hebrew now. The question was, Where was I to go? and What security was it in my power to offer?

In this strait I bethought me of Harry, whose experience would in all probability prove equal to the emergency, and I determined to consult him forthwith. He had given me his address—Clarence Cottage, Richmond Hill—as I often had occasion to send him a note, and it now occurred to me that I could not spend a fine morning better than by riding down to see him. It was true that he had expressed a strong objection to my doing this, but I thought, nevertheless, that I would chance his displeasure and go. I did not want to lose time, and probably he would be good-natured enough to pardon my intrusion in consideration of the pressing nature of my errand.

After taking a bath and changing my clothes I walked round to the stables, where I saddled my horse, to the astonishment of the sleepy helper, who was the only man about, and rode slowly away westward, capping

"The world of pleasant sounds and sights
That vanish with the dew."

I jogged along easily through Hammersmith and Barnes to Wimbledon, and by indulging my horse with a gallop over the common, and taking a circuitous route across Richmond Park, managed to put off the time until nine o'clock; by which hour Harry would, I presumed, be ready to receive an early visitor. From what he had told me I imagined that Clarence Cottage was situated in a back alley, and was therefore pleasantly surprised when the policeman to whom I applied for information pointed out to me a pretty little rustic dwelling, overgrown with creepers, and standing in a small garden. Having remembered the position, I rode away to stable my horse, and presently returned on foot.

"Chapman?" said the maid-servant who opened the door for

THE "ROYAL IRISH" AT TEL-EL-KEBIR.

By the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman."

Terax's ne'er a lad in all our band
But loves the shamrock green,
Thinks with dimmed eyes of Erin's skies,
And sees that rail between.
Yet on we march through shifting sands,
'Neath stars with ghostly sheen
Each man goes by content to die
For country and for Queen.

Full well we know there's grief at home
That blights our shamrock fair,
But here we see pure loyalty,
Ready to do and dare.
So on we march 'neath heaven's wide dome,
Dark, quiet, and serene,
To conquer brave or find a grave,
For country and for Queen.

Soft, soft we step, and make no noise,
In silence one and all,
The Egyptian day dawns red and gray—
Who'll see the evening fall?
But be it life or death, my boys,
Let's keep our shamrock green!
Where'er beside, we lived, we died,
For country and for Queen.

A TURK'S CAP.

AN EXCEEDINGLY BRIEF PARLOR PLAY, PERFORMED ONE NIGHT ONLY.

PERSONAGES MOST CONCERNED THEREIN.

Hope Proctor: a country girl; nineteen; poor in the worldly sense of the word, but rich in goodness, intelligence, and beauty.

Ernest Gaynor: a New York city youth, to love with Hope, spending his vacation in Whitrose; twenty-three; and also poor in the worldly, etc., etc., but rich in goodness, etc., etc.

Madeline Clinton: from San Francisco; twenty-one; very rich in the worldly, etc., etc., but not at all poor in goodness, etc., etc.

Norah Nixon: a native of Milwaukee, at present residing in New York; twenty-eight; in love with Ernest, and blissfully well off in the worldly, etc., etc., but rather poor in goodness, etc., etc.

Nancy Warner: a humble relation of Norah's; of uncertain age and no importance whatever.

I.

Scene: A large and brilliantly lighted parlor in Grandmother Proctor's very old fashioned country house. Flowers and vines everywhere. Some body playing a waltz on the piano, accompanied by somebody on the harp. Persons laden with the sweets of roses, lilies, and honeysuckles floating in at the open windows. Feminine figures in pink, and marvelous figures in blue, all elaborately masked, dancing or strolling about, with the exception of two girls, Norah Nixon and Nancy Warner, who are standing just outside of a door leading into the garden, looking on.

Nancy. And how are you to know her in this crowd of girls all dressed alike?

Norah. Why, haven't I told you? I thought I had. Well, you see, this afternoon I was walking through the lane that divides the hotel from the Furman cottage, and hearing Jessie's voice—which, although I have heard it as seldom, I could recognize by its peculiar lisp anywhere—on the other side of the hedge (she is Hope Proctor's most intimate friend, you know), I stopped to—rest. "I don't be able to get there until quite late," she was saying, "and unless you give me some clew to your identity, Hope, I'm afraid it will be impossible for me to find you out." "I shall wear my favorite Turk's cap," says my lady Hope, "but mind you don't breathe it to another soul, for I don't want to be recognized by any one but you." "All the same, you will be," said I to myself, "and in consequence you will hear some truths about Mr Ernest Gaynor that may induce you to withdraw your encouraging smiles from that too-willing-to-be-encouraged young gentleman."

Nancy. But why are you so bitter about Ernest, Norah? You used to like him very much once.

Norah. Ah! there's the rub. I did like him very much, and he liked me, and would have liked me more, if this girl, whom he has known only a few weeks, hadn't bewitched him with her big gray eyes, her blushes, and her buttercup and daisy ways. But I think I can persuade her to turn those eyes away when he approaches by telling her what he really is, in spite of his distingué appearance, and recalling to her mind a promise, of which I happened to hear by the merest chance, that she made her dying mother. She can't afford to marry Ernest, and I can. And I'm going to win him back if possible. Ah! there's a Turk's cap. (She darts from Nancy's side, for lo! down a tall slender figure whose black satin mask is surmounted by a bright scarlet fez, and quickly overtakes it.) A word with you, fair maiden.

Scarlet Fez. A hundred, if you like.

Norah. Thank you. A hundred be it, then. That will suit me better. You are trying to discover Ernest Gaynor; I can help you to a greater discovery in regard to that young man than any you have yet made, or are likely, unaided, to make. Do you know who and what he is?

Scarlet Fez. Yes: a handsome, clever, lovable fellow.

Norah. Granted. But none the less the son of a common workman and ex-waiting maid, and a lower clerk, at a salary of twenty dollars a week, with no hope of promotion, in a merchant's counting house.

Scarlet Fez. Well?

Norah. Consequently no match for you. You are poor yourself, and entirely dependent upon the caprices of a whimsical old grandmother, who will cut you off completely, as she did your mother, if you marry to displease her.

Scarlet Fez. But suppose we love each other?

Norah. Nonsense! You only met a month ago.

Scarlet Fez. A month! Why, that's a long time. I have heard of people falling in love at first sight.

Norah (impatiently). Miss Proctor, do you remember the promise you made your mother a short time before she died?—your mother, who had suffered as long and terribly from poverty. If you do not, I do. You promised her that never would you marry a man as poor as your father was. And Ernest Gaynor is just as poor. True, your father lacked the energy and strength that the younger man possesses, but it will be years before that energy and strength will avail him anything, and if he were hampered by a family the chances are that they would never avail him anything, but would soon be worn out in a struggle for daily bread. Take the advice of one who is older and much more experienced than you, and who, although a stranger to you, has your interest at heart. Let Ernest Gaynor go, and accept your other suitor, who, with a few more years, has many more dollars. Let him go, Miss Proctor, for truly he can earn barely enough to support in the plainest style himself and his widowed mother, the ex waiting-maid. (She turns away, and, gliding through the crowd, rejoins Nancy, while the scarlet fez is seized by a blue domino and whirled off in a mad galop.)

Nancy. Have you told her?

Norah. Yes, very plainly.

Nancy. What did she say?

Norah. Very little, and that in so low a voice that I could scarcely catch her words. But I think by her manner she was much impressed, and that our friend Ernest will receive his congé to-night. And now I must be ready to try to catch a heart on the rebound.

II.

Scene: Supper-room. Table spread with various refreshments. Pink dominoes seated. Blue standing behind them. At a given signal all unmask, and the scarlet fez is seen to be resting lightly on the smoothly brushed dark brown tresses of Miss Madeline Clinton. Bewildered and surprised, Norah hastily glances around the table. At the opposite corner sits Hope Proctor, a glorious red lily with recurved leaves glowing among her graceful, almost black curls. She looks up with the brightest of smiles into the face of Ernest Gaynor as he bends to whisper something to her.

Young Man (attendant on his youthful hostess' mother, who sits next to Norah Nixon). That tovely girl with the Turk's-cap lily in her hair is Hope Proctor, mother; and that handsome chap with her is Ernest Gaynor, her lover, and one of my clients. He met with a great piece of luck to-night, only a little while ago. Miss Clinton, the lady in the scarlet fez, found him out in spite of his masquerading toggery, and to his immense surprise and immenser joy offered him a position as one of her estates that will give him at least five thousand a year. And I suppose the next thing will be invitations to a wedding. Ah! Miss Nixon (suddenly recognizing her), good-evening. May I have the pleasure of getting you an ice?

SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.

By D. H. Richardson.

Savannah, the chief sea-port city of Georgia, the thirteenth American colony, which was founded in a spirit of true benevolence, has a history that is replete with thrilling incidents and grand events, its glorious past possessing scarcely more interest than its prosperous present and encouraging future. The illustration which is presented in this issue gives an accurate and comprehensive view of the city, sketched by Harper's special artist, from the top of the electric tower on River Street, near the Rice Mill, looking in a southerly and southeasterly direction. Within the limits of a sketch of this character it is only possible to glance briefly at its past, that proper consideration be given to its present and future.

In January, 1733, Eleven Oglethorpe, with a party of one hundred and twenty-five emigrants, arrived in the galley Anne at Charleston, being vested by a royal charter granted by George II., with the possession of certain territory between the Savannah and Altamaha rivers. The party proceeded down the coast to Beaufort, where they were left temporarily by Oglethorpe, who, with a few companions, among whom was Colonel William Bull, of South Carolina, ascended the boundary river of Georgia, and selected as the site of his settlement the high bluff on which now stands the city of Savannah. Here, on the 1st day of February (old style, 12th of February new style), were laid the foundations of the oldest English town south of the Savannah River. The plan of the town was, after due consideration, decided upon, and is maintained to the present day, encircling Savannah one of the loveliest of Southern cities. Broad streets were laid out, and a public square was reserved in each quarter.

The following July, on the 7th day, the settlers assembled on the strand (Bay Street) for the purpose of designating the lots. In reverential service they united in thanksgivings to God "that their lines had fallen to them in a pleasant place," and that they were about to have a goodly heritage. The wards and tithings were then named, each ward consisting of four tithings, and each tithing of ten houses. A half mile distant was located a small village occupied by the Yamacraws, an Indian tribe, of which Tomochichi was chief, and which portion of the city retains the name of that tribe to the present day. The settlers were kindly received and treated by the Indians, and a treaty was entered into between Tomochichi and Oglethorpe, which was strictly adhered to. Having established his settlement, Oglethorpe returned to England, accompanied by Tomochichi, but in February, 1734, revisited those shores, bringing with him a new colony of three hundred, that ease their fortunes in this little town. Among them were Reverends John and Charles Wesley, the former the reputed father of Methodism in this country, and who on the 7th of March of that year preached for the first time on American soil to a modest frame building on the site of the present splendid Episcopal edifice known as Christ Church.

The charter under which the colony was established having expired by limitation on the 19th of December, 1751, the trustees decided not to petition for a renewal, and on the 23d of June, 1752, surrendered their trusts, which were accepted by the crown. On the 29th of October, 1754, John Reynolds, the first royal Governor of Georgia, arrived at Savannah, and assumed the reins of authority, but being of a tyrannical nature, his administration proved unpopular, and in consequence of the disaffections of the colonists, to obedience to the commands of the King he resigned the government into the hands of Lieutenant-governor Henry Ellis on the 16th of February, 1757, and returned to England.

The change proved beneficial, as under the wise government of Ellis the colony prospered for a brief while, but his declining health compelled him to resign in 1760, and the following year he was succeeded by James Wright, the last of the royal Governors, who was forced to flee the country in 1775 to escape the wrath of the indignate people whom he had bitterly opposed in their resistance to the Stamp Act. On the 17th of April, 1763, the Georgia Gazette, the eighth newspaper in the colonies, was established, and the succeeding year Robert Bolton was appointed the first postmaster.

On the 5th of June, 1776, the first liberty-pole in Georgia was erected in front of a public house on Bay Street (the site now occupied by Jones's range), kept by Peter Gordon; and on the 3d of March, 1776, the first attack of the British on Savannah was made, and resulted in the defeat of the regulars under Majors Maitland and Grant. In the second attack by the British, on the 29th of December, 1778, the British arms were victorious, and the gallant little town of Savannah capitulated. The French and American allies, under Count D'Estaing and General Lincoln, in October, 1779, made a desperate effort to recapture the town, but were unsuccessful. In this attack Count Pulaski was killed at a point about one hundred yards from the present depot of the Central Railroad.

The British army remained in possession of Savannah until the 11th of July, 1782, when it was formally surrendered to the American forces commanded by Colonel James Jackson, who entered the city the same day.

Civil authority soon assumed its sway, and in January, 1784, the first session of the Legislature was held in a brick house on South Broad Street, near Drayton, which is still standing, and is the oldest brick building in the city.

Savannah was incorporated as a city in December, 1789, and the first Mayor, Jonas Hocquet, was elected in 1790. In May of the same year General Washington visited Savannah, and was received with great rejoicings. The house in which he lodged is on the northwest corner of Barnard and State streets, and is in a good state of preservation—an interesting landmark visited by hundreds of Northern people who yearly come South.

Subsequently the city has been honored with visits from President Monroe, Marquis de Lafayette, President Fillmore, ex-President Ulysses S. Grant, and very recently by President Chester A. Arthur, to whom distinguished consideration was shown, and every hospitality for which the people are noted extended.

The city is located on a high bluff, fifty feet above the level of the sea, and is bounded by well-drained lowlands under dry culture on its eastern and western sides. The Savannah River forms its northern boundary, and the ridge upon which it is built bends in a southeasterly direction to the salt rivers that separate the mainland from the sea islands which fringe the coast of the South Atlantic. The streets are wide, and so adorned with shade trees that Savannah justly bears the title of the "Forest City of the South." Forsyth Park, a magnificent and carravalled tract of thirty acres of native forest trees, within the limits of the city, and twenty-five smaller parks or squares, which may properly be termed the lungs, contribute some of the great advantages possessed by Savannah as a location only remarkable for its excellent health. Within a cycle of half a century it has been visited by only two serious epidemics, the last several years ago; and with the thorough drainage suggested by that experience there is every reason to believe that such a calamity will never again to the same extent afflict the community.

Fire has also ravaged the fair city. In 1824 over four hundred houses were burned, and the little modest sea-port seemed doomed; but energy and enterprise triumphed. In January, 1865, as even greater calamity threatened the city, and the people were panic-stricken, fleeing hither and thither in terror. A fire broke out in a stable in the rear of old "Granite Hall," on the corner of West Broad and Zubly streets, which had been used by the Confederate authorities as an arsenal for fixed ammunition, and in which there were twenty thousand rounds stored. One hundred buildings were destroyed, and to the horrors of a destructive conflagration were added the frightful dangers of a terrible bombardment. Before the ammunition could be removed the fire communicated to the arsenal, and explosion succeeded explosion, fragments of shells flying in every direction, mangling and killing. On the 21st of last October another fire caused a destruction of property to the extent of a million of dollars. Not despite the ravages of war, of fire, and storm, Savannah to day stands forth the second cotton port on the south Atlantic coast, and among the first commercial and prosperous cities in the South. Since the war between the States Savannah has progressed, and has far outstripped her neighbors in solid and substantial growth. Indeed, it may be said rightfully, without disparagement to Atlanta, which applies to the name of "Gate City," that Savannah deserves the crown to the "solid" city of the Empire State of Georgia.

Her cotton receipts have enormously increased of late years, and with the additional railroad facilities there will be an access to the coming years over the past. The foreign and coastwise shipping has greatly increased, and with the improvements mapped out for the river completed, there is no doubt that the largest foreign freight ships will visit the port of Savannah.

The merchants are energetic and public spirited, ever ready to assist upon any enterprise. It is the first Southern city to adopt the electric light, and introduce the town system, and in a few weeks it will unquestionably be the most brilliantly and thoroughly lighted city in the South.

Savannah has a paid fire department admirably equipped, a military police considered the best organized and disciplined in the State, a thoroughly organized sanitary system, with corps of inspectors who weekly make visits to every private residence and public building in the city. Among the industries are a paper mill, at which the wrapping paper is manufactured from Florida palmetto, a prosperous cotton factory employing nearly one hundred hands, three large rice mills, four cotton compresses, immense railroad shops of the Central Railroad, and Savannah, Florida, and Western, at which is turned out everything from a car coupling to a splendid passenger palace coach, sleepers, and locomotives, iron foundries, guano factories, four and grist mills, barrel factories, cotton-seed-oil mills, and a prosperous soap factory. The system of street railways is excellent, two corporations covering the principal streets, and having their termini at very desirable resorts on the coast from four to ten miles distant from the city.

The library owned by the Georgia Historical Society is the model one of the State, and is filled with thousands of volumes of value, and numerous rare relics. The Academy of Science and Arts will shortly be opened under the liberal bequest of the late Miss Mary Telfair, daughter of the late Governor Telfair of Georgia.

The public-school system is acknowledged to be a model in its ramifications. It is conducted by a Board of Education, a corporate body controlled eight schools of eight classes each for whites, and two very handsome colored schools of six grades each, in the city, besides nine mission schools. The appropriation for the support of these schools from the county amounts to the neighborhood of $50,000 per annum, which is dependent of State aid. The white high schools are partially self-sustaining, a tuition fee of five being charged per month. The season of these schools lasts nine months.

During the past year, Major B. J. Hunter, formerly of the Cape Fear (North Carolina) Military Institute, established here a military school, under the name of the Savannah Military Academy, conducted on the plan of the Virginia Military Institute. So popular has the Academy become in the community that a board composed of a number of prominent citizens has been formed, and subscriptions to the amount of $30,000 have been raised for the purpose of erecting a suitable building on desirable lots opposite the Park extension, which will be leased by Major Hunter for the term of ten years, and be under the control of trustees. The total amount required is $15,000, which will be readily obtained. Work is to be commenced at once. The Academy now has a roll of eighty-four cadets, about one-third of whom are from adjoining counties and States, who are boarders.

The telephone is most liberally patronized, and the Exchange probably has more subscribers than in any other city of the same population of the South. The Bogue Sound and Inland District Telegraph Company is also in successful operation here, and has a capital of $50,000, and has under protection over one million of dollars' worth of property in this city, there being nearly four subscribers, including the principal exchanges.

Among the important public buildings not already mentioned the Savannah Hospital, the Alms House, the Savannah Female Orphan Asylum, St. Mary's Home, St. Joseph's Infirmary, Georgia Infirmary (especially for colored persons), Cotton Exchange, Savannah Board of Trade Rooms, and the Episcopal Orphans' Home. The Masonic Temple, granite front, is the finest building of the kind in the State.

The theatre is the oldest theatre in the country, and while modernized in interior and exterior is the same structure that has stood for over a century, having been erected at the same period of 1779.

The commercial interests of the city are well protected and fostered by the Savannah Cotton Exchange and the Savannah Board of Trade, whose offices are very influential and worthy institutions.

The volunteer military of Savannah is excellent, there being a full regiment and battalion of infantry, squadron of cavalry, and battalion of artillery, of whites, and a battalion of infantry and artillery and cavalry companies, colored. Their records but little old from the State. The soldiers are well disciplined and mustered, and Savannah enjoys the reputation of having the best division of volunteer soldiery in the South. Your artist has given a sketch of a parade of one of the companies of the Savannah Volunteer Guards Battalion, which was organized in 1802, and has a career extending through four wars, and this country.

In a word, the Savannah of to-day has far before her full of hope, and her people are forward confidently to the time when she shall recorded the close war as the last of oppressed cities of the South.

CAMPING OUT AS A FINE ART.

WHILE wandering in the Adirondacks last summer, an artist was agreeably surprised to receive an invitation to visit the pleasant and attractive camp depicted in our illustration on page 733, and situated on the picturesque shores of Raquette Lake. Hastily packing up his blankets, a small "A" tent that had seen service in the Rocky Mountains, an alcohol stove, and a camp kettle, he took up his line of march toward the heart of the Adirondack wilderness.

Imagine his surprise when he found himself before the beautiful camp shown in the upper right-hand sketch, and was invited to an elegant repast in the rustic dining-room depicted in the lower corner! After spending a few days in this beautiful villa, where camping out was combined with the comforts and luxuries of city life, our artist proceeded to Little Forked Lake, where he was treated to a fresh surprise in the form of another villa camp. Here he found the curious fire-place shown in our illustration. In the middle of the living-room was a large six-sided box, built of heavy oak planks, and filled with stones, on which a cheerful fire was blazing. Over it was a funnel of sheet-iron connected with a stove-pipe leading up through the roof. By an arrangement of pulleys the funnel could be lowered or raised to regulate the draught. In these instances camping out has certainly been reduced to a fine art, but has not been robbed of some of those features which have always been supposed to lend a charm to a life in the wilderness.

OUNCES OF PREVENTION.

RAIN-WATER.

ONE might suppose that there was not a great deal to be said about drinking water, but who ever begins to study the subject will be surprised at its complexity, and at the extent of its literature, especially in foreign languages. The history of the discussion begins long before the time of the Roman aqueducts. Hippocrates of Cos described the leading qualities of good and of bad drinking waters well so they have ever been described since his time; and the topics treated range from the irrigation of ancient Babylon to the newest piece of inefficiency in the way of a kitchen filter.

What are the characteristics of good water for drinking and for domestic use? I will answer in the words of Mr Mansergh, the engineer of the works at Chiltern Hills, in England. Good water should be "(1) at all seasons clear, transparent, bright, and when seen in large bulk pure blue, that being the natural color of uncontaminated water; (2) it should be well aerated, holding in solution from seven to eight cubic inches of air per gallon, consisting of two to three cubic inches of oxygen and six of nitrogen; (3) it should have at its source a uniform temperature equal to the average of the climate for the year; (4) it should be free from living organisms, vegetable and animal, and from all dead decomposing organic matter, and should not dissolve lead, and (5) it should hold only a moderate quantity of mineral matter in solution, and thus be soft, and not deposit a coating of lime or magnesia when boiled."

Rain-water, as the source of all other waters, will naturally take the first place in the review of the subject. How many of the above conditions of excellence does it satisfy?

Rain-water is pure at the moment when it leaves the clouds, but only then; when it reaches the earth it is always more or less impure. In passing through the air it absorbs four to five different gases, and takes up floating organic particles in less or greater quantity, and especially in no near towns it may be very far from pure. "Rain collected half a mile from the extreme southwest of Manchester," says Dr Corfield, "although the wind was blowing from the west, after it had been allowed to clear itself of suspended matters, contained more than two and a half grains of organic matter in a gallon, and was, moreover, obviously impure."

These impurities from atmospheric sources, except in cities, are not often excessive; yet they should be guarded against, and care should be taken that they be not accidentally augmented, as when, for instance, the first washings of the roof after a dry spell are allowed to go into the tank. This should be prevented, and, indeed, more tanks than one are always desirable for the better purification of the rain water, if it is intended to be used for drinking. This is done in parts of Italy, where three tanks are used. In the first the rain-water is received, and its chief impurities are allowed to settle. It is then strained off into the second, to storage tank, where it sometimes remains for a year, and here it constantly improves in quality, for it absorbs carbonic acid gas from the air, and becomes better tasting and more sparkling. When quite pure and clear the water is drawn into a third tank for use.

It will be long before such a thorough system of purifying rain-water will come into vogue among our householders. Our ruder tanks are not well adapted for the preservation of drinking-water, and the purest rain-water has its own disadvantages and risks. In proportion to its purity or softness it is more likely than hard water to dissolve lead. Leaden cisterns, leaden fittings, even leaden covers to the tank, pump, or well that contains very soft water are sometimes the cause of danger. Then the fourth of the conditions of excellence named above, and of course the third also, because the temperature of rain-water must vary with the season, are not satisfied by rain water, nor is the fifth, for rain-water contains an insufficient quantity of salts. When delivered away from towns it is generally very pure, but it is not the best for drinking; for lack of salts, besides making it flabby to dissolve lead, gives it also an insipid taste.

But wherever it is convenient to do so, rain-water should be kept as a reserve supply for drinking. Sooner or later, when other sources are contaminated by accident or by an epidemic, it will be found of great use, as, for instance, when cholera or typhoid fever prevails, as such a time the ordinary water-supply sometimes becomes an open highway for the travel of those diseases, an alternative supply may become, in such a predicament, the means of preserving health or life.

TITUS MUNSON COAN.

DEMOCRATIC GOVERNORS.

NEW JERSEY and Maryland each elected a Democratic Governor on the 6th inst., whose pertenure will be found on page 736. The Hon. LEON ABBETT, of Jersey City, was born in Philadelphia, October 3, 1836, but when still a young man removed to New Jersey, where he has been a prominent figure in politics on the Democratic side. He was three times elected to the State Assembly, and afterward to the State Senate, and was for three years President of that body. For three years past he has been Corporation Counsel of Jersey City. His majority over the Republican candidate for the Governorship was about 6800.

A full discussion of the character and purposes of Mr ROBERT M. MCLANE, Governor-elect of Maryland, will be found in the issue of HARPER'S WEEKLY for November 10.

THE FAR NORTHWEST.

PRIOR to the purchase by the United States of Alaska the extreme northwestern possessions of this country were the San Juan Islands, away up in the corner of Washington Territory, and separated from Vancouver's Island by the Straits of Georgia. At one time, pending the location of the international boundary line, these islands were in dispute, and it was doubtful whether they would ultimately become American or British soil. According to treaty the boundary was to follow the line of the forty-ninth parallel of latitude to the middle of the channel separating Vancouver's Island from the mainland, thence it was to follow this main channel to the Straits of Juan de Fuca, and continue in the middle of this passage out into the Pacific. The controversy arose from the fact that at this point the Straits of Georgia divided into two main channels, one of which lay to the east of the San Juan archipelago, and the other to the west of the islands. The British claimed that the former was the one specified in the treaty, and that the islands belonged to them, while the Americans insisted that the western was the main channel, and that the islands there became their property. Troops were sent by both sides to maintain the positions taken, and a collision was imminent, but the dispute was finally settled amicably, and the American claim allowed.

It was amid the magnificent scenery of these far-away islands that the steamer Northern Pacific recently bore our artist, and afforded him the opportunity for making the sketches that appear on page 728. Thirty five miles inland to the eastward, but seeming to rise from the sea, towered Mount Baker, piercing the purple haze that blotted out its foot-hills, and lifting its snow crowned pinnacles 11,000 feet into the clear upper atmosphere. Mount Baker is one of the grandest peaks of the Cascade range, and although overtopped 3000 feet by Mount Tacoma, or Rainier, a hundred miles to the southward, the former appears the higher because viewed from the sea level. It was ascended for the first time last summer by an enterprising photographer of Victoria, who gives vivid descriptions of the crater of its extinct volcano that he discovered on the extreme summit.

Objects of interest to our artist nearer at hand than Mount Baker were parties of coast Indians fishing for salmon from queer-looking canoes or dug-outs with primitive hooks made of fat pine splinters and bone. The canoes are very long and heavy, each being hollowed with infinite labor from a single tree. The outside is painted black, and the interior a bright vermilion, while the high beak or prow is ornamented with rude devices traced in the same vivid color.

Although it is now customary to speak of all these coast Indians as "Chinooks," the term was originally only applied to the pigeon, in trading, English by means of which the Hudson Bay Company's traders and the Indians who met at Chinook Point conducted their negotiations.

Vancouver's Island, on the extreme southern point of which is situated Victoria, the capital of British Columbia, was supposed to form part of the mainland from the time of its discovery in 1778 by that redoubtable navigator, Captain Cook, until 1792. In that year Captain Vancouver, of the British navy, proved it to be an island by circumnavigating it. He gave it his own name, and then left an everlasting monument to his memory. He was so struck with the appearance of the land at his discovery that he wrote, "It is an enchantingly beautiful as the most elegantly finished pleasure-grounds in Europe."

In spite of Captain Vancouver's praise of this land, no attempts were made to settle it until 1843, when the Hudson Bay Company established a fort and trading station in Victoria. Ten years later an act was passed by the British Parliament constituting British Columbia and Vancouver a crown colony, with Victoria as its capital. It remained, however, for Americans to give an impetus to the settlement of the country. This they did in 1846, when gold was discovered on Fraser River, and no need an exodus was made from California to this direction that ten years later 20,000 miners were in the country. The gold fever passed, and Victoria settled down into a staid business and political community. To-day it is one of the most beautiful and substantial cities of the Northwest, the seat of a quiet but solid prosperity that is steadily increasing. Its citizens look upon it as one of the future great cities of the world, and predict that with the completion of the Canadian Pacific Railway it will become the leading port of the Northwest.

ENGLISH GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

Tourgueneff's place in Literature.—Binding Oaths.—Gladstone and Tennyson.—Madame or Mistress?—A confiding Author.—A Ticket-of-leave Parson.—A Literary Mare's Nest.

TOURGUENEFF, being dead, has been placed in the Walhalla of novelists. He did not, it seems, like "plots" in novels, and preferred Pickwick to any of Dickens's works. Yet without "plots" where would his Nihilists have been? I have read Virgin Soil, and found it a stiffish one. "One loses so much in translations, you know." All great men who have posthumous applause ought, he him, to die in the dull season. At the bottom of the extravagant praise that has been lavished upon him is perhaps a secret wonder that a Russian should write novels at all.

There is great credit due to Tourgueneff that he has introduced us to a new people, burdened, alas! with unutterable sorrows. Since Oliver Twist was written, none of our own writers have gone deep enough down, yet terrible things lie ready to their hands. For example, I read that in a certain Union work-house snuff has been at last allowed to the old people. It is, it seems, their only pleasure. Heretofore "the old women took to bits, and the old men ground up stones, and mixed them with clay, which injured their health." What a picture of human life among ourselves is seen through this little loop-hole! In the examination of one of our great London clubs snuff figured forty years ago at £120; it has now sunk to thirty shillings, but these poor folks belong to the old school.

A Roman Catholic young woman has refused to take her oath, in a court of justice, upon the English Bible. She would have a Douay Bible, as "it couldn't be binding," she said. What a queer nation she must have had of the nature of an oath! On the other hand, as if to restore the average, a coroner's jury in Middlesex have been going too far in the other direction. They have all been sworn upon a copy of Tristram Shandy.

Never was a higher compliment, to one more gloriously expressed, than that paid by Mr Gladstone at Kirkwall this other day to Alfred Tennyson. A visitor, in the room to come, looking upon the sconce to the roll of hexameters, and coming on some, may well (he said) inquire, "Who was Gladstone?" but in the case of Tennyson he would have no difficulty. "Since he could know both who he was and what he had done to raise the intellects and hearts of his fellow-creatures." It is quite true that the mission of a poet is higher than that of a politician, but it is not every Prime Minister who would have confessed so much. It is the best coin of thought and candor of speech which lies at the root of Mr Gladstone's personal popularity.

A philosophic journal, however, while admiring the gracious humility of the speech, demurs as to its truth. "The world," it says, "remembers Moses, the lawgiver, as well as David, the sweet singer of Israel, and Moses perhaps better than Valentio." This latter statement is an exaggeration; it would surely be well-nigh sure to have said that the world remembers Moses so much as it remembers Velonski—a remark which would certainly not be open to cavil.

A gentleman who has shown little scruple in getting rid of his family at all hazards at last now awakening much interest. He has been convicted of murdering his five children in cold blood, and therefore, say the philosophic sinecures, must needs be a madman. He nevertheless made some shrewd observations about the cost of offspring, and the desirability of starting again to life without incumbrance. The truth is, such a large class of dull, commonplace people, a great crime always suggests madness, they have no experience of the desperate wickedness of the human heart, and have not the intelligence to imagine it. In to-day's paper I read of a cattle-dealer who sent a number of horses to be slaughtered in London, in such a manner that they took six days to accomplish the journey, throughout the whole of which time he withheld food from them, since it was not worth his while to pay for it. Some of them were, in fact, starved to death before they reached the knacker's hands. As they call a murderer mad, perhaps the philanthropists in question would consider a wretch of this kind unaccountable for his actions. I can only say that there is another, though I allow a much smaller and less blatant, class of persons, to whom women and children are objects of pity, and who could take such measures with these so-called madmen that on living creature should ever again be troubled with their eccentricities.

I am always sorry to hear of popular authors coming on the garish.—I mean appearing to the public. Mr Martin Tupper, Tupper in the last —and ought to be the last in another sense—to do it. What is the use of having one's books run to thirty editions if this is what comes of it all? His contention is—or rather his friends contend for him—that, notwithstanding their immense sale, he did not receive the royalty for his poems for fifteen years. He he it accumulate, and then his publishers burn. It is enough to make all the other publishers burst—with envy—to think that there should here been such a snuffling author, and they not to have him. There must be some mistake in that statement about the fifteen years. Mr Tupper may not have been a high-class poet, but he was never such a fool as that.

How a poor novelist would here sought it over the knuckles from the reviewers if he had ventured to portray a popular parson on a ticket-of-leave man! Yet the Rev Thomas Harris Hughes, it seems, has carried these two roles in his own person for a considerable time. The cause of his present trouble can be having married two wives, the last lady being his rector's cook. This was, no doubt, a marriage of convenience, to rather of economy. He seems to be of a very practical turn of mind, and quietly inquired of the police inspector about was usually given for bigamy. Whatever it is, he will probably get it.

The Irish press is almost as queer as the Irish people. "If it is necessary," says a Dublin paper, "twenty thousand pounds would be subscribed to-morrow for the defense of O'Donnell. He has committed the most popular murder since Head-Constable Talbot was shot in Dublin." It does not seem to strike the editor of this hardy gaely (for one can hardly call it "organ") that except in Ireland "murders" are not generally spoken of as "popular."

The finest mare's nest of the day has been found by a six-skilling quarterly. In instituting an inquiry into the respective merits of browning and Tennyson, it takes the lines "Flower in the crannied wall," etc., as a proof of the superiority of the former poet over the latter. Tennyson had not the philosophy for such a marvellous piece of reflection, couldn't have written it to save his life, etc., etc.—an argument which possibly may have been very effective, and settled the matter, only, unhappily, it was not Browning, but Tennyson, who wrote the lines in question. I wonder where editors find the reviewers who perform feats of this kind, and especially what they pay them for it? And yet there are people who wonder that authors who have been at work all their lives upon their own subjects are not more moved than they are by "Notices in the Press." In the case of a high-class review, however, I only remember two examples of such a complete fiasco as this; a notice in The Quarterly, by Hallam, of some rival scholar's book, in which there was some Greek poem, of which, taking it for the author's own, he felt feel most memorefully "a bit of modern saucer," etc., when, unfortunately, the poem on Pindar's. Then, in comparatively late times, I recollect, in another quarterly, a notice of "In Memoriam"—written, let us hope, in haste, and "as we were going to press"—in which the book is described as "a volume of verse written by a widow to her deceased husband"; the poem beginning, was set down as "an invocation to Cupid."

"Strong are of God, immortal Love,"

Every one expresses astonishment that Trollope should have made £69,000 in thirty five years of writing. There is not a successful hewriter of even the middle rank who has not made as much, on a fashionable physician; and yet Trollope was one of the three most popular novelists of his day. It is perfectly amazing that people should have such ludicrous notions of proportion.

R. KEMBLE, of London.

A NOTABLE GROUP.

IMMEDIATELY after the autumn manœuvres at Homburg-vor-der-Höhe, in Hesse-Nassau, the Emperor of Germany conceived the idea of commemorating the presence of the twenty royal personages who had assembled to witness the magnificent military spectacle by having them photographed in a group.

Accordingly, on the 26th of September, they took their places on the steps of the grand portal of the royal castle, forming a most striking and impressive galaxy around the heroic figure of the aged but still vigorous Emperor. He was dressed in the simple uniform of the Household troops, and on his breast were displayed orders of England, Spain, and Saxony. On his left was Alfonso of Spain, resplendent in his Uhlan uniform, which a few days afterward excited the ire of the Paris mob, and came near involving Spain and France in war. The white toilets of the royal ladies gave brilliancy to the group.

Taken altogether, this was one of the most notable gatherings of modern times, and the readers of HARPER'S WEEKLY will be glad to find, on another page, a reproduction of this remarkable photograph.

AN IMPORTANT WORK.

THE dedication of the building of the Young Men's Christian Association of Boston affords a fitting occasion for a review of the increase of such structures during the last seventeen years. In 1866 there were but seven Associations building, valued at $10,000, there are now seventy-three, valued at nearly $3,000,000. This is, however, but a single illustration of the growth of Christian Associations during the same period. In fact, since the close of the civil war, the Associations have entered upon a career of progress such as was never before known. At that time they were but eighty to number throughout the entire United States, there are now more than seven hundred, and the aggregate of members is nearly one hundred thousand.

This rapid increase is mainly due to the formation of an "International Committee," located in New York, but operating throughout our country and Canada as a fostering and missionary agency. This committee has created special branches of service among commercial travellers, Germans, colored young men in the South, railroad men, and college students, there being for each branch a special secretary. One very admirable part of the methods of the committee is the special training of young men for service as Association secretaries. What might be called reverential institutes are sometimes held for the drilling of candidates. In all the varied planning and administration of the International Committee the practical interest predominates. The end to be attained is steadily kept in view, and the means

THE LAST COMPLETE WORK OF GUSTAVE DORÉ.

THE RAVEN.

By EDGAR ALLAN POE.

WITH TWENTY-SIX FULL-PAGE ILLUSTRATIONS BY

GUSTAVE DORÉ.

COMMENT ON THE POEM BY EDMUND CLARENCE STEDMAN.

Folio, Ornamental Cloth, Gilt Edges, and in a neat box, $10.00.

UNIFORM WITH DORÉ'S "ANCIENT MARINER."

Doré has portrayed all that the strongest imagination can conceive in reading Poe's wonderful poem. The work is a beautiful parlor book, and a perfect holiday gift.—Troy Press.

In the illustrations of "Poe's Raven," which was his last work, he found a subject suited to his genius, which causes out in its full original force in these designs. The subject is one to be committed to such vehicles as he knew best how to command, and illustrates itself naturally in his ace-producing masses of light and shade, his suggestive shapes and distances.—Independent, N. Y.

The weird legend of the poet has inspired the weird genius of the artist to produce some of his most powerful designs. He has found in it, indeed, many things that readers of the ordinary text would not dream of. The poet could have had no more ghostly visions than are given in some of these marvellous pages of the artist. Each one is a study, and the variety in their treatment is one of the most extraordinary proofs of Doré's amazing imagination. • • • The Doré "Raven" will easily take a place in the front rank of the gift-books of this season.—Philadelphia Bulletin.

They are every way the noblest monument which the genius of an Old World artist has yet raised to a New World poet.—N. Y. Mail and Express.

Every admirer of Poe—and his admirers are many—who can afford to do so, will buy a copy of this magnificent work of art • • • As regards the rare merits of the engravings that shadow forth the weirdly imaginative lines of the poem, no words of ours can give the reader a proper conception. They must be not only seen, but carefully studied • • • One can turn again and again to these engravings, and each time discover something that was before hidden from his view.—Portland Argus.

The lovers of that great work cannot fail to have their interest therein greatly heightened by the strikingly dramatic pictures here portrayed, while the admirers of artistic workmanship are certain to be delighted with the superb manner in which the Harpers have done their part.—N. Y. Commercial Advertiser.

One of the most elegant works that has ever appeared from the American press.—Evangelist, N. Y.

WORTHY Of Confidence.

AYER'S SARSAPARILLA (extracted from the root of the genuine Honduras Sarsaparilla) is its base, and its powers are enhanced by the extracts of Yellow Dock and Stillingia, the Iodides of Potassium and Iron, and other potent ingredients.

IS your blood vitiated by derangements of the digestive and assimilatory functions? Is it tainted by Scrofula? or does it contain the poison of Mercury or Contagious Disease?

THE leading physicians of the United States, who know the composition of AYER'S SARSAPARILLA, say that nothing else so good for the purification of the blood is within the range of pharmacy.

ONLY by the use of this remedy is it possible for a person who has corrupted blood to attain sound health and prevent transmission of the destructive taint to posterity.

THOROUGHLY effective renovation of the system must include not only the removal of corruption from the blood, but its enrichment and the strengthening of the vital organs.

RELIABLE witnesses, all over the world, testify that this work is better accomplished by AYER'S SARSAPARILLA than by any other remedy.

BLOOD that is corrupted through disease is made pure, and blood weakened through diminution of the red corpuscles is made strong, by AYER'S SARSAPARILLA.

PURIFYING the blood and building up the system requires time in serious cases, but benefit will be derived from the use of AYER'S SARSAPARILLA more speedily than from anything else.

MEDICINE for which the effects are falsely claimed, is abundant in the market, under many names, but the only preparation that has stood the test of time, and proved worthy of the world's confidence, is

Ayer's Sarsaparilla,

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 1883.

RE-OPENING OF THE ART COMPETITION.

The judges appointed to award the prizes in the Art Competition for the illustrations of ALFRED DOUTY'S "Christmas Hymn" have reported [see HARPER'S WEEKLY dated September 1] that they "are not justified by the conditions of the competition in awarding any prize whatsoever." Three hundred and thirty-eight drawings entered into the competition, and twenty-three were received after the 1st of August—too late to be considered.

Persistent to the intimation given in their original "offer to young American artists," the MESSRS. HARPER have determined to reopen the competition, enlarging its scope and modifying the limitation as to age, in accordance with suggestions made by the judges.

For the best original illustration appropriate to Christmas—the drawing to be suitable for publication in HARPER'S MAGAZINE, *to be made especially for this competition, and to be the exclusive work of an American artist not over twenty-seven years of age—*MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS offer an award of THREE THOUSAND DOLLARS, upon the honorable understanding that the successful competitor shall use the same for the prosecution of art study in one or more of the best American schools, including also a sojourn abroad of at least six months for the study of the old masters. The award will be paid in such installments and at such times as shall best suit the convenience of the recipient for the purposes specified.

The drawings must be received by MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS, at Franklin Square, New York, not later than March 1, 1884, addressed "Art Competition, Harper's Magazine", and each must be designated by an assumed name or motto which should also be given, together with the real name, age, and residence of the artist, in a sealed envelope securely attached to the drawing, and not to be opened until the result of the competition shall have been determined. The name of the successful competitor will not be publicly announced until the publication of the drawing.

MR. R. SWAIN GIFFORD, N.A., MR. F. D. MILLET, A.N.A., and MR. CHARLES PARSONS, A.N.A., Superintendent of the Art Department of HARPER & BROTHERS, will act as judges of the competition.

The treatment of the subject is left to the artist, limited only by the special reference to Christmas. Either the Bible story of the Nativity, or the customs or scenes of Christmas past or present, may be chosen for illustration. The judges in making the award will take into consideration not only the technical art value of each drawing, but also the appropriateness of the subject selected, the efficiency of the illustration, and especially the originality of conception and treatment. The combination of different designs in a single picture should be avoided.

It is intended to engrave the successful drawing as one page for HARPER'S MAGAZINE for December, 1884, and should others submitted be found suitable, second, third, and fourth awards will be made, as follows: one page HARPER'S WEEKLY, $500, one page HARPER'S BAZAR, $300, one page HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, $200; these awards not to be subject to the above-mentioned understanding as to "the prosecution of art study," etc.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK, September 8, 1883.

☞ An ILLUSTRATED SUPPLEMENT is issued gratuitously with this number of HARPER'S WEEKLY.

NEXT YEAR.

THE Democratic fancy that the Republican party, with its record and character and tendency, was to be summarily displaced by the Democratic party, with its record and character, vanished at the late election. It had not occurred to the eager gentlemen who think that this country can be carried with a whoop like a Tammany caucus that the cry "Turn the rascals in!" was quite as likely to startle the country as "Turn the rascals out" was likely to stimulate it. Indeed, the careful avoidance of any issue but that of the general character and conduct of the parties concentrated public attention upon the probabilities arising from the history and common knowledge of each of them, so that, had a general election taken place this year, the Republicans would unquestionably have been successful. It is certainly not surprising that the Democratic press now remarks with plaintive sobriety that Democratic success next year can be secured only by a hard fight.

The moral of the recent election is that the Democratic party must represent something besides a greed for spoils if it means to make any fight at all next year. It may safely count as usual upon the solid South, which of itself should array every intelligent Northern voter against it, because Democratic success would mean Southern ascendency in administration, and that is not desirable. There is plenty of patriotic and national feeling in the Southern States, and there are able and honorable men among Southern political leaders, but the political bond which unites those States is not a sound and good one. It is not common devotion to a definite national policy. It is vindictive feeling. It is, in a plain word, hatred of the North, inherited from the war. This feeling undoubtedly is disappearing. It is yielding to the inevitable influences of time, and to the want of a special sectional interest around which to organize itself. But it exists. This feeling, and that of the immense foreign element in the Northern States, are the chief strength of the Democratic party, and for that reason it is undesirable for the great and general national interests that the party should succeed. There is no Republican policy or measure to which the Southern States—Southern States ran fairly object. In any normal party division those States would not be solid. [illegible] are so as a distinct menace and

But, sure of them, the Democratic party will labor to carry two or three doubtful Northern States, and especially New York. Indeed, even before the election, when, as usual, they were most jubilant, the Democratic papers insisted that the vote of New York was indispensable for Democratic success next year. Since the election this is evident. Now the New York elections of this year and of the last show conclusively that neither party can count surely upon the State, and that the balance of power is held by the independent voters. The real question, therefore, is, which party will probably win those voters. In reply to this question it may be truly said that the Republicans have shown how to lose them, but the Democrats have never known how to gain them. They can certainly never be gained by the cowardly and shuffling policy of dodging the real issues. The independent voters, for instance, are generally civil service reformers, and, except in Pennsylvania, revenue reformers. The Democratic course upon both these questions has strongly repelled both classes, nor can that party seriously change its position upon either without risk of greater harm than advantage. It is now, indeed, tolerably clear, as we have said, that its shuffling and silence will not win: but if it be true that it can not stop shuffling without peril, it is evident that, at this time, the probabilities are strongly against Democratic success next year. To strengthen these probabilities the Republicans, taught by the events of two years, must take no steps backward. There is now something of the old Republican enthusiasm and unity. It is obvious how these have been gained. It is equally obvious how, and how swiftly, they may be lost.

THE PRESIDENT AND THE REFORM RULES.

THE recent amendment by the President of one of the civil service rules is of importance as showing his disposition toward reform, and of still greater importance as committing him to a certain course in his own action. He has now required that the selection among the four eligible candidates for appointment whose names are submitted to the appointing officer shall not be determined by political or religious consideration. This, of course, is a provision that can not be enforced, because the actual reason of the choice can be known only to the chooser. But it relieves the President and the Commission of the charge that the rule as it stood was a device to secure an opportunity for partisan choice among the eligible names. The President distinctly declares that such is not his view, and in accordingly amends the rule, a violation of which is good cause for removal.

Such an amendment justifies the expectation that for the offices to which the President himself nominates and appoints, which he will naturally select men in sympathy with his administration, yet that he will not appoint and remove for mere party advantage, but for reasons of efficient service and of good character. The evidence which the country looks for of the interest and purpose of a President in regard to administrative reform is found not less in the manner and methods of his own discharge of the great Executive function of appointment and removal than in his enforcement of rules affecting the minor positions in the service. Mr. MAHONE expressly and vehemently acquits the Administration of any complicity with his performances in Virginia. This is a timely declaration, because if the Administration were prostituting the civil service in Virginia in the very way which it is the prime object of reform to correct, it would be vain to point to its enforcement of reform regulations in New York and elsewhere.

There is no mistaking a thoroughly earnest Executive purpose of reform. It does not show itself in a merely technical or perfunctory manner. Its signatures as plain as those of a general foreign or domestic policy. President ARTHUR'S attitude toward reform has been, upon the whole, friendly, and there is no doubt that with his observation of public sentiment, and of the excellent practical working of the reformed method, he becomes more and more friendly. It is, however, difficult to understand why he does not see that the presence of a man like Mr. HATTON in a highly responsible position is an unexplicable anomaly in a reform administration. The Republican party is now so fully committed to reform, and the President has given so many proofs of his interest, that any conspicuous inconsistency is the more surprising. His amendment of the rule is excellent, and removes one of the points at which it is probable that Democratic criticism in Congress would have been directed.

A SINGULAR VIEW.

SENATOR LANSING, of the Watertown district, was asked before the election whether, in case of his election, he would be prepared to vote for such measures as the inquiries of the State Civil Service Commission might show to be necessary and expedient, the expediency and necessity, of course, being clear to him. To this question Mr. LANSING replied that he was in favor of enforcing the reform law, and of every other means of promoting political purity but that he could not answer the second question, because the Constitution of the State treats such promises as a bribe, and it is made a ground of exclusion from the Legislature. The constitutional clause in Article XII., cited by Senator LANSING requires a member of the Legislature to swear that "I have not . . . made any promise to influence the giving or withholding" of a vote at his election.

The secretary of the society which wrote the letter to the Senator, in reply to questions upon the subject, has shown conclusively that the intent and spirit of such a prohibition, and not its possible literal construction, is always considered by the courts. If Senator LANSING'S view were correct, if the declaration before an election of certain convictions, and of the purpose to embody them in law—a declaration made with the object of obtaining votes—were to be regarded as bribery, it would be impossible for the people to elect their representatives intelligently. It would be equally unconstitutional for a citizen to accept a nomination upon the usual platform of a party, because such an acceptance would be a declaration that he asked votes for the reason that he held certain views, and would endeavor to carry them out in legislation. This would be a promise of the same kind that he makes in stating that if certain propositions in regard to reform seem to him necessary and expedient he will support them.

The position of Senator LANSING upon this point is untenable. But his course at the last session gave the assurance that his vote would not be wanting if any measure prepared by the Commission should seem to be necessary and expedient—unless, indeed, that course should have operated upon some of his constituents as a bribe or tacit promise of his conduct in the next Legislature, and have induced them to vote for him, in which case it might be a question with the excellent Senator whether he might not be unseated for bribery!

LIGHT WANTED.

JUDGE DAVIS has suggested to the Grand Jury of the Oyer and Terminer a thorough investigation into the frauds recently disclosed in various municipal departments, and, in fact, into the general methods of city administration. It is a most timely suggestion. There is a general conviction that the corruption, the waste, the incapacity, and inefficiency of that administration are enormous, and that reform has no richer field. The charter of the city was contrived by knaves then in command of the city, and contrived for their own purposes. There is general ignorance of the complicated machinery of the city government, and nothing would be more agreeable to the great body of tax payers and of the people than to know in detail something of the methods of disposing of the enormous revenue which they pay into the city treasury.

The government of the city of New York has long been cited by the skeptics and enemies of popular government as the most striking illustration of its total failure in large and miscellaneous communities. Wasteful, corrupt, and imbecile, they cry, the government of the city of New York is not in itself as deep a disgrace, or so strong an argument against a popular system, as the acquiescence of a vast and intelligent body of citizens in the plunder of their property and the dishonor of the community in which they live. The possession of the City Hall and the control of the administration by a band of vulgar robbers like TWEED and his gang, the submission of a great party to the behests of that squad of ruffians, and the doubt whether they could be expelled without a civil convulsion, they say, not without reason, are quite as discreditable as any situation in any city of the world to which we profess our superiority.

In addition to the investigation by the Grand Jury which Judge DAVIS recommends, it will be remembered that extraordinary powers of investigation into city and county affairs are given by law to the State Civil Service Commission, and we trust that it will not suffice them to be unused. The Commission is empowered to require a sworn statement from all city and county officers of the amount and sources of their receipts, of the number and salaries of all employés, and in fact a complete, accurate, and detailed statement of all their financial transactions. Is there any reason why the people should not know how much their agents are paid? If there are officers who receive from fifty to a hundred thousand dollars for such services as they render, is anything gained by concealment? And is it not evident that such sinecures are corruption funds, and so meant to be? The exposure of all this obscure iniquity is strictly in the path of civil service reform. There is plenty of talk about the extravagance and corruption of the national government, but the dishonesty, fraud, and squandering of the municipal government of New York are quite as flagrant, and require as searching and fiery a broom. Mayor EDSON, who has submitted an admirable code of regulations for appointment and employment in the police service, is now well nigh powerless by the charter. But the Commission is in full accord with him, and should use all its powers to reveal to public knowledge the abuses and corruption [illegible] officers, and upon the most hearty support of the public

A NATIONAL DEBT OF HONOR.

As the celebration of Evacuation-day in New York will close the series of centennial Revolutionary commemorations, it is a proper moment to suggest that arrears of pay are still due to the descendants of Revolutionary officers. The debts have been acknowledged, and in his admirable oration at Yorktown, two years ago, Mr. ROBERT C. WINTHROP said that he thought this claim "called loudly, even amidst these centennial rejoicings, for equitable consideration and adjustment."

The contract was made with the officers on the 21st of October, 1780, and was confirmed by the Commutation Act of March 22, 1783. In 1790, Mr. MADISON tried to persuade Congress to do justice, but it was felt that the country was very poor. But the foreign officers, as we understand, were fully paid, interest and principal, according to the act of Congress of May 8, 1792. On the 15th of May, 1828, Congress fully recognized the debt due to the native officers, and provided for the payment of that part which fell due after March 4, 1826, but no provision was made for that part which accrued from the disbandment in 1783 to 1826. This still remains unpaid, and it is to this that Mr. WINTHROP alluded.

On the motion of Mr. SEWARD, a bill passed the Senate on the 22d of February, 1855—auspicious day!—to pay this remainder of the debt; a similar bill passed the House of Representatives on the 30th of July, 1856, by a large majority; and even the opponents of the measure, who were subsequently secession leaders—MASON, SLIDELL, C. C. CLAY, and others—in a debate in the Senate on the 15th of January, 1857, acknowledged the justice of the "contract" debt. But it is not yet paid. Can any honorable reason be offered for not paying it? Does the money which was solemnly promised to the officers belong in the Treasury of the United States?

AN APPEAL OF THE LADIES.

THE committee of ladies who have charge of the distribution of newspapers to the hospitals desire to thank the kind givers, whose generosity is unfailing. Every day several hundred newspapers are dropped in the boxes provided for them at the railway stations and ferries, and they are promptly distributed among readers to whom they bring not only the satisfaction of reading the news, but the gratification of knowing that they are not forgotten. A simpler, easier, and more satisfactory little deed of charity is not possible than that of dropping in the box the newspaper that you have read.

Akin to it is the gift of books. The ladies have found an eager and general demand for books to wile away the long and weary hours when reading is permitted. In almost every home are books that can be spared, if only it were known how great a boon they would be to the sick and suffering inmates of the hospital.

All gifts of books should be sent to that head-quarters of good works and of wise charity, No. 79 Fourth Avenue, and the friendly givers are assured in advance that their gifts are deeply appreciated, and that the little trouble of selecting and sending them would seem very light if the givers knew how very great a pleasure and consolation they afford.

CRITICS OF LUTHER.

IN the midst of the LUTHER jubilee upon the four-hundredth birthday of the great reformer there were two or three dissonant voices, which proceeded from ministers of the Church of Rome. One charged LUTHER and his supporters with dissolute lives. But even had this been true, the clerical censors could hardly wish to challenge a comparison between LUTHER, for instance, and the BORGIA Pope ALEXANDER VI. If they find no difficulty in accepting such a man as the vicegerent of God, why should anybody else be troubled by the character and habits of LUTHER, even had they been as bad as the critic might desire to paint them?

Another censor claimed the Church of Rome as the great genius of liberty. This remark recalls that of WILLIAM GODWIN, that the Church of Rome "reposed with a generous confidence upon the folly and blindness of mankind." The censor of whom we speak evidently reposes with [illegible] confidence upon the ignorance of his hearers. The numerous Christian sects in England and this country were cited as against the unity of the Church of Rome. But the unity of that communion is the Czar's peace at Warsaw. The Protestant diversity of form is the proof of religious freedom.

Again, it was urged that LUTHER's protest was the first step toward agnosticism and infidelity. But the retort is obvious that religion suffers as much from ignorant superstition as from unbelief. Fire is as fatal as frost. Moreover, if LUTHER leads to unbelief, Rome led to LUTHER. The excellent clergymen of whom we speak undertake an arduous task when they propose to stem the advance of human thought and to curb religious freedom.

THE IMPORTANCE OF OPERA.

A CURIOUS observer asks why it is that nothing occupies proportionately so large a space in the newspapers as reports of the opera, and why the sayings and doings of singers are described with a prolonged detail which implies the utmost public interest. The greatest and most significant public events, he says, are turned off with a paragraph or a line. But day after day the faithful recorder notes the more or less skill with which the tenor struck the high C, and for the hundredth time the soprano's representation of the same character is elaborately described.

Yet the number of people who go to an opera is comparatively very small, and they are not generally readers of newspapers. It is a high-priced luxury, and as PATTI in Lucia and NILSSON in Faust and GERSTER in Sonnambula are [illegible] much on one evening what they are on another, and as their performance in those parts has been familiar for many years to those who can afford the luxury, it is amusing to compare the fullness and elaboration with which the [illegible] same remarks are made upon it, and the satisfaction with which they are perused. What, he asks, does it mean?

At least this satisfaction must be assumed. The conductors of great journals understand the tastes and wishes of their public, and there would not be the daily recurring descriptions of the same singer in the same part if there were not a public demand for that kind of reading. The explanation doubtless is, the general desire to know what is going on in the world, that is, in the community around the reader, and the fact that he is really more interested in the cold of PATTI or the voice of CAMPANINI than in the withdrawal of England from Egypt, or the chance of war between France and China. The curious observer of life must remember that ever since opera began it has been ridiculed and belittled, and yet never until now in New York did an opera-singer receive five thousand dollars a night.

CAMPAIGN FUNDS.

IN the New York Republican campaign of this year, which accomplished such gratifying results, there was less money collected and spent than in any campaign of recent years. This fact disposes completely of the assertion of HUBBELL and company, and of the defenders of the assessment outrage, that the contributions from the public offices were voluntary. They were not voluntary gifts; they were in effect the price of the places. This year, when the national and State laws stringently forbade assessments, and the public employés were actually free to do as they chose, the amount received from them was very small.

It is to be said to the honor of the State Committee that its action in this matter was conformed both to the letter and the spirit of the law. The treasurer took care to print the law in his circular, that there might be no misunderstanding, and there was no coercion, direct or indirect.

There are, however, large honest expenses at every election, and those who are glad to know that the old system of robbery and extortion to supply a fund has been largely abolished ought to take care by their own contributions that the necessary sum is raised.

LADY HARRIET ACLAND.

IT is obvious that the Revolutionary centennial season has aroused New York. Several permanent memorials will be erected upon famous spots, especially along the Hudson, the river which is identified with many of the most important and interesting Revolutionary events. The Chairman of the Tablet Committee of the Saratoga Monument Association has already placed several tablets at noted spots upon that famous field, and it is understood that Lord CARNARVON is considering the propriety of marking with a tablet the spot upon the shore where Lady HARRIET ACLAND left BURGOYNE's lines to proceed to the camp of General GATES to attend her husband, who was a prisoner and wounded.

Lord CARNARVON is, we believe, a grandson of Lady HARRIET, who is a charming figure in all the stories, and he writes to Mr. W. L. STONE, secretary of the Monument Association, and author of a work upon the surrender, as of other valuable historical works:

"....Lady ACLAND was a lady deserving, I fully believe, all the praise you have bestowed upon her, and of as high gifts of mind as she was graceful and charming in person and manner. There is at Killerton a very striking portrait of her by Sir JOSHUA REYNOLDS, of which I have the copy here. It is, however, remarkable that in the place where she lived so long and where she died there is little remaining to preserve her memory.

"As I have only just returned from America, I wish I had had your letter in time to have visited Saratoga and considered on the spot the question you ask."

Lord CARNARVON hopes soon to return to this country, when he can visit the battle-field and decide the somewhat delicate question. The name of his ancestress is so closely and romantically identified with the field that such a tablet would be an exceedingly interesting memorial.

PERSONAL.

THE Evening Post ventures to assert that "a large proportion of the judges" on the bench "hold railroad passes, and have asked for [illegible] or have, in other words, incurred obligations to railroad companies which ought to disqualify them, but do not, for sitting [illegible] any railroad case, and which the law ought to make a punishable and disgraceful offense."

—Governor BENJAMIN F. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, ventilates his "smartness" by making a Thanksgiving proclamation which brings verses of the Bible into ridiculous association, and which no clergyman could read from his pulpit without exciting the risibilities of his audience. It was not to this sort of thing that Massachusetts was used aforetime.

—The death of Mrs. JOHN W. GARRETT, of Baltimore, has awakened wide-spread sympathy for her bereaved family, and a profound recognition of her many and rare virtues. She had lain unconscious at her home ever since the deplorable accident by which she was thrown from her carriage.

—The late WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT was often humorous in his after-dinner speeches. At a dinner given some time ago in New York to Mr. WILLIAM BLACK, the novelist, Mr. BRYANT responded to a toast on poetry by saying that, although the novelist has laid society under great obligations, the poet should not be forgotten, since it is to him that we are indebted for some of our most labor-saving productions. "What," he continued, in his gravest manner, "could be more useful, more winning, more worthy of being remembered than that immortal song"—here the audience held themselves in breathless silence—"beginning, 'Thirty days hath September'?"

—Two athletic girls, Miss TERESA JOHNSON and Miss LAURA SAIGEMAN, contended in a swimming match at Eastbourne, England. The distance was one mile, and the prize one thousand dollars. Miss TERESA, who is only fifteen years old, swam in splendid style, and won in thirty-five minutes and thirty-four and a half seconds.

—Mr. HOWARD PYLE, to whom our readers need no introduction, has given an outward and visible sign of his professional success by building in Wilmington, Delaware, where he resides, a commodious and very pretty cottage, highly artistic inside and outside. [illegible] main room, twenty-five by thirty feet, with lofty ceilings, [illegible] studio; the walls are hung with burlap, whose upper [illegible] studded with big [illegible] and [illegible] tel-piece of yellow pine, beautifully moulded and marked, stretches above the fire-place of pressed brick. The furniture is of the Colonial period, familiar to the spectators of Mr. PYLE's pictures, and the waxed floors are partly covered with Turkish rugs of antique designs. The inhabitants of Wilmington are justly proud of this building, and of the appreciated genius that made it possible.

—The late Professor JOHN T. SHORT, of the Ohio State University, was the learned author of a book on American antiquities (published by the HARPERS), and of a work called Historical Reference Lists.

—Mrs. FRANCES L. MACE, of Bangor, Maine, has just published a volume entitled Legends, Lyrics, and Sonnets, which will greatly enhance her reputation as a poet. Some of its contents are already known to readers of the magazines, and the poem "Only Waiting," written in her eighteenth year, and printed in the Waterville (Maine) Mail, has found a welcome in almost every hymn-book subsequently issued in this country, and has re-appeared in England also. It is related that JOHN G. WHITTIER, on first meeting Mrs. MACE, said: "In Bangor I know but two persons, HANNIBAL HAMLIN and thee. I know him from his statesmanship, but I know thee from thy beautiful poems;" and the old Quaker poet has been very prompt and cordial in congratulating Mrs. MACE on the appearance of her new book.

—A learned member of the Paris Academy of Sciences has invented a method of towing barges on rivers by means of two endless chains. If he is as successful with his "grip" as our Brooklyn Bridge engineers are, he is bound to make a sensation.

—The London News makes no mistake in saying: "It is clear that the New York audience has recognized Mr. IRVING's finest qualities with a positive warmth of admiration, and has seen in him a man who, when all deductions have been made for this defect or that, is distinctly one of the comparatively small group of really great actors whose careers make up the history of the stage. England and America are becoming decidedly international so far as the drama is concerned. We interchange actors and actresses, and of late years it hardly ever happens that the approval of the one people is not accepted and indorsed by the other."

—There is a "club" for working-girls in London. Two nights in the week are devoted to singing, needle-work, and "cutting-out," and five nights to a school, a drill, and instruction in the Bible.

—Lord CHICHESTER has, he says, been studying for many years the subject of a man's right to marry his deceased wife's sister. "I find nothing in Scripture," he declares, "prohibiting those marriages, and I can not think it right that any human law should prohibit or throw disgrace upon what might be a true marriage in God's sight."

—The handsome recumbent statue of the late Dean STANLEY, to be placed in Westminster Abbey, is of the finest white marble, the figure being life-size, and in the Dean's dress, with hands clasped across the breast. The monument over the grave of Lady AUGUSTA STANLEY records that she was "the beloved wife of ARTHUR PENRHYN STANLEY, Dean of this collegiate church, ... for thirty years the devoted servant of Queen VICTORIA and the Queen's mother and children, and for twelve years the unwearied friend of the people of Westminster, and the inseparable partner of her husband's toils and hopes, uniting many hearts from many lands, and drawing all to things above."

—The Egyptian judges, under the new legislation, being called upon to punish slave-dealers, find it difficult to do so, because they have been brought up in the firm belief that the institution of slavery is both politically and religiously legal. They will probably be assisted on the bench by some European judges whose scruples in favor of the "divine institution" are less pronounced.

—The finest Turkish tobacco is produced by about five hundred cultivators on a southeast slope of the Rhodope range of mountains. These men are splendid specimens of Turks, and, strange to say, are remarkable for honesty, urbanity, and simplicity. There are twelve villages of them, and in order to obtain the best tobacco of all, it is necessary to blend the specimens raised in the different villages, according to the nature of the year's crop. This science of blending is very delicate, and the number of connoisseurs equal to the task is few.

—The charming town of Nice is noted for the highness of its death rate and the abundance of its visitors. Works of a gigantic nature have recently been constructed for the supply of water, and the health of the place will doubtless improve, especially since it is intended to purify the river Paillon, which usually presents sewerage, soap-suds, dead animals, and everything but a stream of water. The washer-women of Nice, who are forced to use every stagnant pool formed by the hollows of the river-bed, will have cause to rejoice. And so will the invalids, domestic and foreign.

—The children of working-men and tradesmen in Paris are so often sent into the country to be nursed that more than fifty per cent. of the whole number of children born in that city die in the baby farmers' hands before reaching their second year. The tradesman whose shop is on the ground floor, and whose sleeping-rooms are on the fourth or fifth floor, could not keep children without losing the services of his wife, whom he needs in his business. If he had children, his wife would be compelled to stay up-stairs and take care of them. The case of the workman is similar. A baby farmer charges five dollars a month for the keep of a baby.

—The "fitting memorial" which it is proposed to raise to Sir MOSES MONTEFIORE will very appropriately take a form that will benefit suffering women and poor children. Cottage homes for convalescent persons will be established, especially for those who have been discharged from hospitals after painful operations, and who else would linger long in illness in the vitiated air of unwholesome homes.

—Persons who use stimulating fluids, either with or without the advice of a physician, will find it advisable to note the quantity of alcohol contained in what they consume, this being the stimulant of all wines, spirits, and beer. A pint of beer contains as much alcohol as half a pint of claret, a quarter of a pint of port or sherry, or a wine-glassful of gin, whiskey, or brandy.

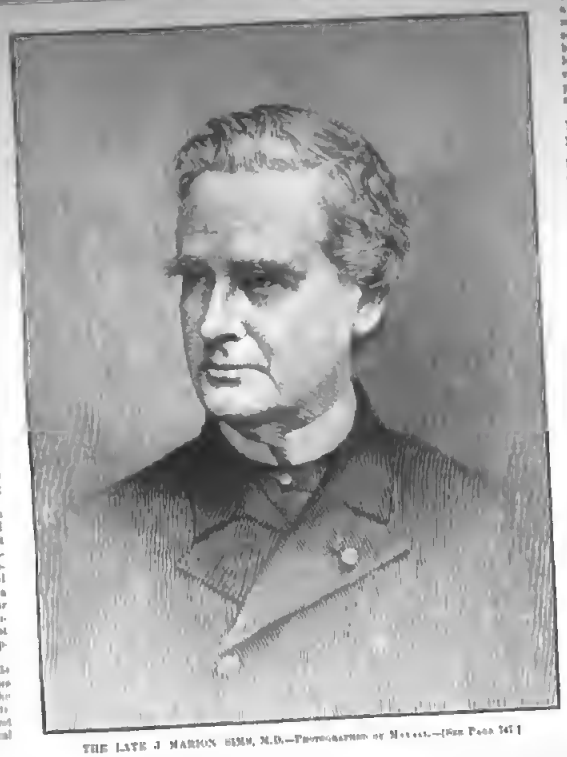
MR. SOTHERAN PRESSES AND RUNS AWAY.

It was rather a disappointment to me, on arriving there, to find that Lady Constance who she was alone, nor likely to be so for some little time. Surrounded by a circle of visitors, amongst whom were Mr Sotheran and that jovial member of the Ministry to whom I have already had occasion to allude, she was commanding upon the last news from the seat of war, and did not allow the current of her observations to be disturbed by my entrance.

"If there is one thing that pleases me more than another," she was saying, "it is your delight at the success of the Turks. You are as jubilant as if you yourselves had forced the Russians to raise the siege of Silistria; you don't seem to suspect that all Europe is laughing to your array, which can't move, and has to look on while the Turks do the work. When you do begin fighting, what do you expect to gain? Do you even know what you are fighting for? Is it to 'protect an oppressed people from the insolence of a tyrant,' as Mr Sotheran told his constituents the other day?"

"Well, for that, among other things," good humouredly answered the Minister, to whom these questions were addressed; "we English are fools, but give us credit at least for possessing a conscience."

"You represent the sentiments of the nation admirably," returned Lady Constance, "that I can't understand why everybody should say that you will be out of office before you are much older. You care as much about the oppressed people in the East as you care about the oppressed Poles. You would like us take Egypt, only you daren't do it. You plume yourselves upon your moral swordfire, you shout out that it is a conscience, and all the people cry Amen! Look at Mr Sotheran, for instance. Mr Sotheran is a typical Englishman."



THE LATE J. MARION SIMS, M.D.—PRESIDENT OF MEXICO.—[SEE PAGE 747.]

The gentleman referred to, who, with his hands folded upon the top of his walking stick, and his chin resting on his hands, had been studying the pattern of the carpet, assumed a more erect attitude, and cleared his voice. Probably it was not disagreeable to him to be described as a typical Englishman.

"Mr Sotheran," continued Lady Constance, "is possessed of the most reckless physical intrepidity. I can bear witness to that, and so can Mr Maxwell, who will remember a certain afternoon on the Dreidenberg. I am afraid he is not quite up to the mark. I am afraid he made that speech the other day, not because he believed what he was saying, or supposed that anybody else would believe it, but because he felt bound to drop the customary gratuity of incense upon the altar of the great British goat Humbug."

Mr Sotheran reddened a little, but made no reply; and the Minister rose to take his leave. Lady Constance was evidently not in an amiable temper. By degrees her visitors decamped, looking more or less pained, only Mr Sotheran held his ground, and received several broad hints with dogged obtuseness. This disturbed me very little, for I was quite determined to sit him out, and I felt pretty sure that, if he did not soon take the hint, he would be dismissed with a flea in his ear. After I devised a malicious pleasure from observation of his extreme anxiety to get rid of me. He looked at the clock, he fidgeted about in his chair, he coughed, he looked at me, finally he took to throwing me glances of entreaty, and piteous appeal. Mr Sotheran had never manifested any jealousy of me—nor, for that matter, of any of Lady Constance's admirers; he regarded me, I believe, as a complete nonentity, and if he sometimes found me in the way, did not care to show that he did so. His present uneasiness therefore, could only be accounted for upon the supposition that he had something particular to say to Lady Constance, and that this was in fact the case was presently shown, when she, losing patience, remarked:

"I see you are looking anxiously at the clock, Mr Sotheran. Pray don't let me detain you if you have other engagements."

Thus challenged, Mr Sotheran rose slowly to his feet, and, with an odd mixture of flurry and dignity, opened fire. "I was in hopes, Lady Constance, that I might have spoken a word or two to you in private before I went away; but I have no particular objection to Mr Maxwell's hearing what I have to say. You were pleased just now to speak of me before several gentlemen, one of whom is a leading member of the political party to which I belong, in a tone which was calculated—perhaps I may add intended—to bring ridicule and discredit upon me. Now I think you will allow that I am not prone to take offence—"

"It is only common justice to you," interpolated Lady Constance, "to say that you are not."

"—but I must be permitted to observe that if your opinion of me is what your words imply, it is, to say the least of it, strange that you should continue to receive me, and invite me to your house."

The remonstrance was not an unreasonable one in itself, but there was a covert insolence about the manner of its delivery which did not escape me, and which Lady Constance, too, evidently understood. She started up from her chair and took two steps toward the speaker, with a look upon her face which, I frankly confess, frightened me. Her cheeks, always pale, were as white as marble now, her lips were tightly set; two vertical lines had appeared between her brows, under which her eyes were blazing with concentrated anger. The great coarse man whom she faced shrank away from her like a whipped hound. His height must have exceeded hers by nearly a head, but at this moment she seemed positively to tower above him. For about a minute she stood thus, motionless and silent; then, in a low, clear voice, she spoke.

"Say that again, please."

But Mr Sotheran's courage was not equal to the task required of it. He made a desperate effort to assert himself; he tried to look her in the face, and failed ignominiously; at last he muttered, in a sulky tone, "I suppose you understood what I said."

She disdained to make any rejoinder. With a slight contemptuous movement of her shoulders she turned away and rang the bell.

"Good by, Mr Sotheran," she said, curtly.

Mr Sotheran made as though he would have spoken, cleared his voice, stood first on one leg, then on the other, struggling laboriously to recover his equanimity, found that recovery was not possible, and finally, picking up his hat, left the room without a word.

"I think I frightened my friend that time," remarked Lady Constance, quietly, as the door closed behind him.

"Indeed you did," said I. "But the matter of that, you frightened me too."

"I CAUGHT ONE OF HER HANDS, AND COVERED IT WITH KISSES."

med me too. I declare I thought you were going to strangle him."

"It was a triumph of spirit over brute force," said Lady Constance, sedately. "No, it wasn't," she exclaimed, with a swift change of tone, "it was a ridiculous, melodramatic, degrading scene, and I wish you had not been here to look on at it. I was obliged to suit my weapons to my antagonist, though: you can't kill a rhinoceros with sweet-meat."

"Anyhow, you were successful," I remarked. "He won't come back here in a hurry."

"He will come back in a day or two," answered Lady Constance. "At least I hope he will," she added, with a bitter laugh; "because, if he doesn't, I shall be driven to send for him."

"Don't say that!" I exclaimed. "I can't bear to hear you talk so. Why do you want the man back? You don't want him; it is only because you are in need of money, and because you are afraid of the future, that you keep him hanging about you—isn't that it?"

"Why, of course that is it," she replied, calmly. "You don't suppose me of being enamored of Mr. Sotheran's boiled-gooseberry eyes, do you?"

"I don't believe you would marry him if you were starving!" I cried. "You deceive yourself—you are always trying to make yourself not capable of baseness that is not in your nature. You talk as though you would sell yourself to that pitiable fellow, and yet the moment that he presumes ever so slightly upon his advantage, you are ready to tear him limb from limb. You shall never marry him while I can help it. And we have not reached starvation point yet. See—I have done what you told me to do." And I dropped the bundle of notes into her lap.

She started, and stared at me for a moment with parted lips. Then, in my utter astonishment and dismay, she suddenly burst into tears.

I was down on my knees beside her in an instant. I caught one of her hands, and covered it with kisses, I poured forth I don't know what incoherent absurdities, I besought her to tell me what agitated her so terribly, I swore that on one should harm her while I was alive to stand between her and misfortune—in short, I talked as arrant nonsense as I suppose that most men would have talked in my place.

She regained her self-control as quickly as she had lost it. She drew away her hand, dried her eyes, and—"There!" said she, "you have seen what you won't see a second time, I think. After all, I am only a woman, and my nerves have been completely upset these last few days. Your kindness has put the finishing touch on it all. You are a dear, good fellow, Charley," she added, in a low voice, and as I was kneeling beside her, she passed her hand gently once or twice over my hair, murmuring, "a dear, good fellow—only a very foolish one."

The touch of her fingers seemed to send—for aught I knew to the contrary, it did send—a succession of electric thrills through me. With my heart beating wildly I looked up into her face, and saw there an expression of great kindness and gentleness, mingled with just a shade of surprise. "Is it possible," I gasped, "that you can care for me a little?"

"I can't make it out," answered she, with a low laugh; "but it seems to me that I do—a little."

Then, in the midst of my exultation, an odd thing happened to me. The old sensation of angry helplessness which had vexed me at Tuesmion came back with startling vividness. I seemed to see myself swept away by a slow, steady current, which I ought to have struck out against, but could not; I had an intense momentary longing to shake myself free of this woman, and to say to her, "If I am to lose you, it shall be by my own will, not by yours." All this passed away directly, perhaps it may have been rather an effort of memory than of any present volition. It did not prevent me from protesting my rapture, my gratitude, my unalterable devotion, while Lady Constance, listening silently, continued to stroke my hair.

However, such soft moods were hardly in accordance with her temperament, nor—for some reason which I can't explain—am I altogether sorry when she resumed her ordinary demeanor. She rose, gathering up the bundle of notes, and moved away a few paces. I, too, scrambled up from my knees, feeling, to tell the truth, just the least bit in the world foolish.

"Do you know, Charley," said Lady Constance, pensively, "I never thought you would take me at my word. I was sure that you either couldn't or wouldn't find me this money."

"But you did want it, didn't you?" I asked, anxiously.

"Oh," she exclaimed, drawing a long breath, "if you only knew how I wanted it! I wanted it so much that yesterday I very nearly fell into the jaws of Mr Sotheran. He would have gobbled me up this very afternoon, I believe; but you came, like Perseus, and the monster fled. It was I who showed him Medusa's face, though," she added, laughing.

"Thank Heaven! you did," I ejaculated, piously. "You won't let him come back again now, will you?"

She made an immediate reply. "This may take me over into calm water," she said, presently, in a thoughtful tone. "Have you brought me the whole two thousand?"

I nodded. "And five hundred extra, for luck."

"Poor boy! Well, you have saved me from something worse than death, perhaps, and I shall not go through the form of thanking you. I don't suppose that Andromeda thanked Perseus. By the bye, what did Andromeda do? Do you recollect?"

"She married the hero, and they lived happily ever afterward," I replied, promptly.

"How dull! There is not much chance of the parallel being carried out in our case, however."

"But you cared for me a little," I murmured, reproachfully.

"Is that a reason? Don't you think that if I cared for you a great deal I should hand you back your money, and turn you out of the house? But no, we won't dwell on that ugly thought. It is enough that you can't possibly afford to marry me now. Whether you will be able to afford it some day, and whether when you can afford it you will do it, the answer to both of these questions depends, I imagine, entirely upon yourself."

I did not say much in reply; but I reflected with comfort both then and as I walked home afterward that my fortunes depended on longer upon any action or abstention of mine, but upon the circumstance, which must reach my uncle's ears sooner or later, that down at Richmond there dwelt a queer little being named Jimmy Le Marchant.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

I LOSE ALL FAITH IN HUMAN NATURE.

Monday a day passed at the time that I did not run down to the cottage at Richmond, where I was always made welcome, and where my cousin's sympathy and encouragement were a great comfort to me. I had established thoroughly friendly relations with Paulina and Jimmy, the former of whom decidedly improved upon acquaintance. When she was at her ease, and discovered in the vulgar tongue natural to her, she was by no means a disagreeable, and at times rather an amusing, companion. Her love for her husband, though it often manifested itself in a querulous guise, was evidently deep and sincere, and the outbreaks of temper at which Harry had hinted never took place in my presence. That they did occur at other times was unfortunately beyond a doubt; for Jimmy met me one day with a fine black eye, for which he accounted by announcing in a matter-of-course way that mother had pitched a lump of coal at him the night before. "Father said he'd give her the stick, though, if she did it again," added the little man, with unfilial glee.

I am bound to say that Paulina showed signs of great contrition and embarrassment after this unlooked-for incident, and I was glad to see that she was at least ashamed of having been found out, though I looked in vain for any change in her behavior toward the victim. Truth to tell, there was no love lost between the mother and child; and this was perhaps the least satisfactory feature in Harry's domestic concerns. Paulina seldom spoke of her son by any other name than "that brat," and Jimmy informed me, with that simplicity of language which distinguished him, that he hated his mother like poison. Upon my rebuking him, he put it to me whether I shouldn't hate any one who pulled my hair, and banged my head against the wall—a query which I evaded ignobly by asking him if he had never heard of the Fifth Commandment. He replied that he had, but that father didn't think much of the Ten Commandments, adding, triumphantly: "And on more do I. I don't think much of the Bible at all. Father never reads his Bible, and mother says he'll be sorry for it after he's dead; but I don't believe it, because she reads hers, and it don't make her any better. She's a regular bad one—blow me tight if she ain't!"

I endeavored to point out to him that his logic was faulty, and that he really must not say, "Blow me tight!" but he answered that the boys down at the river made use of the expression, and proceeded to run over a string of far more objectionable flowers of speech which he had culled from the same prolific soil.

All this, together with Jimmy's remarkable precocity, seemed to render it highly desirable that he should be sent to school as soon as might be; but Harry paid very little heed to the representations which I took the liberty to make upon this point and one can't very well tell a man that neither he nor his wife is suitable company for their own child. I could only hope that better times were in store for all three of them, little as they appeared to contemplate or desire any change of circumstances.

Once I broached the forbidden subject of Hetty's possible return home to Paulina, and was surprised to find her strongly opposed to any such scheme. "He don't want to see his father again," she affirmed. "Anyhow, he says he don't, and Lord knows I don't want him to! He's very well as he is, in my opinion. But one thing I'm determined on—if ever he goes to Norfolk, I go with him."

I said I sincerely hoped she would, whereupon she turned on me with an angry gleam in her eyes, declaring that she knew very well what I meant when I spoke in that polite voice, and that she was not going to be talked out of her rights. "Harry can't say but what I've been a good and obedient wife to him, though he does try me so at times that I can hardly keep my hands off his face. I'll do whatever he tells me to do, good or bad, and he may go away and travel for months, without so much as leaving an address, and I sha'n't make no complaint; but to be penalosed off and told to stand a' one side after all these years is what I'll not submit to—that's flat!"

I was unable to convince her that on such sacrifice would be required of her—perhaps in my heart of hearts I was not quite convinced of it myself—and perceiving that she could not be enlisted as an ally, I thought it better to let the subject drop.

But Mrs Le Marchant was not often so aggressively disposed. Once or twice I hired a boat, and took the whole family out on the river, and it was upon these occasions that Paulina appeared to enjoy herself most. Living the secluded life that she did, even those unexciting jaunts were a treat to her, and it was pathetic to see how at such times she would try to attract her husband's notice by an assumption of that spiritedness which may have possessed charms for him in former years, but which, it must be owned, did not sit very gracefully upon a person of her age and figure.

Harry responded to these efforts by blank silence, by faint smiles, occasionally by an ironical word or two that brought flames into Paulina's eyes and cheeks. I wondered sometimes whether he knew what he was doing, or whether he was merely what he appeared to be—good-humoredly indifferent. Certainly I never heard him speak harshly to his wife, despite the provocation which she often gave him in her anger.

It was about the middle of July when an incident occurred which compelled me to modify in an important particular the estimate that I had formed of my cousin's character. Walking up from the station toward Harry's house one evening, and turning a corner sharply, I was full against a veiled lady, whose form and gait seemed somehow familiar to me. I apologized, and probably should have passed on without taking any further notice of her if she had not started so violently as to invite closer scrutiny. It then became clear to me that I was in the presence of no less a person than Mrs. Farquhar. Great as my surprise was, it was altogether surpassed by her confusion; and from the agitated and eager manner in which she hastened to inform me that she had been to see her friend Mrs. Macpherson, who had taken a house at Richmond for the summer, I could not but perceive that the old lady was not telling the truth, or, at all events, not the whole truth. It was no part of my duty to set her more at her ease, so I asked her whether she didn't find two thick veils rather stifling in the dog-days. But Mrs. Farquhar was not the woman to be put out of countenance for many minutes. She answered that veils were more necessary in summer than in winter, on account of the dust, and then turned the tables upon me by saying, "And pray what may you be doing here?"

"I also am on my way to visit a friend," I replied.

"Ay, ay," said she, "you will have plenty of friends here, I dare say. They tell me that Richmond is a favorite resort of people of—doubtful reputation."

"Dear me! you don't allude to Mrs. Macpherson, surely," I observed.

"I'm talking of your friends, not mine," returned Mrs Farquhar, severely. "Since we have met, I may just avail myself of this opportunity to tell you that I hear strange accounts of your friends."

Considering that Mrs. Farquhar and I had parted, a twelvemonth before, upon the most affectionate terms, she looked very like an open declaration of hostilities, and I had no doubt in my own mind that she had decided upon once more rejecting me in favor of Harry, and had just visited him in order to make known her intentions. It so happened that I asked for nothing better than such a change of front, while as for any feelings of animosity that Mrs. Farquhar might harbor against me, I was more curious to learn the cause of them than troubled by the fact of their existence.

"Will you explain yourself?" I asked, blandly.

"To be sure I will," she answered, without a moment's hesitation. "That Lady Constance Milner whom you picked up, or rather who picked you up, abroad, is one what I would call a safe friend for a young man."

"But perhaps you don't know very much about her," I took leave to suggest.

"I know more than you think," retorted Mrs Farquhar, nodding a flowery bonnet at me impressively. "I'm an old woman, and I don't see much of society, but I have acquaintances who are better informed than myself, and when I make inquiries about your Lady Constance, what do I find? Why, that she is just one of those ladies whom decent people don't care to visit."

"Really, Mrs Farquhar," I said, "your informants appear to be rather rash in their statements. Lady Constance Milner is the sister of Lord Rosean, who was my chief at Franzenshöhe; she is pretty well known in what is called good society, and this is the first time that I have heard a word breathed against her character."

"Am I speaking of her character?" returned Mrs. Farquhar, not in the least abashed. "She may have a character, or she may have none; I'm willing to give her the benefit of the doubt. What I said was that decent people don't care to visit her, and to that I stick. Moreover, I know that she has run through all her money, and won't scruple to run through yours if ever she gets the chance. Now I think I have explained myself, and as I have to find a fly and drive down to the railway, I'll wish you good-evening."

I certainly could not complain of any want of explicitness on Mrs. Farquhar's part, and I thought I would not pursue the topic. In common civility I could do no less than offer to fetch a fly for her, and she said I might do that if I liked.

"I wonder Mrs. Macpherson did not think of sending you down in her carriage," I remarked, just by way of letting her see that I knew very well where she had been last.

"Mrs Macpherson does not keep a carriage," Mrs Farquhar replied, on obstinate look coming over her face, which I took to mean that wild horses should not drag any compromising revelations from her. "I'll just sit down on yander bench and wait for you," she added, suiting the action to the word; and when I had performed my errand she bade me good by, saying that she would tell my uncle that she had been to see me.

"Do, Mrs. Farquhar," I answered, "and tell him at the same time that my friends at Richmond are not bad people, though I must confess that they are not in society. Lady Constance Milner, as perhaps you know, lives in London, and notwithstanding the testimony of your informants, I must continue to believe that decent folks visit her."

"Keep your opinion, and I'll keep mine," rejoined Mrs. Farquhar. "We shall see who is right if we live long enough." With which she told the coachman to drive on, and was presently lost to sight.

I proceeded thoughtfully on my way toward Clarence Cottage, feeling that a crisis was at hand, and by no means sorry for it. Nothing but an unequivocal crisis could disentangle the threads of my present and future life; it would be a clear gain, too, to be freed from the various engagements of secrecy which I had permitted to be imposed upon me, and which I had found very irksome of late in more ways than one.

"So you have had a visit from Mrs. Farquhar," I said to Harry, whom I found leaning over his garden gate.

"I have a visit from Mrs. Farquhar" he ejaculated, removing his cigar from his lips, and staring at me in blank amazement. "From no recovered grandmother, do you mean? What on earth are you talking about?"

I was on positive as to the fact that it had occurred to me to suppose that Harry would deny it, and I was a good deal offended by the apparent want of confidence shown in his reply. "I have just seen and spoken to her," I said, in an aggrieved tone.

"Well?"

"Well; I took it for granted that she had been here."

"But she didn't tell me so, I presume?" observed Harry, smiling.

"She didn't tell me so, certainly; but I felt no doubt whatever upon the subject, and, to tell you the honest truth, I feel none now."

"You are not complimentary," Harry remarked.

"You haven't said yet that she has not been here," I answered, bluntly. "If you do, of course I shall believe you."

Harry laughed outright. "You seem to think I have a very pretty talent for prevarication," said he. "I assure you the old lady hasn't been to see me. In years gone by she used to arrange meetings with me from time to time, and she was always good for a tenner, which was very convenient. But since your star has been in the ascendant she has dropped me like a hot coal. I gave up writing to her as a bad job ever so long ago."

After that I could only congratulate myself upon my prudence in not having mentioned Harry's name to Mrs Farquhar, as indeed I had been upon the point of doing. I told him of this, and he whistled, remarking that it might have been rather awkward if I had let the cat out of the bag. "Not that the old lady would have been likely to pay me a call; still, she might have taken it into her head to do so, and I don't care to let her know that I am married, you see."

"My dear fellow, that's the very thing you ought to let her know," I cried. "It's the very thing that would make all the difference to you, if you would only consent to let my uncle hear of it."

But Harry answered, with some impatience, that we had already discussed that question, and were not likely to agree about it; and after we had speculated a little upon the mem of Mrs Farquhar's obvious embarrassment on being recognized by me, we began to talk about other matters.

"Whom do you suppose Charley saw this afternoon, Paulina?" said Harry, when we went into the house. "Why, my old grandmother. He made up his mind at once that she had been to pay us a visit, and I had some trouble in persuading him to believe that we hadn't been honored on far."

"I don't know about honor," grumbled Paulina, naturally. "She hasn't been here, that's certain, and for the matter of that, I don't want her here—nor yet any of them."

Now, after all this, my stupefaction at what followed will, I think, be considered excusable.

I had taken my leave, and was making down the hill, when a pattering of small feet behind me caused me to look round, and Jimmy, breathless and excited, dashed up to me. "Oh, Cousin Charley," he gasped, "have you heard the news? Such a funnie old woman has been to see us, and she says she's my great-grandmother. She talked to father ever so long, and she cried—oh, my! how she did cry! And she gave me this," concluded Jimmy, triumphantly, holding up a bright sovereign.

"Good Lord!" I exclaimed; "this really does beat everything! Jimmy," I went on, feebly, "there must be some mistake. Are you sure—quite sure—that the old woman we saw is father?"

Jimmy nodded repeatedly. "I should just think she did!" said he. "You ought to have seen her cry! Isn't it very silly for grown-up people to cry? And father kissed her, and so did mother, and so did I, when she gave me the quid, and—" But here he suddenly broke off, and put his forefinger in his mouth with a look of apprehension. "I'm sure it's a secret, though," he said. "Do you think it's a secret, Cousin Charley?"

"Eh?—what?—a secret? Oh yes, I should think it is. Sure to be!" answered I, endeavoring to collect my scattered wits.

"My wig! I say, you won't let me about my telling you?" said Jimmy, evidently much alarmed.

"No, I won't let on." I answered. "I don't suppose you'll say anything about it at home, either?"

"No fear!" returned the urchin, shaking his head. Then he said he must go, and withdrew in a sober and chastened mood.

I don't know [illegible] could have been shocked at learning that his father had told me a monstrous falsehood—probably [illegible] But in any case it seemed best to keep that [illegible] As for me, I felt that my [illegible] Harry only, [illegible] in humanity at large, had received a crushing blow. "If he had at least had the grace to look a little ashamed of himself," I thought, indignantly, "it would have been something, but to lie in that unblushing way, it was enough to bring the coal down upon him! And Paulina too!—she was just on bed. Oh, Ananias and Sapphira couldn't hold a candle to them! Well, one lives and learns; I shall never believe in men, woman, or child again."

Moreover, I did Jimmy the justice to remember that he, at least, had been an party to the fraud. I was so disgusted with his ingrateful and untruthful parents that, if it had not been for him, I would have washed my hands of them then and there, being now quite convinced that they were not worthy of the sacrifice which I had contemplated making for their sake.

FREDERICK DOUGLASS.

FREDERICK DOUGLASS is the most conspicuous American of African descent, and his career is a striking illustration of the nature of free popular institutions. Born a slave, he is to-day, by his own energy and character and courage, an eminent citizen, and his life has been a constant and powerful plea for his people. Over infinite disadvantage and prejudice, his patience, intelligence, capacity, and tenacity have triumphantly prevailed, and in himself he is a repudiation of the current assertions against the colored race. MR. DOUGLASS'S address to the late Colored Convention showed a comprehension of the situation of the colored people in this country which justified the regard in which he is held, and which explains the leadership that he has held so long. His tone toward his people is not that of flattery and sentimentality, but of candor and exhortation; and he understands, if no other colored man perceives, the immense and crushing power of that prejudice which overwhelms a race whose color is an ineffaceable sign and suggestion of prolonged servile bondage.

The story of MR. DOUGLASS'S early life has been told by himself with a simplicity and power which make his autobiography one of the most striking and unique books in our literature. There is no closer and more intimate view of slavery as it was fifty years ago, and it is impossible to read it to-day as a tale of recent American life without incredulity. No man who directly or indirectly, by sophistry, or evasion, or resolute refusal to hear the truth, sustained the system of slavery, can read the narrative of FREDERICK DOUGLASS without sorrow and remorse. These books contain the most complete and vivid picture of American slavery in its details, in its spirit, and in its influence upon master and slave, and upon industry and society. These are DOUGLASS'S narrative, HAYWARD'S Two Years Before the Mast, and MRS. STOWE'S Uncle Tom's Cabin. Careful study of these reveals the nature of the malign power with which good men at the South as elsewhere were called to contend.

FREDERICK DOUGLASS was born in Talbot County, Maryland, sixty five or sixty-six years ago. Like all slaves, he was not permitted to know his age, but he supposes, from the conversations of his master which he overheard, that he was about seventeen years old in 1835. His master was probably his father, and he was at different times a field hand and hired out to mechanical work in town. He was partially taught to read by a kind mistress, whose husband "stopped the nonsense" as soon as he knew it, and he taught himself by stealth to write. He was undoubtedly a very clever boy, and it was perhaps an instinctive apprehension that his cleverness might make his fellow slaves troublesome which caused him to be frightfully flogged and abused in the hope of breaking his spirit. Fortunately the savage treatment stimulated rather than subdued his manhood, and when living near Baltimore in 1833 he organized a party of his comrades to attempt to escape. The scheme was betrayed, and he expected to be sent to Alabama; but this doom was averted, and, waiting patiently a little while, on the 3d of September, 1838, he quietly left Baltimore by a railroad train, and soon after reached New York, at two o'clock in the morning.

He was working in a ship-yard at the time, and observing a sympathy for his race among the sailors, he thought that he could disguise himself as a sailor and so escape. He had caught the air and the vocabulary of sailors, and carefully dressing himself and carrying a "protection," which he does not say how he procured, and knowing that if he offered to buy a ticket he would be exposed to a searching examination, he jumped on the train after it was in motion. The disguise was so good that men who knew him did not recognize him. The conductor, passing through the cars, asked for his free papers, and DOUGLASS, with a sailor's air, showed his protections, and said that he did not carry his papers to sea, from which he had just returned. So the slave became a freeman, and the most powerful witness against the woes of the house of bondage found his tongue.

In 1841, at an antislavery convention at Nantucket, MR. GARRISON first saw MR. DOUGLASS, who had vaguely heard of the abolitionists, and was curious to know what they proposed to do. He was persuaded to address the convention, and after apologizing for his ignorance, the slave of three years before spoke with such force and eloquence that MR. GARRISON said that he had never heard slavery so intensely as at that moment. From that time MR. DOUGLASS was one of the most popular and powerful of the antislavery orators, and his life was devoted to arousing public sentiment, that the liberty which he had gained for himself might be secured for his fellow-victims of slavery. He shared the fate of all the antislavery pioneers. He was denounced, mobbed, and pursued, and the very fact that he was a living example of the abuses of his race seemed to give peculiar malignity to the hatred with which he was regarded. If such men were slaves, how unspeakable was the wrong of slavery to humanity! ISAIAH RUDDENS, who says in a recent statement that he "got mad with GARRISON because he was an infidel," replied to a speaker in one of the antislavery meetings who cited DOUGLASS as evidence of the equality of the races, "That won't do; he is half white, and that accounts for him." "Oh," retorted DOUGLASS, "then I am only your half-brother," which, Captain RUDDENS adds, was "as good a shot as ever I got in my life."

In later years MR. DOUGLASS has been a soldier, a popular lecturer, lecturer, and a devoted Republican orator. He was a Republican Presidential Elector in New York, and he has been Marshal of the District of Columbia. His address, of which we have spoken, at the late Colored Convention, was the wisest word that has been spoken for his race for many a year. He is still a Republican, but he exhorts his brethren to subordinate party attachment to their own welfare. MR. DOUGLASS is one of the most interesting figures in the country, and an American career has had more remarkable and suggestive vicissitudes than his.

GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

THE EVACUATION, 1783.

No part of the country suffered as did New York from the pains of the Revolution. More than half its territory—and that the most populous and important—lay for seven years in the power of the invader. It could have neither privateers nor trade. It had no sea-board. Its fine river and harbor were used for its destruction. Of its remaining territory the larger part was in the very track of the war. The savage hornet of BURGOYNE from the north left arrest where traces of desolation. The merciless CATAWBAS covered the shores of the Hudson with the ghosts of his barbarity. Towns, villages, and farms he laid in ruins. But even all this might have been borne had not one distracted State been threatened and harried along its borders by the constant invasions of the Indians, and in the interior by the plots and turbulence of the Tories. It is wonderful that Governor CLINTON and his almost fugitive Legislature were able to maintain its independence, collect their taxes, and contribute so large a share of men, arms, and money to the Continental armies. CLINTON, the LIVINGSTONS, WILLETT, SCHUYLER, MCDOUGAL, VARICK, ROOSEVELT, PLATT, and, above all, a patient, courageous people, carried New York through seven years of pains and sorrows such as few communities ever bore.

And now suddenly had come the almost unlooked for liberation. The invaders, too few, were about to escape sullenly from the fallen city. It was once more free. For the first time in seven years of captivity New York Island, Staten Island, and Long Island were to hear the notes of their national music, and listen to the voice of peace.

Here, on the 25th of November, 1783, was performed the last act of the war of liberation. The people of New York took possession of their metropolis. For seven years of expectation doubt, fear, to exultation WASHINGTON had never ceased to keep his eyes fixed upon the city from which he had fled in 1776 a beaten general. He had hoped to snatch it away from the foe by some swift strategy or bold attack. He had won it at last in Virginia, and now was to enter it in peace. The day, the scene, rise upon us at its hundredth anniversary. In the morning of the 25th a detachment of the American army had marched from Harlem as far as Grand Street, the English troops retired at their approach. The Americans took possession of the forts, lines, intrenchments, so long held by their foes. The English and the Tory exiles moved slowly down to the Battery, and embarked in the great fleet of war ships and transports that filled the bay. Reluctant, and, they passed through the ruined city, symbols of a dying past, adherents of a political creed long since tarnished from among men.

But at the upper end of the island all was exhilaration and hope. Escorted by the Westchester Light Horse, and followed by a crowd of citizens and patriot exiles returning joyfully to their homes, two eminent men rode down together from Harlem to the city. One was WASHINGTON, pale, care-worn, exultant, full of hope, and into Governor GEORGE CLINTON, active, brave, sincere, the war Governor of New York. They were both on horseback, of fine appearance and striking carriage. Both were sincere friends of the people, possessed of the very spirit of reform. To CLINTON New York owes its common schools and its general education; to WASHINGTON its freedom to follow knowledge. They rode together on that auspicious day along Bowery Road, down Queen, or what is now Pearl Street, through Wall to Broadway, amidst a crowd of rejoicing citizens, and as for the first time in seven years the fair city of their love. But what a change! They came to a city of ruins. How had not New York suffered? It was a picture of despair, lightened only by the new era of hope.

In the evening there was a memorable dinner at Fraunces' Tavern, on the corner of Broad and Pearl streets. The room is still shown, almost unchanged, where WASHINGTON, CLINTON, and the heroes of New York met at this triumphal banquet. Its fare was solid and plain. Toasts were pledged to all who had aided the cause of freedom—the French King, the United Netherlands, the Northern powers. With one heart they exclaimed: "May America be the asylum to the persecuted of the earth!" "May the remembrance of this day be a lesson to princes!" The memory of the heroes who have fallen for our freedom." All was excitement and hope. A display of fire-works was given a few days later. Of the touching traits of the festal season were the congratulations (November 29) offered to WASHINGTON and CLINTON by the exiled patriots, and their replies. "May the tranquility of your city be perpetual!" wrote WASHINGTON; "may the ruin be repaired!" "To your sufferings, and the invincible spirit with which they were surmounted," wrote CLINTON, "I have been witness."

The 25th of November was long the great day of New York. LAFAYETTE, who landed here in 1867, describes it in its early ardor. The military assembled, the people came out in crowds. The Continentals, in buff and blue, acted again the scenes of the evacuation; they took possession of the abandoned forts, and marched in triumph to the Battery. Slowly the observance died away. Yet it is the celebration of the new birthday of New York. No State had suffered so much from the terrors of war, none profited so largely from their results. The city sprang up at once from its ruins to become the metropolis of the continent. Its people were full of energy and hope, its wharves were hid as a forest of masts, its streets were gay with trade. In the seventeen years from the evacuation to 1800 its population rose from 20,000 to 60,000—a threefold increase. It passed on before Philadelphia and Boston, and was the chief city of the West. It is well for New York to celebrate yearly the birth of its freedom with glad rejoicings, and remember with tender gratitude the brave and honest souls who in their sufferings laid the foundations of its prosperity.

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

It is pleasant to observe that a person of inventive genius has turned his attention to the needs of carnivora without producing a new kind of rowboat. His invention is a contrivance consisting of a combination of canvas fastened to a light cap, for enabling an carnivora to use over the bow of his shell without turning his head. Thus, by wearing one of these, Courtney could see the finish of a race in which he was a contestant.

On a first night at a West End (London) theatre, just after one of the actresses had disclosed herself amid appropriate surroundings, and softly breathed, "How lovely is the night, and the solemn calm that prevails!" there was a tremendous crash of falling scenery, and the maiden was frightened nearly to death. Commenting the incident, the Court Journal observes: "There is a great deal of the twinkling about of property and scenery of late. When some fair being is knocked out of her being, the Lord Chamberlain will see to the fixings."

A Chinese restaurant has been opened in Paris in which patrons may be served with such Oriental delicacies as bird's-nest soup, smoked sharks' fins, dried cuttle fish, salted rat, and eggs that have been purposely kept till they have become opaque and unsuitable for hatching our poses. It is said that the last-named dish requires that the eggs shall be covered with a mixture of embers, chalk, lye, soda, powdered licorice root, and oil, and left to themselves for several months. The edible bird's-nests are built in a species of swallow. They are boiled in chicken broth in lieu of almonds. The experiment of the Chinese restaurateur is in its beginning as yet.

In Pennsylvania a fruit has been unearthed which measures forty inches in circumference at the forehead. It is conjectured that the man died on the morning following his celebration of a Democratic victory at the polls.

The preponderance of spinsters in Boston receives a noteworthy illustration in the fact that when a cat show and a cheesanthemum show are held recently in neighboring halls there, the receipts from the rat show exceeded those from the show of flowers by some seventy five dollars.

Nothing came of the plot to tar and feather the Lord Mayor of Dublin while he was attending a meeting of the University Philosophical Society at Trinity College. Maybe the plotters were placated by the assurance that he would let it be the last time he would attend a philosophical society meeting.

In a Boston household was a cat named Blanca. The pet died, and was buried in the yard. Over its grave was placed a slab, on which the eldest child had printed the deceased creature's name, "Beyanbee."

"They are not wanted any more," said a policeman in the Tombs, as one hundred and ten men were sentenced as vagrants for terms varying from three to six months; "they had a soft time for thirty days before election, and will have a hard time for three hundred and thirty-three days." The experience of those citizens, and of those who have flocked to Washington in the hope of obtaining offices which the Democratic Congressmen have to dispense, shows how unprudent it is to resolve to live by politics with nothing to fall back on.

Hannibal Hamlin was never known to wear an overcoat. Nor was he ever known to wear that anxious, "Am I getting the guernsey?" look of the overwarlless dudes of this wind-swept metropolis.

Some of the most characteristic stories of steamboat travel on the great Western rivers are associated with the bar rooms of the immense craft that ply on those waters. In almost every instance, perhaps, they have passed through the process of amplification in the fancy of the successive narrators, but there has been usually something more as the way of foundation than a mere suggestion. The movement which has been going on for some little time for the abolishing of bars on the Mississippi and Ohio river boats promises to do away with liquor-selling on all the boats of those waters. This is a reform of greater dimensions than would be that of shutting up the closets in which liquor is sold on the steamboats of the Sound and the North River. The reason for the abolition of the bars on the Western boats seems to be mercenary, the owners believing that the room devoted to their lucrative trade will be more valuable if occupied in other ways.

A farmers' congress is to be held next month in Kentucky, and somebody asks why the lawyers of the country don't hold a congress somewhere. Bless our, they do at Washington, in the Capitol, every winter.

Two missionary men of the sect known as Plymouth Brethren were travelling in Persia, partly for business and partly for pleasure. In the course of their journeying they discovered a beautiful Armenian widow. Humanity forbade that they should leave her to the persecutions of her heathen relations, and prophecy forbade them to travel about with their convert. So it was agreed between the missionaries that they should cast lots to see which of them should marry her. This part of the proceedings, by the way, is probably what recommended the story to the London Life, in which paper it appears. Well, the one to whom the lot fell promptly married the widow, and he lived happily with her until she died. The fortunate missionary was Lord Congleton, whose death was recently announced.

When the future tabulator of facts puts it down that in the winter of 1883 the opera singers in New York produced a memorial famine, the question as to where Italian opera was received the most encouragement can be settled by reference to statistics as often as it arises.

An east-side Chinese laundryman of the name of Sam Chin had his name registered before putting it on his sign. It now appears as Sam Jaw.

An old lady from the country sat all the afternoon recently in the new Senate-chamber, in Albany, listening to the arguments of a distinguished lawyer before the Court of Appeals, and industriously knitting. As she was departing after the court had adjourned, she said to the superintendent of the Capitol, "The man that delivered the comic lecter was purty fair, but I've heern better."

Of the painting which the Queen has commanded an English artist to execute, a large picture representing the battle of Tel-el-Kebir, "as seen from the position where the Duke of Connaught was with his regiment of Guards, Mr. Labouchere writes: "It will, I presume, be a companion picture to the well-known work of art entitled 'London in a Fog.'"

It is claimed by the officers of the government secret service that every man in the United States who is known ever to have been engaged in counterfeiting Federal money or securities is so closely watched by detectives that he can not work in connection with other counterfeiters without detection. This claim is supported by the fact that when city detectives were recently detailed to watch a suspected gang of counterfeiters they found the criminals already closely "shadowed" by secret service men. The requirements of successful counterfeiting are in this age such that one man working alone can accomplish nothing.

"Quaker Indians" is the Colorado name for the Moquis—an inoffensive tribe, some of whose are held as slaves by the Navajoes.

TWO MOTHERS.

A woman whose pale face was worn with weeping
Gazed with sad eyes upon her only child,
A lovely girl who, though the death-sleep sleeping,
As if in her an dreaming, softly smiled.
And "Must I part, beloved, from thee forever?"
She cried, in anguish, as she bent to kiss
The smiling mouth. "Ah! woe is me, there never
In all the world was grief so great as this."

Spoke then another mother: "There is sorrow
Which makes shine gladness; sorrow so sublime
That it seem caught but waking every morrow
With the old pain, from sleep that brought no rest;
Sorrow that deems thy grief a blessing, knowing
That she thus lost to thee is glorified;
Sorrow that asks—the while no tears are flowing—
'Would that, like thine, my only child had died!'"

MARGARET EYTINGE.

A NERVOUS LADY AT HEIDELBERG.

By VIRGINIA W. JOHNSON.

I.—THE ADVENTURES OF A NIGHT.

THE Frankfort train reached Heidelberg at five o'clock on a July afternoon, and two ladies descended—the elder timorous and suspicious of railway officials; the younger confident, eager, and full of enthusiasm. A carriage soon bore them away from the depot and suburb of modern aspect, along the Anlage, damp with recent heavy rains, toward the town.

"Those villas and gardens resemble any American city—Buffalo, for example," quoth the Nervous Lady.

"Buffalo!" echoed her niece Margaret, in the scornful accents of Young America. "The idea, aunt, of comparing beautiful old Heidelberg on the Neckar with one of our towns!"

"Buffalo is more accessible, certainly, and I am not quite sure the comparison is just to our towns, for I should judge by the evil odors here that the Electors Palatine and their successors have devoted less time to sewerage than to hair-splitting over religions," retorted the Nervous Lady, with a droll twist to her thin, mobile lace.

Niece Margaret sighed profoundly, and gazed at the tree-tops. She declined to bring herself down to the level of such arguments. Niece Margaret was a dignified young woman of twenty-five, with a white intellectual brow, a pair of clear gray eyes, a firm mouth, and money in her own right. In travel she was the lover of cotton wool in which a certain Madame De Stael has compared the feminine element in society, and the Nervous Lady expended her whims on that safe elastic resistance of a calm temperament.

"I am always afraid of my life in a carriage," resumed the latter, after a moment of silence. "These horses appear hermless, however, and they eat black bread, I am told. Why, Mrs. Thorpe's boy is studying at Leipsic or Heidelberg."

Down came Niece Margaret's gaze from the tree-tops to the depths of the carriage, where she discovered an absorbing interest in the strap of her chaise-case.

"He is at Heidelberg, studying medicine," she said, quietly.

"Dear me, how time flies!" sighed the Nervous Lady. "I am actually an old woman. I remember Willie Thorpe, in a jacket, firing a Fourth of July cannon, and breaking my parlor windows. He was a handsome rascal, and made a polite apology for having frightened me into a fainting fit. Now he is a German philosopher, I suppose, and would not recognize us, with his meerschaum pipe and beer tankards."

"No," assented Margaret, gravely.

The carriage paused in a narrow, crooked street of the old town, paved with round cobble-stones, and the Nervous Lady, entering a low massive door, was conducted to her destination.

The educational pension belongs in Germany. As a rule, it is dingy, lugubrious, and horrent; its pervading odor is a faint suggestiveness of blackboard and pencils, mingled with boys' boots, woollen garments consigned to a camphorated seclusion at times, and wet umbrellas. English comfort and American coziness are frequently the baits which gild its austere simplicity. Niece Margaret had selected an educational pension at Heidelberg as a suitable haven, keeping her true motive in the background, and assuring her deluded relative that all the world flocked to this popular establishment.

The Nervous Lady found herself in an old-fashioned mansion, mantled with green vines suggestive of spiders and earwigs, and with a neglected garden in the rear. The side-stone corridor, adorned with angular portraits of a greenish hue, after fleshpots, was redolent of greasy soup and kerosene oil at this season of year, with hints of wintry draughts and diphtheria. The chambers, large and lofty, were oddly shaped, as if originally they had intended to be square, or oblong, but had been moulded into their present dimensions at a moment of indecision. There was something rambling and disconnected about the house, which terrified and fascinated our travellers. The landlady was vague in manner, swerving aside instinctively from a decisive affirmation or negation, and vanished hum by-ways continually, as if searching for a lost article never found, the mosaic were limp and indifferent.

Ten hours later the Nervous Lady stood at her window, her countenance reflecting many emo- She had dined in an apartment like the refectory of a convent; the viands had proved inferior, and had in eccentric combinations wholly new to her experience. The company, chiefly ladies from English rural situations and Scotland, had adhered to the custom of dressing for dinner, appearing in silk attire, with long and dress-bed trains, like the tail of a in Brobdingnagian fashions in the by vaps, ones worn.

Outside the window, life manifested its many phases. The Heidelberg students were abroad at this sunset hour. Here a group wearing caps of a unusual yellow that linked some affectionately, whips and canes ashing, naturally in time of peace, the attitude of fencing. There a blonde and a brunette youth, in blue caps of the Polish aristocracy, lounged in an open landau, gazing superciliously at pedestrians. A pair with military bearing doffed their white turbans to a professor. A lofty and cynical hero, with a broken nose, and gold-embroidered head-covering the size of a saucer tilted over one eye, stalked alone. A boy in a green cap, with the face of a cherub, perched a tinted eyeglass on his pretty nose to ogle Margaret.

In an adjacent garden two students occupied a summer-house draped with vines. Both were stout, of heavy aspect, and wore those patches of white plaster on cheek and chin denoting recent duels, the scars of which might serve as a badge of bravery in after-life, but which imported, for the time being, the aspect of sailors on shore.

"They are drinking brandy to wine-glasses, and then a horrible black beer," cried the Nervous Lady. "Oh, where are their mothers?"

"Prince von Bismarck was one of the maddest of the Heidelberg students, I believe, hence their license," said Margaret, smiling. "However, the German government is about to interfere with duelling and other irregularities in the universities."

"It is time. I wonder how many drunken ruffians emerge into the world to one scholar who has sown his wild oats here?"

"Nonsense, aunt!" said Margaret, sharply. Her usually calm gray eye flashed, and the color mantled her cheek.

"I have a right to my opinion," pursued the Nervous Lady.

At this moment the setting sun separated the heavy clouds on the horizon, and the castle appeared spanned by a glittering rainbow. The distant valleys were still veiled in dissolving mist, the roofs and gables of the ancient town glowed in the warm light, and the rainbow abutted across the majestic ruin on the hill-side as if memory may linger about the terrace of the Frederic bubbling or the ivy-mantled bastions of the time of Elizabeth Stuart.

The Nervous Lady prepared to retire at an early hour. She dismissed Margaret, after assuring herself that she knew the exact locality of the latter's room, situated at the extremity of the tortuous corridor. Scarcely had she done so when she remembered that her chloral pearls were in the pocket of a certain black bag borne away by her niece.

"I shall not require the bag to-night," she soliloquized, ignorant of all the adventures which could hinge on the trifling circumstance.

Insomnia had presided at the cradle of the Nervous Lady, and accompanied her through life. Her later years, otherwise prosperous, were remarkable only for the localities and nights during which she had slept. In travel, London, Paris, and Venice were cities cherished by her with peculiar tenderness. Why? "I slept soundly in each from eleven o'clock until five," she invariably explained, with a certain wiry gayety peculiar to her.

The clock struck ten as she laid her head on the stony pillow of the educational pension. The first train quitted the Heidelberg depot for Wurzburg, and rushed through the town like a shrieking demon, vanishing in a distant tunnel with a prolonged howl. At the same moment the convivial songs of a party of students became audible in a neighboring garden, mingled with the click of billiard balls and the report of pistols in a shooting-gallery. Scarcely had the Nervous Lady accustomed her ear to these sounds when the pension awoke as simultaneous melody. The young English lads in the next room began to warble sentimental ballads; the youth attending lectures launched himself on the "Beautiful Blue Danube" with the aid of the tinkling instrument of the velon; while the classical musician Schumann-stairs remembered a sonata. The Nervous Lady then found herself between a cross-fire of music on either side, and with Beethoven rising through the floor, thus producing a fascinating discord. She bounded into an upright position, and removed her night-cap. "Oh, why was the piano ever invented?" she groaned. "I am confident the first piano-maker is meeting with a just retribution—somewhere. I wonder what Margaret is about? Surely nobody but a deaf mute sleeps at Heidelberg."

Niece Margaret was seated before her writing-desk, and the music did not disturb her. "My old friend Willie," she began, at the head of a sheet, then blushed, paused, and tore the page in fragments. "Dear Mr. Thorpe," she recommenced, "have you forgotten your school-mate and playfellow, Margaret Cooke?"

Margaret's letter was destined never to be completed. Eleven o'clock tolled solemnly from a church tower. The Blue Danube vessel abruptly, the songs languished, the sonata below-stairs grew more muffled and distant. Outside, the report of the pistol became intermittent, while the click of billiard-balls and the mirth of the students increased. The second train, emerging from the tunnel, swooped down upon the town as if with the intention of cutting in twain the very chamber of the Nervous Lady. Twelve o'clock struck. The audience of a theatre dispersing passed beneath the window with heavy tramp of feet and laughter. One o'clock was announced from the belfry. The students emerged from the garden, with gibes and jests, piercing whistles to attendant dogs, disputes in loud and thick mixed utterance.

"They must be tipsy," thought the Nervous Lady acutely wakeful, and her gaze the ceiling, where the street lamp made bars of light. Then she experienced a stab of pain in her side. "Pleurisy or pneumonia," she said, and rose in search of remedies. She found a box of licorice drops, and ate one. Everything was to the unsuspecting black bag. Perhaps the pain was not pneumonia, but the hard texture of the mattress. Reassured, she returned to her pillow, and fell asleep, although she would have taken oath in any court of justice that she had not even "lost herself."

Two o'clock sounded, and the strokes beat on her startled brain. Then it was that the third train of the night approached slowly with heavy rumbling movement, paused, backed, puffed spasmodically, and entered the depot. The Nervous Lady's last remnant of composure vanished with this train. Her teeth chattered, her head whirled, she even wept with rage and weariness. Half the maledictions she wished on the heads of the community about her, if fulfilled, would have swept the university town from its foundations. Grimly she lighted a candle, wrapped herself in a dressing-gown, and issued forth on the tortuous corridor in search of Niece Margaret and the black bag. At the threshold she made her first blunder; she turned to the left instead of to the right. Arrived at Margaret's door, as she supposed, she knocked, and said, quaveringly, through the key hole. "Could you give me the black bag, dear? I have not slept a wink to-night."

A masculine voice growled a sleepy response.

The Nervous Lady fled in dismay. Evidently she had knocked at the wrong door. She stumbled down several steps, vaguely aware that the passage narrowed, and turned a sharp angle over a window. A draught of night-wind through a broken pane of the casement extinguished the candle. The midnight wanderer stood alone in fearful darkness. Where was she? How could she discover her own room again? Should she scream, and alarm the whole household? Instead she leaned against the wall, and laughed weakly at the absurdity of the situation. The educational pension was a labyrinth. She would not be surprised if a trap opened beneath her feet, consigning her to the dungeons of the Vehmgericht, or the arms of an Iron Maiden. She found a candle on the candlestick, it refused to ignite. A second, struck against the wall, flared and went out. Chilled, bewildered, and enraged, she groped her way back. She stumbled up several steps again, ran against an open door, and discerned a faint ray of light. Possibly Margaret was coming in search of her.

The light proved to be a night taper burning in a chamber of which the door also was open. A man was extended across the threshold, his eyes closed, and his face covered with blood.

"It's murder," gasped the Nervous Lady, and stood still.

II.—THE NERVOUS LADY FULFILLS HER MISSION.

A man had fallen on the door with blood pouring from a wound in the cheek and chin escaping via the jugular vein. Such was the startling spectacle presented to her eyes. The Nervous Lady did not shriek or faint. Nervous ladies seldom do in those grave emergencies of life which require them to forget themselves. Incredible and appalling circumstance! Instead of a bottle of chloral pearls in the pocket of a black bag, she had found a fellow-creature bleeding to death. She had arisen and sought this stranger in response to a mute appeal for assistance, instead of obtaining relief for her own petty ailments. She stepped across the prostrate form, and glanced about the room. The taper burned on a table, but no watcher had guarded the feverish slumber of the young man. He was alone. Swiftly the Nervous Lady gathered the pillows from the bed, placed them on the floor, and raised the wounded head. The man groaned, opened his eyes, and again closed them. His new friend knelt beside him, coolly and firmly re-adjusted the bandages, which had slipped aside, thus occasioning the hemorrhage, and restored the head to the pillows as if she had served as hospital nurse instead of swooning at the sight of a penknife wound on the finger of a comrade in girlhood.

Her next move was not less collected. She lighted a lamp, took it in her hand, and went out on the landing. The fact that the fingers which grasped the lamp were stained with blood did not even impress her as ghastly. A flight of stairs led down to an entrance door. She was no doubt at home. The Nervous Lady winked valiantly several times but did not permit this astonishing circumstance to disconcert her. In the tranquil clearness of her mind at the moment she remembered having seen from her window a brass plate inscribed with a doctor's name on an opposite house. She found it the most natural circumstance in the world to seek the physician in her dressing-gown. She opened the street door. At last the town was hushed to slumber. The silence and darkness were oppressive, a damp fragrance of flowers from a neighboring garden reached her nostrils. Sweet flowers are placed on coffins, she thought.

A tall form approached the opposite house, paused, and looked at her. She beckoned energetically. A dignified gentleman, wearing gold spectacles, crossed the street.

"If you are a Christian," and understood the English language, "follow me," said the Nervous Lady.

"Good!" replied the tall gentleman.

Soon the young man was restored to bed, stimulants and restoratives applied, and the tall gentleman surveyed the result with evident satisfaction.

"You are the doctor opposite?" inquired the Nervous Lady.

"Yes, madame."

"Good," said the Nervous Lady in ta

"Possibly this trial is too much for you," continued the physician, with a searching glance at her white face, rendered shadowy by the obscurity.

"Oh no; I never felt better," was the jerky response.

"He is your son?" hazarded the doctor.

"I do not know who he is, where I am, or how I came to be here," retorted the Nervous Lady, incoherently. "I found him on the floor bleeding to death. That is sufficient."

"He is a good fellow enough," said the doctor, slowly. "An American student, the name Thorpe."

"Oh, Lord!" ejaculated the Nervous Lady, suddenly collapsing in a chair. "How I wish my niece Margaret was awake!"

"Shall I awaken her?" demanded the good-natured doctor.

"You would not be able to find her in the educational pension, unless you are a magician. He is alive, that is one comfort, anyway. I thought him dead, stone-dead, at first."

She rose and approached the doctor mysteriously.

"I know what it is," she whispered. "He has fought one of those wicked duels."

The doctor shrugged his shoulders, and smiled leniently. He had a scar on his own cheek.

"Some boyish scrape," he admitted.

"Don't talk to me about your barbarous customs of the Dark Ages! I wonder you are not ashamed that you have not outgrown them. There! I will watch while you go to the pharmacy and bring your assistant. I am not weary, and, besides, I could not find my way home if I tried. He must be Willie Thorpe, Mrs. Thorpe's boy, the only son of a widow. Dear! dear! what a wicked world it is!" She seated herself beside the bed, discovered a handkerchief in the pocket of her dressing-gown, and began to cry.

The physician departed. The nurse soon dried her tears, and began to move about the chamber, peering at different objects in the anticipation of discovering a whole magazine of deadly weapons—at least a blood-stained sword. She shook her head at the heaps of ink-marked books, the pens and loose sheaves scattered about, the general aspect of dust and disorder. The cave of young men, especially of students, were too wonderful for her. On the chimney piece were two photographs framed, one reflecting the pale, sad face of Mrs. Thorpe, with hair meekly smoothed on either side of a care-worn brow; the other a girl's head in a large hat.

"Why, it is Margaret!" exclaimed the Nervous Lady. "Ah, the home influence was too remote for this youth in a foreign land."

She returned to her post beside the bed, sighing profoundly. At the moment the patient opened his eyes, gazed at her dreamily, and extending his hand, touched her arm, as if attempting to establish the reality of objects about him.

"Mrs. Cooke," he said, faintly.

"Yes, my dear," she replied, beaming on him as if he were not a sinner.

"Do you remember the Fourth-of-July cannon?" vaguely and mechanically uttered, the mind still astray.

"To be sure. Go to sleep."

The young man's eyes did not immediately close in response to this injunction. He glanced about the room, visibly disquieted by some thought.

"I tried to open the window or the door," he muttered. "I was stifling, and Jack did not answer when I called. Where is Margaret?"

The Nervous Lady smiled, nodded, and placed a finger on her lips.

"You shall see her when you awaken," she replied.

Willie Thorpe sank into a refreshing slumber, and his nurse, bolt-upright in her chair, followed his example. When the latter opened her eyes, Margaret was embracing her with ardor, while the doctor bent over his patient.

"What a dreadful night you must have had, dear!" said Margaret, pale with excitement and sympathy. "You saved him, aunty."

"I do not think much of him," were the first words of the Nervous Lady. "However, we must play the good Samaritan, as we are his country women, and he is Mrs. Thorpe's boy."

Margaret rose to her feet with a reproachful glance.

"Where is the educational pension located this morning?" added the Nervous Lady, in a flighty manner. "If that establishment still exists, it might be well to bring me some raiment."

"The door of communication with this house was left open by a servant," explained her niece. "The landlady is very sorry."

"Is she? Then I advise her to illuminate her crooked corridors by means of the electric light."

Margaret joined the physician. She did not attempt to touch Willie Thorpe, although her emotion was plainly written in the pallor and tremble of her face.

"Permit me to be chief nurse," she pleaded, tremulously. "I am very strong."

"He requires little nursing, only careful washing," he returned, cheerfully. "You are doubtless strong, as you say, but your relative is the stronger. She had nerves of steel during the night, and this young man owes his life to her."

The convalescence of the American student was rapid. It was also painful. There can be no manner of doubt that Willie Thorpe found the presence of the Nervous Lady irksome, and his debt of gratitude uncomfortable. She was the surgeon who probed the wounds of his moral nature with unflinching hand. And Margaret's The proximity of a girl whose father had forbidden him to correspond with on only daughter above him to worldly position, when he abroad to study, was embarrassing. He had vowed he forget her, in anger and deep resentment. Now the intervention there to men from home signified concurrence, tender and regret, to him after an absence of four years. The pet son of an ominous mother gifted with a bright intelligence, possessing a careless good-humor of disposition, which rendered him popular, and a touch lighter purse than many of his associates, these reminders of duty pricked him sharply. He had attained that crisis of youth when the ship either obeys the helm and sweeps around on her course, or openly defies all future restrains. Was he a dissipated student, having already required a dazzling reputation for audacity, recklessness, and being "fast"? Not on yet, but gas, fond of pleasure, with many social engagements which do not render the brain clear next morning. None the less did Willie Thorpe stand on the first step of that decline from fun as vice which Alphonse Daudet compares to the luxuriously carpeted stairway of the cafe, flooded with gas jets above, and leading down to the darkness and the gutter of the street.

The Nervous Lady spoke to him of his mother, with an inflection of anxiety in her voice. Margaret, on the contrary, persisted in making a born of him by a thousand subtle inferences of glance and manner. The gaze of the hero followed her with profound gratitude, which rendered himself only the more miserable. Oh, the cheerfulness of this usually sedate Margaret! She sang, she read aloud, she described the career of old playfellows at home. Her aunt glanced askance at her. Her calm niece was no longer recognizable in this tender mame, this girl full of a gentle mirth, yielding to little fluttering tremors of smiles and capricious frowns. Possibly the surprise of the Nervous Lady was not unmingled with the prejudice of jealousy. Was Margaret's manner due to the virtuous satisfaction of pitying the good Samaritan, or to the joy of again seeing Willie Thorpe?

The subject of the duel had not as been broached. Now the invalid turned over cards and notes on the table, selecting one which bore a coronet, and poised it in his hand.

"He has never asked to see me, I suppose?" he questioned, while the gloom deepened on his face.

The Nervous Lady, as guardian dragon of the premises, replied in the negative.

"Was he a friend?" inquired Margaret, softly.

Willie turned the card, tossed it aside, and laughed bitterly.

"He was the best friend I ever had, we were inseparable—until we fought."

"I marvel you did not slice off each other's noses, as pat out an eye," observed the Nervous Lady, to a withering tone. "Such privileges are accorded by the university code, I believe, although the neck is swathed as leather."

Willie's eye flashed, his face crimsoned, and he struck the table with his clinched hand.

"It is easy enough to avoid quarrels," he said. "The duels of drinking beer on a wager, usually forced on a new arrival, sicken him fearfully at first, but do no harm. I would fight him over again to-morrow if he hurled the same taunts and sneers at me about—American girls, and at a supper table."

Margaret looked at him, advanced a step, and gave him her hand with an eloquent gesture.

"Thank you," she said, in a low tone.

He bent his head and kissed her hand.

"It is true, I thought of you at that moment," he whispered.

The Nervous Lady remained wholly unmoved. "Willie Thorpe, how many years have you been here?" she demanded, in a magisterial tone.

"Four years."

"What have you accomplished?"

"Little enough, I am afraid. Studied, played, joined debating societies, dabbled in science and philosophy."

"How do you intend to occupy yourself now?"

The student winced, rose, and paced the floor.

"Aunty!" remonstrated Margaret.

"Look here, Mrs. Cooke. I will go home and earn farmer, if you like," he said, pausing. "Shall I dwell like a patriarch on the old place, reaping and sowing the hill patch, while mother feeds the chickens in the barn-yard?"

"No," retorted the Mentor, slowly. "Your mother sold the farm long ago to defray the expenses of your foreign education. She boards in the village."

Willie stood with a bewildered and stricken look on his face. "She never told me," he murmured.

"Reverses come to every one. Oh, aunty, how can you be so disagreeable?" Margaret again interposed.

"'A curse from the depths of womanhood
Is very salt and bitter and good,'" quoted her aunt.

III.—THE NERVOUS LADY DEPARTS.

"A pair of lovers!" said a mocking voice in the distance. Careless words echoed by the light breeze which rippled the masses of ivy on the wall, and found confirmation in the glance of a grave professor rested on an adjacent bench, musing on matters human and divine.

Margaret and Willie stood on the castle terrace. They did not heed the criticism, if they heard it, and on vows of reciprocal affection had been exchanged as they gazed down on the Neckar winding below to join the Rhine. Why was not the river like the stream of life?

"Such air-castles as I have built for you, Willie, in those four years, dwelling quietly at home!" she said, presently. "It is easy to decide on the glorious career of another, especially for a woman. I have always believed you would be like the great and noble Dr Gruefe, of Berlin."

The student bent his head, and flecked the ivy with his cane. The example of Dr Graefe had not been held especially before his eyes.

"How good of you to believe in me at all!" he exclaimed. "I intend to apply myself seriously now. I have idled away time enough. Margaret, will you help me?"

"Yes."

A pair of lovers? Vaguely conscious of a happiness as yet expressed only by glances and the desire to be together, neither of them accepted the idea. The book-worn smiled cynically, but the pussy Fraulein, in white with blue ribbon, leaned on the parapet and looked at them sympathetically with half lowered blonde eyelashes.

The Nervous Lady was seated in the Grimburg Museum, awaiting the return of her young people from exploring the dungeons. The rooms were silent, as if the memory of the Lords Palatine still lingered, in ghostly fashion, about the relics of their earthly reign. The spot soothed and pleased her; she nodded drowsily in her chair. Opposite hung the portrait of Theresa Caterina, daughter of the Polish Prince Lubomirsky and wife of Charles Philip. This Polish woman is unique in the collection. Her powdered hair is gathered back from a subtle, irregular face, the tresses confined above one temple by a cluster of gray pearls, her robe is a deeper gray tint, fastened across the front with a second pearl cluster, from whence soft lace depends over the bodice, while her mantle, ermine-edged, is of a peculiar slate blue. What a contrast she forms to the pictures about her!—princesses blooming with the shimmer of amber satin, and rustling furbelows in crimson, green, and brown, and royal robes in flowing peruke, doublet, and armor.

The solitary occupant of the place found this neutral toned portrait full of interest, as the original had been of subtle tact and grace in her day. She gazed at it meditatively, until she fancied the soft rustling of a summer breeze wafted through the open window actually blended with the movement of the gray robe. Then a hand was placed on her shoulder, and Margaret said,

"Confess that you have had a nap, aunty."

"Not at all. I never slept in a public place in my life," said the Nervous Lady, testily.

Margaret and Willie betrayed in a smiling glance behind her back that treachery to which the surest relatives of nervous ladies are prone. She recovered her good humor as she descended the steep path to the cure market. "A beautiful old castle and town, but I shall be glad to leave to-morrow," she admitted.

In the evening Margaret made a communication, twisting her watch chain nervously the while.

"I have decided to remain at Heidelberg, to study German and music."

"Oh, indeed," retorted her aunt. "I have decided to depart to-morrow. It is a delightful city to keep awake in, doubtless."

"I can remain as the Polish national pension with propriety; besides, the Morgans will be here later. You know I positively adore the German language and literature," concluded Margaret, fervently.

"You are old enough to judge for yourself."

The Nervous Lady departed grimly.

One year later she was seated beside the identical window of her American home now smashed by the Fourth of July cannon of Willie Thorpe. Mrs Thorpe was with her, visibly agitated by the contents of a letter which her neighbor read aloud. The letter was from Margaret, warmly affectionate, and exalted to tone. Her friends the Morgans were still with her, and that day she had married Dr Heidelberg student in London.

"I thought devotion to German literature did not detain her at Heidelberg, and it could not have been the attraction of the educational pensions, you know," remarked the Nervous Lady.

"Ah, dear Mrs Cooke, they have always loved each other!" cried Willie's mother. "I urged Margaret to go abroad, when she became her own mistress at the death of her father. My boy writes me he is coming home to work. Now he will reap the advantages of his foreign education."

"Yes," assented the Nervous Lady, mildly; "such a wife as Margaret will make a man of him."

Left alone, she added, musingly: "What on earth can she have discovered in him—a work lad enough—firmly believed Margaret destined to be an old maid."

Then she re-read a postscript to her letter, which she had not communicated to Mrs Thorpe, although in the handwriting of that lady's son.

"You are destined to love me as Margaret's husband and your future nephew, O kindest of aunts. According to one of the finest phases of philosophy, you can not do otherwise. Did you never see Le voyage de Monsieur Perrichon performed at the Paris Odeon? If so, you must be aware that if you feel grateful to the man who rescues your life at a moment of peril, you experience a warmer sentiment toward the man whose life you have saved. On this circumstance the claim is founded of your dutiful and affectionate

"WILLIE."

"The scamp!" said the Nervous Lady, folding the letter. "After all, he has a good heart. Dear! dear! when I have a nightmare I am always back in Heidelberg!"

THE "JUNIOR CENTURY."

The parochial work undertaken and accomplished by the energy of Dr. Potter since he became rector of Grace Church is one of the most cheering facts not only in the church life, but in the civic life of New York. Much of it is noteworthy from being distinctly outside of the sphere in which parochial work is commonly restricted. Within the past few months the picturesque and attractive group of church buildings which constitutes on note-worthy w feature of Broadway has been made more picturesque and attractive by two new buildings, our Grace Memorial House, which occupies the rear of the church grounds on Fourth Avenue, and one Grace House, which stands between the church and the rectory on Broadway, and is entered through the porch of the north transept. This building owes its existence to the liberality of Miss Wolfe, and the lower ten floors of it are devoted to the uses of the "Junior Century."

The Junior Century is not an imitation in its scheme of the well-known Century Club. The resemblance of name came from the fact that at the outset it was intended, as it was also intended to the case of the senior Century, to limit its membership to one hundred. The name of the older club has long grown as inapplicable that it has been facetiously proposed to rechristen it "The Eighteenth." Although the younger body has only been in existence a few months, its circle has already become a misnomer, and the limit now proposed is of one hundred and fifty members. The name of the club is practically limited by the seating capacity of the rooms in which its entertainments are given, and this is rather less than the proposed limit.

The object of the club is to provide a social centre for young men and women engaged as clerks, artists, teachers, and students in New York who are new-comers to the city, and who, living in lodgings, feel the lack of the social privileges which the club affords. The only requisites for admission are good character and the condition of homelessness. Whoever wishes to join the club fills out a blank form of application, with name, residence, occupation, and references, and this application is submitted to the Standing Committee, composed of the younger members of Grace parish, who are appointed by the rector, and form the governing body of the club. Now that the club is fairly under way, it is proposed that the committees on library, entertainments, and so forth, shall be chosen by members of the club.

The club differs in its aim from such a body as the Young Men's Christian Association by being much smaller, and therefore more available for forming friendships—much more in the nature of a real club, that is to say—and also by including both sexes. The ground floor of Grace House is given to men, and the second floor to women. The ground floor has an ample reading room, and a chess-room and lounging room, from which tobacco is not excluded. The second floor has a ladies' reading-room corresponding to that below, and over the chess-room are dressing-rooms and bath-rooms. The library is almost equally divided between the two floors, and on attendant brings from one reading room such books as may be required to the other. The reading rooms are, however, chiefly used to read periodicals and to consult works of reference. The library, which already contains a thousand volumes, the last five hundred of which were bought on the application of members, is a w circulating library, and the volumes are taken in exchange for a deposit and a registration by the borrower. The usual result of putting "on honor" people of home-cable antecedents has followed, and on losses are reported.

The members of different sexes meet at the receptions, which are given twice a month; once a social reunion on the first Monday of the month, at which simple refreshments are served; the other, a literary and musical entertainment, on the third Monday, at which excellent artists appear. The rooms for men are open in the evening, those for women, in the evening and from three to six in the afternoon.

Mr Nugent the constant minister of the parish, has his office in Grace House, but anything in the nature of surveillance of the members is rigorously avoided. The investigation before admission is considered to furnish a sufficient guarantee of good behavior afterward, and this confidence has not been abused.

Although the club has been founded and equipped by members of the parish, membership in the club by on means involves membership in the congregation. On the contrary, on church tests whatever are imposed, and only a small majority of the club are even Episcopalians. For very obvious reasons, a fee is required of members; but the annual subscription is the trifling sum of $2 50, and the aggregate of the fees scarcely covers the cost of the stationery supplied as the members.

IN THE FAR NORTHWEST.

When the traveller along the route of the Northern Pacific Railroad crosses the great mountain ranges and descends upon the Pacific slope, he begins to encounter large numbers of Chinese laborers. They congregate in camps formed chiefly of A tents, although sometimes they build huts of scantling. These camps are said to be models of neatness, and our artist states that the Chinese laborers pay great attention to personal cleanliness. They wash themselves thoroughly morning and evening, and are very particular in the use of the tooth brush. The camps are often tastefully decorated, and on holidays are gay with banners and streamers, and noisy with fire-crackers.

Every evening the laborers gather in a large tent for social amusement. They have theatrical performances and concerts, the latter made hideous with tom-toms and other Chinese instruments of musical torture. Opium-smoking is a rare vice among them, and is discouraged by the better class. There is a merchant in every camp, who supplies the laborers with provisions, groceries, and other necessities. When the work requires it, the tents are struck, and the camp is moved on to another point.

The Chinese pay tender care to the burial of deceased comrades, and graves like those depicted by our artist may be seen all along the route. They are marked by head-boards, on which is inscribed the name of the deceased. Each grave is protected by a pile of rails, and beside each are laid votive offerings in the form of decorated tea-cups, etc., which are never meddled with by the white laborers.

The singular-looking train in the foreground of Mr. Graham's sketches is in reality a village on wheels, containing about 200 inhabitants, and everything necessary to their work and sustenance. As the labor of laying the railroad track proceeds, the train is moved forward, forming a movable base of operations. Provisions, implements, giant powder or dynamite for blasting, etc., are stored in various cars. Others serve as lodging-houses, restaurants, kitchens, etc. When the train is stationary the guy ropes shown in the sketch are used to stay the cars, and prevent them from being blown off the track by the high prairie winds.

DR J. MARION SIMS

A GREAT benefactor in surgery has passed away, a benefactor whose originality and whose skill will not be contested. How rarely is this the fortune of a great benefactor! The most important discovery of medical science in our age is doubtless that of anæsthesia; but the credit of the great discovery must as fairly as can be shared among no less than five discoverers—Long, Wells, Morton, Jackson, and Simpson. Dr Sims's inventions and his wonderful operative successes are peculiarly his own. Only once, and that early in his career (1853), has any serious effort been made to detract from his credit in the invention of the silver suture, and this effort, which failed, need not be recalled at length.

Dr. Sims had a remarkable combination of gifts. In the sciences of healing, as to others, the famous names fall mainly into two classes—those of discoverers and those of successful practitioners. Bichat and Virchow are eminent instances of the one, Valpeau, Trousseau, and Valentine Mott of the other. There is a third and a smaller class in which theory and practice, the invention and its application, go hand in hand. Paccos is perhaps the most eminent living example of this rare combination. To his own division of surgery Dr Sims belonged as this class of mode equally divided between invention and its practical end—the relief of human suffering. Dr Sims never stumbled upon results. His great discovery, the one by which his name will always be memorable in the annals of surgery, was carefully thought out beforehand, it was prosecuted with no long delays and disappointments, and at last as unerringly carried out, and with as perfect and undoubted success, as Columbus's discovery of the New World. This discovery, that of the cure of a grievous and previously incurable complaint (vesico-vaginal fistula), and the subsequent introduction of silver sutures in surgery, are the main triumphs of the eminent career that is now closed. They are triumphs that no one will dispute.

The record of Dr. Sims's work would be far too long for this place, even in the mere transcription of the titles of his monographs. These cover a sense of subjects, and bring new light on all of them; but they nearly all converge upon the practical treatment of the ailments peculiar to women. Whether in the related pathology, anatomy, chemistry, or microscopy of these subjects, he ranges over the ground with an alertness, an enthusiasm of intellect, that is seldom equalled. There was a rapture in his work like that of a lover's pursuit or of a great artist's creation. The glow, the élan, was Dr Sims's distinctive intellectual trait, and it need not be said that it lent a peculiar charm to his character. It was this that led him through delays and troubles to one of the most real and well deserved triumphs in the brilliant history of American surgery. Of his early efforts to perfect the operation already mentioned, he writes: "My repeated failures brought anguish that I can not now depict, even if it were desirable. All my spare time was given to a single idea. My brain was engrossed, my heart was heavy, but never for one moment did I despair of eventual success. At last I happened to remember that when a boy I used to make sinkers to my fishing-lines by cutting a shot half in two, laying the lead in the cut, and then compressing the shot on it with my teeth. I can not express the delight that filled my heart at this simple suggestion. Its beauty, simplicity, and perfect adaptation to the purpose gave me a sleepless night. There I lay with an etherealized brain, performing in imagination a surgical case on each of my devoted patients."

In this passage we have the key-note of Dr Sims's success through life, as well as of all other success that is not merely chanced upon, but won, namely, an ardent pursuit, and a fertility of intelligence that makes the pursuit fruitful. Sometimes, indeed, his ideas outran his time. Some of his favorite ideas have not as yet been realized; they bide their time. It will be remembered that when General Garfield was shot, Dr Sims advocated a "heroic treatment," namely, to cut down as the ball and remove it. The proposition was blamed by many surgeons as venturesome surgery. It was at least an audition or unconsidered suggestion. Seven years before that time Dr Sims had published these words: "The time will assuredly come when gunshot and other wounds of the abdomen, and perforations of the intestine, will be treated by opening the abdominal cavity and washing out or draining off the septic fluids that would otherwise poison the blood."—(On Ovariotomy, 1873.) But on need not look to the possibilities of the future to vindicate the well earned eminence of Dr Sims's name. His founding of the Woman's Hospital (1855), his presidency of the American Medical Association, and his frequent medals from foreign countries may be mentioned. But his personal work was for woman, in relieving her sufferings, and often in the scientific removal of her gravest sorrow. His patient skill enabled many a woman to exclaim with Leah, "Happy am I, for the daughters will call me blessed." Dr Valentine Mott once said to him, "You will have in all time an enduring monument; that monument will be the gratitude of women." It is the verdict of his professional brethren upon his noble and distinguished career. Palmam qui meruit ferat.

IMPORTANT.

No one should travel without a bottle of Dr. Tobias's Venetian Liniment. Established in 1847, and warranted to give satisfaction in every case or the money will be refunded, and during over 37 years not a bottle has been returned.

Those once trying it are never without it. It cures Sea-sickness, Diarrhœa, Dysentery, Colic, Spasms, Cramps, Cholera, etc., taken internally, and is perfectly harmless (see circular accompanying each bottle). As an external application for Chronic Rheumatism, Lumbago, Toothache, Sprains, Bruises, Old Sores, Pimples, Blotches, Swellings, etc., its equal is unknown. Improve waste in purified by adding twenty drops of the Liniment to a tumblerful, thus no danger of Diarrhœa or Dysentery.

If you have children, no need to fear their dying of Croup if you have the Venetian Liniment with you, as it will cure every case if used when first taken.

To Ladies it is invaluable in removing Pimples, Blotches, and Swellings.

It does not harm the complexion, but improves it. Gray hair is turned to its natural color by rubbing the head with the Liniment three times a week, and it is warranted to contain nothing injurious.

Dr. Tobias's Pulmonic Life Syrup is the great Cough Remedy of the day. It is warranted superior to any other as an expectorant. Only 50 cents in large bottles.

HON. HENRY O'KELSEY,
Secretary of State New Jersey, writes:

Send me one dozen bottles of your Life Syrup by express. If its virtues were as well known as your Venetian Liniment, it would have no large a sale as that article has.

FROM THE REV. I. P. PEIGL.
New York, Sept. 11, 1880.

A short time ago Dr. Tobias's medicines were brought to my notice. I was suffering from an affection of the throat. I tried outwardly his Venetian Liniment, and took occasionally during the day his Pulmonic Life Syrup, which made a perfect cure. In future I will not be without his medicines. I. P. PEIGL.

A Neighbor

In your own community, wherever you are, can tell you—if you do not happen to know them yourself—of cases within the knowledge demonstrating that AYER'S SARSAPARILLA is an ever reliable and thorough purifier of the blood—one that will eradicate from the system every atom of the taint of Scrofulous, Mercurial, or Constitutional Disease; enrich impoverished blood, strengthen each tired vital organ, invigorate and build up the system, so far as the power of no other medicine.

Ayer's Sarsaparilla

Has been nearly forty years standing the test of the world's use, and the best proofs that it has successfully met the requirements upon it are, that

Leading physicians endorse it as the best blood purifier known,

There is a great annual increase in the demand for it;

Voluntary testimonials as to its efficacy are constantly offered in great numbers, by persons whom it has cured of disorders born of corrupted blood, even hereditary ones, and those of many years standing.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, 1884.

The Christmas (December) Number, in which no expense has been spared to make an unusually beautiful holiday number, will be the first of a series of numbers intended to surpass all previous undertakings in magazine literature.

The Christmas Number begins a new volume, with no contented portions held over from the previous volume, so that new subscribers begin even.

The two novels, "Nature's Serial Story," by the popular American writer, E. P. Roe, beginning in December, and "Judith Shakespeare," by the most prominent of the later English novelists, William Black, beginning in January, will run during 1884, and will be illustrated, the first by W. H. Gibson and Frederick Dielman, the second by E. A. Abbey, with a richness never before attempted.

EPPS'S COCOA.
BREAKFAST.
"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected Cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately flavored beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.

BOOKS FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

Books are a necessity in every home. They are no longer counted among articles of luxury, but are one of the indispensable things of daily life, and the constantly increasing demand for good books on all subjects, and also for volumes of rare artistic merit and beauty, is a sure index finger to the rapid growth of intelligence and culture among all classes.

The extreme cheapness of thousands of well bound and well printed volumes enables every household to possess a good library, and as the desire for reading is something that grows by practice, the possessor of a few volumes soon becomes ambitious to increase his store as fast as possible. With books in the house, one is never at a loss for something to do. Even the terrors of stormy winter evenings vanish before the magic influence of those silent yet eloquent companions.

Books are among the most popular of holiday gifts, and as the Christmas season draws near, what are the best new books and what are the best old ones, becomes a universal inquiry.

To those seeking books for Christmas presents the publications of Messrs. HARPER & BROTHERS present a vast variety of works of all descriptions, from sumptuously illustrated holiday volumes to neat story books for youthful readers. Art, literature, history, travel, biography, and fiction are all largely represented by works by the best authors, and special attention has been paid to the durability and elegance of form in which they are offered to the public.

The Raven, by Edgar Allan Poe with illustrations by Gustave Doré, aside from its own intrinsic merit, possesses a deeper interest than any other volume issued for the coming holidays. A pathos hangs around it as the last great work of Doré's pencil before he too became "nameless here forevermore." It is the only set of illustrations this artist magician ever drew to a work by an American author. The subject, the wild hallucinations of a desolate and sorrow stricken soul, was especially congenial to the genius of Doré. He carried it in his mind for many years before the wondrous imagery it suggested took visible form and shape: none too soon, for scarcely was the last drawing completed when the artist let fall the pencil, and the mystery of death, the "distant Aidenn," was for him a mystery no longer.

There is little change of situation in this magnificent series of drawings. Nearly all of them picture the midnight chamber with its solitary occupant, solitary yet never alone. How the room becomes peopled with the wild visions of the poet and the artist! Mysterious shapes of beauty hover in the uncertain light, horrors group themselves in the shadows, and the black form of the raven watches with statuesque calmness from its perch above the door. Most pathetic of all is the final drawing. Visions of horror and visions of beauty have alike vanished, the room is bare and desolate as commonplace reality can make it, and in the shadow of the bird of evil omen lies a solitary prostrate figure, struck down by ruthless destiny.

"Poe's raven is a distinct conception," writes Mr. Stedman, in his "Comment on the Poem," printed at the beginning of the volume, "the incarnation of a mourner's agony and hopelessness; a sable-embodied Memory, the abiding chronicler of doom, a type of the Irreparable." A dismal, symbolic bird it evidently was to the mind of Doré, a symbol more than itself a central overshadowing point in the poem, for he never makes it the prominent object in a picture. Its influence is there, the "shadow on the floor," the grim shadow of death, which it has brought from the "nightly shore" to throw forever on the soul with whom it takes its abode.

It is impossible to speak in detail of Doré's marvellous conceptions of the varying shades of feeling expressed in Poe's verses. Never did artist's pencil portray more keenly the sense of loss, the despair and desolation, of one left alone on earth with no soul-companion save the wild phantasms of a weary brain.

The world is richer for this unique book. Mr. Stedman's words, "A work is called out of the void; where there was nothing it remains—a new creation, part of the treasures of mankind," are fitting alike for the creation of both artist and poet. This volume is a beautiful memorial to the two master-minds whose work it perpetuates, and its wide-spread acceptance by an appreciative public is suitable and gratifying.

Doré prepared this magnificent series of twenty-six drawings expressly for HARPER & BROTHERS. The best engravers of America have reproduced them with wondrous skill and delicacy of workmanship; the cover is superbly illuminated with a design by an American woman; Elihu Vedder has adorned the title-page with symbolic figures; the letterpress is perfect; and altogether this rare volume, a sumptuous folio, is the most magnificent specimen of American book-making ever issued.

Doré's illustrations to Coleridge's Rime of the Ancient Mariner are also published by Messrs. HARPER & BROTHERS in a magnificently bound and printed folio volume. The wondrous imagery of Coleridge's celebrated poem found its true interpreter in Doré. The horror-stricken ship spell-bound in haunted seas, the ancient mariner, with "long gray beard and glittering eye," passing "like night from land to land," are represented with soul-thrilling power. These great works of Doré are all the more precious now because the limit of their number is set, because of them we shall have no more.

In the two magnificent quarto volumes Pastoral Days and Highways and Byways, written and illustrated by W. Hamilton Gibson, may be found the most beautiful tribute to New England her flowers, her birds, her poetic sylvan life, that has ever been published. In Pastoral Days the author illustrates the cycle of the four seasons, and as his hands each progressive movement of the year brings a revelation of new beauty. Text and drawings are gracefully intertwined, and form a new poem on every page, and the same praise may be given to both alike.

This exquisite book was enthusiastically received in England as well as in this country. The London Saturday Review said of it: "People must be strangely constituted who do not enjoy such pages as Mr. Gibson has presented to us here. It is not merely that he writes well, but the subject itself is irresistibly fascinating. We plunge with him into the silence of a New England village in a clearing of the woods. The spring is awakening in a flush of tender green, in a fever of warm days and shivering nights, and we hasten with our companion through all the bustle and stir of the few busy hours of light so swiftly that the darkness is on us before we are aware. Then falls on the ear a pathetic, an intolerable silence, a deep mist covers the ground, a few lights twinkle in scattered farms and cottages, and all seems brooding, melting, in the deep and throbbing hush of the darkness. All this is described with great sympathy and delicacy; but perhaps Mr. Gibson is most felicitous in his little touches of floral painting. He has a few words about the earthy, spicy fragrance of the arbutus that might have been said in verse by the late Mr. Bryant; his description of the effect of biting the bulbs of the Indian turnip, or 'Jack-in-the-pulpit,' is inimitable in its quiet way; while the phrase about the fading dandelions—'the golden stars upon the lawn are nearly all burned out; we see their downy ashes in the grass'—is perhaps the best thing ever said about a humble flower, whose vulgarity, in the literal sense, blinds us to the beauty of its evolution and decay."

In Highways and Byways, Mr. Gibson selects special subjects—the old country road, the rail-fence, which in his hands becomes the "squirrel's highway," the fields, and the busy insect life and tiny flowerets "among our foot prints"—around which he groups his dainty, poetic fancies. How many bits of genuine New England life are found in these pages! Who does not remember the old water-trough by the roadside, on which the sunlight falls through overhanging boughs in dancing golden sparkles, or the village street with its shaded vista and church spire, where the peddler's cart stops under the trees, and thrifty housewives come out to drive a "way-side bargain" with the itinerant salesman? But it needed Mr. Gibson's pencil to give them their full poetic significance, their artistic place in rural life.

The wood-engraving in each of these beautiful volumes is of the finest modern workmanship, and in a style only attained by the best American engravers. The London Athenæum says of Highways and Byways: "Every one who has admired the so-called new 'American' mode of engraving on wood should possess himself of this book, for the sake of the soft and delicate cuts which enrich its pages with the charm of finish, breadth, and beautiful draughtsmanship. The book is a perfect example of its kind—a treasury of modern labor, skill, and graceful taste."

Bound in covers elegantly embellished with floral designs, and printed on thick, smooth paper, either of these beautiful books is suitable for a holiday gift—a garland of poetry from the woods and flowery fields to wreathe with the holly of Christmas-tide.

A very elegantly bound and printed quarto volume is Selections from the Poetry of Robert Herrick, with drawings by Edwin A. Abbey. Mr. Abbey's dainty conceptions of the lyrics of this poet, who has been called the English Anacreon, are above criticism.

One can only pause over these beautiful drawings with exquisite delight, and wonder that poetry so suggestive of quaint imagery waited so long for its artist-interpreter. It is a matter of congratulation that it has found him at last. Mr. Abbey shows a vast range of fancy, poetic grace, and feeling, and great strength of handling where the subject requires robust treatment. Here are landscapes thoroughly English in tone, as they should be, quaint interiors, shepherd lads and lasses, hags and fairies, delicate figures of maidens, stately cavaliers of "ye olden time," and in each one recognizes the exceeding fitness, the harmony between artist and poet.

In England as well as in this country Mr. Abbey's work has been received with appreciative favor. "If there be merit in originality in these days of copious imitative illustration, that merit belongs in a very striking degree to the American draughtsman Mr. E. A. Abbey," writes an English reviewer. "He brings to the task of interpreting his poet a totally new view of life and nature."

The preface to this charming book is written by Mr Austin Dobson. It is a delicate and heart-felt tribute to the old English poet from one of the modern brotherhood.

There never was a more attractive book on American scenery than The Heart of the White Mountains, by Samuel Adams Drake, with illustrations by W. Hamilton Gibson. These drawings by Mr Gibson are faithful copies of actual scenes, and those familiar with the magnificent landscapes of the White Mountains will recognize many a favorite haunt.

Mr Drake's charming power of description is familiar to all readers of his delightful volume Nooks and Corners of the New England Coast. Here in the White Mountains he finds ample material for pleasant discoursing. Not content with describing scenery, he lingers in each locality to study its history, its legends, and the peculiar character of some of its inhabitants. With this charming book in hand, one may sit at home by the library fire, and, although it be a tempestuous winter night, pass delicious summer days climbing mountains and resting by stream lets in shaded mossy glens.

The Heart of the White Mountains is a handsome quarto, issued with all the grace of a holiday gift book.

For the convenience of those desiring to use Mr Drake's work as a hand book, a special Tourist's Edition has been published which contains the entire contents of the larger volume printed on a smaller page, with additional maps, and with information concerning routes, distances, and other things adapted to the use of actual travellers.

When George Parsons Lathrop and Charles S. Reinhart set out together to visit the Iberian Peninsula, those who knew about it began then to enjoy in anticipation the fascinating volume, entitled Spanish Vistas, which contains the record of their wanderings up and down. Mr. Lathrop writing the delightful and sparkling descriptions of the ancient and musty cities and towns, with their indolent inhabitants, their flowers and fruits, their luscious-eyed maidens, their picturesque rustics and tattered, importunate beggars; and Mr. Reinhart meanwhile noting down with his skillful pencil the form and likeness of whatever of beauty or grotesqueness struck his artistic fancy.

Spanish Vistas is a charming and entertaining book, and contains, too, a vast amount of information valuable to any one meditating a trip to that country, which in all the more inviting as being at one side of the route usually followed by Continental excursionists. It is published by Messrs. HARPER & BROTHERS in very handsome form, with the arms of Castile emblazoned on the cover, and would make a holiday present very acceptable to the recipient.

Besides the magnificent array of sumptuous gift-books resplendent in gold and brilliant colors, there are many volumes of more modest appearance, whose contents are gold indeed, and of that pure quality the brilliancy of which nothing can tarnish. A good book is always a good thing, a constant friend if one allows it to become so. Messrs. HARPER & BROTHERS publish a vast number of works any one of which, if chosen according to the taste of the recipient, is an acceptable and graceful holiday offering.

Old Mexico and her Lost Provinces, by William Henry Bishop, is a very sparkling book of travel in the most interesting sections of North America. Mr. Bishop is an excellent traveller. He notices everything, and tells about it in chatty, familiar style. He sets out on his journey by way of Cuba, where he lingers a few days in passing, before proceeding to Vera Cruz. His description of this old Mexican seaport is picturesque and charming, and as faithful as a photograph. One can almost hear the bells ringing in the old gray towers of this little dot of a city on the barren stretch of sandy shore. Then up the long mountain slope goes the traveller, among coffee plantations, groves of oranges and mangoes, and wildernesses of flowers; he crosses the table-lands of Apam, and reaches the great valley where lies Mexico city.

From the capital Mr. Bishop went horseback across the country to Acapulco, on the Pacific coast, traversing picturesque barrancas, stopping in odd little towns and inland cities, and seeing much of Mexican country life in regions reached by few travellers.

Of the customs of the country, the new enterprises, especially the railways, he writes in great detail, and his book is very valuable to those desiring information of the present condition of things in Mexico.

The last half of his charming book is devoted to the Pacific slope of the United States, the "lost provinces" of the country of the Aztecs.

Mr. Bishop has the advantage over some travellers of being artist as well as author, and many of the illustrations in this volume are from his own drawings.

To read one of Mr. Du Chaillu's books of travel is the next best thing to visiting the country itself—a better thing even for those who dread giving up the comforts of daily life, which every traveller must make up his mind to do. Then, too, one might make many trips to Sweden and Norway and still know less of the country, its magnificent scenery, its industries, and its social and domestic life, than can be learned from Mr. Du Chaillu's delightful book The Land of the Midnight Sun, one of the most sparkling, valuable, and reliable books of travel ever written. Mr Du Chaillu never travels in a hurry, and he never goes to a strange country without due preparation. He studies the language, and, as far as is possible, the habits of the people, in advance, so that ever on the beginning he is not among strangers, and can without waste of time begin his personal observations. In summer and in winter during five years he journeyed up and down in the Scandinavian Peninsula, going often by irregular routes, and visiting localities where the ordinary traveller never penetrates. In this way he gained a vast amount of new and valuable information, which he presents with force and judgment, and in the peculiarly brilliant and sparkling manner well known to the readers of his books of African travel. The Land of the Midnight Sun is published in two handsomely bound volumes, superbly illustrated from photographs taken exclusively for use in this work.

A sumptuous work of travels in the Holy Land is The Land and the Book, by William M. Thomson, D.D. During his forty-five years' residence as a missionary in Syria and Palestine, Dr. Thomson had advantages which no others have enjoyed to the same extent for studying the scenes where the events of Biblical history are located. The devout spirit with which he pursued his work renders his descriptions of mountains and hills and valleys and streams hallowed by sacred associations both faithful and touching. As a descriptive account of a remarkable country the work is one of absorbing interest, and as a reference-book for clergymen and teachers it is unequalled. The two large and richly illustrated volumes (which may be purchased separately if desired) are devoted respectively to Southern Palestine and Jerusalem, and Central Palestine and Phœnicia. It is a work eminently suitable for a family library, as youthful readers can not fail to take interest in its glowing descriptions of sacred scenes, and many a Sunday-school lesson would be studied with more pleasure and profit were it done in connection with this faithful account of the land where Christ and His apostles lived and labored.

A very useful present to any Bible student is Mosaics of Bible History, by Marcius Willson and Robert Pierpont Willson, which is published in two neat volumes. It is the Bible record with added historical information, and with poetic and prose selections from the best modern authors on sacred subjects.

The same authors have also prepared another work on a similar plan, entitled Mosaics of Grecian History. This charming book is in one convenient volume, and is an intensely interesting outline of the history and literature and art of Greece from the fabulous and legendary period to the present time. It contains numerous illustrative poetic and prose selections from ancient and modern authors. For those readers who have no leisure for the perusal of more extensive works this volume is as complete as could be desired, and those who wish to pursue the subject more in detail will find in the preface excellent suggestions for a broader course of reading.

The Rev. J. P. Mahaffy's History of Classical Greek Literature, in two volumes, is a learned and valuable work on the poets and prose writers of ancient Greece, and is the most modern and reliable guide for students of this special branch of classic literature.

A History of Latin Literature from Ennius to Boethius, by George Augustus Simcox, in two volumes, is a new work of great importance to students, and also to general readers who seek a work on ancient literature in a condensed and popular form, through which they can become familiar with the writers of olden time without the labor of studying many cumbersome volumes in the original Latin.

Messrs. HARPER & BROTHERS' elegant library editions of standard histories should not be overlooked by those in search of substantial Christmas gifts. They include the histories of England by Macaulay and Hume, Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire; Motley's United Netherlands, The Rise of the Dutch Republic, and The Life and Death of John of Barneveld; and Hildreth's History of the United States. These popular editions are substantially bound in cloth, and each set is sold in a neat box.

Library editions, in uniform style with the histories, of the miscellaneous works of Lord Macaulay, in five volumes, and of Oliver Goldsmith's works, in four volumes, also form valuable and attractive sets for a holiday present.

A scholarly work on English Literature in the Eighteenth Century, by Thomas Sergeant Perry, is among the new books of the present season. It is an excellent book of reference for teachers, and one of great interest to ordinary readers. It gives a clear picture of the progress of English literature during the period of which it treats, illustrating the style of the different authors by numerous and judiciously chosen extracts from their work.

The neat volumes of biographies of the "English Men of Letters" are deservedly popular as simple and appropriate Christmas tokens to readers of literary judgment and good taste. Each volume contains a complete biography of a celebrated author, prepared by some one of the best modern writers. This series already comprises thirty-three volumes, the latest of which is Mrs. Oliphant's sparkling life of Sheridan.

A biographical work of rare interest, which is published in a handsomely bound and illustrated volume, is Victor Hugo and his Time, translated from the French of Alfred Barbou by Ellen E. Frewer. The life of Victor Hugo involves a history of France during the present century, for in every public movement of importance this remarkable man has played a prominent part. To the thousands of readers of Victor Hugo's works M. Barbou's book is as charming as a romance. He dwells on the details of the poet's eventful life, and describes the circumstances under which each of his important works was written, and the manner of their reception by the French public.

An Autobiography, by Anthony Trollope, is a new volume of peculiar interest, as being the frank story of a life which outwardly was marked by no important event, but still one which will be long remembered for the place it has filled in modern English literature. Mr. Trollope wrote this entertaining account of himself six years before his death, when his high position as an author enabled him to look back with calmness upon the struggles and mortifications of his early years. He was a sensitive, awkward boy, and had a very hard time of it in school, in the clerkship at the Post office, in every way, until he came to be a man, and, turning author, took his fate in his own hands, and made a success. He dwells briefly on this unhappy boyhood, and devotes the most part of the book to his literary career, introducing in the proper place reminiscences of English novelists of his time, and criticisms on their works. His chapter "On novels and the art of writing them" contains many suggestions which young writers would do well to consider carefully.

The Life of James Buchanan, by George Ticknor Curtis, and the Memoirs of General John Adams Dix, by his son, Morgan Dix, are two important biographical works recently published by Messrs. HARPER & BROTHERS. Each of these eminent Americans holds an important place in the political history of the United States, and while the story of their lives possesses a deep personal interest, it also forms a part of our national history.

In the preparation of the life of Buchanan, Mr. Curtis has shown masterly skill in his arrangement of the materials and documents at his command. It was not an easy task, but it has been performed with conscientious fidelity. These two handsome volumes, each containing a steel-plate portrait of Buchanan, form the most complete history hitherto published of the period immediately preceding the civil war.

The Memoirs of General Dix, also in two volumes, form one of the most interesting books of the year. During his long life General Dix took so active and honorable part in the public affairs of his country, and his life is one which all American youth should read and consider carefully, as such soldiers and statesmen as he bring honor and glory to the nation, and their example is a golden legacy to their young countrymen.

An ornamental as well as useful volume, which would be a well-chosen Christmas gift for a family of young people, is Harper's Cyclopædia of British and American Poetry, edited by Epes Sargent. This volume, which contains nearly one thousand pages, is a complete epitome of English and American poetry from the time of Chaucer to the present day. The poetical selections, which are carefully chosen, and the short biographical sketch of each author, make the work a valuable literary reference-book.

Will Carleton's books of poetry are very attractive for holiday presents. They are Farm Ballads, Farm Legends, and Farm Festivals, and each volume is handsomely bound and illustrated. The great charm of these poems lies in their fidelity to the incidents of common life, which are related with rare humor or with heart-felt pathos, according to the situation. Mr. Carleton reaches the heart of the people as few have done, and has achieved a signal triumph as a writer of popular poetry.

The History of Ancient Art, by Dr. Franz von Reber, is a work of rare interest on a subject of the greatest importance, which is being more scientifically and methodically investigated at the present time than ever before, and concerning which new facts are being constantly brought to light. Dr. Reber's work, which is admirably translated by Joseph Thacher Clarke, is based on the most modern discoveries. It contains over three hundred illustrations of architecture, sculpture, and ancient wall painting, and a glossary of technical terms.

A small and very handsome volume, containing a concise account of an art in which astonishingly rapid progress is being made at present, is A History of Wood Engraving, by George K. Woodberry. This attractive book contains ninety exquisitely printed specimens of the wood-engraver's art, beginning with a rude wood-cut of the early part of the fifteenth century, and showing the gradual growth and progress to the artistic workmanship of the present time.

A neat volume of excellent short stories is Dialect Tales, by Sherwood Bonner (Mrs. Katharine S. McDowell). These tales represent a peculiar side of life in the Southern States, and the strange dialect and negro humor are handled by a master-hand, and have never been better portrayed.

Mrs. McDowell was a close student of human nature, and carries her readers with equal strength through scenes of deep pathos and through incidents of the most amusing character. Her recent death, at the early age of thirty years, comes as a personal loss to the large number of admiring readers who have delighted in her spirited and brilliant sketches of Southern life.

Two novelettes which have become deservedly popular both in this country and in England are Anne and For the Major, by Constance Fenimore Woolson. Those readers who have not already become familiar with Anne have a rare enjoyment in store. It is a thoroughly American novel. The plot is animated, and sustains its interest to the end, and the characters are handled with a strength and clearness of purpose which place Miss Woolson in the foremost ranks of modern writers of fiction.

For the Major is a still stronger proof of the power of the author. The field of action is restricted to a single village, and the characters of the plot are few and simple, but they are made living personages, and the reader unites heartily with the devoted wife and daughter in their watchful care of the pathetic old Major, so grand and yet so helpless.

In Harper's "Franklin Square Library," a number of which appears weekly, are published the most popular modern novels, and also many valuable works of a serious character, which are sold at an almost nominal price thus placing a vast variety of good reading within the reach of all.

A neat duodecimo edition of the "Franklin Square Library," bound in blue paper cover, is now being published, which has been fitly called "the ne plus ultra of shapeliness, convenience, and cheapness."

Books of reference should always be provided for the family library. An excellent work of this kind is Harper's Cyclopædia of United States History, by Benson J. Lossing. It covers the subject from the aboriginal period to 1876, and contains full information concerning all important events, and excellent condensed biographies of all persons in any way connected with the history of our country, its arts, its literature, its industries, and religious development. There is no other work containing the same amount of information on the subject in such clear, condensed, and well-arranged form.

Another valuable reference-book is Haydn's Dictionary of Dates. A new edition of this work has been published recently, revised for American readers, which gives dates of all important events of all nations and all ages to the autumn of 1883, together with much explanatory reading matter. It is a complete historical and biographical encyclopædia in one volume.

The most beautiful weekly publication in the world for children is HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and a year's subscription to this delightful paper would be a well-chosen Christmas present to any boy or girl. Its contents present the richest variety of good reading to please and instruct the youthful mind, and lead it in a pure and healthful direction. The bound volume of YOUNG PEOPLE for 1883 is now ready, and it would be difficult to find another book containing so much delightful entertainment for a family of little folks. "Nao" and "Deck and D.," two beautiful stories by Mrs. Lillie, and "Raising the 'Pearl,'" a fascinating tale of the Florida coast, by James Otis, are in this volume, which also contains an infinite variety of short stories, and papers on all subjects of interest to boys and girls, many dainty pieces of music arranged for little fingers, poems, puzzles, games, and the Post-office Box, which, with its pretty letters from all parts of the world, is, without any exception, the smartest chronicle of childish life ever printed. The favorable verdict of little readers—the severest and most truthful of critics—on HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and its enormous weekly increase of circulation, are gratifying proofs that children eagerly accept good and elevating mental food when it is provided for them in beautiful and attractive form.

Colonel Knox's books of travel for boys have received such a hearty reception that youthful readers will hail with delight the appearance of the fifth part of The Boy Travellers in the Far East, especially when they learn that it describes the strange and interesting country of Africa. When Colonel Knox decided to write the adventures of Frank and Fred, those boy travellers, he did a splendid thing for the young folks who stay at home. In Part First of the Boy Travellers in the Far East, Frank and Fred, with their companion, Dr. Bronson, visit Japan and China, seeing everything of interest in those wonderful countries, and studying the manners and customs of the people. In Part Second they go to Siam, to Java, and all through the Malay Archipelago. Part Third tells of their adventures in Ceylon, India, Burmah, where they visit the scenes of missionary labor, and in the Philippine Islands. They then proceed, in Part Fourth, to Egypt by way of the Red Sea and the Suez Canal, and make an extensive tour of that ancient country and of the Holy Land. In this new volume, the fifth and last part of the Boy Travellers, the wanderers traverse the wild regions of Central Africa from the Nile to Zanzibar, where they embark for England, and home. Each volume of this popular library of travel for boys and girls is bound in elegant illuminated covers, and profusely illustrated with interesting engravings.

A very attractive new book for little readers, which will make many a childish heart happy on Christmas morning, is The Ball of the Vegetables, and Other Stories in Prose and Verse, by Margaret Eytinge. It is handsomely bound and illustrated, and contains a charming selection of dainty and fanciful stories and poems.

Charles Carleton Coffin's books of historical reading for the young form a beautiful and fascinating series of United States history which should be placed in the hands of every American boy and girl. There are four handsome illustrated volumes, which may be purchased separately, each being a complete history of the special epoch to which it is devoted. The Story of Liberty teaches the rise and progress of those movements which inspired our forefathers to found a new nation. The sufferings and hardships they encountered are vividly pictured in Old Times in the Colonies. The story of the Revolutionary War, the best ever written for young readers, is told in The Boys of '76. And in Building the Nation is a complete résumé of United States history from the signing of the treaty of peace in 1783 to the outbreak of the civil war in 1861. Mr. Coffin writes in fascinating style, and no story-book could be more entertaining than these delightful histories. They are profusely illustrated with portraits and other engravings.

Games and Songs of American Children, by William Wells Newell, is a charming and quaint collection of childish sports and jingles of past and present. It is a delightful book for little folks, as it gives directions for many pretty pastimes, and those to whom childhood is a far-away dream will fast themselves young again reading "Outs, pens, beans," "Intery, mintery, cutery corn," and other things which gave delight before the graver matters of life began.

Messrs. HARPER & BROTHERS' list of books for children is very extensive, and includes volumes on all subjects, prepared by the best writers for youthful readers. The Messrs. Abbotts' histories of celebrated men and women are standard biographies for the young, and hold a high place in juvenile literature. Mr. Du Chaillu's books of African adventure for boys and girls are as fascinating as that sparkling and popular author can make them. Of fairy tales there are many handsome volumes, by Miss Mulock, Miss Johnson, Mrs. Hays, and other writers. And in the "Harper's Young People Series" of story-books, each pretty volume of which contains a complete story, are The Four Macnicols, a manly tale of the adventures of four Scotch boys, by William Black; Nan, a beautiful story for girls, by Mrs. Lillie; the popular stories of Toby Tyler and Tha Moral Pirates, and many others which have been favorites with the readers of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

THE CONTEST FOR THE SPEAKERSHIP.

THE spectacle of gentlemen going to Washington and "opening head-quarters" to secure their own election to the Speakership, and to urge members of the House to pledge themselves to vote for them, is not agreeable, and is very different from the practice of other and, in this respect certainly, better days. It is, however, a custom which has become universal in the pursuit of every office. The doctrine that the office should seek the man, and not the man the office, is obsolete. Nothing is more common or more discreditable than the personal efforts of candidates for the Senate of the United States to win by actual solicitation the votes of members of a Legislature. The spectacle of two summers ago in Albany will not be soon forgotten, and while the kind of contest for securing a party nomination to the Speakership is proceeding at Washington, it is announced, not, indeed, authoritatively, but as something to be naturally anticipated, that the President is about to open his campaign to secure a nomination next year. We believe the President to be wronged by such a report, and while it is probable that he desires to be nominated, we believe him to be much too shrewd a man to suppose that such a course would aid him to secure the prize.

The renominations of Republican Presidents have been really spontaneous. Ordinary machine politics did not procure and could not have prevented them. Mr. LINCOLN was renominated in 1864 and General GRANT in 1872 in obedience to the honest wish and choice of the Republican party. And the conspiracy to secure the nomination in 1880 although the effort of the most powerful and thoroughly organized "machine" known in our political annals, was totally baffled, because it outraged the real conviction and desire of the party. None of the leaders of that machine although they were all managers who were powerful by patronage, were men of political sagacity. There were plenty of their lieutenants who could have taught them that the art of the politician is not to try to sail against the wind, but to turn it to his own account. It is true, however, that to do this he must be able to perceive both its direction and its force. A great office acquired by bargain, or by any means but the force of character, of service, or of legitimate argument, is not an honor. A Speaker whose election represents private understandings and pledges and promises gains his office at the cost of the respect and confidence of the country. Many men who are most fitted by character and capacity for high public place constantly decline the controversy necessary to obtain it, because it is not a controversy which is consistent with their self-respect. Yet the unwillingness to engage in the scramble is urged as a conclusive plea against them. Refusal personally to solicit votes is denounced as a high and mighty disdain of the public which ought to be severely punished. If a man does not care enough about his election to work for it, why should he expect any body else to work for him? is the simple-hearted query of the heeler.

The three gentlemen who aspire to the Speakership have been long in the public service. Their characters, their views, their parliamentary abilities are perfectly well known. They can not change the impression which these have produced. Their "canvass," therefore, the personal endeavor to persuade members to support them, is open to serious suspicion. In itself it costs them a regard which is better than votes. The same thing is as true of the President. His administration is his platform. If the party should desire his nomination, it would be because, upon the whole, it is satisfied that nothing would probably be gained by attempting a change. But a personal effort upon his part, by the use of patronage, or by any "aggressive" means whatever, to obtain a nomination, would, in the present temper of the public mind, probably turn the scale against him. No vigorous and obvious attempt to secure the nomination could improve the President's chances, whatever those chances may be. But a vigorous and obvious administrative impulse in the directions which public and party opinion plainly indicates would unquestionably improve them.

EVACUATION-DAY.

THE last of the centennial Revolutionary celebrations takes place in the city of New York just before this paper appears. Yet the city of New York took no part in the actual Revolution after the battle of Long Island. The British occupation was absolute and continuous, and there was a strong Tory element among the people. But the story of the city in the preliminary movements of the contest is exceedingly interesting and honorable, and it will doubtless have been adequately told in the newspapers. New York has always shown a certain indifference and negligence toward her own annals, which is partly due to the Dutch temperament of the early settlers, and partly to the mixed and cosmopolitan character of her subsequent population. A large part of the crowd which will gaze upon the pageant of the celebration of Evacuation-day will wonder what Evacuation-day was, and the electric national appeal of great national anniversaries, which brings homogeneous communities to their feet with pride and joy, will be wanting here.

The incidents of the day a hundred years ago were narrated in Mr. JOHNSTON'S article in HARPER'S MAGAZINE for November, and it is exceedingly pleasant reading. The city of New York, indeed, was bound fast during the war, but the State of New York was the theatre of great and decisive events, and the Revolution both culminated and, in the final evacuation, ended here. The events that were recently commemorated at Newburgh, and the completion of the Saratoga monument, which will probably be celebrated next year, recall some of the great Revolutionary memories of the State: and the plains of Long Island, the field of Oriskany, the heights of Ticonderoga, the waters around West Point, are all eloquent of the days whose centenary has now passed.

The celebrations of these events have been a remarkable series of commemorations. They began with the observance in Philadelphia, on the 5th of September, 1874, of the centenary of the assembly of the Continental Congress, and they end with that of the evacuation of New York, on the (25th) 26th of November, 1883. Their culmination was naturally that of the central event of the Revolution, the Declaration of Independence. During this long period the Revolutionary story has been told and retold in a manner deeply to impress it upon the national mind and memory, and the final result is unquestionably a more vivid and adequate knowledge of the national history. It is one of the great good fortunes of the country that the centennial season did not occur until the civil war had ended and the national Union had endured successfully the prolonged and vital test of its character and power. That war is already merely one of the incidents of our story—an incident which will soon have left no baleful consequence. To one more celebration we must now look forward, to the centenary of the institution of the government of the Union in 1889 and then the country will enter upon the second century of its national life with memories as proud as its anticipations may be justly sanguine.

REPUBLICAN REORGANIZATION IN NEW YORK.

THE reorganization of the Republican party in the city of New York is an important event, which throws a great responsibility upon critical and independent Republicans. The overwhelming defeat of 1882 was followed by general apathy in the party, and a stunned feeling among the party managers. Some months elapsed without action of any kind, although various projects involving reorganization were entertained and discussed. Finally a plan of enrollment in the city was adopted, to go into effect after the election. The State Convention approved it, and directed inquiries into an extension of representation in the Convention, and the purification of primaries. The State Committee selected at the Convention proved to have what is known as a Stalwart majority. It entered upon the campaign at great disadvantage, because of a certain distrust, and of the indifference of an off year, and of the small contribution to the treasury. But its conduct of the campaign was skillful and efficient, and it can not justly be accused of the least factional purpose or effort. On the contrary, it dropped all considerations but Republican success, and the result speaks for itself. It has totally changed the Democratic tone and feeling in regard to the election of next year.

All this shows an honorable spirit upon the part of the official managers of the party, and Republicans who have complained hitherto have had an opportunity to secure that share of initiative and control the want of which they have denounced as a wrong. It is obvious that in a great city there must be some kind of registry, or it can never be known whether those who control Republican meetings may not be Democrats. The registry offered was perfectly free, with the exception of a pledge not to take part during the year in the caucuses of another party. The exact meaning of this pledge occasioned some doubt and discussion. But as it was susceptible of a simple and reasonable interpretation, it does not seem to us that it should have discouraged enrollment. It could not be fairly held to prevent participation in what is called a citizens' movement, because the characteristic of such movements is that they are non-partisan. Neither did it commit the voter to the support of any candidate who by any means may obtain the party nomination. The pledge, as we understand it, was merely a declaration that the voter preferred Republican ascendency, and proposed to use every honorable means to secure it. There was, undoubtedly, some dissatisfaction with the fact that the machinery for the new organization was in the hands of the "old set." But that was not important until it was seen that they intended to abuse their trust, and then they would be dealt with as they were in 1882. No form of organization, indeed and no kind of enrollment, in which intelligent and honorable men take part, will constrain them to support candidates whom they think to be unworthy of support.

There are a great many voters, of course, who are content to vote at the election, and who will not trouble themselves with preliminary details. But the remedy for deprivation of the chance "to begin at the beginning" has been offered, and those who neglected it can not fairly complain if hereafter they find themselves debarred. On the other hand, it would be folly for those who may obtain control in the new organization to forget that "regularity" is no argument with those who hold the balance of power, and that the Republican party will not succeed because of a new registration, but only because it deserves to succeed.

GOOD CHEER FOR THANKSGIVING.

We trust that the Republican Legislature of New York will heed the words of Mayor EDSON. He repeats what every intelligent man who consents to become Mayor of New York discovers that—he is practically powerless in most important matters.

Mayor EDSON says:

"In my view the government of cities is rapidly becoming a serious question. The State of New York has done very well in giving Brooklyn so excellent a charter. If, now, the Republicans give New York city as good a government as that possessed by Brooklyn, they will strengthen themselves all around. New York city asked this of the Legislature last year, but failed to get it. I haven't changed my mind at all in respect to the legislation needed. It is now only a question as to whether the Republicans will be far-sighted enough to grant the request, which will certainly be repeated the coming winter. Brooklyn's charter gives the Mayor some powers which he has not before enjoyed, and which he ought to have. In saying this I do not mean to be understood as hankering personally for increased power. But in the future the people of the city of New York should select a man in whom they have confidence, and then he should have fully as comprehensive powers as those granted the Executive of Brooklyn. The rule [illegible] of over 100,000 inhabitants, and I don't know but to the smaller cities as well."

The Mayor says further, and his conduct in regard to reform has been worthy at high commendation:

"I think the working of civil service reform in New York State is excellent. Even the simple rules which will be recommended this year will do good. In cities of over a certain number of inhabitants the civil service is and will be subject to such rules as the Mayor may adopt. So far as New York city is concerned, I expect before January to have civil service rules adopted which, though simple, will be of great help in carrying on the government of the metropolis. I am heartily in sympathy with the civil service reform movement."

This is most suggestive. Within a year the national reform bill has been passed, and the reform practically begun under a friendly President. The New York State reform bill has passed, and the Commission is organized, and the work is about to begin under a friendly Governor; and in the two cities of New York and Brooklyn the reform will begin immediately by the direction and under the control of two friendly Mayors. In these facts there is no reason whatever for political discouragement.

THE COMING OPERA.

A WAGNER SOCIETY has been formed in New York, and it is therefore to be expected that the modern opera, or, more distinctively, the opera of the future, will soon begin to contest the prize of popular favor with the Italian opera. The latter has now to bear a great deal of adjuration from many critics, and the young student of music displays a great deal of polite disdain for the childish taste of their elders, which can patiently endure, without protest, a [illegible] avowing of the "tinkling tunes" of ROSSINI, BELLINI, DONIZETTI, and VERDI.

The performance of La Gazza Ladra for the return of PATTI seemed, indeed, to reveal a doubled change of taste

Despite the exquisite vocalization and the great charm of the prima donna, there was an evident feeling of inadequacy and triviality in the opera, and even the bright gayety of the Rossini music left a sense of disappointment. It is, indeed, impossible that the masterly rendering of WAGNER'S music now for many years by Mr THOMAS and his orchestra, and the evident delight which it awakens in great audiences, should not show some positive effect upon the ruling musical taste. Moreover, every great successive master in any art expresses the spirit of his age, and is, in so far, more agreeable to those who are influenced by that spirit. The words "quaint" and "old-fashioned" imply an appreciable change in the general taste and appreciation.

These words are already applied in music to HANDEL and HAYDN and WEBER, and even MENDELSSOHN is "patronized" by the "young person" of the Wagnerian epoch. The great success of Lohengrin at the Metropolitan Opera-house is an unmistakable sign of the interest that would attend an equally adequate representation of the WAGNER series. There would, indeed, be some kind of struggle for public favor at the beginning, as there was in the first performances of the BEETHOVEN symphonies, which were also derided as unintelligible. But, with the fitting accessories, such as the composer contemplated and required, his cinema as a great composer could be justly treasured. It is, however, hardly to be supposed that the sweet and charming melodies of the familiar Italian operas would become wholly obsolete even in the event of a complete triumph of the modern opera. They would survive in the available resources of the opera as WATTEAU and GREUZE and WOUVERMANS survive in the famous galleries of pictures. Meanwhile, as an earnest of what is coming, Mr. THOMAS has completed arrangements with Madame MATERNA, the chief WAGNER prima donna, and two other singers who are especially interpreters of his music, for a series of concerts in the chief cities of the United States, beginning in April.

AN INSTRUCTIVE CASE.

THE case of the removal of E. R. DUDLEY, Deputy Collector of Internal Revenue at Newbern, North Carolina, merits the attention of the public and of the Administration. The Hon. J. E. O'HARA is a member of Congress from North Carolina, who for some reason does not like Mr. DUDLEY, and the public service is therefore deprived of an admittedly good officer. Mr. I. J. YOUNG, the Collector, writes as follows to Mr. DUDLEY:

"SIR,—Hon. J. E. O'HARA has just been to see me, and insists on your removal. I hope you and your friends will appreciate my position, and the partiality I have shown you by retention so long against the demand and wish of our M. C. I had hoped that time would soften him, and bring about some concessions; and I yet feel, if patience and forbearance prevail on the part of yourself and friends, that all differences may be healed, and equal justice done to all concerned. I shall appoint Mr. PALMER your successor. Be ready to turn over to him November 1.

"Please work up all unfinished business in your Dist by that time.

"I feel it due to you to say that I deem you a good officer, and will gladly give you the chance to resign prior to that time.

"Would be glad to talk personally with you, and hope you will to act as to not cause a wider trench among our political friends, and trust to time, the great arbitrator of human grievances, to heal feuds, and repair the wrong you may feel done you by appointing your successor."

The commendation of the victim to the assuaging influences of time is very touching. But Mr. DUDLEY declined voluntarily to resign a position for which his superior officer declared him to be fit, and he was summarily removed, to gratify the Honorable J. E. O'HARA.

It is in this way that the positions in the civil service of the United States are made to serve the personal and political ends of politicians and members of Congress, and it is the necessary consequences of this system of allowing individual citizens to use the public money for their own purposes, and to pay them henchmen out of the national Treasury, who have aroused the people to insist upon reform. Mr. O'HARA had no more right to demand the removal of Mr. DUDLEY than to require that of any employé in the office of this paper; and the lever by which he pried on ostensibly good officer out of his place was the implied threat that he would pry out the superior officer if he did not do his bidding. Such incidents are conclusive arguments against the spoils system.

MRS. FRY.

JOHN HOWARD awakened general interest in prisoners and prisons, and much of the reform of modern days is fairly attributable to his exposures of the wrongs and sufferings of prisoners. ELIZABETH FRY, a little later—about seventy years ago—again drew attention especially to the condition of women in prisons. The story of her benefi cent and self-sacrificing life, all the more interesting from its Quaker sweetness and simplicity, was told after her death by her two daughters. But the volume was large, and is long since out of print. EDWARD RYDER, a preacher of the Friends, has prepared a tale of her life and labors from all the existing sources, which gives an adequate and impressive picture of the admirable woman. Mr. RYDER is his own salesman of a book which naturally treats Mrs. FRY's career from the religious point of view.

"FIRST AID TO THE INJURED."

ONE of the excellent forms of human activity in the city is the instruction in "first aid to the injured" which is furnished by a society of ladies and gentlemen organized for that purpose. Human life can often be revived and suffering greatly relieved by prompt and intelligent treatment of those who are wounded and disabled by casualties of every kind, and the object of the association is to promote such treatment.

The central society in New York has organized branches in Boston and Philadelphia. In New Brunswick and Orange, in New Jersey, there are classes, and other branches are forming in Buffalo, Baltimore, Providence, Rochester, and Newark. Nearly a thousand persons attended the New York lectures last winter, and the work is sustained by many of the chief churches in the city.

The classes are made up of railroad and factory employés, of working-men of all kinds, of machinists, policemen, clerks, theological students, and school-teachers. The lectures are generally free. The pupils are duly examined, and those who pass satisfactorily receive a suitable certificate. The society is maintained by life memberships, subscriptions, and donations. The expenses are: printing, postage, medical appliances and material, small salaries and clerical services, and rent. The expense of the last year was only about $1200.

MR. IRVING AND MISS TERRY.

MR. IRVING has finished his present engagement in New York, and with Miss TERRY, who has "charmed the town," and his admirable company, he now goes to Philadelphia and Boston and other cities. The perfect stage setting of the drama in which he plays is not only exceedingly attractive, but it is an essential part of theatrical representation. The imagination will do much, but the imagination is aided by fine and fitting stage appointments as it is by fine acting.

There is no question of the impression which Mr. IRVING has produced as that of a masterly artist. He has the supreme gift of accomplishment in his art that he is able to turn even his disadvantages to profit, as we have known singers of the utmost musical feeling and skill produce exquisite effects even when nature had stinted the richness of the voice.

This "reverse action," as it is happily called by one of Mr. IRVING'S most sympathetic critics, enables him to produce the effect in a manner which is the very reverse of the author's probable intention. Thus for a passionate explosion of feeling may be substituted a kind of speechlessness, the seeming inability from very intensity of emotion to give it adequate expression. These are the touches that reveal the consummate artist; and such mastery, with his intellectual comprehension of the art which he illustrates, has won for him his great distinction.

Miss TERRY has given us the most perfect of Portias, and as she filled the eye and mind in the delightful drama, SHELLEY'S line was the due description of the scene:

"She was one of SHAKSPEARE'S women."

O'DONNELL'S POSITION.

THE trial of O'DONNELL for the murder of CAREY, the Irish informer, is a singular commentary upon the state of Irish feeling. He has been made a popular hero, and money has been subscribed for his defense, upon the ground of his noble and patriotic devotion in murdering the "infamous informer." But it is understood that his plea is that he killed CAREY in self-defense, which plea, if sustained, runs him as a devoted hero and martyr.

O'DONNELL, therefore, is in the awkward situation of a man who does not merit popular gratitude and enthusiasm unless he should be proved guilty of murder and be sentenced to the gallows. If he escape hanging, it will be because he is proved not to deserve the popular homage. The situation illustrates the condition of Irish feeling. Crime, however dastardly and cold-blooded, if it be committed in revenge upon the "Anglo-Saxon," is a passport to public favor, or at least to the sympathy of the great mass of the poor and ignorant Irish.

Meanwhile the British Government continues its efforts to correct abuses and to do justice. The result of the late criminal trial when the jury disagreed shows the untruth of the assertion that juries are impanelled to convict. There is certainly no European government which would maintain on humane and reasonable a course, under the same circumstances, as that of the GLADSTONE administration in Ireland. Much undoubtedly remains to do, but how much more promptly and satisfactory it would be done if the Irish leaders were wisely friendly to the Government!

PERSONAL.

A PARISIAN journalist began a leading article as follows. "It was with the keenest satisfaction that, one months ago, I learned of the death of RICHARD WAGNER." He then proceeds to vent his anger against classical concerts and the German Empire.

—The French (observes a Paris correspondent) do not attach to their newspaper articles the same importance that foreigners do, and for one Frenchman who reads an editorial on the subtleties of Chinese diplomacy (the details of which are, of course, obtained from the English press) there are ninety nine who read the accounts of the drollery of the new operetta, the splendors of the restored Alcazar Théâtre, and the enthusiasm provoked nightly at the Opéra Comique by Madame GALLI MARIÉ'S splendid impersonation of Carmen.

—A late emigrist announces that "men of vast powers do not need the stimulus afforded by foreign travel, and the ordinary tourist frequently decides himself in supposing that he will gain more knowledge and more enjoyment by spending his vacation abroad." Artists who want to go to Europe, but can not, may find comfort in these words.

—The rest of LUTHER'S face, taken three days after his death, is preserved in a public library in Halle. Some hairs of the eyebrows, which came out while the cast was being removed, are religiously cared for by a firm of art-dealers in the same city. Those modest souvenirs of the Reformer are stiff, and iron gray.

—JOHN RUSKIN will lecture at the London Institution, on the 4th of February next, on "The Storm Cloud of the Nineteenth Century." The subject seems to be to explain the realm of art criticism, and his discussion of it will doubtless be all the more valuable.

—Field Marshal VON MOLTKE, though more than eighty years old, takes much pleasure in hunting, and is very successful in the sport.

—GERMAN ARTHUR SALA writes: "Miss MARY ANDERSON, whose success on the English stage is now fully established, [illegible] stately, graceful, and winsome in the part of Pauline. No [illegible] gentle or ungentle, will bar the fact that there is an [illegible] lady on the stage than Miss MARY ANDERSON. She is in the full as highly favored in nature as was the late Mrs. ROUSBY, but she carries herself with greater dignity, and her countenance are more symmetrical. An actress who is extremely pretty in visage, lithe in form, and refined in manner may be considered to have gained half the battle which she has to fight. I am not at present qualified to pronounce whether Miss MARY ANDERSON is the possessor of real genius, or only of very highly developed dramatic training. As Pauline, an ample display of pathos is demanded from her, and Miss ANDERSON did not convey to my mind the idea of her feeling the part. She was never carried away. She was not by any means cold, but her warmth lacked abandon. She seemed to be perfectly well aware of what she was about, and determined that not one of her graceful poses, not one of her careful touches of by-play, not one tone of her pretty head, nor undulation of her shapely cask, should be lost on her audience."

—Critics must have something to criticise, and one of these, we notice, is tired of seeing Mr and Mrs. KENDAL, of the St. James's Theatre, London, in parts where they are required to make love to each other. "Is there any particular law," he asks, complainingly, "that requires Mrs. KENDAL invariably to make love to her husband, and Mr. KENDAL to be as theatrically devoted to his wife? It is very pretty, no doubt, but it becomes monotonous. It would puzzle one to state for how many years they have been love-making on the stage—classical love-making, comedy love-making, modern love-making, comic love-making, not they are Pygmalion and Galatea, nor the hero and heroine of unlimited faces, nor old lovers parted, and now young lovers reunited. But we have had enough of them, as Dean SWIFT said when he sickened of rabbits, and apostrophized them in a famous grace."

—In responding in an address of welcome which at Liverpool, on his return from Canada, the Marquis of LORNE told that of he had been able to advance the prosperity of that country, it was very much owing to the labors of the Princess LOUISE, who had "undertaken voyages and journeys which must have been trying to any one, even in the strongest health, with the view of helping to make the people of Europe know the advantages and resources of Canada." This explains very handsomely why the Princess was so often and so pertinently absent from the Dominion.

—During the fifty five years that have elapsed since the death of the composer SCHUBERT so many alterations have been made in his songs that the original text of the music is often widely different from the present one. An attempt is making to restore the text to its primitive condition by comparing it with the autograph copies made by SCHUBERT himself, and preserved in public and private collections, chiefly in Vienna.

—Sir WILFRID LAURIER, the Radical statesman, does not know why people should quarrel over politics and religion. He would as soon think of quarreling with a person having the rheumatism. "A man has the rheumatism because it is a disease of his body, and a Tory is a Tory because he is not strong enough to resist the attacks of error." "Mr GLADSTONE once said that the duty of a government is to make it easy for men to do right, and difficult for them to do wrong, and the duty of the people in relation to the government is to make it easy for the government to do right, and difficult for it to do wrong."

—Queen ELIZABETH of Roumania was seen recently, on a state occasion, in an elegant national costume. "The skirt and corsage, full and flowing, are cream colored, with gold embroidery; a gauze veil of a rosy tint enveloped her head and neck, and like a morning cloud floated round her sweet and smiling countenance, on which at moments appeared a passing shade of repressed sadness. Her deep blue eyes, with this background, have an intense light, her delicately cut lips have a frank smile of welcome, and her figure, slightly leaning forward, reminds one of SARA BERNHARDT in the purest and poetical vision of Roland's daughter." The Queen is a books, and has a talent for painting and illuminating.

—GUSTAVE DORÉ'S statue of ALEXANDRE DUMAS, unveiled in Paris on the 4th of November, is in the Place Malesherbes, only a stone's throw from the house of DUMAS the younger, represents the novelist sitting in flowing robes in an arm-chair, and leaning back, pen in hand, as if collecting his thoughts. The likeness is said to be excellent. Below the statue, on the top of the marble pedestal, are seated three female figures, the central one a girl reading a novel of DUMAS'S, while a young man at either side of her looks over her shoulder. This monument, said one of the speakers, would have been of solid gold had all whom DUMAS instructed or fascinated contributed a centime each to it.

—Mr. MOODY, the evangelist, is again at work in London, and the Times of that city says that he "expounds Scripture in plain, homely phrase, in fervid, earnest tones, with marked American accent and animated gesture, turning aside from his text now and then to humorously relate some experience or point a moral, which elicits a laugh or wins a smile."

—Several hundred girls in a skirt manufactory in Derry Ireland, have been on a strike because Sir WILLIAM MILLER, M.D., has not been dismissed from his partisan as medical officer of that establishment. Sir WILLIAM is a Protestant, and the girls are Roman Catholics. The girls parade the streets singing, "God save Ireland," and grouping dismally when opposite Sir WILLIAM'S house. Sir WILLIAM must soon see the error of his way.

—Policemen in London go about in pairs. They are an army in numbers, but an economy of the cost of the constabulary has ever been heard from the most parsimonious ratepayer.

—In Russia the Nihilists are now broken up into widely scattered groups, each more or less independent of the rest. They are desperately in need of funds. Last spring a rich Russian official married a young Pole, and soon afterward was murdered and robbed. Six months afterward, on being arrested as a Nihilist, he confessed that he had murdered the widow for the sake of her money, which he had distributed among the young Nihilists of Poland. Similar cases have frequently occurred.

—Of the engravers on wood who exhibited at the triennial Salon only three were accorded the first rank, and of these three Mr ROBERT HOPKIN, of this city, was one. He has received a large gold medal, on one side of which appears a medallion of MICHAEL ANGELO. Mr HOPKIN'S beautiful work is well known to the readers of this journal, and fully appreciated by his brother artists, as less than by the public.

—CHARLES WILLIAM SIEMENS, the eminent electrician, engineer, and inventor, who in 1871 received the Bessemer Medal of the Iron and Steel Institute, is dead, in his sixty-third year. His decease was rapture of the heart.

—We congratulate our veteran and esteemed contemporary the Commercial Advertiser on the accession of that accomplished journalist Mr ISAAC H. BAILEY to the post of editor in-chief. Mr BAILEY'S pen has already made for him a [illegible] of which any editor might be proud, and his brilliant social gifts have endeared him to troops of friends. It is always pleasant to see the right man in the right place.

—During the days of the old Volunteer Fire Department the mothers, wives, sisters, and sweethearts of the [illegible] as gallant a company as the [illegible] Mrs. [illegible] Mountain, whose family have [illegible] the [illegible] of [illegible] Fire [illegible] [illegible] shot [illegible] 44 [illegible] day I suppose [illegible] to 44 in those days, [illegible] and [illegible] worked in the ship [illegible] place to live in. [illegible] for a bond. If that be so, then, [illegible] memory of the good and true [illegible] constitute anything that is lasting. [illegible] they will search past my door, as I [illegible] must ever more see about all that [illegible] to remind me of the [illegible]

Ye True Story of Granny Greene of Salem Town

Set to Rhyme for ye better entertainment of ye Reader

by Howard Pyle and Abecedach

I

THERE folk there are, I surely grecte
To say, the most in full believe—
Oh, scoffing times!—as witness,
Who shake their heads, with doleful look
When told these cross a stream or brook
In egg-shell boats, to hook or crook,
Or fly on birchen switches

But lithe and listen, all good men,
To this strange tale about a hen
That I here sought to gather
From that which certain papers state
Of sundry things appertainate
To matters brought before the late
Deceased Cotton Mather

II

[It is now to be related of the manner of living and of the condition of one Charity, sometimes called Granny Greene.]

Dame Charity Greene, of Salem Town,
Was not overware, as you shall see,
For in all the settlement, up or down,
Nobody grumbled as much as she.
And yet she had chickens and ducks and geese,
A cottage, a cow, a garden plot,
But still in the spite of all of these,
And plenty to eat and plenty to wear,
She oftentimes said to Barbara Reese,
Her gossip, with tearful whine and whereat,
She was poor as the township charity pot

III

[It is furthermore told of certain things that happened to Granny Greene upon a hill [illegible] of Salem Town, and of a stranger that [illegible] there.]

Granny Greene walked over the hill
Over the hill nigh Salem Town,
With a bag of grist for the valley mill
The wind piped high and the wind piped shrill
As it caught the grass and bent it down,
And far in the hollow, wisp-like sky
The white-winged sea-gulls flickered nigh,
And wheeled and screamed with a harsh wild cry

Dequent saith she was snug and warm
In a long gray cloak and comforter too,
That not a breath of the wind could harm,
No matter how high and chill it blew,
That she thought she was walking all alone,
As she grumbled at money and this and that,
But the suddenly saw, with his hand to his ear,
And his head bent forward as if he would hear
A strange little man in a sugar-loaf hat

His coat was red,
And so was his head;
His stockings were red, and his breeches too;
And swifter far than the wind, and higher,
He spoke in a voice so thin or a wire,
And sharp as [illegible] or the point of a pin:
Oh, Charity Greene, oh, whither so fast?
Why turn away with [illegible] found at last
A [illegible] friend—from [illegible] a hare
W[illegible] the weight of [illegible] of care?
Oh, stay! oh, stay!
[illegible] I pray!
[illegible] have to say
[illegible] in your land case.

For every morning your hen shall lay
A golden egg, from this very day.
Then he skipped and danced in a wanton way,
And grinned all over his sharp, shrewd face.

The wind shrieked out more wild and shrill,
Dame Charity's cloak flew over her head.
She struggled and twisted and turned until
She had freed herself: she stood on the hill
Alone. The stranger in red
Had fled

IV.

[Now it is shown what cometh of evil communion with that which is not of a goodly nature.]

The next morn, as the deponent said,
After the one all clad in red
Had spoken to her in this strange way,
The speckled hen, in the out-house shed,
Cackled as though it would wake the dead.
So putting her knitting and yarn away,
She went to find where the fresh egg lay

A beam of light like a misty bar
Reached through a knot-hole smooth and round,
As though it beamed from the wall to the ground,
Where it shivered and broke in a blaze of light,
And shattered amid the lumber old.
There, near by, was the strangest sight
That ever was thought of, or seen, or told,
For amongst the straw, like a blazing star,
In the dusky light, lay an egg of gold.
The dame stood stark, as though shot with a bullet,
At the sight she saw in the nest of the pullet.

V.

[From that which followeth may be seen, however, those things which we must derive have their both cures.]

All day she walked in a daze,
And her soul was wrapped in amaze
At the thing which the hen had done
And at night, when she went to bed,
The thoughts so skipped in her head,
Each jostling the other one,
That she'd never caught a wink of sleep
When the daylight began to peep,
And the little birds began to sing
At the waking up of everything

For now that such wealth untold
Was hatched from an egg of gold,
She bethought her of what to say
To her gossiping cronies when
She should tell of the golden hen
That was blessed in so godly way
Likewise out a thought was found,
Though she chased all her wits around,
To tell her of how the egg of gold
Could be taken to Boston Town and sold

But still her wits danced around,
When a shrill and piercing sound
Stabbed straight through the hush like a knife.
A scream, a clatter, a shrieking,
As though fifty imps were squeaking
And yelling and fighting for life
Out of her bed she tumbled,
And out of the house she fumbled,
With never a limp of her rheumatic leg
She neared the door of the out-house, when
She found the hen
Had been at it again,
For there lay another bright golden egg

Another day passed by, and then
Came another egg from the speckled hen.

A week passed by, and every day
A golden egg was put away.

VI.

[Following then is shown how wealth, more especially that which is ill-gotten, weigheth down the heart.]

She filled a barrel, she filled a bag,
She hid them back of the four-post bed.
The hen kept on with never a lag—
For every morn of every day
A golden egg was put away.

Dame Charity hated her golden store,
And the hen so cursed by the one in red,
As she never had hated a thing before.

GRANNY GREENE SEEKETH YE LIFE OF YE HEN.

She'd have given an eye to be free once more.
And would have wrung off the pullet's head,
But the thing grew wild and bad anear,
And only came back
With shrieking and clack
At the gray of the dawn of the coming day.
To lay

VII

[This shows how ill happenings follow upon evil doings.]

And now what she went to take a walk,
As she used to do in the days of old,
Before she was cursed with the weight of gold,
The folk began to whisper and talk,
For she muttered of gold, and this and that,
And there came to her house a great black cat
(The one in red,
It was afterward said);

DAME CHARITY GREENE MEETETH YE STRANGE LITTLE MAN.

GRANNY GREENE FALLETH INTO ILL REPUTE.

THE ARREST.

[illegible] to at things after her wi-ch
Her [illegible] strange-ly like that of witch

[illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible]
Hasting, hurrying,

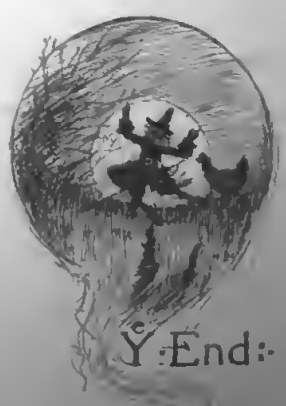
That runs the smith with his arms all bare,
The landlord out from the tavern there,
The carpenter too, and the undertaker,
The one-armed soldier, the old shoemaker,
The tallow-chandler, and the baker.
There's a noise of men and boys in the street—
There's a hubbub of voices, a tramp of feet.
'The witch! the witch!' is shouted loud.
'They're taken the witch! they've got her fast!
They've caught the old she-cat at last!'
Down the street comes the noisy crowd,
And right at the head of the press is seen
The County Sheriff and Granny Greene.

VIII

[The proof of the witchcraft on all these doings is clearly set forth by what follows, as is likewise a moral advanced from them by a goodly man.]

Now when they searched the cottage through,
As they were called upon to do,
They found—so I am told—
A barrel where some mhone lay,
Some last year's turnips laid away,
But not a bit of gold.
Which shows how witchcraft changes things,
And how ill-gotten wealth takes wings.

A discourse preached by Parson Greene,
In which it was full clearly shown
How wealth is but a bubble;
Showed also how the lusts of men
But lead weak flesh to evil, when
They find they get a speckled hen
That hatches naught but trouble.



NO SUNSET TO-NIGHT.

No sunset to-night, no glory
Is over the pallor of snow;
Dark is the heaven above us,
And dark is the earth below.
No sunset to-night, no dazzling
Of purple, or pink, or gold
The day dies sadly in shadow,
And the night comes dark and cold.

Sunshine to-morrow morning! Sunshine
Will brighten the eastern sky;
The birds will tell us at dawning
As they go twittering by.
The pallor of snow will vanish,
And the dark clouds drift away;
The grass is under the snow drifts,
And the blue sky under the gray.

No sunset to-night in the household,
The hearth-stone is dreary and still;
There is something the matter with father,
And mother is weary and ill.
No playing to-night in the parlor,
No story, no laughter, no song,
And the little ones go to their sleep
With a feeling of sorrow and wrong.

But to-morrow, when shadows lengthen,
The hearth will be ruddy and light;
Children will climb on the father's knee,
And the mother be well and bright;
And the sun o'er the little household
Go down in the glory and bliss
Of laughter, and story, and music,
Of a father's and mother's kiss.

And my heart has oft mournfully said:
"In my life no sunset to-night;
Gray is the sky and horizon,
Clouds piling to left and to right;
Gone are the purple and amber tints,
The shimmer of pink and of gold;
My day has been all in the shadow,
And my night cometh dark and cold."

Then, lo! in the morning new glory,
New beauty of earth and of sky,
New hope in my heart and my duty,
As the lark sings gladly on high
"Shadows last only a night-time,
Like a happy bird, song them away;
For after the night comes the dawning,
And the blue sky is under the gray."

THANKSGIVING, 1783—1883.

THANKSGIVING is an new thing. A national day of thanksgiving to the source of all has been observed in China for unknown ages. On that day the Emperor prays at the Temple of Heaven, and in oriental people to an altar near Pekin, and offers abase prayers and sacrifices be return for the gifts Heaven has vouchsafed his people. For the moment he becomes the representative of the nation. On the same day, at the same hour, three hundred millions of his subjects bring grateful offerings to their unknown gods. Despotism has perfected an unparalleled system of religious rites. Custom rules the half civilized Chinese with a rigor unknown to the West. Nowhere else is there so large a portion of the human race united in one cry of gratitude, one universal prayer.

The Chinese seem to belong to a retrospective period, and quite unheard of traditions to several unusual sictures. With the Greeks and Romans thanksgivings were occasional, and followed important public events. There was no all over Greece after Marathon or Salamis of thanksgivings and prayers were offered in all its temples. But Greece was seldom united, and the cruel wars the Greeks waged against each other allowed no room for a general thanksgiving. It was seldom that the early republics could rejoice in peace even. The Romans, more successful, sang hymns of praise after the fall of Carthage, or in the empire celebrated the peaceful rule of Augustus in secular odes and Saturnalian license. But nothing in the form of an annual thanksgiving was known to them. The Jews suggested it in their Feast of the Tabernacles, the Romans in their annual sacrifices to Ceres or to Flora.

An American President announces fifty millions of freemen to give thanks for peace and its abundance. It was seldom that the Roman Consul or Emperor could feel so much at ease. In the dawn of history a national life was a perpetual disease, and men prayed upon each other. That curious, contrastive symbol, the closing of the gates of Janus, happened only twice in the history of the most powerful of the ancient republics, and even then was scarcely to be held allowable; war and disaster hung over the walls of Rome. In the Middle Ages the nations dashed madly against each other in ceaseless conflicts. The world was old and dark, and men sang only a "Dies Iræ." Modern Europe has been scarcely more fortunate. It has sung "Te Deums" for sanguinary victories, but has never been at peace. The gates of Janus are wide open. Sometimes it is Russia plunging headlong into a Crimean war, sometimes England protecting its colonies and carrying on military expeditions, or France and Germany tormenting each other.

But with us it is different, and Thanksgiving is an American custom. It came to us slowly. The Dutch and the Puritan may dispute for the honor of its origin. Holland appointed a day of public thanksgiving after the siege of Leyden, 1573. The early Dutch in Manhattan made their public thanksgiving irregularly as early as 1621, 1622, and 1623. The Dutch Governors of New York in 1644 and 1645 began the national custom. But it was not until the war of Independence had passed away in triumph and the nation of thirteen States was in one great [illegible] New York in the joy of the Peace. Then, [illegible] ernor George Clinton called upon the people of the State to give thanks for their new freedom. "All worldly labor and recreation," we are told, are to be laid aside; all was gratitude and rest.

Washington proclaimed the first national Thanksgiving in 1789, and afterward in 1795. But the annual celebration of a Thanksgiving day was long confined to New England and to China. It was not until after the peace of 1815 that the custom was observed in New York. It is only since the death of Lincoln that the Presidents of the United States recommends yearly to all the people the virtue of gratitude. The growth of the custom has kept pace with that of intelligence. It is a useful one. Gratitude softens and refines human thought. The mind or the nation that can say heartily, "I thank you," is tending toward the good, and is in the path of progress.

Never was New York more ready for its annual Thanksgiving. For a hundred years it has been free, and freedom has brought it a bounteous prosperity. It has just celebrated the day on which the ancient tyranny failed from its sight. A story is told of an English officer who, a few days after the evacuation, returned to the city on collect some property that had been left behind. With some alarm he landed from the British fleet, and applied to the government for a guard. He was told that he needed none so long as he acted prudently; but his request was granted. He found New York in November, 1783, quiet and peaceful as a country village. There was no disorder, no retaliation. "Why," he said to a friend, "for seven years our army failed to keep the peace of the city; every day and night there was riot and disorder. Now we are gone, everything is peace and safety. These Americans," he added, "know how to govern themselves, but nobody else can govern them." It is for this that we give thanks. Our Thanksgiving-day is the united impulse of fifty millions of people, grateful for the prosperity of the past, and the opportunity of progress in the future.

EUGENE LAWRENCE.

THE LOSS OF THE FAMILY PLATE.

A THANKSGIVING STORY.

THE town of Locustville is situated on a majestic river, and sufficiently near the city of New York to be deemed suburban. Why Locustville? Betsy Trotwood might have inquired, as these trees are not numerous in the vicinity. Possibly the memory of the delicate foliage and sweet blossoms lingered in a less alien nook described by a French translator of Fenimore Cooper, with the aid of his dictionary, in these words, "The stranger alighted before the door of the mansion, and fastened his horse to a large grasshopper." Suffice it that Locustville is modern, pretty, and picturesquely perched on the river bank, with the railroad track below, while the more pensile element of butcher, baker, and candlestick maker is grouped about the station. The spot is a true paradise of the man of business, who dreams even at desk and ledger of rural repose.

There are cottages painted white, with green shutters, and mansions shaded by weeping willows, trees, and several cottages, slate-roofed in lines, with facings of brick and orange, and English arrangements of red brick, in casements boasting diamond panes of glass. Nor are mere shades of distinction wanting in this suburban community. The red brick cottage, as home of a banker, looks down on the modest white abode of a [illegible], while the [illegible] house soars above both, as seat of an architect-poet.

The most remote of these residences is Gothic in structure, and of all Locustville resembles the home of the friendly spartan in the tree of [illegible] There is a [illegible] environs, so to speak, over the [illegible] which arrests attention. The smoke floats up like a banner from a square new chimney, a crystal festoon of a conservatory sparkles on the left side, and striped awnings flutter over the windows when the sun is hot. There is no entrance gate capable of admitting a wheeled vehicle, with a tiny sweep of gravel leading up to the front door. Nor are external decorations lacking. A diminutive fountain adorns the grass-plot, while a pagoda-shaped summer-house is built on the river bank. A tree trunk covered with ivy encounter a ruined column, and a net-work of twine stretched across the porch still held some sprays of drooping vines in the mild November weather of which we write, trained by the fostering care of the mistress of the house.

"And Pamela," "Have to other buckwheat cake, darling."

"Well, no love, but those corn muffins are excellent," replied Walter.

Then Pamela buttered delicately one of the praised muffins, and proceeded it to her lord and master, while he partook of breakfast, with his watch placed on the table beside his plate, and his ear alert for the locomotive whistle at the next station, which should warn him to flee on the path of duty eastward. Walter Tombe was book-keeper in the great dry goods house of Drugget & Co. He adjusted his habits of life with the same regularity that he balanced his accounts. The ménage of the Gothic cottage was young, even to the furniture was new. Walter and Pamela had not been married a year.

"No, indeed!" said Pamela, rising from the table; "we are to keep Thanksgiving-day—our first Thanksgiving—at home. I made up my mind to that a month ago, and I told papa as much when he invited me to town." She put on a stylish coal-skin cap and coachman's cape to accompany her husband to the cars. Pamela performed this act of devotion with gayety, for she was still [illegible] beside them.

Walter smiled, [illegible] looked grave. "I wish you would teach Bridget to keep the front door locked, my love," he remonstrated. "I invariably find the entrance gate half open, besides. Some day a band of gypsies will come along and steal every tea-spoon. Depend upon it!"

"Perhaps they will carry off the grand piano," suggested Pamela, in sprightly vein, and she tripped down the bank to the station. "If Bridget is careless about leaving doors and gates open, she is a perfect treasure in other respects. Have you forgotten Maggy, who spent her time flirting with neighboring gardeners, to the detriment of your dinner? or Catherine, who got drunk, and threatened you with a carving knife?"

"I have not forgotten all those delusive Swedish and German maidens, chosen by stalwart cousins for Western farms just when they learned to make hot biscuit," rejoined Walter.

"Bridget is to honest as the sun, and as ugly that even Miher, the grocer's boy, has jilted her for a better-looking girl," added Pamela.

Walter bit his lip. "All that goes for nothing if the front door is not locked," he said. "You should enforce it."

"Nonsense!" laughed Pamela.

Locustville awaited the train at the station, for the railway was the centre of life. Young ladies seated in pony phaetons bade lovers adieu for the day, mothers imparted anxious advice to sons, while paterfamilias kissed the babies. Even Pamela was not insensible to the exhilaration of being ogled by an entire train of cars as she stood there in her coachman's cape and oval shaw cap. She was a handsome young woman, tall and slight, with fine blue eyes, a creamy skin, and rich black hair brushed back from the nape of a very white neck, and arranged on top of the head in a fashion deemed purely American in Europe.

Away went the train, leaving feminine Locustville to a day of quiet routine. Walter Tombe was portioned as he took his place in the cars. A cloud had chilled his sunshine. Pamela had made very light of his first attempt at asserting authority. What would come of it? Perhaps his nerves had been tried by a tasteless knot of the previous day at Drugget & Co.'s, impossible to untangle. Possibly that last corn muffin was a ton on digestion calculated to produce gloom of spirit.

"She should not have said 'Nonsense!' when I suggested locking the front door," mused the husband, and immediately took an opposite political view to his companion of the same seat concerning the election of a new mayor.

Pam in retraced her steps until she regained the Gothic cottage. This day before Thanksgiving was to be long memorable to her, yet it began like all other mornings. She washed the delicate cups and saucers, and put them up in the china closet, after the most approved housewifely fashion. Then she played a Strauss waltz on the grand piano, which nearly filled the two drawing-room. Afterward she adjusted curtains, patted cushions, and hovered about the plants of the little conservatory, herself a glowing human bloom, for it was inseparable to her ideas of unity at this date to wear a coquettish cap, decked with scarlet bows, a distracting apron, and red slippers. Valuable rings flashed on her fingers, while a pair of diamond solitaires twinkled in her ears. These were wedding gifts together with the grand piano and the household furniture. Pamela enjoyed her pretty things, and liked to have them scattered about. She was rehearsing the courses of her Thanksgiving dinner, with the aid of a cook book when a shadow darkened the window, and the tramp looked in on her as a famished dog might at a [illegible] scene of [illegible] and [illegible], thrift-betokening [illegible] had sent him to roam, teeming ship-load to fatten on American prosperity. Dull, sodden, brutal, and ferocious, according to the amount of drink accessible to him, a creature preying on the peaceful country until such time as frost and snow should drive him to some city den to plot in darkness, crime, and robbery. Pamela shivered, then gave him bread and meat. The tramp received the food with an inarticulate growl, and [illegible] it way again to [illegible] the [illegible] the sun at a distance from Locustville and smoke a pipe. Pamela played another Strauss waltz to efface him. The tramp, swarthy, bearded, and unkempt, with heavy jaw and strong white teeth like the fangs of a wild animal, remained stamped on her mind, like a phantasm of the night.

After lunch a bustle of preparation for Thanksgiving pervaded the house. The guest-chamber was re-arranged, and windows opened. At two o'clock Pamela came down-stairs, having [illegible] the closet of her own room and taken out a bag. This bag contained the family plate. Fine spoons, forks, knives, pepper-casters, and sugar-sifters were spread on the dining-table, together with all those trifles in shining metal given by friends at a wedding.

"There will be work enough to do to-morrow, so those had better be brightened a bit now," thought Mrs. Tombe.

Just then Bridget announced that a steamer was passing on the river, with a band of music and soldiers on board. Steamers gay with flags did not pass Locustville at every hour of the day, so mistress and maid ran to the summer-house to see the excursionists. As they emerged from the back door of the cottage to gain the summer-house on the bank, a man entered the gate stealthily, trod the front door, which was unfastened, and penetrated the house. Oh, rare chance of thieves! Silver was outspread temptingly on the dining table, and the bag from which it had been taken reposed on a table near at hand. The man glanced around, listened, swept the silver into the bag, and departed as he had [illegible]. When mistress and [illegible] returned, the family plate was gone. They gazed at each other in speechless consternation. Was the front door unfastened? Well, yes, an hour earlier Pamela had admitted the Maltese [illegible].

Walter Tombe was later than usual in coming home that night. He had paused to smoke a pipe with the poet of the slate-gray cottage, and their talk had turned on a tramp barking along the hedges with his bundle on a stick. "What will become of us, as a country, if these vagrants are handed on us by Europe, to be supported or live by depredation?" Walter had exclaimed. "Could you not write a—poem—on the subject?"

The poet had removed the amber mouth-piece of his Oriental pipe, and answered, "I might make a tragedy of such a theme."

Then Walter had come home and found the house door so firmly bolted that he had much ado to enter.

"I am glad you remember my injunctions, Pamela," he said, briskly.

Pamela looked at the carpet in pale silence. Bridget peered in the door, disappeared, and a crash of falling crockery signaled her return to the kitchen. Confidences from to Pamela's lips. Should she tell the truth? Never had such a dinner been served in the Gothic cottage as on that day before Thanksgiving. Mr Tombs raised the lid of the soup-tureen with the eagerness of a hungry man, dipped the ladle into the milk thickened oyster stew, and exclaimed, sharply, "Take it away!—this soup is burned."

"I never left it on more than five minutes," asserted Bridget, and skilled off with the tureen, gazing at her master over her shoulder in such a very strange manner that he might have been warranted in believing sudden madness to have smitten the household.

Pamela placed with her spoon. Alas! it was a plated one for every-day use. The chicken was hopelessly raw, the potatoes were cold, the apple-pie scorched to a cinder, with the addition of a flavor of ashes. Humanity, with an empty stomach, asserted itself to the master of the house as he ate a pickle.

"Really, the prospect for Thanksgiving is a lively one, my dear. I hope the banquet may not prove a Harmenidal feast after all. I should like a Polynesian pudding. I sure read about. The bread-fruit, ripe plantain, taro, palm or pandanus nut, are rasped, pounded, and baked apparently. Then a large tray is filled with cocoa-nut milk, kept simmering by popping in heated stones, and the other ingredients, fresh from the oven, are added. Think of cocoa-nut milk for a pudding sauce!"

"Perhaps you had better live in Polynesia," snapped Pamela.

The wretched meal concluded, Walter took refuge in a cigar, while Pamela attacked the grand piano in a storm of discords.

"Spare my nerves," groaned the hungry husband, after a time.

Pamela rose, and flounced into the darkness of the little conservatory. Her heart ached, tears were ready to overflow her eyes, and her nerve were strung to a tension of excitement by the disaster of the day. But pride still upheld her. The conservatory was dark and fragrant; the young wife moved about with an assumption of indifference, and sang a little tune. The stand of large plants formed a denser foliage at the end, with a recess behind. As she lifted a spray of flowers to inhale their perfume, Pamela saw a man crouching on his hands and knees in the recess. She recognized the shock head of the tramp. Pamela's heart bounded violently, and stood still; the blood ran cold in her veins. She did not scream or faint. In a lightning flash of swiftest conviction she beheld the tramp, discovered, spring forth to stretch Walter Tombe at her feet, if she caused to sing. Held by this mortal dread, she continued to hum her song, she even plucked a flower from the plant nearest the hidden foe. Then she crept away slowly, faster and faster, until she swung to the door of the adjoining room, slid the bolt with stiffening fingers, and fell in a little heap, gasping. "A man—the tramp—is hidden there!" At the same moment there was a noise in the conservatory of falling plants and crash of glass, incident on the tramp's escape through the casement rather than be taken like a rat in a trap.

Walter gathered up Pamela in his arms and placed her on a sofa. Then he gave chase, revolver in hand. Soon all Locustville joined in pursuit of the outcast. Every cottager turned out, to a man, to defend his own hearth-stone. The news flew like lightning through the night that Mrs. Tombe had found a burglar hidden in her conservatory, ready to plunder and murder when the household should have retired to rest. Weapons were snatched up, lanterns lighted, and watch-dogs let loose, as if ever tramp waited under cover of darkness for all such preparations of capture! Even the poet came forth in embroidered dressing-gown and cap, his spectacles polished, and a silver-mounted pistol in his grasp. The tramp had vanished as completely to if the earth had swallowed him, and only the rustling of the wind through the trees and the murmur of the river responded to the shouts of the pursuers. When Walter returned to his abode, flushed with the fruitless search, he found Pamela weeping bitterly on the sofa, while Bridget stood by with her apron to her eyes.

"I am not hurt, my pet, and the rascal will not return," said Walter, lavishing endearments on his wife, for his heart began to melt.

"Oh, it's not that!" sobbed Pamela.

"No, indeed, it's not that, think," echoed Bridget, with a sympathetic bow.

"What is it, then?" queried Walter.

"Why, he had been here—before!" cried Pamela.

"He had, [illegible] had luck to him!" added Bridget, behind [illegible] ron.

"Ah! the tramp had been here before. Did you leave the door open?" pursued Walter, with a deceitful smile.

Pamela swept the handkerchief from her eyes with a tragic gesture. Concealment [illegible] What I here suffered she exclaimed. "You may as well have the worst at once. The silver is gone, and we are ruined. Oh, those darling spoons with little curly ends, and that duck of a sugar-sifter shaped like a thistle! I shall never have any more."

"The silver gone!" repeated Walter, wiping he his feet. "Let me see with my own eyes, for I can scarcely believe it."

He took a candle, and ran upstairs, followed by Pamela and Bridget. He unlocked the closet door, and produced the bag containing the family plate.

Mistress and maid were dumb. What did it mean?

"The fact is, I was the thief," explained Walter. "I came home at two o'clock to surprise you, and I found the gate ajar, the door unlocked. I had passed the tramp on the road. Neither of you was in the house. I put the silver in the bag, and carried it to the garret, and later took a chance to put it back safely so the chest. Then I slipped out, and spent the afternoon with the poet, in order be return home at the usual hour."

Pamela stared at him rigidly, but warmth and life began be re-animate her frame. Bridget smiled.

"Let it be a lesson for the future, my love, to be more careful," concluded Walter, with masculine superiority. "I did not intend to speak until the hour of dinner to-morrow, which would become a true Thanksgiving with the re-appearance of the family plate."

"I wonder you are not ashamed of yourself to play such tricks," retorted Pamela, finding voice at last. "So like a thoughtless man! I might be worn gray and worried into a fever with such nonsense. Pity you spoken at all!"

Walter's countenance fell under this volley of feminine indignation, and somehow the result seemed rather lame.

"If I had not stolen that silver, the tramp might have got it," he reasoned.

Pamela dreaded that night Walter was cook, in the white apron and cap of a French chef, preparing the famous Polynesian pudding, while Bridget had given warning in consequence.

Next morning brought restored peace and tranquillity to Walter Timbo's interior. Pamela's parents arrived at noon, and of all Lawnsville the Thanksgiving dinner served in the Gothic cottage was the most enjoyable. At an early hour the poet accosted Walter over the fence.

"I have been meditating on my tragedy of the Dangerous Classes. I shall make your wife the heroine—a splendid creature with creamy skin and stately throat. There must be crime to enhance the light effects, you know. The stronger slays you, or the heroine falls in defense of her home."

The poet blew a cloud of smoke from his lips, and watched it dissolve in mist-air.

The restored family plate adorned the table, and Pamela's eyes sparkled when they reverted to the treasure. Two notable results became manifest; the front door of the Gothic cottage is always kept locked, and Walter never attempts be enforce marital authority.

A BITTER TRUTH.

There are more foes on earnestly bright
And fell at witching grace that with delight
All eyes upon them dwell—faces that make
Man mad with love, woes for whose fair sake
Heedless would gladly die—yet those who own
This wealth of loveliness have hearts of stone,
Their beauty being like the light that lies
On palm seas and shines in polar skies—
Light that the never-melting sun bestows
With many proud gleams and rainbow glows,
But with no warmth. And on the splendor there
Is cold as death, and cruel as despair.

MARGARET EYTINGE.

THANKSGIVING TURKEYS: ARE THEY GRATEFUL TO US?

"I HAVE been thinking," said I to my friend, as we sat on metal over our post prandial cigar, "over what you were saying yesterday about the dogs in Mexico and the wickedness of demonstrating animals generally. And though I agree with you on the broad principle, I don't think that one ought to forget the other side of the question, or overlook the elevating influences which man undoubtedly exercises over the lower animals. The world's history abounds with proofs of the beneficent services which man confers upon beasts and birds."

"Such as, for instance, at Thanksgiving and Christmas time, I suppose," replied he, with a smile.

"Well," I said, "and who can dispute the very excellent effects of Thanksgiving and Christmas on the beasts of the field and the fowls of the farmyard? Will you deny that our dinners on those occasions fulfill a great moral purpose—that they bring on honorable ambition within a reasonable distance of every turkey, and point the fat on to the chine? Be it fowl or beast, the reward in this life, if it does its duty and fattens properly and industriously, is ease and peace, and after death there is honor of men, and gratitude, and immortality."

"But you can not pretend," said he, "that fat poultry and plain cattle look forward with any satisfaction either be Thanksgiving or Christmas?"

"No," I replied, "I do not pretend they do, for poultry and cattle never look forward at all. They live in the present, fortunately for them, or their anticipations would be of a rather solemn kind, and their emotions very mixed."

"But the turkey cares very little, I fancy," said he, "whether it has cranberry sauce served with it or not, and it does not much matter to the dead beef whether he is tender eating or tough."

"Very possibly," I answered. "Yet why should they not, all the same, pride themselves upon the honors of consumption on a public festival day? It is not every turkey chick that pips its shell that lives so long or so well as these we eat at Thanksgiving and Christmas, and sir they not owe the comfort of months and their good feeling to the simple fact that they were destined to be cooked on those days? Which is better for a goose, that it should have waddled out a short and ignominious existence in a country farm-yard, and then suddenly one day have been killed and devoured by some pronunceanable feeding villagers, or that it should have its months of life prolonged, be carefully fed and tended all the while, and ultimately be cooked with appreciative skill at Christmas-time, and consumed with honor? Give the cattle their choice, and which would they prefer, the existence that leads only to some suburban meat stall in the fly-blown months of summer, or that which, lettering on special feeds, and enjoying the pleasures of careful attention and ample repose, is crowned with Thanksgiving honors, and concludes in the universal respect of men and women?"

"I don't think, though," interrupted me friend, "that the bird and beasts have learned to reason in the fashion about being eaten."

"Perhaps not," I replied. "But the ourients believed that the oxen dedicated to sacrifice walked to the altar with a prouder step than when they went to the pastures. The garlands round their necks and the ribbons on their horns made them, it was said, conscious of some special dignity about the occasion, and so they went to their death, on Queen Elizabeth danced, 'high and commendly.' And perhaps the old Greeks and Romans were right, and that our American turkeys are grand to being reserved for November, preferring the sacrificial honors of Thanksgiving to the undistinguished fate of other months."

"At all events, let us hope it is so."

"Yes, for I can not help thinking it must be better, moreover, for bullocks and turkeys to be here that they are being for a final day of probation, and to have set before them the high standard of Christmas excellence, that they may try and live up to it. The pig that lies in his pen, doing his duty with all his might, standing, as to speak, for the gold medal, and conscientiously doing his best to get as fat as possible in as short a time as possible, is in no way an inspiriting spectacle. There is a nobility in the effort with which men and women ought to sympathize. It should grace them up to their own labors in life. A turkey, in the same way, cramming or being crammed for the Christmas examination, presents itself to the well-regulated mind as an admirable example of hard work honestly undergone, and when eventually we see the same pig selling for so many cents the pound higher than any other pig in the market, we are glad to see that solid worth has met with no due reward. Whether pigs understand that, and exhibit such heartiness of co-operation in the process of fattening, from a high moral sense of duty and loyalty, is a question which they alone can answer, but, in the mean time, it is our privilege to extend to them the benefit of the doubt. In our own supposing that it isn't so, and that the chosen hog only gets fat because he likes eating, there still remains the argument in favor of Thanksgiving and Christmas that his life is lengthened and made comfortable by the process of fattening, and in most length of life one of the blessings we Christians regularly pray for? Had it not been for the festive 29th, the turkey might have been nipped in the bud months ago. There is had young companions every bit as good as itself, and where are they? For them, the playmates of the Thanksgiving turkey's sporting childhood, no honors were reserved, and no one can remember exactly when they were eaten, or who ate them. They died unwept, unhonored, and unsung. Such, however is not the case with the [illegible] of [illegible] fowl that [illegible] life of [illegible] and at [illegible] they [illegible] [illegible] to admiration to the [illegible] after death live in the pious memory of those who had the good fortune to eat them."

"Ah, well—de mortuis nil nisi bonum."

"Which, I suppose," said I, "means, 'it may be said of the dead that they were nothing if not good.'"

WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL.

THE fourth day of December, 1783, witnessed a memorable scene in Fraunces' Tavern, on the corner of Pearl and Broad streets, in the city of New York. Washington was to take leave of the officers with whom a few days before he had made his triumphal entry into the city which had been the head-quarters of the British during nearly the whole period of the Revolutionary war. His comrades in arms awaited him in one of the large rooms of the tavern. They were silent, their hearts beating quick with suppressed emotion. Their beloved General entered the room with a firm step, on was his wont, but with flushed cheek and swimming eye. A man of action and of few words, he looked for a moment into the faces of the men with whom he had fought and won the great battle for liberty and independence, and then, in a voice trembling with emotion, he uttered these simple words:

"With a heart full of love and gratitude, I now take leave of you. I most devoutly wish that your latter days may be as prosperous and happy as your former ones have been glorious and honorable. I can not come be each of you to bid him farewell, but shall be obliged if each of you will come and take me by the hand."

Tears blinded the eyes of the hero, his voice failed him, and he could say no more. An overpowering, manly grief prevented reply on the part of his officers. One by one they advanced, and in silence took him by the hand. Not a word was said. When the last man had pressed his hand, Washington turned away, with tears streaming from his eyes, and left the room.

Frans Fraunces' Tavern Washington repaired to Whitehall Ferry later in the day, attended by many of his officers, and followed by throngs of citizens, and thence was rowed across the river to what is now Jersey City. There was no ceremony in this affecting leave-taking. It was simple and soldier-like, befitting the character of the men who in a long and heroic struggle had won freedom for their native land.

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

An English artist who came be America in the interests of one of the illustrated papers of London fell in with bad company in the course of his stay in Chicago. In the morning he had neither money nor any other valuables, but he remembered the faces of those who had been his companions. So he made portraits of them from memory, and took the pictures to the police, who arrested three of the "originals."

Some recent experiments of the veteran aeronauts the brothers Tissandier, made near Paris, seem to have been more satisfactory than any others that have ever been made in the way of aerial navigation. The balloon consisted of a cigar-shaped envelope, from which a luminous car was suspended. It carried an electric motor, which moved a propeller, and could run for three hours without being replenished. A London engineering journal says that the aeronauts ascended be a height of five hundred meters, where they found the wind blowing at the rate of three metres a second, and "proved that they could manipulate and breast the wind, as well as steer the balloon to it."

At one of the weekly meetings of the Reformed pastors—why should these men of not unusually mincing names designate themselves collectively be such a misleading word?—a paper was read on "The Difficulty of Reaching a Tenement House with the Gospel," and that topic was discussed at considerable length. It is undoubtedly true that the difficulty complained of is real. So is the difficulty of reaching a tenement-house mash soup. The first named difficulty is largely an outgrowth of the second, and no better mask could be carried on among the poor of New York than that which could be prescented be all lovers of manhood working together to give the toilers of this city homes in which cleanliness would be possible.

In a speech in England, a short time since, M. De Lesseps said that he had received from the engineers of the Panama Canal assurances that the waterway could be opened within five years. Not even in the fervor of the occasion did he believe the value which be placed on those assurances. Five years is a brief period for doing the work that has been laid out.

Walking fat walking's sake is said to be very fashionable in Washington these days. Pennsylvania Avenue, says a writer, is crowded every afternoon when the sky is bright. The usual autumnal influx of "bridal couples"—stretched expression—has been large, and so fashionable has it been to roam the avenues that those contented ones have been compelled be turn out and walk too, under penalty of being looked upon as "spoon" if they refused.

There is a little French restaurant in a downtown basement where many of the more youthful workers on the morning press take their dinners. Between six and eight o'clock in the evening there was usually be found at one of the tables some forty of young journalists whose conversation has to do with the opera and the theatres and matinées, and consists chiefly of criticisms of the leading singers and actors, and of the methods of operatic and theatrical managers. A stranger might think that he was dining in the presence of the brilliant and powerful fellows who be by a scratch of the pen makes or unmake the reputations of those who claim a share of the honors of the stage. But his delusion would disappear when the loudly talking young men, after having figured their expenses, confided to one another the nature of their tasks for the evening. It would then appear that they were not all about to partake themselves be opera-houses and theatres, but that one must be investigate the circumstances of a suicide in a lodging-house, another be give an account of some ward politician's clean-up till he should [illegible] and be interviewed, a third be make the round of the East Side police stations, and the other member of the party be perform some similar errand. When the strangers become better acquainted with the faces met there be would recognize among the men of more quiet demeanor some of the old and trustworthy workers in newspaper fields, whom long experience had made less bathe.

Lieutenant Governor Ames and Governor Butler, of Massachusetts were riding in the western part of the state—on the short seat—the Governor on the back seat of the carriage, and the Lieutenant-Governor facing him.

"Ames," said General Butler, after some moments of deep thought, "they are you now like the Democratic party?"

Mr. Ames promptly gave it up, as become a Lieutenant-Governor and a man riding backward, when puzzled with a conundrum by a Governor and a man riding forward.

"Because," said the Governor, "you can't see anything till you have passed it."

The first railway in Spain was laid in 1848. It was fifteen and a half miles in length. In the next ten years the railway system of the country grew just one mile and a half. Something has been added to it in every succeeding year, until there are now about six thousand miles of railway in Spain.

A writer in a San Francisco paper describes a "bee cave" which he claims be have seen in the mountains north of San Bernardino, California. He writes that in the side of a perpendicular cliff is an opening large enough in admit a man standing upright, which widens on it goes back into the mountain. How far it extends back no one knows. It has been in the possession of the bees during many years, for great sheets of honeycomb, blackened by age hang from its roof and sides. Continuous streams of bees are pouring in and out. An enterprising settler has found out up the mouth of the cave, leaving a grated opening for the bees, and when he wants some honey he puts on a wire mask, goes in, and cuts down as much comb as he desires.

According to a Russian statistician, whose name seems to be Xarces Jarmenchi-Gurechkoff, the people of the world from the time of Noah tell the date of Christopher Columbus took from the earth gold and silver of the value of about nineteen hundred million dollars. Mr. Gurechkoff does not tell where he got the figures as to the pan outs of Solomon's Argonauts in the land of Ophir.

A still shorter and than calling it be the number of the methods has been found for designating the standard time of each of the five divisions between ocean and ocean. Instead of "seconds for time," the standard in time thrown is to be called "red time." It came about in this way: On the map prepared by Mr. Allen, showing the advantages of the new system, the several divisions of territory were on different colors, beginning with brown for the Eastern provinces, and following on toward the West with red, blue, green, and yellow in the order named. Thus we have red time for New York and yellow time for San Francisco. It is a good illustration of the wonderful importance of the railroads in this country that railway time has taken the place of local time, even where the difference was half an hour. It has been decided that operations in the Federal buildings throughout the republic must be timed according to the meridian of the place, for the reason that only Congress can change the government's method of timing its doings; but it has already been shown that the railway mail service of the Post-office Department must be conducted by railway time, and an exceptional order recognizing the necessity has gone forth

ENGAGED.

And so I'm fairly engaged at last;
In the meshes of Cupid's net held fast!
I can't forget it, for, turn where I may,
The ring on my finger seems to say,
With its glitter and flash: "You're no longer your own;
And you'd better let flirting and folly alone."

Now, Belle, do help me a bit, there's a dear,
To empty this drawer full of relics here—
Trophies of last year's "season," you see,
When I had the jolliest times at B——,
And no more dreamed than the man in the moon
That Fred and I would—ahem!—so soon

He followed me round, as the others did,
As though I were "put up for the highest bid":
And to tell the truth, in learning the art
Of flirting, one injures a trifle the heart.
And I—well, here is a photograph
Of—surely you've seen him. Now pray don't laugh.

A pair of gloves and some faded flowers,
Relics of sweet last summer's hours
A broken fan—oh, Willie broke that.
I broke his heart, he said; tit for tat!
And here's a button; I think it came
From the uniform of young What's-his-name.

These gloves?—well, throw them away. I once
Them riding with Clark three times or more.
Of course I know it is only right
That I should forever put out of sight
These nice old relics, since never more
Can I live the same old jolly times o'er.

But, Belle, my dear, now, honest and true,
If I had this "engagement" over to do,
I think—I think—between you and I,
If Fred didn't mind, I really would try,
For the sake of one more summer of fun,
To postpone the engagement till summer were done!

AMERICAN BODIES.

Recent years have seen great changes in the out-door life of our youth. The ball-player of 1863 would be a tyro now. He would be bothered enough when he found that instead of knocking the ball anywhere, it must fall within a comparatively narrow angle or be "foul." The foot-ball player would be lost in the maze of technicality of the present Rugby game, and could not define a "touch-down" or a "punt-about" were he paid roundly for it. A university oarsman of that day would be all of twenty-five pounds too light for a place in the eight to-day. The influence of Tom Brown on American sports by land and water has been greater, perhaps, than that of any other Englishman. Had he introduced us to hare and hounds alone, we might well thank him, for a better sport for most American youth could hardly be devised. But the pupil has been apt, and England must come to this side to-day to learn to scull, to row, or to box. Whom has she ready to match against Hanlan, the Ward brothers, or Sullivan in their respective lines?

And the years which have seen these changes have been wholesome ones. Athletic matters have nearly found their level. It is doubtful if we ever again see the thir[illegible] almost, the many hundred [illegible] at a single field meeting, and the whole nation watching the score of a go-as-you-please foot-race. Records have been steadily cut down, crack performances in all the recognized events have been so accurately gauged, and the distance which [illegible] or throw ball or hammer, has been so often measured, that twenty years more can hardly better the score much in any of these lines. And instead of making them mere pastime, men have trained for them at large expense and with great care, and have given them their [illegible] time and thought, for money, until a great professional oarsman, ball-player, wrestler, boxer, or pedestrian makes a larger income than almost any college president in the land.

But this reaching fine performance in these many lines of manly sport has not been without its lessons. Now that shells and canoes are housed, and foot-ball is at present king, look at the youth who, this week, on a thousand fields, are struggling for the mastery, willing almost to lay down their lives if only their side may win the goal, and what do we see? The ones who most need vigorous out-door work, do they compose these rival teams? By no means. It is the pick and flower of the whole school, the heroes of a hundred fights, to whom are intrusted the fair name of Michigan or Wesleyan, Columbia, Princeton, or Yale. Look through that little observation window, a foot and a half square, of the crew-room at the Hemenway Gymnasium at Harvard at five o'clock this afternoon, and the eight massive fellows [illegible]ing back and forth there with clock-like precision under the sharp yells of their coach, hoping again, seven long months hence, to show Yale the stern of their boat, look as if bodily exercise was the last thing they needed. But the pale spectacled student in the great hall [illegible] for [illegible]—for eight men out of fourteen [illegible] leaves quite a perceptible majority. Have we yet managed to provide for the bodily education of most of our youth at all? Left to be their own tutors, the [illegible] the strong have shone in the sports, [illegible] is crowded [illegible] who, far [illegible] than they, [illegible] them sound, hale bodies.

[illegible] the student only in this neglect confined; [illegible] of our educational advan[illegible] hundred to-day gets in this country a collegiate education. Stand this evening at the door of any factory of all the mighty chain which, beginning in New York city, stretches on up the Sound, up the Connecticut Valley, through central Massachusetts, and on up the Merrimac, and see the hundreds of thousands of men and women starting for their homes. How many of them are erect of carriage? How many more with strength and ease? What proportion of them are thoroughly deep-chested and well made, not in parts of the body, but in all the body, and in every limb? Not one in a score. The parts their ten hours of labor call into play are strong and useful, and the rest small and neglected. Most clerks and salesmen are still worse off. Even on the farm, with all its grand vigor and freedom, the same thing stands out. The parts used get strong. The rest do not. Many wondered in the war why farmers could not walk. But what farmer ever walks? If it is a single mile, or even half a mile, to the mill, or store, or station, he must hitch up. Most farmers never walked twenty miles in one day, and probably never will. But many postmen do it every day, and up and down a thousand stairs besides.

England has taught us many lessons in the use and development of our bodies. But the day she will so impress on every in-door man and woman in this country the almost priceless value of the vigorous constitutional, so common among the well-to-do on her own busy island, that every one shall, as do Emerson and Bancroft at eighty, make as sure of their hour or more of sharp exercise daily as they do of their breakfasts, she will increase the working capacity of our countrymen to an extent that they will never, till they make actual trial of it, believe.

William Blaikie.

"THE HALF-REASONING BEAVER."

It is an American humorist who says that one of the first and holiest passions of man is that of making mud pies. He goes on to say that it is also one of his latest. He begins as a child by messing about on the ground, and when he grows up concentrates his hopes and his ambitions on possessing a piece of that same ground as his own.

In this the beaver approaches somewhat in character to man. It never grows out of this weakness for dabbling in mud. Half its life is spent in making it into little heaps and patting them down smooth with its tail. Its tail was evidently designed for this purpose, or, if not, it is a wonderful example of development on the Darwinian theory. It would be difficult for beavers to buy such tails ready made; they have to grow them. For they can never lie about mussing, are flat below and rounded above, heavy yet conveniently weighted; something like a good fives bat, with all the wood in the right place, and springy in the handle. One judicious flap with a beaver's tail will settle as much mortar as an average mason would spread with his trowel in a morning—if working by the hour. Yet this does not make them proud. They are too matter of fact to be vain. Though they are double-barrelled, as it were—a carpenter at one end and a mason at the other, they are always as diligent as an apprentice in his first week, and as intelligent. Nothing puts them out. If they want a log of wood they go out on a family party [illegible] have [illegible] the woo[illegible] teeth, with an [illegible] the [illegible] And when they [illegible] get out of the way. In this they are more sagacious than monkeys and some men. For there is no instance on record of a beaver ever having had a tree fall upon hi[m].

Man for his [illegible] wants and fancie[s] has [illegible] everything that [illegible] more or less [illegible] to all his [illegible] It is hard for the innocent old hippopotamus wallowing in the Zambesi to be shot for food by Portuguese travellers, as it is for the [illegible] to be [illegible]ted to furnish our tables [illegible] in aspic. Like the carpenter in Wonderland, we greatly sympathize with oysters, but nevertheless we sort out those of the largest size.

Yet none of our victims, furred or feathered, deserves, perhaps, more sincere commi[seration] than those sturdy, indefat[igable] little workers, the beavers. They a[re] fast [be]ing exterminated, as many as two hundred thousand skins coming in a season into the market, and, moreover, continual trapping makes them so shy that they are leaving waters which they lately haunted, and beginning to congregate more than they did in particular spots, thus facilitating further slaughter. There are few Hiawathas nowadays in beaver-land to make friends with the soft-furred creatures and befriend them. They carry their death warrant on their backs, and it is as much as their lives are worth to leave the imprints of their feet or tails upon the muddy river-banks. A quick-eyed trapper marks the tell-tale impression, and next day sets the strong-jawed trap, cunningly baiting the spot with some strong-scented "beaver medicine"—cloves or fennel seed, cassia, anise-seed, thyme, asafœtida, or any other drug of pungent and lasting odor—so that the passing beaver, tempted by the scent, may turn from the water to investigate the cause of the sudden fragrance, and, sniffing about too curiously, may spring the trigger-plate of the concealed [illegible] and find itself a captive in [illegible]. When [illegible] the [illegible] of that Spartan heroism which fable has attributed to other animals, and gnaws off the entrapped limb, so that when the fur hunter goes round in the morning, on average of one beaver in every three that has been caught is considered a fair take. Many of us—those, for instance, who look at the small hut-builders only from our own (the human) side of nature—regard this courageous trait only as it affects the fur trade; but when we think of it from the beaver's side, and picture to ourselves the number of those busy folk that go about their work maimed and crippled from the trap, there is a curious pathos in the silent, uncomplaining life of the little moralists of the Western stream.

If a harmless, secluded, and busy life could suffice to secure safety, the beaver should certainly be secure; for who could kill the small builder that passes its life in sawing up logs on the banks of unfrequented streams, in laboriously piling them together into wigwams for the family use, and laying up stores of bark and edible twigs? Left alone with its skin on a well-wooded river side, the beaver would have annoyed no one, indulging in mud pies to its heart's content, and keeping its teeth sharp by constant filing. Its skin, however, is an unpardonable offense in the trapper's eyes, and it is hunted down, therefore, as if it were a criminal, simply because it lives inside its own fur. The wolf that desolates the sheep-fold and carries off children has comparatively a larger measure of immunity than the innocent beaver, for no one can forgive it for having such a fur. In fables we are told that the castor, when pursued for the sake of its scent pouch, bites off the perilous possession, and thus saves its life.

Another step in courage is all that is needed, for if the beaver would only flay itself, and consent to go about skinless, trappers would leave it in perpetual peace. They might saw up all the cottonwood on the continent into any lengths they chose without a word of molestation, and build up for themselves with the fragments towers that would reach to the clouds, if they pleased.

Yet, after all, it seems a heavy price to pay for immunity that one should go without his skin, and almost beneath the dignity of humanity to exact it. The world has indeed come to a pretty pass if man will let these harmless little river-folk alone only on condition that they shall peel off their own fur.

Poets make little use of this delightful animal—"the beaver that with patient teeth cuts his timber." It is used now and again as expressive of wild nature, or in Bryant's

> "No tree was felled in all that world of woods > Save by the beaver's tooth";

or of solitude, as in Brainard's

> "The beaver feeds
> Where pensive osiers dip their willowy weeds";

or of remoteness from human habitation, as in Hoffman's

> "Our home shall be by the cool night stream
> Where the beaver chooses her safe retreat"; or to denote the retirement of wild life before the rapid advance of population and civilization in America.

> "But the beaver builds
> No longer by these streams, but far away,
> On waters whose blue surface ne'er gave back
> The white man's face—among Missouri's springs
> And pools whose issues swell the Oregon
> He rears his little Venice."

Once and again, too, as an accident of a trapper's or an Indian's life, the beaver's lodge, or dam, or pelt is mentioned. But there seems to me to be [illegible] in the [illegible] which are altogether [illegible] How [illegible] romance of a stream, [illegible] the poetical past, to be told that there [us]ed to be beavers in it." An English poet [illegible] of the Tivy, writes

> "More famous [illegible] than for the salmon's [illegible]
> [illegible] Tivy was, in her strong banks that bred
> What else no other brooks of Britaine nourished,
> Wh[ich] nature, in the shape of thee now permit to get,
> This [illegible] did seeme t' have ... [illegible]
> Being [illegible] like a beast, with such a [illegible] taile
> As served him for a bridge, a helme, or for a saile."

Drayton's zoology was a little defective, but, after all, it was an improve[ment] upon Spenser's, who includes the "beaver" in his catalogue of hybrid monsters. Darwin speaks of "the half-reasoning beaver," and Campbell, Shelley, Mackay, Oldham, Ben Jonson, and perhaps one or two others, refer to the animal incidentally. But taken altogether, American and English, the beaver strikes me as a conspicuously neglected incident of nature.

"Hiawatha" is, of course, a notable exception, and the poet, tracing the first efforts of the red man to ameliorate his condition by developing the resources of his forests, streams, and prairies, and allegorizing the natural religion of the tribes, accords to the beaver the prominence which belongs to it both in wild nature and in the social economy of the people of the wigwams. It is specially enumerated among the chief gifts of Gitche Manito to his children, among the totems of the tribes, among the prominent allegories of nature. "The lodges of the beaver" are acknowledged as one of the sources of the poem's inspiration, and the secrets of the beaver were one of Hiawatha's attainments in occult knowledge. Kwasind's capture of Ahmeek, the beaver king, is the crowning exploit of "the very strong" man's story; while the storming of the beavers' lodge where Pau-puk-Keewis had taken refuge is the most notable incident of Hiawatha's vengeful pursuit of the demoralizing [illegible]. Furs of beaver [illegible] and ermine in the spoils of the mighty Megissogwon's wigwam, and also in the furniture of Hiawatha's lodge. Dressing the pelt is one of the chief accomplishments of Ojibway women, and the skin is used in the sacred medicine procession of the great Medas, the Wabenos, the magicians, and the Jossakeeds, the prophets.

In the episode of Pau-puk-Keewis as a beaver king the description of the animals is very exact and felicitous. The fugitive from the wrath of Hiawatha has reached the beavers' dam, and begs to be given an asylum.

> "From the bottom rose a beaver,
> Looked with two great eyes of wonder,
> Eyes that seemed to ask a question,
> At the stranger."

But it declines to agree off-hand to Pau-puk-Keewis's request:

> "With reserve he then made answer:
> 'Let me first consult the others,
> Let me ask the other beavers.'
> Down he sank into the water,
> Heavily sank he, as a stone sinks,
> Down among the leaves and branches,
> Brown and matted at the bottom."

After a short interval of sickening suspense for the hunted Pau-puk-Keewis,

> "From the bottom rose the beavers,
> Silently above the surface
> Rose one head, and then another,
> Till the pond seemed full of beavers,
> Full of black and shining faces;"

and, satisfied with their inspection of the stranger, invite him to join them. So

> "Down into the pond among them
> Silently sank Pau-puk-Keewis.
> Black became his shirt of deer-skin,
> Black his moccasins and leggings;
> In a broad black tail behind him
> Spread his fox tails and his fringes:
> He was changed into a beaver ..
> Silently sank Pau-puk-Keewis;
> Found the bottom covered over
> With the trunks of trees and branches,
> Hoards of food against the winter,
> Piles and heaps against the famine;
> Found the lodge, with open doorway
> Leading into spacious chambers."

But he has little leisure to enjoy the kingship which the beavers proceed to bestow upon him, for on a sudden the cry is raised of "The hunters!—Hiawatha, with his hunters!"

> "Then they heard a cry above them,
> Heard a shouting and a tramping,
> Heard a crashing and a rushing,
> And the water round and o'er them
> Sank and sucked away in eddies,
> And they knew their dam was broken.
> On the lodge's roof the hunters
> Leaped and broke it all asunder;
> Streamed the sunshine through the crevice,
> Sprang the beavers through the doorway"— and left poor Pau-puk-Keewis to his fate.

CHAPTER XXIX.

I AM TAKEN TO THE OPERA.

"Blessed," runs the modern adage, "are they that expect little, for they shall not be disappointed;" and doubtless we are all too prone to form an exaggerated estimate of what is due to ourselves and to society at large from the mass of our fellow-creatures. Great injuries—which commonly arise out of great temptations, for which the philosophic mind can make allowance—are comparatively easy to pardon; it is the minor and meaner offenses, such as perhaps our own guardian angel may have been called upon at one time or another to make a note of—it is the shabby little scandals, the ingratitudes, the infidelities, of every-day life, that cause us to cry aloud in our anguish that mankind is corrupt, and altogether become abominable. For my own part, by dint of growing old, and making use of such small powers of observation as I possess, I have, I believe, schooled myself into something not unlike the beatific state of mind above mentioned; but thirty years ago I was, as a matter of course, much more exacting. Human nature did not at that period of my life strike me as being at all a complex affair, and I had little difficulty in dividing mankind roughly into two categories, namely, good fellows and scoundrels. Liars, I need hardly say, were ex officio members of the latter class, and after what had occurred at Richmond I really could not see my way to ex[cusing] Harry from the penalties attaching to the denomin[ation] under which his conduct necessarily brought him. I remembered now with bitterness what my uncle had told me long before about his son's habitual mendacity, and, without stopping to ask why the culprit's past sins had seemed to me so much less heinous than his present one, I anathematized myself for having been such a fool as to think the same fountain could give forth sweet water and bitter.

One thing was certain—I could not attempt to associate with Harry upon the old terms, or to feign ignorance of his duplicity. I f[elt] fully entitled and very much inclined to write him a short note, saying that I had found him out, [but] I should abstain from saying a word that might prejudice him in any on[e's] eyes, but that, since he preferred intrigue [to] plain dealing, he must expect no more aid from me. For J[ulia]'s sake, however, I would not do that, and I [illegible] be out all day, in order to avoid a passing visit from my cousin, and I determined to go down [to] Richmond no a[gain].

It would have [illegible] to tell Lady Constance of the [illegible] that I had made. Not that I should ha[ve illegible] much pity from her, for she would [illegible]

* Begun in H[arper's] Weekly No. [illegible]

both thought and said that I was rightly served; but all my life long I have experienced a necessity for relating my various troubles, immediately after their occurrence, to somebody, and, like most people who own to that kind of weakness, I have seldom lacked patient listeners. It was, however, out of the question that I should take Lady Constance into my confidence in this matter, for Harry had repeatedly and pointedly mentioned her to me of the persons whom he especially desired to keep in the dark as to his identity, and his having been false to me did not, of course, release me from the promises that I had made to him.

For the rest, Lady Constance was far indeed from entertaining any suspicions of the insignificant Chapman, and my beguiling looks, which the very soon noticed, were attributed by her to dissatisfaction with her treatment of me—a form of ingratitude that never failed to provoke her to anger.

"What is it that you want?" she asked, impatiently, one evening when I had been dining with her, and, according to my custom, had overstaid her other guests. "You sit there with a face as long as one of Mr Sotheran's harangues; you won't talk to people and do your duty to society; you make yourself supremely ridiculous, if you only knew it. Do you imagine that you are the only person in the world with whom life goes askew? I myself have anxieties enough and to spare, yet I manage to show a tolerably unconcerned face to my friends."

"You can do a great many things that I can't," I observed.

"Very possibly; I shall not contradict you there. But patience and self-control are virtues within the reach of the humblest capacity, and if you possess neither, it is because you don't choose so be at the pains of acquiring them. How foolish you are not to enjoy the present and make the most of it! The present does not satisfy you? Wait, then."

"How long?" I asked. "Until I see what I am waiting for?"

Lady Constance struck the palm of her hand sharply with her fan. "You are worming the pettishness of a spoiled boy," she exclaimed; "and I detest spoiled boys. You were much pleasanter as Fontenebleau."

Now it an chanced that that was exactly what I was thinking of at the moment, though I didn't like to say so.

"Come!" she said presently, in a more amiable tone, "what shall I do to put you in a good humor? Will you come to the Opera with me?"

"Isn't it rather late?" I objected, looking at my watch, for I infinitely preferred staying where I was.

"Oh no; we shall hear the last two acts of the Puritans, and that is enough in all conscience. Anyhow, I mean to go; you can do as you like about accompanying me."

To be taken to the play against one's will is a small hardship enough, and is submitted to uncomplainingly by a great many people every night of the year; yet at this particular moment I chafed against the tacit command which obliged me to answer mechanically that I should be delighted. Was I to be Lady Constance's bondslave for the rest of my natural life? Would it always be sufficient for her to raise her little finger in order to turn me round it? And in the very improbable event of my ever becoming her husband, would such unconditional submission on my part be calculated to win her respect? I asked myself these questions while she went away to make some change in her dress, and afterward while we drove rapidly through the streets toward Covent Garden. I was not angry with her; for it is evident that if a man chooses to prostrate himself at a woman's feet, she will hardly be able to avoid treading upon him—I was not angry with her; but I was angry with myself for having assumed so unbecoming an attitude, and still more so for being unable to abandon it.

It so chanced that we reached the Opera during an entr'acte, and our entrance into the large and somewhat conspicuously placed box which some one had lent to Lady Constance for the evening consequently aroused no amount of notice which it might not have done a little earlier or later. Independent an Lady Constance was in her habits, and little as she cared about ruffling the prejudices of the British metrom, she seldom chose to place herself in a really compromising position, and to appear at the Opera attended by one young man only was undoubtedly a compromising act, as far as it went. I had not thought of this before; but I realised it fully when I saw that eyes and opera-glasses were being brought to bear upon us from all quarters of the house, and I wondered whether she realised it also. I saw people staring at us and whispering together; I could guess pretty well what they were saying. I knew that for the moment my name was upon the lips of a large proportion of the audience. But, truth to tell, all this neither disconcerted nor displeased me. From what I can remember of my own feelings, and from what I have observed of others, I am inclined to believe that young men generally glory in situations which at a more advanced period of life we learn to regard with holy horror. I had an objection to being spoken of as one whom Lady Constance Milner delighted to honor, it did not strike me that any of those who thus spoke of me would be likely to be laughing to their sleeves. I was conscious, indeed, of an amiable wish that Mr Sotheran might be somewhere among the spectators.

But before the curtain rose again my silly vanity was mortified not in an unexpected fashion. While I was surveying the house languidly, and scrutinizing the various boxes and their occupants, a face came on a sudden within the field of my vision which caused me to lower my glasses and to turn hot and cold all over. Since I was so willing to advertise myself as Lady Constance's favored suitor, it would have been difficult to say why I should have minded Miss Dennison's recognition of me in that character, but I did mind it. I minded it so much that if escape had seemed to me any way practicable I should most certainly have arisen and fled without more ado. As it was, I sat motionless, unable to remove my eyes from hers, and aware that she, for her part, was gazing steadily and somewhat eagerly in my direction. My sight as a young man was remarkably good, and I could distinguish every detail of Maud's features across the intervening space as clearly as if she had been within a few feet of me. I saw that she was looking, not at my companion, but at me. Her lips were slightly parted; her large gray eyes were opened rather widely. I almost fancied that she wished to attract my attention. At last I felt bound to bow, and received a nod in return. Then I glanced at Lady Constance, and perceived that some of this bystplay had been lost upon her.

"You look quite as nervous," she remarked, with something not very far removed from a sneer to her smile. "May I ask whether the young woman on the way is our old friend Dolcinea Dennison?"

The nickname of Dulcinea was inappropriate and offensive, but I thought perhaps I had better not take exception to it. "It is Miss Dennison," I replied, a trifle sullenly.

Lady Constance raised her opera-glasses, adjusted them deliberately, and made a lengthy and careful inspection of Maud, after which she delivered her verdict, without any sort of regard for my feelings. "She is pretty, extremely pretty, in her way. If you still possess any influence with her, though, you should use it to dissuade her from eating with her mouth open—a habit of that kind would be enough to make Venus herself look like a booby. But I believe all the Norfolk rustics have mouths from ear to ear, have they not?"

Now, as I have already hinted, I had been vaguely desirous of picking a quarrel with Lady Constance all the evening, but this really outrageous speech would have roused my ire to any time. "She is not a Norfolk rustic," I retorted, hotly. "Her mouth is simply perfect in shape, as anybody can see; and as for her sitting with it open—well, I must say that you yourself seem more often than any one that I ever saw as heard of."

My rudeness did not provoke Lady Constance, who only laughed slightly. "But I am always careful to conceal my jaws behind my bend," she observed. "Besides, I am not pretty, so it doesn't signify. You have an quite got over your first loss, after all, I see."

"You know very well that that is not true—" I was beginning, but she laid her finger on my arm and stopped me.

"We won't wrangle over it in public, please," she said, still laughing. "Do you know that you are as red as a turkey-cock, and that everybody is staring at you? Very likely Miss Dennison only opened her perfect mouth in horror at the sight of you in your present predicament—which would show what a well-brought-up young woman she must be. She is quite right, I am neither old nor ugly enough to dispense with the safety of numbers, and in my heart I am dreadfully frightened of Mrs Grundy into the bargain. Let us hasten to put a stop to the scandal. Quite down there, in the left hand corner, near the entrance to the stalls, you will see a large bald patch standing out in the shade. It is the whitecoat of Mr Sotheran. Go down and fetch him. We will not have him alone, though, on account of Miss Dennison's mouth and Mrs Grundy's tongue. In other parts of the house you will discover other acquaintances. Tell them all to come up here and talk to me. As for you, you had better go and talk to Miss Dennison."

"Thank you; I think I will," answered I, defiantly; though I had an intention of doing anything of the kind.

I carried out my instructions; I collected the gratified Sotheran and two other men, and then, retiring to the back of the box, gave myself up to disconsolate meditation. I was by way of being offended with Lady Constance, both on account of the ill natured manner in which she had spoken of Maud, and of the readiness she had shown to dispense with my society, but soon I abandoned the pretended grievance, and acknowledged inwardly that it was not with Lady Constance, her sayings or her doings, that I was dissatisfied, but with my own life and with what I had made of it. The four people in front of me were keeping up a brisk interchange of chatter and chaff; even after the curtain rose three of them continued to talk in an under-tone, only Mr Sotheran, who occupied the place which I had vacated, relapsing into serene, radiant silence. None of them took any notice of me, nor did I pay much attention to their proceedings. While they were whispering together, while solo, chorus, and recitative were succeeding one another on the stage, while bouquets were being thrown and hands clapped, I was wandering in spirit far away from all that noise, heat, and glitter, sitting in a pond among the tall reeds of Thirlby Broad; I was standing in the conservatory at the old Rectory, the cold moon shining upon the glass, upon the coloring flowers, and upon a shadowy white figure bent over them. In a melancholy procession the best days of my youth were passing before me, and every now and again I was muttering inaudibly, "Oh, you ass! you unspeakable ass!"

Thus it came to pass that at the end of the act I yielded to an impulse which had been growing upon me for half an hour or more, and, slipping quietly out into the corridor, passed round to the door of the box which was occupied by Maud and her friends. I was at once admitted, and was presently shaking hands with Mrs. Saville—that sister of the Rector's under whose roof Maud's childhood had been spent, and with whom I had a slight acquaintance. I was introduced to her daughter, and the two ladies received me with that modified civility which is all that a young man without definite intentions as definite prospects is entitled to expect; but from Maud herself I met with a much warmer greeting.

"Oh, Charley," she exclaimed, "I am so glad you have come! I was afraid you didn't mean to speak to me, and I was thinking of making a signal to you; only Aunt Charlotte said it wouldn't be proper." Then she bent forward and added, in a lower tone, "I want rather particularly to talk to you about something."

The opportune entrance at this moment of an eligible young gentleman, upon whom Mrs. Saville bestowed a motherly smile of welcome, enabled me to reply that I was all attention. Maud ceded her place to the new-comer, who dropped into it without much protestation, and, withdrawing into the background, beckoned to me to follow her. I asked her whether she was going to stay any time in London, and she answered that she would probably remain a few weeks with her aunt. "But my real reason for coming up now," she added, "was that I hoped to see you. Charley, you must go home at once—at once, mind. Things are going badly there."

I was startled for an instant; but her meaning flashed across me directly. "I know what it is," I said. "Mrs. Farquhar has found Harry, and means to bring him back to Thirlby."

"Yes, that is it; but there is worse than that. I am afraid your uncle is giving way. My father says he is sure of it, and that he hasn't seen Mr. Le Marchant in such low spirits for years. You seem amazed; but I you assure you there is nothing to laugh at. I believe your only chance is to go down and see him immediately, and I came to London to tell you so. You will go, won't you, Charley?" she concluded, persuasively. "You won't be so silly as to rule yourself, when a word or two might set everything straight?"

"It's a fine kind of you to interest yourself about me," said I, "but—"

"What nonsense!" she interrupted. "Of course I interest myself about you, and I hate to be called 'kind' by my friends."

"Very well," I answered, laughing; "then I'll endeavor not to call you 'kind' any more. But don't you see that even if, as you say, I could set things straight by a word or two, I should be bound to hold my tongue? The real truth is that no words will ever move my uncle in one direction or the other; but, anyhow, I have always thought, and still think, that Harry has been unjustly treated, and that he ought to have his own again."

"Perhaps so, but let us at least have fair play. If Mr Le Marchant, after all these years, suddenly discovers that he has done his son an injustice, and determines to have him back again, well and good. But what I do object to is that he should be put in your place because he is supposed to be a steadier fellow than you are."

"I don't know that any one supposes that," said I.

"Of course not; you don't know anything about it. But I know. Mrs Farquhar has done you a great deal more harm than you think. She goes about everywhere saying that you are extravagant and idle, and—and—well, all sorts of disagreeable things that are not true."

"But perhaps they are true," said I.

"I don't believe it," answered Maud, stoutly. "Mrs. Farquhar makes a great deal of a small farm being put up for sale, and Mr. Le Marchant himself tells me father that you had not asked him for a penny, and as for the rest—well, perhaps that is not true either. But even if it were—"

She paused here, and I inquired what further iniquities had been laid to my charge.

"Will you be offended if I tell you?" she asked. "It isn't worth while to repeat little shrewish speeches and hints, the sum and substance of it all is that Mrs Farquhar suspects you of wanting to marry somebody who will eat up the property."

This was a subject upon which I was not disposed to enter. "I can't make out about my uncle's wanting to part with land," I said, "it is very unlike him so do that. Do you know which farm it is that he means to dispose of?"

"Brigham, I believe. It is your land, you know; but the Wellys have always had a bank crring after it because it jots into their property, and my father says Sir Digby will give more for it than it is worth. At all events, Mrs Farquhar was not telling the truth to saying that Mr Le Marchant needed the money to pay your debts."

"No; she certainly was not," I agreed; "but if it amuses her to tell lies, she's welcome: it doesn't hurt me. Mr George!" I exclaimed, in a sudden access of disgust with the entire human race, "I believe everybody tells lies except you and me and Uncle Bernard!"

"Won't you even make an exception in favor of Lady Constance Milner?" asked Maud, with a slightly malicious smile. "Is that Lady Constance in the box opposite?"

I answered gloomily that it was.

"She is distinguished-looking," observed Maud; "and she seems so have plenty to say for herself. Tell me, Charley, is it really true that you want to marry her?"

"Down at Hailsham you laughed at the idea of my doing such a thing," I remarked.

"Did I? Well, I am not laughing now; and I want very much to know whether you are in earnest about her."

"Oh, I suppose so," I answered, in a sort of despair. "I don't know. Sometimes I think I am, and sometimes I think I am not. However, she won't marry me now that Harry is to have Thirlby; so it doesn't matter."

Maud frowned thoughtfully. "She one not very well marry you if she is badly off, and if you have only a few hundreds a year. But if you are in earnest—and I think you must be—you ought, for her sake, to stand up for yourself."

"Dear me!" I exclaimed, irritably, "you are very anxious to am me married to her! Luckily, I am not in a position so yield to temptation. If my uncle has decided to forgive Harry, it is not because of anything that Mrs Farquhar has said against me. I am as certain of that as I am of my own existence. I don't think that there you be any harm in my telling you now that I met Harry a long time ago, and that I have been doing my best ever since to smooth the way for his return."

Maud looked completely puzzled, and confessed that she was so. "I am convinced that Mr Le Marchant is displeased with you," she said at last, "and my father thinks the same thing. Tell me about this young man. What do you think of him?"

"He isn't a young man any longer," I answered. "Honestly speaking, I don't think much of him. At first I liked him, but he sold me a very shabby sort of lie the other day, and I can't get over it. I shall be him glad his own hand now. Of course I shall not stand to his way, but I don't mean to help him again. To be sure, I couldn't help him much if I would."

Maud was about to make some rejoinder; but the rising of the curtain and the departure of the eligible youth put a stop to confidential intercourse, and she only managed to say, as I was bidding her good-night, "You will go to Thirlby, won't you?"

"I won't promise," answered I. "As far as I can see at present, my going there would do no earthly good."

Then I returned to Lady Constance's box in a less sentimental hue am much more cheerful frame of mind than that to which I had quitted it. At the conclusion of the performance Mr Sotheran was kind enough so congratulate me, in a loud, sonorous voice, upon my good fortune so having been accorded so lengths an interview by the beautiful girl opposite. "We all saw you," said he. "A very charming young lady, upon my word! Mat I venture so ask her name?"

Lady Constance answered for me. "That young lady," she said, laughing, "is a Miss Dennison, an old flame of Mr Maxwell's. They broke a serpence together in their childhood, and when he left his happy home she gave him a "hocco-Lox marked with his name, or some other token of her regard. And she has never been false, she declares—whatever he may have been during his wanderings. Don't look so angry, Mr Maxwell; there are all envying you, especially Mr Sotheran, who is innocent of having broken any sixpences or hearts in his life."

So we made our way down the staircase; but when I was handing Lady Constance into her brougham she turned upon me all of a sudden with a cold look of contempt. "After all," said she, "you are not worth much."

She was gone before I had time to ask her what she meant; and I walked away westward, wondering whether it was possible that she could be jealous of Maud.

CHAPTER XXX

I RECEIVE ADVICE FROM HARRY AND MR. SOTHERAN.

It falls so the lot of most men, at one time or another of their lives, to be compelled to look through the papers of a deceased friend or relative, and many people, if one may judge by their subsequent oracular utterances and shakings of the head, do not find this task a bodily distasteful one. It is age, no doubt, to lend to highly interesting discoveries, so throw broad and unexpected lights upon the character of the defunct, and so add something to the searcher's stock of knowledge and wisdom. Nevertheless, the act of prying into the private letters of a dead man might mem, if it did not come under the head of a duty, to be not very far removed from the quaintessence of rasmmess, and therefore, be we hope, there will always be a certain number of honest folks in the world who, after performing it, will go about for some days with shamed faces and depressed spirits. Perhaps, upon the whole, it is more charitable to prevent the risk of honest persons being put to shame by destroying all letters of a strictly private nature while one is still in a position so destroy them, and, for my own part, I have always endeavored to act upon this principle. When I die, my heirs, executors, and assigns will not find themselves overburdened with manuscript. In the dispatch-box which stands upon my writing table they will discover my will, a few other documents of importance, and only a single packet of letters, every one of which they are heartily welcome to peruse, and will, indeed, be all the better for perusing.

These letters are written in a clear, cramped writing—the writing of a student accustomed to making marginal notes. The hand that traced the crabbed characters has turned to dust, the paper is yellow with age; the ink has faded so a pale brown hue; the subject-matter relates to events which, for the most part, have long since passed into the category of forgotten things. Yet it still happens to me, every now and again, to read them over, and one of them (dated Thirlby, 10th July, 1854) lies before me now. In it I am informed that my uncle, having been told of Harry's marriage and Jessie's birth, and having seen attested copies of the marriage and baptismal certificates, has felt bound at last to the whole family to pay him a visit. "After all that I have said to you at different times," the writer proceeds, "you will really understand that I have made no yet surrendered myself in any way as to the ultimate disposal of my property, nor shall I do so in haste. At the same time I want you to clearly understand that your chance of [illegible] ing me here has been changed by events [illegible] a very good as a very indifferent [illegible] I am sore to [illegible] from [illegible] has [illegible] [illegible] Jessie, but I hope [illegible] [illegible] to hear [illegible] freedom."

"LADY CONSTANCE ANSWERED FOR ME. 'THAT YOUNG LADY,' SHE SAID, LAUGHING, 'IS A MISS DENNISON, AN OLD FLAME OF MR. MAXWELL'S."

And then, after many kind words and some sensible advice, he goes on: "One thing you ought certainly to know, namely, the amount of income that you may henceforth expect; and as to that, I can't say that, during my life, you will always have a thousand a year (including the interest of your own money). After I die there will be a little more, but not very much. I am afraid, for I think I am bound to hand over the estate to my successor as I received it."

My uncle was evidently very sorry for me; but for myself I had no regrets. For some weeks past I had felt convinced that Harry's restoration was only a question of time, and it was a relief to have done with suspense and mystery. Of my own prospects I preferred, for the moment, not to think. I pushed the consideration of them into a pigeon-hole of my mind, only remarking to myself that they were no worse than I had expected them to be. At that time I hardly knew whether a thousand a year was a large or a small income for a bachelor, though I could not but be aware that would be ridiculously inadequate to the requirements of Lady Constance Milner's husband.

My cousin had behaved so badly to me that I felt under no obligation to congratulate him upon the change in his fortunes; nevertheless, on the day succeeding that of my meeting with Maud at the Opera, I could not resist taking the train for Richmond. In this I was actuated, I own, chiefly by curiosity. I wanted to see what Harry would do when confronted with a direct accusation of double-dealing, added to which, I was anxious to hear any account that Pauline might have to give of her share in the discreditable business.

Jimmy, who was swinging on the garden gate descried me from afar, and came tearing down toward me with extravagant demonstrations of joy. "Oh, Cousin Charley!" he exclaimed, "have you heard? We're all going down to mourn to that place where you live, and we're to take [illegible] always, if it is good, father says, with the [illegible] Have a meal of it. Who don't eat it [illegible]

I answered that I hoped to join the party later.

"I say," Jimmy went on, turning his sharp little face up to mine, "do you think the old buffer will let us stop

"I hope so," I replied, "if you will behave [illegible] old buffer. If I were you. He is your grandfather, you know."

"So he is," said Jimmy with a delighted chuckle. "What a rum start! I should think he's sure to like father and [illegible] but another chucks a glass of water in his face, or something, we may get up rough, don't you see."

"I dare say she won't do that," I remarked.

Jimmy shook his head knowledgeably. "I wouldn't answer for her," said he, "she's been precious queer all day—laughing and crying, you know, the way she always does before she pitches into one of us. I tell you what I wish she'd stop here and let father and me go without her!"

I thought to myself that Jimmy was, perhaps, not the only person who entertained that amiable wish, but I made no reply. As we approached the cottage, Harry came slowly down the path to meet us. He looked a little nervous, and seemed anxious to avoid my eye, but it was in his ordinary calm voice that he said:

"I'm glad you thought of coming down this afternoon. We are off to-morrow, as I suppose you have heard. Now, Jimmy, make yourself scarce, your cousin and I are going to have some private conversation." When the boy was gone, he added, "I am afraid you are not best pleased."

"I am not pleased at having been humbugged," answered I, [illegible] are why I should silence inquirers. "I think it [illegible] right that I should go to Thirlby you know that well enough."

Harry sighed. "The experiment is not likely to prove [illegible] he said; "but I am bound to make it, I suppose. You are annoyed, I fancy, because I didn't tell you that my grandmother had been here the other day, but really I couldn't help that."

"Why, you told me in so many words that she had not been here!" I exclaimed, indignantly.

"That comes to pretty much the same thing, doesn't it? What could I do when you put the question to me? The old lady had made me promise that I wouldn't let anybody know we had seen her."

"I don't think you ought to have said what you did, all the same," returned I. "If you'd not committed yourself with simply denying the fact, you spoke in such a way that it was impossible to disbelieve you."

"But as there any particular merit in telling a clumsy lie?" asked Harry, mildly. "If you say that all lies are wicked, I understand you; but as the only conceivable object of lying is to deceive, it seems to me that one may as well do the thing artistically a little once in about it."

"Well," I said, "I give you every credit for being a first class artist. I shouldn't much care to travel in that particular branch of art myself; but there's no accounting for tastes. The stumbling-block to being so very clever is that when a man finds that you have taken him in once, he is apt to suspect you of having taken him in before."

Harry made a quick sidelong glance at me, but said nothing.

"You tell me," I continued, "that Mrs Farquhar did not wish you to mention her having been in your house, and that is all very well. But what made her come to your house? I have an idea—and if I am wrong, you have only yourself to blame for it—that you have been privately scheming to make your way back to Thirlby all the time that you have been protesting to me that you did not want ever to see the place again. I tell you this because I may not have another opportunity, and because I should like you to understand that I am not an absolute fool, though I may be [illegible]

Harry [illegible] had goaded me into saying what I had [illegible] but I became furious when he replied quietly:

"You are taking a little out of the prospect of being a fine estate. What, all, it would be strange if you were not.

Thank you for the [illegible] I, in great wrath. "That is [illegible] after all that I have said and done to prove [illegible] I suppose you can't understand how a gentleman feels about such things."

"By all means," said Harry, "but I must be agreed that I am incapable of entering into a gentleman's feelings. Nevertheless, I didn't ask Mrs Farquhar to [illegible] here, and I didn't want her to come. I suppose I think that the slight of Pauline would be quite enough to [illegible] on account of disgust with which my father has inspired me for so many years, and therefore, if I had been scheming against you, the very last thing that I should have wished to make known would have been my marriage. The old lady had my address, and she chose to make a descent upon Richmond without giving me a hint of her intentions. If you don't believe me, ask her."

I did not know what to think. I had lost faith in Harry, yet it was difficult to doubt that he was speaking the truth in this particular instance. "Perhaps I ought to apologize," I began at last, rather reluctantly.

"Pray don't think of doing that," he interrupted, with a short laugh, "nobody is bound to apologize to me under any circumstances. The only wonder is that you should have trusted me so long as you have done. But I tell you candidly that your present indignation seems to me positively ridiculous. Why should I have wished to conceal from you that my grandmother had been here? She asked me to keep it dark, and I made no difficulty about obliging her. As far as I understand you, you would have done the [illegible] thing; only you would have quieted your conscience by doing it so badly that you would have been detected at once."

I was puzzled, and ingenuously confessed as much, whereat Harry laughed again.

"I know you are," he said; "you think there is some dark plot on foot. Let me tell you the truth: you can believe me or not, as you please. Mrs Farquhar has thrown you overboard, not out of any love for me, but because she has taken a scare about you. She is a pusillanimous old creature, and some one has told her that you are developing into a speculator. Besides which, she heard that it was quite upon the cards that you might marry an extravagant woman. Immediately it occurred to her that even I, bad as I am, might be less likely to ruin the estate than Lady Constance Milner, and she dashed up here post haste to tell me so. She was so much in earnest that she accepted Pauline without making many wry faces, and crept over Jimmy. All this would probably have led to nothing, but when my father heard that I had a son, he found out that it was his duty to try and make friends with me, and he has sent for me accordingly. What did you expect to remain to be seen. If you ask me, I expect that it will lead to the whole lot of us being kicked out of the house at the end of a week."

By this time I was a little ashamed of myself. I held out my hand to Harry, who said, "Do you accept me of pleading and pleading, then?"

"Yes," I answered, "I do. The fact of the matter is, Harry, that you and I have different ways of looking at things, and I confess that I was a little staggered by your—your—"

"By my readiness of resource, let us say. Now I do wonder whether I shall put you in a rage if I repeat the question that I started with! Anyhow, I'll risk it. Are you feeling at all sore about my going to Thirlby?"

"You don't put me in a rage by asking such questions," I replied; "but you astonish me rather. Haven't I been doing all I could to bring a suit this very thing ever since I first met you?"

"Yes, but success is not always as pleasing as rudeness. You ought to be feeling sore, you know, it must be an interest on account for you. What about your matrimonial prospects, by the [illegible]?"

I shrugged my shoulders in silence.

"Now listen to me, Charles," said Harry, laying his hand upon my arm. "Don't you hurry off to Lady Constance and tell her the game is up. The game is not up at all. My father detests me, unless he is very much altered from what he used to be, he will be simply horrified at Pauline, and I doubt whether he is of an age to expect the playful ways of small boys. I couldn't, to justify to dismiss, refuse to accept the olive-branch, but I look upon this visit as a very doubtful experiment, and I think there is an excellent chance of my being finally cleared out of your path before the autumn."

"You don't understand your father," said I. "He will do what he believes to be his duty, whatever happens. Also, you are quite mistaken in thinking that he will detest any of you."

"We shall see," answered Harry, smiling. "At all events don't push Lady Constance into Mr Sotheran's arms before one know what your fate is to be."

"I shall tell her the exact truth," I said. "I shall tell her that my uncle has sent for you."

"Including my anticipations as to the result?"

"Oh yes, if you like. Now I [illegible] be off. Am I to be allowed to shake hands with Pauline before I go?"

"By all means," answered Harry. "I'll go into the house and fetch her."

However, he returned presently, saying he was sorry that his wife was not visible. "She has worked herself up into a [illegible] excitement over this business, and the consequence is that she is lying down now with a splitting headache. I'll say good-by for you."

A SLEIGH-RIDE IN RUSSIA.

Travelling in Russia is a very different thing from the easy and rapid process to which we are accustomed, with our lightning express trains. But to the man of leisure, able to appreciate the varying aspects of nature, and to discover their beauties, Russia will afford many new experiences, and reveal much novel grandeur.

In Northern lands the snow is so pure and beautiful that instead of awakening a feeling of sadness it inspires joy and pleasure. It has the bright, charming attractiveness of marble. The lines are not whiter and chaster than in white lilies. The trees, adorned with drops and branches of lunar frost, resemble lofty candelabra in Venetian glass, and the earth, adorned with the magical robe that winter has woven for it, reminds one of a pale bride being led to the altar. And then the snow—is not this real Russia, the Russia of our dreams, the Russia that displays its pleasant, child-like smile beneath the freaky coverings of its cradle? On the hardened snow see how the sledges glide along lightly and silently! On a bright and starry night traverse, at a good pace, and in a light troika, those vast frozen regions, destitute of roads, bridges, and villages, and you will experience the healthy delight of the cold air, the pleasurable sensation of the infinite and the unknown—you will be seized with what has well been called the vertigo of the North. When the sledge is thus rapidly whirled along, you feel as if you were no longer on earth, but in space, in the clouds, in the moon. You seem to be borne along in a balloon, which hurries you onward, and in its flight just skims along the silvery layer of the clouds.

Durham is historic. It was neutral ground while the armistice was pending between Sherman and Johnson. Soldiers of both armies filled their pouches with the tobacco stored there, and, after the surrender, marched homeward. Soon orders came from East, West, North, and South, for "more of that elegant tobacco." They too soon ran an unknown factory. Now it employs 500 men, uses the pink and pack of the Goddess of Liberty, and the Durham Bull is the trade mark of the best tobacco in the world. Blackwell's Durham Long Cut is Durham in its daintiest and handiest form.—[Adv.]

A Safeguard.

The fatal rapidity with which slight Colds and Coughs frequently develop into the gravest maladies of the throat and lungs, is a consideration which should impel every prudent person to keep at hand, as a household remedy, a bottle of AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL.

Nothing else gives such immediate relief and works so sure a cure in all affections of this class. That eminent physician, Prof. F. Sweetser, of the Maine Medical School, Brunswick, Me., says:—

"Medical science has produced no other anodyne expectorant so good as AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL. It is invaluable for diseases of the throat and lungs."

The same opinion is expressed by the well-known Dr. L. J. Addison, of Chicago, Ill., who says:—

"I have never found, in thirty-five years of continuous study and practice of medicine, any preparation of so great value as AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL, for treatment of diseases of the throat and lungs. It not only breaks up colds and cures severe coughs, but is more effective than anything else in relieving even the most serious bronchial and pulmonary affections."

AYER'S
Cherry Pectoral

Is not a new claimant for popular confidence, but a medicine which is to-day saving the lives of the third generation who have come into being since it was first offered to the public.

There is not a household in which this invaluable remedy has once been introduced where its use has ever been abandoned, and there is not a person who has ever given it a proper trial for any throat or lung disease susceptible of cure, who has not been made well by it.

AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL has, in numberless instances, cured obstinate cases of chronic Bronchitis, Laryngitis, and even acute Pneumonia, and has saved many patients in the earlier stages of Pulmonary Consumption. It is a medicine that only requires to be taken in small doses, is pleasant to the taste, and is needed in every house where there are children, as there is nothing so good as AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL for treatment of Croup and Whooping Cough.

These are all plain facts, which can be verified by anybody, and should be remembered by everybody.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

NEW YORK. SATURDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1883.

RE-OPENING OF THE ART COMPETITION.

The judges appointed to award the prizes in the Art Competition for the illustration of ALFRED BUNN'S "Christmas Hymn" have reported [see HARPER'S WEEKLY dated September 1] that they "are not justified by the conditions of the competition in awarding any prize whatsoever." Three hundred and thirty-eight drawings entered into the competition, and twenty-three were received after the 1st of August—too late to be considered.

Pursuant to the intimation given in their original "offer to young American artists," the MESSRS. HARPER have determined to re-open the competition, enlarging its scope and modifying the limitation as to age, in accordance with suggestions made by the judges.

For the best original illustration appropriate to Christmas—the drawing to be suitable for publication in HARPER'S MAGAZINE, to be made especially for this competition, and to be the exclusive work of an American artist not over twenty-seven years of age—MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS offer an award of THREE THOUSAND DOLLARS, upon the honorable understanding that the successful competitor shall use the same for the prosecution of art study in one or more of the best American schools, including also a sojourn abroad of at least six months for the study of the old masters. The award will be paid in such installments and at such times as shall best suit the convenience of the recipient for the purposes specified.

The drawings must be received by MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS, at Franklin Square, New York, not later than March 1, 1884, addressed "Art Competition, Harper's Magazine", and each must be designated by an assumed name or motto, which should also be given, together with the real name, age, and residence of the artist, on a sealed envelope securely attached to the drawing, and not to be opened until the result of the competition shall have been determined. The name of the successful competitor will not be publicly announced until the publication of the drawing.

MR. R. SWAIN GIFFORD, N.A., MR. F. D. MILLET, A.N.A., and MR. CHARLES PARSONS, A.N.A., Superintendent of the Art Department of HARPER & BROTHERS, will act as judges of the competition.

The treatment of the subject is left to the artist, limited only by the special reference to Christmas. Either the Bible story of the Nativity, or the social features of Christmas, past or present, may be chosen for illustration. The judges, in making the award, will take into consideration not only the technical art value of each drawing, but also the appropriateness of the subject selected, the sufficiency of the illustration, and especially the originality of conception and treatment. The combination of different designs in a single picture should be avoided.

It is intended to engrave the successful drawing as one page for HARPER'S MAGAZINE for December, 1884, and should others submitted be found suitable, second, third, and fourth awards will be made, as follows: one page HARPER'S WEEKLY, $500; one page HARPER'S BAZAR, $300; one page HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, $200—these awards not to be subject to the above mentioned understanding as to "the purchase of the drawing."

NEW SERIAL STORY BY WILKIE COLLINS.

We take pleasure in announcing that a new serial story by this popular author, entitled

I SAY NO;

OR,

THE LOVE LETTER ANSWERED,

will begin in HARPER'S WEEKLY for December 22, 1883. The story is one of exceptional interest and power.

CONGRESS.

THIS will be a President making Congress. Yet there are many subjects which require wise consideration and deliberate treatment. But the key of the probable action of Congress is seen in the actual political situation. Naturally financial and administrative questions take precedence in importance of all others, because there is no absorbing and supreme topic of public interest, as there was during the anti-slavery epoch and the war. Here, however, the situation is singular and difficult, from the fact that parties do not divide upon actual questions, but cohere by tradition and association. The question which naturally suggests itself to many persons as of chief importance is that of tariff revision. But the friends of tariff revision are in both parties, and there is no party expressly to secure that result. The Democrats who favor it are not, so far as appears, the real leaders of their party, while its Republican friends certainly do not anticipate any satisfactory action upon the subject from the Democratic party.

By the time that this paper is issued the election of Speaker will have thrown some light upon the relative strength of the two tendencies in the Democratic party. The letter of General GORDON, of Georgia, to Mr. RANDALL showed the situation, of which every close observer is aware. General GORDON declares himself to be a revenue reformer, but still more a Democrat, and as he thinks that his party can not succeed next year without the sympathy and support of business men, who would be alarmed by any serious tariff disturbance, he is of opinion that the least said will be soonest mended. The true party policy, he thinks, is to keep mum and to look wise and to say nothing, and by such means having obtained possession of the government, to proceed to such free-trade measures as may be thought best. This is certainly a naïf suggestion. But none the less it illustrates the truth that parties are now maintained and will be supported next year mainly upon their traditions, general sympathies and tendencies, and their probable future action as inferred from their history and the character of their membership. Nobody can suppose, from any evidence or from the probabilities, that wise financial legislation, a sound revenue system, or improved administration would follow Democratic success. The party represents no policy except that of silence, evasion, and running for luck.

But these are certainly not reasons for displacing a party which has shown itself so heedful as the Republican of the demands of public opinion. The protective sentiment is strong in that party, but the same kind of reasoning which leads General GORDON to deprecate free trade action upon the part of the Democrats holds in check extreme protective legislation by the Republicans. The reason is, as we have already said, that the parties do not divide upon that issue. Republican revenue reformers and Democratic protectionists each think that upon the whole the general public interest would be more surely promoted by the success of their parties. If we are mistaken in this view, the error will appear in the light of the legislation of this session. If the Democratic party intends to appeal to the country next year as the representative of any policy of administration, it will be disclosed during the winter, and the chances of the election next year then could be more surely calculated. To rely upon a declaration that the Democratic party is honester, wiser, and of higher administrative sagacity than the Republican, and to appeal for support upon such grounds, would be worthy of the extraordinary folly of the Democrats. But, although that folly is unfailing, it must not be the dependence of the Republican party, while it will doubtless be its ally. The Republican argument will be the general record of the party, its amenability to public opinion, its adherence to administrative reform, and the public confidence in the moderation and good judgment of Republican administration. Apparently the battle is to be offered upon the ground of general good character and promise, and that is a contest which Republicans do not fear.

GOVERNOR CLEVELAND IN NEW YORK.

GOVERNOR CLEVELAND is not a familiar figure in the city of New York, and his sturdy form was seen with great interest and pleasure on the late centennial day. This interest culminated at the banquet of the Chamber of Commerce in the evening, when he made a speech which was heard with the closest attention, and whose significant passages were received with warm and equally significant applause. Governor CLEVELAND IS, like the rest of us, a party man. But he is plainly a conscientious and devoted magistrate, who does not surrender his independence, and is not afraid of "bosses."

In the course of his speech at the banquet of the Chamber of Commerce the Governor alluded to the commercial interests of New York, and asked the company whether they were sure that in the Legislature the city had true and worthy champions of those interests. This question produced a hearty response, which was only to be interpreted as a sign of the consciousness of the merchants that they were quite sure that they had not such champions in the Legislature. The earnest suggestion of the Governor that in the performance of political duties the citizens of New York should not fall behind the noble example of their forefathers, is not only one that is needed, but it was an intimation, not less needed, that the Governor can not atone for the negligence of the citizens, and that if a community chooses to send unworthy representatives to the Legislature it must expect unworthy legislation and has no right to grumble at it.

The Governor was careful not to make a sweeping generalization including every representative from the city. But there was no misunderstanding the fact that the Governor of the State gravely said in effect that the city sends unfit men to represent her interests. It was not a new saying, but it was a true saying. The men whom the city of New York sent to the Legislature a hundred years ago were of a very different kind from the majority of those whom she sends to-day. Governor BUTLER in his speech thought fit to malign the merchants and professional men of the earlier day by saying that they were not the men who carried on the Revolution. It was a bit of cheap demagoguery, and of course it was untrue that they were less patriotic than their fellow-citizens. Let any New-Yorker read the names of the men whom old New York selected to lead her councils, and he will understand the wisdom and significance of Governor CLEVELAND'S question, and ask himself whether it is impossible that the city should be worthily represented, not as now by a few gentlemen in the delegation, but by the entire body of the representatives.

A GREAT DAY.

THE centennial celebration of Evacuation-day is already historical, like the great event itself, and, like all great popular demonstrations in New York, it was a most interesting illustration of the effect of popular government in producing popular moderation and self-restraint. A New York crowd, vast as it is, keeps itself in order. There were hundreds of thousands of persons packed upon the sidewalks in Fifth Avenue and Broadway, and a continuous throng swarming through the neighboring streets. But there was no disorder or accident, and, despite the pitiless pelting of the storm, there was universal good-humor. The storm, also, did not seem to affect the popular ardor and interest in the pageant of the procession. The multitudes stood fast during the four hours occupied by the procession in passing, and cheered lustily any person or object that it wished to honor; and, as usual, interesting and striking as the procession was, the chief interest was the mass of spectators.

Of course the crowd, as must be always the case in New York, was a heterogeneous throng. It was composed of persons of many nationalities; for New York is the largest Irish city in the world, and almost the largest German city, and the numbers of natives of other lands are always large. The traditions of such a day are consequently unfamiliar to a great part of the spectators, to whom the pageant is pure spectacle, and who feel no thrill of patriotism in the associations of the hour. But, although this changes the nature of their pleasure, it does not destroy its zest, and they hear with the interest of novelty the story of the significance of the day. The Irish societies may be supposed to have had peculiar pleasure in recollecting that in some way the day commemorated British discomfiture. But the Irish societies may also wisely ponder the fact that, while British authority was happily expelled, the glorious British traditions of constitutional freedom remained, and are organized in new forms. It is the tradition of the English speaking race that still dominates, as it has always controlled our civilization.

It was well that the permanent memorial of the day should be the statue of WASHINGTON raised upon a spot hallowed by a whole history of patriotic events—a spot upon which it will be seen by more persons in one day than now probably see all the other statues of WASHINGTON in the same time. Of all appropriate places in the country for such a memorial this was the most appropriate, and with the stone imbedded in the rostrum beneath it, upon which WASHINGTON stood in the balcony of the old Federal Hall when he took the oath of office, it forms one of the most interesting monuments in the country. It is a noble and dignified figure, and the rostrum, a platform below it, which will be surrounded by a railing, will be the place from which American orators for many a generation will make their patriotic appeals, with the great exemplar of patriotic devotion and achievement lending by his calm presence a gracious emphasis to the loftiest eloquence of which human lips are capable.

BETWEEN THE DEVIL AND THE DEEP SEA.

Two things must be very disagreeable to New York Democrats. One is their general acknowledgment that their success next year is impossible without the vote of New York, and the other is the hostility of Governor CLEVELAND and JOHN KELLY. Such a situation means great trouble. The Governor is not a man to surrender a principle or a conviction, and JOHN KELLY has shown his perfect willingness to defeat his party if he can not have his own way. We have pointed out more than once the fact, which is distasteful to honorable and sincere Democrats, that their party can succeed only by yielding to KELLY. The County Democracy was organized to shake him off, and he brought it to his feet. It has really ceased to exist except in name. Democratic harmony means only submission to JOHN KELLY, and Governor CLEVELAND does not propose to submit to JOHN KELLY.

Moreover, Mr KELLY has published a private letter from the Governor which has drawn upon him a great deal of censure. Now the Governor's friends control the party organization, and by preference and necessity they cling to him. Governor CLEVELAND is not, in the ordinary sense, a politician. He is an honest man, of strong nature and convictions, honestly seeking to do his duty. He seems, at least, to be a man who would prefer to see his party defeated rather than successful by surrender to JOHN KELLY. In this situation a rupture seems to be inevitable. Mr KELLY professed a great desire for harmony, and the County Democracy, understanding him, immediately concluded a bargain with him. The Governor would not submit, and wrote him a letter, which KELLY published, and declared that the Governor had destroyed harmony.

Next year the price of his Tammany vote will be much higher. The Democratic newspapers will bellow for harmony, meaning buying Tammany upon its own terms. The Governor will not buy. If the delegation to the National Convention and the consequent prospects of Tammany are apparently unpromising, Mr KELLY will take his own course. If he gives a negative and lukewarm support to the National ticket, the State can not be carried, and from the Democratic point of view that will be fatal. If, despite the Governor, the party surrenders to Tammany, of course it will not obtain a single vote beyond the strict party lins, and very many within the line will be alienated. It is thus a familiar situation, but a very disagreeable one, a position between the devil and the deep sea, and it comes from the presence in the Democratic party of a sturdy official leader who refuses to do what the County Democracy leaders have done—bow to Gesler's cap upon the pole.

THE REPUBLICAN ENROLLMENT.

THE Republican enrollment in the city of New York contains more than twenty thousand names. This is about a third of the total Republican vote in the city; and if the enrolled voters remember an old saying about eternal vigilance, and act upon it, they can correct many of the abuses of which there has been just complaint hitherto, and which have been often disastrous to the party.

The "old stagers" of politics will certainly not relax their activity, and a large enrollment will not be a benefit of its purpose is not fulfilled, which is to secure large and independent primaries. Yet the "old stagers" must see that the old tricks will be useless at a time when public and party feeling are so strongly arrayed against them. The knowledge that a candidate is a machine or boss favorite would be in itself enough to defeat him.

This is the lesson which all managers must now lay to heart for next year. When such strong party men as Mr. BEECHER and Mr. WATTERSON say substantially that their parties do not own them, it is evident that a spirit of independence is abroad, which is most becoming in the close of the centennial Revolutionary season. If bosses of high and low degree, and machine men of every kind, will but remember that there are many voters of the same mind, they will see that in a contest, as that of next year promises to be, between party traditions and prospects rather than actual policies, everything which can weaken regard for the party must be carefully avoided; and nothing will so certainly alienate Republicans as old-fashioned machine management.

MR. LOWELL AS LORD RECTOR.

MR. LOWELL'S election as Rector of the University of St. Andrews is an extraordinary compliment. But no man could have better deserved it. He is now one of the chief of living authors in the English tongue, and certainly one of the two or three most eminent names in American literature. He is, however, the chief official representative of America in England, and by common consent one of the most admirable and acceptable representatives that we have ever had in England.

It is sometimes suggested that a minister so popular in a foreign country can hardly be a good American. But there was never a more popular American representative abroad than Dr. FRANKLIN, and it would be hard to name a better American. Indeed, it was in large part his Americanism which made him socially attractive. He had shrewd sense and mother-wit and the art of conciliation, and MR. LOWELL has the same qualities, and is as genuine an American.

He has also remarkable scholarship, and a gift of most graceful speech, besides his gifts and achievements as a writer. When such a man occupies such a position to a foreign country the friendly feeling of the country can not express itself more happily than by his selection for an honor which is usually, but not necessarily, confined to Englishmen. The duty of the position consists wholly, we believe, in the delivery of an address, a duty which in recent years, at various universities, Mr. MILL, Mr. CARLYLE, Professor HUXLEY, and Lord BEACONSFIELD, with other noted men, have discharged most general attention and applause. It is a task in which MR. LOWELL is not likely to fail.

THE PARDON OF MASON.

THE pardon of MASON, the soldier who fired at GUITEAU, whom he was guarding, is doubtless judicious, and will be generally approved. The President utterly refused to listen to the earnest appeal for remission of the sentence which was made to him at the time, because he felt, undoubtedly, with other intelligent men, how great an offense MASON had committed—an offense greater, under the circumstances, than if it had been committed by any other man.

For the time, while he was guarding GUITEAU MASON had in his keeping the honor of the United States. That honor required that the assassin should have a judicial trial, and be safely guarded from mobs and individual avengers while the trial proceeded. It was the very fact that the government had intrusted GUITEAU to MASON for this protection which gave MASON the opportunity to try to shoot him.

The offense was great, but it was largely condoned by public feeling, and the punishment has been adequate. There will be no censure of the refusal, and there can be no sentimental treatment of MASON as a martyr. The claims of law and justice have been satisfied, and the pardon is the exercise of a wise clemency.

REVOLUTIONARY MEMORIALS.

THE close of the Revolutionary centennial season finds, as the fruit of the long attention of the country, a disposition to promote the erection of memorials both of men and events, and especially of battle fields. Congress has made specific grants of money upon certain conditions to certain memorial enterprises, as at Newburgh, and the Pennsylvania Historical Society has urged strongly the claims of Valley Forge to such aid and remembrance.

There is an spot whose name is more grimly familiar in the Revolutionary story than Valley Forge, and nowhere could the stern sacrifice of the patriot soldiers be more fitly recalled. The Valley Forge Centennial Association proposes to urge the passage of a general bill, which has been already introduced in Congress, providing for a conditional grant. It is a kind of shore project. The national Treasury contributes in proportion to a sum contributed by the community in which lies the memorable spot.

This condition prevents any serious draft upon the Treasury, while the contribution by the community is evidence of a warmth of local interest, which the country may wisely recognize and make effective. Such appropriations are made undoubtedly to gratify sentiment. But as there is no nobler sentiment than that of patriotism, nor any more wise to promote a wise and lofty public spirit, the question is whether grants for such purposes are not grants the most desirable public uses. A Revolutionary battle was of no limited significance. It was part of a great united movement, and its results are common and not local. There is an reason that the entire cost of a memorial to designate and honor it should be thrown upon the neighborhood, and a wisely guarded bill of the kind that we have mentioned we believe would receive general approval

THE LATE MR. BLACKFAN.

MR. JOSEPH H. BLACKFAN, the late Superintendent of Foreign Mails in the Post-office Department at Washington, was an original member of the first Civil Service Commission appointed by President GRANT. His perfect comprehension of the situation and needs of the postal service, his clear mind and admirable judgment, made him one of the best of counsellors, and his name attached to the first report and scheme was a guarantee of their practicability and value which experience has demonstrated.

MR. BLACKFAN was a man of singular modesty and of gentle urbanity of manner, which greatly endeared him to all his friends and associates, and his long and upright official career, his unusual experience in the service, and his ability to turn it to account, made him a model public officer.

His tranquil life passed in the faithful discharge of duties which bring an éclat, and like a war-worn veteran—although not an old man—he died at his post. He was himself a signal illustration of the excellence of the reformed methods in the civil service of which he was an unwavering advocate, and the honest and capable officer, the unassuming, friendly, and cordial companion, will be tenderly remembered.

MANNERS UPON THE NORTHERN PACIFIC.

THERE has been much serious comment upon the persons, mainly Englishmen, who were said to have behaved discourteously upon the famous Northern Pacific trip during the summer, and, notwithstanding the positive and apparently peculiarly well-informed denials and corrections in the New York Evening Post and elsewhere, the tale has been repeated until, as the Milwaukee Sentinel says, it has become accepted as a fact, and still holds its course through the newspapers.

The Sentinel again, and very clearly and conclusively, explains that the story has arisen from two sources: one, the probable confusion of the Yellowstone Park trip of Mr. HATCH, which apparently did encounter some social mishaps, with the Northern Pacific excursion; and the other a mistake of the Earl of Onslow, who supposed that "a private car" meant a car exclusively for himself and family—an error, however, which was promptly corrected, and the correction perfectly understood by him; and the intrusion of an Englishman who came upon the ticket of another invited guest, and his sons, who thrust themselves upon the party without permission, all of whom were discussed from the excursion. This was a contretemps, but it does not in any manner justify the assertion that the invited guests of the Northern Pacific disgracefully make boors of themselves. It was a trip which the Sentinel describes in words which, so far as we can learn, express the general feeling of the guests, remarkable in plan, complete in performance, and of unalloyed delight to the travellers.

PERSONAL.

MR. MATTHEW ARNOLD agrees with PLATO, that a good education is not fitted for all sorts and conditions of men, and that an intelligent man will pursue those studies which shall result in his getting soberness, righteousness, and wisdom, and will discard all the rest.

—Mr. BLAINE expresses his conviction that "nothing much matters in a summer, except the weather, the ourse, and the air." Such small things as warmth, sunshine, cleanliness, rarities, and soothing syrup are favorable to order.

—Ismail Pasha, ex-Khedive of Egypt, explains that the Egyptian troops [illegible] three Pashas were defeated because, more than any other [illegible] needed a flag, military music, and all the eclat of war, and these they did not have. The ex-Khedive was not surprised at the [illegible].

—"If some great [illegible] should arise tomorrow (says Mr HENRY WATTERSON) and offer to restore the South as slaves the South would stand back aghast and say, "Get behind me, Satan."

—A newspaper called Truth, published in San Francisco, California and devoted to the propagation of Socialistic doctrines, in its issue for November 17 appropriates a chapter from Professor RICHARD T. ELY's book on French and German Socialism, recently published by HARPER & BROTHERS, and prints it in the form of an original contribution, under the Professor's own signature. This may in its appreciation of the author's views, but as it also conveys the false impression that he writes for the paper, nor San Francisco contemporary should either change its name or mend its ways.

—In a recent divorce case in London the presiding judge said that "if the plaintiff's husband called her and her mother liars, that was a very gross insult, but it was no excuse for her slapping [illegible] on the face, and the fact that she got out of bed and slapped him three times on the face showed that she was not afraid of him." The question often arises as to what a man should do when another man has called him a liar, and it would be interesting to know what the learned judge's ruling would be in that case.

—The new Italian Minister of Marine, Signor DEL RAVRO, is as best as good a sea-dog as some of our Secretaries of the Navy. At the battle of Lissa, in 1866, he gallantly went down with the frigate Re'ia, of which he was commander, after a brilliant engagement, but as rising to the surface he managed to get hold of a spar, and after floating six hours was picked up.

—France, Belgium, Italy, Spain, and Portugal have together a population of 90,000,000, of whom only 600,000 are Protestants. In France alone there are 630,000 Protestants, in Belgium, 18,000; in Italy, 10,000, in Spain, 30,000, and in Portugal, 500. The great object of the French Protestants during the present ministry has been to avoid conflicts with the Catholics, but they have signally failed in rescuing from infidelity men who were willing to be Christians, but unwilling to be Romanists. The French Protestant clergy receive their salaries from the national treasury. One of the most eloquent and eminent of them is M. DE PRESSENSÉ, who has just been elected a life member of the French Senate.

—Disgusting (observes a late writer) as the sale of wives may seem to be now, the belief in its lawful character has descended from very early ages, when a wife was actually a chattel bought as so many cattle from her father—as daughters are still bought among the Zulus—and salable by her owner when he found a suitable customer. Only a few days ago, at the Liverpool assizes, a woman charged with bigamy pleaded that her former husband had sold her for a quart of beer, and the witnesses who testified on her behalf really seemed to think that a man has as good a right to sell his wife as his pig as his bull-dog. In 1832 a farmer in England sold his wife at auction for twenty shillings and a Newfoundland dog, and the authorities made no objection. In 1810 an Englishman sold his wife for eleven shillings, in 1820 for five shillings, in 1826 for thirty shillings, and in 1835 for fifteen pounds.

—Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, who finds time to vary the toils of politics with the sports of literature, has been amending a popular audience that the best writings of modern times are but reproductions of the same thoughts, the same feelings, and the same spirit which distinguish the ancient writers, that some of the most beautiful lines in MILTON's poems are taken straight from THUCYDIDES; that some of the most curious and amusing conceits of Gulliver's Travels was copied or of copied from LUCIAN, and that certain passages in HORACE which describe the house of a vulgar rich man, as the one in which a great hero fastened himself upon the poet while he was out walking, apply with much force to our own times.

—The new Lord Mayor of London announces that when he goes to church he will not take out four horses, nor put his servants into state liveries. To ride in church for the sake of a show on a Sunday morning would be inconsistent with his principles, one of which is, "to save my servants on the Lord's day from all work that it is possible to avoid."

—A Scotch wine-merchant writes: "I do not believe in drinking one wine during a lifetime. At one time I drank nothing but port, now I seldom touch it, because my constitution is changed. If spared to live a few years longer, I shall probably take to it again as a vitalizer. Any food may give you the gout if it does not agree with you, and the same wine that would produce it in one person would cure it in another."

—Prince BISMARCK, lean and thin, his face rollow from jaundice, and capricious of great suffering, his gait uneasy and constrained, seems at length to be really on the sick list.

—M. DE LESSEPS professes himself ready to listen to any complaint brought against himself or the administrators of the Suez Canal by any shipowner. "I shall be glad to meet such gentlemen face to face, because I have always found that it is by the interposition of a third busybody that difficulties arise, and that when people must face to face such difficulties can be settled to peace and harmony."

—An English jury found themselves at variance respecting the amount of damages to be awarded in a breach-of-promise suit. One juryman thought that $25,000 was the proper sum, another that $27,500 should be given; a third that much less would do. Finally they agreed to add up the several sums mentioned by the various jurymen, and to divide the gross results by twelve. This gave $12,750, which was accordingly awarded to the plaintiff.

—Mr FRANKLIN B GOWEN said in the United States Circuit Court, Trenton, New Jersey: "I am now about to retire from the railroad to the legal profession, and I want to leave good character back with me. In all the fifteen years I have been connected with railroads I have never been directly or indirectly interested to speculation in the stock of any road with which I was connected."

—The late Judge BLACK used to say that it was the business of the clergy to preach Christianity, and of the laity to defend it. We are glad to learn that Mr. JOSEPH TURNER CURTIS has prepared for a popular magazine a series of articles in defense of the Christian religion, which deal specifically with the charges of treason and evolution and in which he treats his readers as a jury, and applies to the subjects treated the rules of evidence and the principles of rational belief.

—The interest of the wealthier classes in the project of the pedestal for the BARTHOLDI statue has certainly been manifested by the alacrity with which the owners of valuable collections of pictures have responded to the appeal of the committee of the Loan Exhibition. These owners have so often been called upon to lend their choicest works of art that of late years the exercise of such generosity has in many cases been very wearisome. To some minds it is difficult to understand why a favorite oil-painting should be lent in charity any more than a favorite piece of furniture or a favorite pair of horses.

—The Pope having given to the people of Detroit, with his blessing, an oil painting representing the betrothal of St. Catharine, the gift has been acknowledged with "very sincere and heartfelt thanks for the picture so graciously sent." We notice with pleasure that the work of establishing in that city a permanent art museum is going on prosperously, and that the committee who have the matter in charge announce to their fellow-citizens that "those who wish to travel on the same train should get aboard at once."

—Mr COURTLAND PALMER'S Nineteenth Century Club still resume its sessions on the 6th of December, with a paper by Mr GOLDWIN SMITH. Mr. CANON, also reads as well as he writes. This meeting will be the forerunner of a series which promises to be even more interesting than the brilliant assemblies of last winter. It is worthy of mention that among the guests of this literary club the ladies are believed to be even better able than the gentlemen to appreciate and discuss the subjects introduced.

—The enterprising managers of the Salmagundi exhibition of works in black and white have made some money this year by selling the catalogue of the National Academy to the Salmagundi exhibition committee. These fine old engravings display in the American Art Rooms will accordingly be a financial not less than an artistic success, and for several years to come, doubtless, the public will share in the benefits of this favorable turn in the tide.

—GEORGE AUGUSTUS SALA gives a curious account of his ancestry. Some writer inquired whether he was a Jew. He answers: "In reply to my esteemed correspondent, whose communication is evidently of a bona fide character, I beg to state that I have no knowledge of ever having any Jewish ancestors. On the other hand, my maternal great-grandmother was a red Indian."

—Baron DE ST. AMAND, the diplomatist, has just published at Paris an account of the Empress JOSEPHINE'S first four years of wedded life, under the title of La Cérémonie Rompante.

—M. DE LESSEPS had, after all, only a second hand idea when he propounded the cutting of the Suez Canal. The first NAPOLEON, according to history, is credited with the plan, and the fact is recorded in these words, written in 1797: "In the course of the next decade I shall sail in the canal which is now cutting across the Isthmus of Suez. The Polytechnic School and Corps of Engineers are employed in devising means for conveying my heavy artillery across the great desert. Soon shall India hail me her deliverer, and those proud islanders, the tyrants of Calcutta, shall fall before the heroes of Arcola."

—One of the most agreeable features of Baron GERARD VAN SCHAUB's visit to Yale College, immediately [illegible] to for Germany, was his meeting [illegible] of Latin, THOMAS I. TUCKERMAN, who [illegible] in [illegible] Prince of [illegible] In an [illegible] died [illegible] Ma [illegible] about the family of the [illegible] Prince [illegible] Interesting fact that the [illegible] married the daughter of Queen VICTORIA and [illegible] his knowledge of [illegible] Yale graduate. CHAPTER XXX.—(Continued.)

I RECEIVE ADVICE FROM HARRY AND MR. SOTHERAN.

I RETURNED to town, meditating over Harry's advice, which seemed to be well meant, and wondering what Lady Constance would say to it all. I expected to meet her at a dinner party that evening, but when the time came she failed to make her appearance, having, as subsequently transpired, sent an excuse at the last moment. I was one sorry for this respite as I thought matters might be more comfortably discussed in Hill Street, which I repaired as early as possible on the following afternoon.

The door was opened, after some little delay, by a young man in plain clothes, who looked as if I had interrupted him in the act of brushing the powder out of his hair. It appeared to me that he was struggling with a smile, as he said, briskly, "Ladyship's out of town, sir."

"By Jove!" I ejaculated, involuntarily; and then I perceived at once what Lady Constance had left, and how soon her return might be looked for.

"Not coming back at all, sir," replied the ex-footman, with much suppressed satisfaction. "Her ladyship left yesterday morning for the Continent."

I was so astounded that I turned, without another word, and should have walked away, if I had not at this moment become aware of the slow and majestic approach of a well-known white waistcoat. I could not refuse myself the pleasure of watching Mr Sotheran's demeanor under the blow which is one about to fall upon him, and I stood aside as he mounted the steps.

He recognized me with much affability.—"How do you do, Mr Maxwell?—how do you do? Warm afternoon, is it not?"—and marched as unsuspectingly to receive his sentence from the lips of the servant, who was now grinning delightedly.

For a moment he was evidently staggered. His eyes became as large and round as those of the First Dog in the fairy tale of the Tinder-box; his jaw fell, and he gasped out, "Eh?—what?—gone abroad?" But presently he resumed his customary philosophic calm, and drew out his card-case, merely observing, "I had an appointment with Lady Constance for this afternoon."

"Indeed, sir? Dear me, sir!" said the young man, upon whose manners sudden emancipation from the shackles of livery seemed to have produced a deleterious effect.

Mr Sotheran frowned at him heavily. "I presume that you are no longer in Lady Constance's service," said he. "Has she broken up her establishment, pray?"

"Yes, sir. We was took by surprise, having been given to understand as we should be wanted for another month at least."

"Well, you got a month's wages, I suppose," said Mr Sotheran, shortly. "What is Lady Constance's present address?"

"Her ladyship didn't leave no address, sir."

"Nonsense!" returned Mr Sotheran; "she must have left some address for her letters."

The young man said he would inquire, and came back, after a short absence, with the somewhat startling information that letters were to be forwarded to Monte Rotunda, Commentumpole.

Mr Sotheran and I walked down the street together, communing of misfortune making us almost friends for the time being.

"This is a bad job," I remarked. "She has gone to have a look at the war, of course."

"No doubt she has," agreed my companion. "Yes; no doubt that will be it. It is, as you say, an unfortunate freak, and one

[illegible] I [illegible] the last [illegible] I [illegible] whether I [illegible] well be [illegible]

I beg to [illegible] I answered. And [illegible] asked me why he should [illegible] very civilly "He [illegible] you might get the address required, I don't know."

I was not [illegible] deterred by any fears of that kind, said Mr Sotheran.

"But might you not allow yourself to be deterred by fear of intruding, where you were not wanted?" I suggested, for, not being able to [illegible] myself I was unwilling to allow [illegible]

Mr [illegible], said Mr Sotheran, not unkindly, "you are, if [illegible] the hope that I entertain with regard to Lady [illegible] I have not [illegible] and I believe that there is a female [illegible] that too [illegible] have similar hopes. Will [illegible] in all good faith and sincerity to [illegible] such a [illegible] from your mind?" The last [illegible] the ghost of a chance existed for [illegible]

I [illegible] said I, laughing. "How can you [illegible]

[illegible] on Mr Sotheran. "I am far [illegible] that Lady [illegible] not in the least prefer your society to mine. But when it comes to a question of that kind of marriage, I am afraid [illegible] which every man and woman of the world must, at one time or another, [illegible] I have reason to believe that Lady Constance does admit to it."

Indeed! but I didn't say so. I contented myself with observing that Lady Constance was not always and altogether influenced by rules [illegible] worldly wisdom.

I think, however, that she will prove to be so in the present instance. Mr Sotheran rejoined. "So far as I am concerned, you are very welcome to try your best with her, but I warn you that you will be disappointed. I have, in short, made up my mind to succeed," he concluded, calmly.

"And do you consider that an infallible recipe for success?" I inquired.

Mr Sotheran paused for a moment before replying. "Well, I have failed in one things, like most men; but that has always been when I have attempted a task beyond my powers. This task is within my powers, and I have no fear of failure. I have been perfectly open with you, Mr Maxwell," he added, "because, in spite of the—may I say juvenile petulance?—with which you have sometimes treated me, I like you, and because I think it a pity that you should waste your time in the pursuit of shadows. Believe me, you will do very well without Lady Constance Milmar. I will even go further, and say that, in my humble opinion, Lady Constance is not good enough for you. I am by no means blind to her defects, I can assure you, but the difference between us is that you will outgrow your present fancy, whereas I am too old to change. Good-evening to you. Think over what I have said."

And Mr Sotheran turned into Brooks's, while I walked on, somewhat nettled, but with an increased respect for my elderly rival. I soon banished him and his warning from my thoughts, however, and fell to busying myself with conjectures as to the cause of Lady Constance's flight. Debts—society—caprice—any one of these might have sufficed to send her off on her travels again, and it was quite in [illegible] with her habits to disappear without taking formal [illegible] of her friends. Yet I thought that she might have made an exception in favor of one of them, and as soon as I reached home I wrote [illegible], in which I [illegible] pathetic expression to this sentiment. Between [illegible] had parted almost in anger, I implored her to forgive me, if I had been unfortunate enough to incur her displeasure; I [illegible] how at last [illegible] what her movements were [illegible] to be, [illegible] of it, I decided not to bring [illegible] the [illegible] situation. Such an [illegible] and if Mr Sotheran carried [illegible] East, there was no saying what she might not be brought to consent to in a moment of despondency.

When I had [illegible] had dispatched my letter, I surprised myself by [illegible] to a right-hearted manner, and asked myself sternly what I meant to [illegible] conduct. I ought to have been weeping and tearing my hair. I had been deceived—more or less deceived, at all events—by my friend. I had been deserted by the object of my affections. I had been cajoled duffed by a formidable rival, and I was about to be disinherited by my uncle. Why, then, in Heaven's name, should I feel like a school-boy let out for a holiday?

Being unable to reply to these pertinent questions, either then or the next day, when the same unaccountable gayety of spirits took possession of me, I felt drawn toward obtaining the opinion of an unprejudiced person upon my case; and as it came about that, exactly twenty-four hours after the disappointment which I had met with in Hill Street, I was ringing the door-bell of Mrs Saville's house in Portman Square.

Mrs Saville, I was informed, had gone out driving, but further inquiry gendered the pleasant intelligence that Miss Denison was at home and would see me. Under which circumstances, I decently hoped that Mrs Saville's drive might be a prolonged one.

CHAPTER XXXI.

LADY CONSTANCE MAKES A FINAL COMMUNICATION.

It was an immense comfort to me to be able to talk openly to Maud, without betraying any one's confidence. I made her acquainted with all the circumstances relating to my first meeting with Harry, to our subsequent friendship, and to my discovery of his wife and child, not forgetting the episode of Mrs Farquhar's visit to Richmond, and Harry's explanation of his conduct on that occasion, and when I had done, she observed that, for [illegible] that, I did not seem to be very quick at distinguishing honest men from rogues.

That Harry was not a rogue, and a very clever one too, she declined to believe. "The whole thing is as clear as daylight," she said. "He has contrived to get what he wants without any assistance from you, because it would not at all suit his book to be included to your generosity, and I have no doubt that it is he who has traduced you to your uncle. My only hope is that Mr Le Marchant may be a little less blind than you. You had better leave them alone, I think, for the present; there can be no use in your going to Thirlby now that matters have reached such a pass."

But although Maud avoided me more than was quite just, and although she had some searching questions to put to me about Lady Constance, whose unexpected departure I was obliged to mention, I spent the best part of an hour as agreeably with her [illegible] anything new. I had regretted my [illegible] so [illegible] days, but regrets [illegible] The romance of my boyhood [illegible] buried that Maud seemed [illegible] over and one calmness. There remained [illegible] which I should be exceedingly foolish to [illegible] that I had not precisely a pleasure [illegible] world.

Fortified with these considerations, I [illegible] Portman Square, as I was [illegible] after that, finding Mrs Saville [illegible]

thus sufficiently talked over; and indeed the home news that reached us was of the most meagre description. My uncle wrote much as usual, scarcely alluding to the circumstance that his family circle had been increased, although he asked me to try and find him a Shetland pony of docile character, suitable for a child learning to ride—an order which seemed significant. As for Harry, he did not write at all

Nor did any letter reach me from the East. Once or twice I encountered Mr Sotheran, which was proof positive that he had thought better of his intention to pursue Lady Constance; but on these occasions he only nodded to me without speaking, and I did not ask him whether he had any news of the absentee, feeling tolerably certain that he had none.

The London season, meanwhile, was drawing to its close. Parliament rose late that year; but the dearth of entertainments, added to the alarm of cholera, drove away most of those who could leave town before the end of July; and Mrs. Saville followed the stream, taking Maud with her. During the two or three weeks that followed I had a great deal of toy-box company, and very dull company I found it. My anxiety about Lady Constance, which had slumbered peacefully enough while Maud had been in London, woke up again and pestered me day and night. If I had known at all where to look for her, I might have been tempted to spend the month of leave which was all that an exacting country would allow me in making a dash for the seat of war; but to there was an even probability of Lady Constance's being by that time fomenting sedition at Warsaw, or stirring up a clearer conception of the political crisis in the breast of a philosophical potentate at Berlin, I abandoned the idea of engaging in any such wild-goose chase. Moreover, the path of duty plainly led toward Norfolk.

Three-quarters of the month of August had passed slowly away, and I was in the act of packing my portmanteau, one evening, preparatory to a move homeward on the morrow, when a note was brought to me, which, on being opened, proved to contain only the following laconic command:

"Come and see me any time after eight o'clock to-night at Claridge's Hotel.—C. M."

Lady Constance had returned, then! I gazed at the paper which bore the evidence of her presence in London with somewhat mixed feelings. Of course I was overjoyed at the thought of seeing her once more, and very glad that she had arrived just in time to catch me in from my departure for Thirlby; but the thought which did not overjoy me at all was that of the long-deferred statement that I should have to make that evening. Still, it was impossible to foresee what Lady Constance's views might be upon any given subject, and it was some comfort that I had my uncle's authority for asserting her that no irrevocable settlement had as yet been decided upon.

I was at Claridge's at five minutes past eight, and was shown without delay into Lady Constance's sitting-room, where I found her still in her travelling dress, answering letters, of which a large heap lay open upon the table before her. She glanced up as I made my entrance, but did not move to offer me her hand. "Is that you?" she said. "Sit down and read the papers; I shall be ready for you in a few minutes."

I was too familiar with her peculiarities to resent this cold welcome. I did as she bade me, and for some little time there was silence except for the scratching of her pen as she dashed off and addressed note after note, apparently oblivious of my presence. I scrutinized her features, upon which the light of a shaded lamp fell, and it struck me that her journey had not done her much good. She looked paler than usual, and more care-worn, and from time to time she pressed her hand upon her temples, as though her head ached. At length she threw down her pen, and requested me to ring the bell, and Antonio appearing presently in answer to the summons, she handed her pile of letters to him, telling him to have them posted. Then she got up and took a chair nearer to the one upon which I was seated.

"Well," she began, "did you think you had seen the last of me?"

"I didn't think it would be quite so bad as that," answered I, "but I have been feeling very uneasy about you lately, I confess. Did you get my letter?"

"Your letter? Oh, you mean the one that you wrote directly after I started. Yes; it reached me, but you know I never answer letters unless I am obliged."

"Why did you go off like that?" I asked, reproachfully. "I don't think it was very kind of you."

"Ought I to have asked your permission first? I should have let you know that I was going, but I couldn't tell that you would allow twenty-four hours to pass without coming to see me, and I found it quite impossible to wait. I am not like most people, who grow gradually weary of their surroundings: a disgust for places comes upon me all of a sudden, and then I feel that it is a case for immediate departure or self-destruction. You could not have lived to find me on the drawing-room floor in Hill Street with my throat cut."

"No; but you might have sent me a line to say that you were leaving, and to give me an opportunity of bidding you good-by. Then at least I should have heard about part of the world you [illegible] for."

"I didn't ask of it. I apologize. It seems, however, that you did discover my destination."

"Only by chance. I was so [illegible] at hearing of your departure that I was going away without asking any more questions, when Mr [illegible] came up, and, with great presence of [illegible] your address."

"Ah, yes. He [illegible] favored me with a long letter."

While I went you didn't answer [illegible] did. He wished to know whether I intended to keep my promise of visiting some neighbors of his during the autumn, and he said he should pursue me to Turkey or elsewhere if he did not receive a speedy reply. So I wrote to tell him that he might expect me back in England before September. I thought it unnecessary to take that precaution in your case, as you had not held out the same threat."

"I suppose that means that you wanted to be rid of both of us."

"I can't contradict you. There are times when one wants to be rid of everybody, one's self included. In a general way, I should say that any one who was tired of life could not do better than go to Constantinople at the present time; but I have the constitution of an ostrich, and I suffered from nothing worse than a prolonged attack of the blues. Then I went to Varna, and had a look at the allied armies, by way of raising my spirits. They are dying like so many flies, and though they talk of invading the Crimea and taking Sevastopol, the hovering people say that a peace will be patched up, and the whole expedition will collapse. When I had seen and heard enough horrors to satisfy me for the rest of my days, I retreated to Vienna; after which I looked in upon my brother at Franzensbohe—who begged me to say all sorts of kind things to you, by-the-bye—and so I made my way back to London. Now you have heard the history of my doings, and it is your turn to speak. Have you made up your quarrel with Miss Dennison yet?"

"I never had any quarrel with her," I answered.

"No? But are you engaged to be married to her?"

"I don't think you need ask that question," said I. "If you don't understand that I shall never marry anybody, unless, by some miracle, it should be yourself, I am sorry for it; but I can hardly say or do anything more than I have done to convince you."

"She is a very pretty girl," observed Lady Constance, abstractedly. "I remember making you quite hot and angry at the Opera by some disparaging remarks about her, which were not in the least sincere. The vulgar belief that a plain woman is always jealous of a pretty one is perfectly correct, like most vulgar beliefs, whatever assertions may be made to the contrary."

"You, at all events, are unvulgar, and need not be jealous of anybody," I remarked.

"Ah," said Lady Constance, smiling, "I see you have realized the truth of another vulgar aphorism, that you can never go wrong in telling a woman that she is pretty. Stick to that rule, and you will do well. I presume you have been to see Miss Dennison since that night?"

"Of course I have," answered I. "We are very old friends; and though I was in love with her once, she never was at all in love with me. You don't mind my seeing her, do you?"

Lady Constance laughed outright. "Why should I mind? The miracle hasn't occurred yet, you know. Now tell me some more news, if you have any to tell."

"I have one thing to tell you," I replied, eager to acquit myself of my task, and have done with it; "but I don't know whether it will interest you. You remember the story of that cousin of mine who was sent away from home in disgrace, and whom I was in a sort of way supposed to replace? Well, my uncle has almost made up his mind to [illegible] him. At least Harry has been staying at Thirlby for some weeks upon trial, as it were, and I believe I may look upon it as tolerably certain now that I shall never be one of the landed gentry of Norfolk."

Lady Constance, who had up to this point been lying back, with her eyes half closed, and had spoken in a weary, apathetic tone out up in her chair now, and looked at me anxiously. "Do you mean to say," she asked, "that you have been an income so to put this man in your place?"

I explained that my cousin's restoration was due to no efforts made by me on his behalf, but simply to the fact that he had a wife and child, of whose existence my uncle had until lately been ignorant.

"A wife and child!" repeated Lady Constance. "This sounds serious. What sort of a wife, and what sort of a child?"

"His wife," answered I, "is a very good sort of woman in her way, but she is not a lady, and I am afraid she will never be made to resemble one. The boy, of course, can be sent to school and learned like other boys."

"Hm! I wouldn't give a five pound note for your chances. Let me see: what was it that cousin of yours did? Was it forgery?"

"No; I am sorry to say it was cheating at cards," I answered. "But this happened a good many years ago, and—"

"Ah, I remember now," interrupted Lady Constance. "That man Chapman told me the whole history, but I did not attend particularly to what he said. Probably he knew very little about it."

"He ought to know as much about it as anybody," I observed. "I am free to disclose now that his name is not Chapman, but Harry Le Merchant. It was his own history that he told you."

Lady Constance started visibly, and I asked her, laughing, whether she was very much astonished.

"I am indeed!" she said; "I am astonished beyond measure. I have always been told, and I have always believed, that it takes a sharp man to make a fool of me; but your gifted cousin has successfully accomplished that feat. He must be a very finished rascal. I wonder, now, what interest he had in telling me in?"

"I don't think [illegible] assuming a false name was so very unnatural," I remarked.

"I was not thinking about his name. What I should like to arrive at is his motive for having urged me to marry you."

"If he did [illegible]," said I, "I believe it was out of pure good-n[illegible]

"So I should think!" returned Lady Constance, serenely. "I never did the wretched creature any injury," she went on. "On the contrary, I always paid him well, and I was more polite to him than ninety-nine people out of a hundred would have been; and yet, knowing all the time that he intended to cut you out, he actually had the audacity to tell me in so many words that your expectations were no assured on anybody's in the kingdom."

"It looks rather awkward, I admit," said I; "but the explanation is simple enough. He never believed that my uncle would be induced to overlook his offense; and indeed I don't know that he wished very much to be forgiven."

THE CONDITION OF THE FREEDMEN.

By FREDERICK DOUGLASS.

Whatever the lately emancipated slaves in the Southern States have made any sensible degree of progress since they obtained their freedom is a question often put to me in a tone of doubt and denial. Another question, equally pertinent, and even more momentous in view of the history of Yazoo, Hamburg, and the recent slaughter at Danville, is this: Have the recent slave-holders made any sensible degree of progress in civilization since the emancipation of their slaves? Are they more industrious, honest, and humane than when they bought, sold, and flogged their fellow-men to toil for them without wages? These two questions, like the two sides of a horse, should go together, since they are largely dependent upon each other. Plainly enough the recent bondsman can make little progress without the consent and co-operation of the ruling class among whom they live, and who own the land upon which they live. Nobody seems to doubt the progress of the masters, but everybody is curious to know how the freedmen are getting along.

Well, it is not for me to speak for the late slave holders. They have never been in want of defenders. It is mine, by your leave and may manimity, to speak for the class less favored. The answer to the question now put to them is of vital importance. It is shall be found that the freedmen are progressive and improving, that they only need time, patience, and a fair chance in the race of life to become useful citizens, making the nation prosperous in peace and powerful in war, then is, I believe, justice and generosity enough in the American people to supply the needed conditions of success. If, on the other hand, they are found to be non-progressive, worse masters to themselves than their old masters were to them, that liberty neither improves their character nor condition, they are sure to be treated in the end as cumberers of the ground, and will in due season perish from the earth. Civilization is all love and tenderness toward whatever accords and co-operates with it, but implacable, cruel, and remorseless to all obstacles. It spares neither forest, mountain, nor ocean, and it will not spare Indian, Mongolian, or Ethiopian. All must go along with it, or be crushed beneath its swift-flying wheels.

Before answering pro or con concerning the progress of the freedmen candid men will run the parallel of other people, namely, what these people were before they were emancipated, under what conditions they were emancipated, and what have been the means of improvement within their reach since they were emancipated? All will admit that it would be manifestly and grossly unfair to judge the freedmen without taking their ante cedents into account. They should be measured, not from the height yet to be attained, but from the depths from which they have come.

My relation to these people does not make me [illegible] ears against facts favorable or unfavorable to them. I know no race in my regard but the human race. The same feeling that led me to risk my life to save that of a white boy in my boyhood made me espouse the cause of the slave as soon as I was able to think.

The question asked at the beginning of this article includes mental, moral, and material improvement. What the American people want to know, and have a right to know, is whether the lately enslaved load better lives and have made for themselves more comfortable conditions of existence than in slavery—whether during these twenty years they have advanced, stood still, or retrograded.

Let us first compare their mental condition of twenty years ago with what it is at present. Prior to emancipation the colored intellect of the South made no visible sign—and could make no sign—of life or power. It was suppressed and shrouded in darkness. Letters were unknown. The law made fast and imprisonment the penalty for teaching one of these cabin children to read. So far down were they in the scale of intelligence that they were deemed by many incapable of mastering the rudiments of an English education. Even in religion nothing more than oral instruction was allowed them. "Servants, obey your masters, and be contented with your lot," was the most they got of this, but of this they got abundance, both by arguments from the pulpit on Sunday and by the rhetoric of the lash in the field on Monday. In those days a colored man who could read was a curiosity, and was generally set down in the estimation of the white people as a dangerous character. It would be easy to enlarge upon this mental midnight darkness, but I will leave something to the reflection of the intelligent reader.

I affirm that in nothing have these illiterate and benighted people made more progress than in the [illegible] knowledge. There are now in the Southern States, according to statistics in the Bureau of Education at Washington, between two and three hundred thousand colored children attending schools during some portion of the year. Of course this is but a small proportion of the children there of school age, and for whom there is no provision. The amount of illiteracy is therefore still great and deplorable. The antipathy inherited from slavery to allow the States to be taxed for the education of the laboring classes is still strong, and the general government, which had no hesitation in crossing State lines to catch slaves, has thus far too much respect for the sovereign dignity of the States to cross those lines to secure civil rights to education to its citizens.

It may be adduced as a fair argument that the freed people have made some progress in the matter of education, that now nobody can be found to deny their capacity for education. If any such could be found, they would only need to visit the public schools here in Washington, and witness the qualifications of the colored teachers and the aptitude of the colored pupils to learn, their doubts and denials made ridiculous. Colored children, to the credit of the statesmen of twenty years ago, have commodious school houses, competent teachers, and are pursuing the same course of study that white children pursue, and with almost equal success.

With respect to the moral progress of the lately enslaved class I am sorry to speak in a somewhat lower tone. But the same rule of judgment should be applied here as elsewhere. They are in this respect, as well as others, the legitimate results of their antecedents. The sense of right and the voice of conscience had little chance of cultivation in the relation of master and slave. Conduct in that relation was guided by force and fear. Mutual interest and common welfare were excluded from that relation. Its corner-stone was composed of the blood-cemented fragments of the moral constitution of human nature. Each party to it found himself impelled to do that which was not to the advantage of the other. They were mutual enemies on the same territory, and in daily unfriendly contact. In his notes on Virginia Mr Jefferson says, "The whole commerce between master and slave is a perpetual exercise of the most boisterous passions, the most unremitted despotism on the one part, and degrading submission on the other." In such a state of society the moral sense was blunted, and the voice of conscience suppressed. The attributes of a manly character such as liberty now demands had no chance of development. The master found what he could and all he could from the slave, and the slave in turn stole all he could from the master, his only restraint being the fear of detection and punishment. He was born into a society organized to defraud him of the results of his labor, and he naturally enough thought it no robber to obtain by stealth—the only way open to him—a part of what was forced from him under the hard conditions of the lash. I do not pretend to deny that there was ever a generous slave-holder or honest slave, for I know the contrary, but I equally know that the system made wrongs of one class and thieves of the other.

As to social relations, the system was even more destructive and deadly. Its victims were herded together like horses, sheep, and swine, without the restraints of moral instruction or decency. The master was made more important by every addition to his slaves. Marriage did not exist; the family was abolished. The young had no reputation to gain, and the old had none to lose.

Let it be remembered in respect to the morals of these people that streams are not easily diverted from well worn channels, that the moral character formed under the conditions thus feebly described is not easily or speedily reformed. There is not only much to learn, but much to unlearn. It is sad to think of the multitude who only dropped out of slavery to drop into prisons and chain-gangs, for the crimes for which they are punished seldom rise higher than the stealing a pig or a pair of shoes; but it is consoling to think that the fact is no due to liberty, but to slavery, and that the evil will disappear as these people recede from the system in which they were born.

From what has been now said it must not seem that I have conceded that there has been no improvement in the manners and morals of the freedmen since emancipation. I do not admit any such thing, for in morals, as in mental power, according to my knowledge, classes of men many sources of information, there is a visible and growing improvement both in honesty and chastity. What was once done among these people not only with impunity but with shameful boasting, and without apparent sense of wrong or shame, does not now escape the rebuke and reprobation of a large and growing class of their own color. There is every where among them a dawning recognition of the new order of life and society into which [illegible] has brought them, and they are gradually adjusting themselves to the requirements of a higher civilization. Churches, preachers, teachers, [illegible]-day-schools, night schools, day schools, sewing schools, and other schools, societies for [illegible] aid, debating societies, libraries, and [illegible] clubs, lawyers, doctors, editors, and newspapers, have sprung up and have multiplied with wonderful rapidity. These come me from mere activity. Sin is death to such effort. They show an upward tendency which may well [illegible] pious and benevolent effort in their behalf, and [illegible] Mr Slater in magnificent donation to the cause of their elevation.

It is noticeable, too, that [illegible] old camp-meeting emotional religion is subsiding [illegible] them, and that thought is taking the place of [illegible] In the dark time of slavery, when this [illegible] only toil, [illegible] pain for them, [illegible] ready wrought [illegible] of mourning by the pastoral and [illegible] of the world. They are now beginning [illegible] thing can [illegible] made of this world.

other. Of course some of them are still wearing the old cast-off theological hats and coats of fifty years ago, but the young people who have learned to read and write have no further use for those old garments. They now demand an educated, chaste, and upright ministry. The spirit of improvement has cost the old-time preachers many sighs and groans. They can lay it only down of true religious feeling. However that may be, it is evident that morals and manners have gained by the change, and will continue to gain as the lump of knowledge grows brighter among them. No doubt that even the wild incoherent Sambo sermons were a help in time of slavery. It was something to be told that their suffering time would soon be over, and that fine stripes on earth they would have more to heaven, even though it was clumsily and wildly told, but the want of those days will not do for them. Those old-fashioned preachers minister to passion, decry the intellect, and induce contentment in ignorance and stupidity and are hence a hinderance to progress. The effect aimed at by their preaching is to excite feeling, and raise a shout—a thing which can be as well done by an eloquent stump-speaker as by any modern Whitefield.

Among the instrumentalities which have been most effective in lifting up these people to a higher plane of life none is more worthy of mention than the American Missionary Association. While it has taken the church among the freedmen, it has not forgotten to take the school house. But nearly all denominations, Catholic as well as Protestant, have rushed into this vast field, each after its kind, to labor for the salvation of the late slaves. This is the more surprising in view of the long years during which our churches could more easily see the heathen thousands of miles over the wide waste of waters than at home. But let the dead past bury its dead.

I now come to the question as to what was the physical condition of these people before emancipation; and in referring to it I bear in mind that I am speaking to many of a generation to whom slavery is little more than a name, and who have no adequate idea of what that means covered. I have had this class of readers in mind in all I have said, and I deem it fortunate that you have allowed me to speak my word on this subject through your respected journal. With the exception of a few highly favored house servants, the physical condition of the slaves was indescribably wretched. A bushel of corn and eight pounds of salt pork per month was considered a large allowance for a full grown man. The huts in which they lived left them largely exposed to the mercy of the elements. Their beds were boards, and their covering a miserable blanket, with which they were served not even once a year. Much of the time they were worked under the lash in all weathers. Want, exposure, and cruelty brought to them bodily ills and general physical deterioration often to the extent of repulsive deformity. That physical well being is essential to physical perfection is easily demonstrated both in the case of man and beast. Men laugh at the irregular make-up of the negro, but forget that no people, white or black, could preserve the finer attributes of physical manhood subjected to two hundred and fifty years of slavery. The woes of the slave mother can be read in the faces of her children. Slavery has twisted their legs, flattened their feet, and imparted a depressed and cowardly aspect to their features. Let those who laugh rather be ashamed of the crime against human nature which has produced the deformity over which they make merry.

Looking at the freedmen to-day, in that class which remains on the old plantations, we see but little improvement in food as raiment, as form or feature. Twenty years are but a speck in the life of a race. Still, even here there is improvement. Many have managed to get a few acres and a little home of their own. In the State of Louisiana colored people pay taxes on more than twenty millions' worth of property, and in Georgia, according to the late Senator Hill, of that State, they paid taxes five years ago on six millions. I doubt not of a showing equally creditable in North Carolina, Virginia and other of the old Slave States. The manner in which these people were set free should never be overlooked. No people were ever emancipated under conditions more unfavorable for good results. The forefathers had spoils of the Egyptians, the serfs of Russia had three acres of land given to each head of a family, the West India slaves was permitted to remain upon the old plantation, but the American slave was turned loose to the open sky without money, land, or friends, and, worst of all, under the fierce resentment of those who owned the land from which he must obtain his bread. Those in the heat of momentary wrath drove him away, and many he want, free, but free only to want, hunger, and pain, foes to the chilling blasts of winter, free to starve. Off he went with his sick and well, young and old, and the infant in arms. Many died, and the mortality for a time caused the belief that the race would speedily die out. From the gallery of the United States Senate I heard an able Senator from the North answer Mr. Sumner's plea for suffrage with the remark that it was useless to legislate for these people, since they were sure to die out in a short time. But the old masters who thus resented emancipation relented, if they did not repent, and after a time called back the freedmen to their old fields and quarters. They saw that they had lost away the hands, but had left the mouths, and that they still needed the negro to work their fields—a fortunate discovery for both. Instead of dying out, as predicted, the census tells us these people have increased ten per cent faster than the native born white people of the South.

In conclusion—

When I consider that these people have only been free during the last twenty years, and that this freedom has been more in name than in fact, when I consider the manner in which their emancipation was brought about, not with the consent, but against the consent, of the masters; when I consider the fact that it was born of blood boiling over on the battle-field, the wounded pride and callus determination it left in the old master class smarting under defeat, and the many obstacles thrown in the way of the progress of these people—I am far from discouraged or dissatisfied. On the contrary, I see the colored people steadily rising, and I believe they will unanimously fully justify all the endeavors made in their behalf, and fulfill the highest hopes of their friends.

WASHINGTON IN WALL STREET.

THE rain-storm which fell upon New York upon the hundredth anniversary of the last day on which a foreign soldiery trod its streets was a serious public misfortune. We have no knack, as a race, at making pageants. But the pageant which was to celebrate the centennial Evacuation-day was arranged, and would have been carried out, with a liberality and comprehensiveness, and at the same time with a measure and decorum, that would have impressed the importance of the event celebrated upon every man and woman, native born or foreign born, in this great and diverse capital. There does not seem to have been a detail of the programme not of the ovation, as has as it was executed, from the formal "exercises" of the day to the least pretending decoration of a dwelling as a shop front, to which just exception could be taken.

And even the chill November rain could not deprive the ceremonies of their greatest and best impressiveness—that which came from the evidence that the celebration was spontaneous and popular. Those who, with Emerson, "love not the smallest interest in any holiday except as it ministers real and non-pretended joy," must have been cheered to see the universal glow of patriotism that many waters could not put out. An ovation which assembled the President of the United States and the Governors of seven States of the old thirteen would have been memorable in our event, but it was not the official but the unofficial celebration which was most memorable, the tens of thousands standing their ground doggedly to see the great procession—of more than 20,000 men, it was reckoned—pass by, that they might not miss the memory of the centennial celebration to seem to become legendary with the event it celebrates.

It was a fortunate thought that the unveiling of the statue of Washington should be the culminating event of the celebration, while the bronze colossus remains as a durable memorial of the day, "and bids the distant generations hail!" But, as the readers of Mr. Curtis's oration already have, the event which the statue specifically commemorates is the inauguration of Washington as the first President of the United States within a few feet of the station of this effigy, April 30, 1789. It is not the sworded Commander-in-Chief of the Continental forces, but the first President of the United States, with the fasces of magistracy, whom Mr. Ward's statue represents.

The figure is of bronze, twice the size of life (twelve feet and a half high), and stands upon a marble pedestal level with the floor of the portico of the Sub-Treasury, erected in the centre of the broad flight of marble steps that gives access to the building. Below and in front of the pedestal is a simple platform for speakers, in the pavement of which is imbedded the veritable slab of red sandstone upon which Washington stood when he took the oath of office. It was one of the flags in the flooring of the balcony of Federal Hall, the renamed City Hall, enlarged and decorated by popular subscription, at a cost of $32,000, for the inauguration of the first President and the meeting of the first Congress of the United States under the Constitution, with the hope of securing the seat of government for New York. And this slab was happily saved when old Federal Hall was torn down to make room for the Greek temple which was built for a Custom house and now does duty as a Sub-Treasury.

The placing of the figure is very fortunate, and the statue justifies its compeers-masters and its site. The only faults found with it have been that it is too large and too glaring. That last drawback is very short season of weathering will amend, and it is not a fault, for the color is in fact unusually mellow for brand new bronze. It is quite tenable, however, whether the shining aspauses of the right cheek does not aggravate, if, indeed, by throwing the eye into deeper shadow than was meant, it does not cause the unpleasant expression of this side of the face from any point of view to the southwest of the statue and at a moderate distance. The countenance, lofty and not without sweetness from any other point of view, is from this point of view "lofty and sour"—an expression which the sculptor can not have intended, and could not have passed unamended if it had been in his model, from which, of course, the shoes and reflection of the bronze surface were absent. As to scale, that is in part a question of position and surroundings. It should not be forgotten that the scale of the statue will often be given by a human figure on the rostrum beneath, and continually by passers on the steps, and that a figure nearly the size of life would be dwarfed by this juxtaposition, while a more nearly normal size would be more appropriate in a position where the detachment of the work one secured. But the question of scale is at last a question whether the work justifies its magnitude, and for us this is what Mr Ward's Washington does. From every point of view the silhouette of the figure is admirable, and in a detached figure it is the silhouette that chiefly counts. The hanging cloak is an excellent device for securing a visible stability and poise, and the action is very cleverly carried to the point, and very decisively stopped at the point, at which animation threatens to become inconsistent with sculptural repose. One can take a circuit from either buttress to any point of view from which the whole figure is within the field of vision without finding an awkwardness, without finding a point of view at which the artist has not been beforehand with him. The one disappointing view of the face we have already noted. But, upon the whole, is may perhaps be said that the figure as well as the face is more commanding and inspiring when seen from the east (the left) side than from the west, though this remark notes a difference merely between the pictures and comparative degrees of impressiveness, not between impressiveness and unimpressiveness. From one point of view to the east, the statue seems to hit the superlative degree in modern sculpture, as large and free and noble it looks. From everywhere it is unmistakably a human figure, the anatomy felt through its vestments, not a stuffed suit of bronzed clothes, and this is a positive attainment in contemporary sculpture. The modelling of detail in everywhere thorough, sometimes exquisite. But what is most admirable in the subordination of all this detail to the outline and attitude, which speak from afar, and make or mar a statue. There is an exhibiting of subtleties of treatment, one of the technical boons which mislead so many clever modellers. The treatment is large, simple, severe—in one word, sculptural, and the more so, perhaps, in that the sculptor has accepted what we may call the mythic Washington, without undertaking to refine upon it to subtlety of characterization. One is almost tempted to say, in spite of the liability to be misunderstood, that subtlety of conception has nothing to do with sculpture, and is inexpressible by sculpture which is sculpture. Of the statues in New York that are worth talking about at all, more than one is subtler than Mr Ward's Washington. This one is more characteristic, and that one more intimately expressive, more than one is more picturesque, but it is hard to say that any other is equally statuesque.

It is fortunate that Washington should have been commemorated by an effigy worthy of the duration that seems assured to this. It is especially fortunate that Wall Street should have a lasting reminder as a noble work of sculpture, as it had already in a noble work of architecture, that a man's life really does not consist in the abundance of the things which he possesses.

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

THE La Crosse Chronicle notes appreciatively the presence in that town of the Hon. Nathan Myrick, of St. Paul, who was the first settler upon that spot on the prairie which is now occupied by La Crosse. Mr Myrick left Prairie du Chien in a keel-boat on November 4, 1841, and arrived at La Crosse Prairie on November 8. It was forty two years later to a day that the Chronicle noticed Mr Myrick looking around with pride upon a city of 20,000 inhabitants. Mr Myrick is a vigorous man, and one would not believe, to look at him, that he was twenty years of age when he left his keel-boat and built on the prairie the shanty that grew into the present city of La Crosse.

An account of a "lynching" in Russellville, Kentucky, closes with the assurance, "The mob is said to have been composed of the best citizens." It is to be inferred that the hanging took off nobody more valuable than one, perhaps, of the second-best citizens.

A red-skinned urchin of the Western wilds abandoned the religion of his fathers for that of the pale-faced missionaries, and was sent to England to be educated at Eton. In an unfortunate moment of displeasure a tutor soundly birched the youngster. Shortly afterward the tutor was mysteriously scalped, and the red skinned student was sent to Eton no more. The young American who thus distinguished himself by carrying away what an saber student had ever acquired at Eton was none other than Sitting Bull. All American journals using this information are indebted to the Paris Figaro, whose intimate knowledge of persons and things in this country has on countless occasions helped out the American press.

A person who describes himself as "a gentleman on the wrong side of middle life, with a family at home," writes to the Pall Mall Gazette of his purchase of a stamp at an English post-office where young women clerks are employed. Two girls were behind the counter when he asked for his "Queen's head," and though they heard his request, he avers, they continued the conversation which engaged them. "And did he kiss you?" one of them asked, while he waited. The other assured her that "he" did, and this important point being settled, one of the girls condescended to hear the waiting man's repeated request.

Locomotive No. 20 on the Detroit, Lansing, and Northern road is known as the haunted engine. Several persons have been killed under the wheels on one side of the locomotive, and the men are employed about it now that when the engine is running it gives out a sound on that side like the moaning of a human being in distress. It has been thoroughly oiled, but the mysterious sound can not be stopped. Several persons who claim to have been near support the engineer in the assertion that recently, while No. 20 was standing on the track, and as one was touching the bell-rope, the bell began ringing, and continued for several seconds. There was no "unlucky engine" on any of the New England roads a few years ago, which at last came to be regarded as haunted.

If we may believe the cable report that Queen Victoria weighs two hundred pounds, and is getting comfortably fatter every day, the disturbance caused to her by the news that the Irish societies had barred O'Donovan Rossa to walk in the Evacuation-day parade must have been very slight. O'Donovan said, when he received his invitation, "I should like to think what the Queen will say when she hears of it." It does not transpire that she said anything. Perhaps the news was kept from her. The patriot can see in decency find fault if it was. He had his cheekie; the retained her peace of mind. The balance is preserved.

The utility of the telephone is illustrated in some new way every few days. Mr Ward Hunt, Jom., of Utica, arose the other morning to find that his house had been ransacked by burglars. The dispatch says further, "Mr Hunt's wardrobe was so depleted that he had to telephone for a suit of clothes." Now if Mr Hunt had been robbed a few years earlier, or the telephone had been invented a few years later, his dilemma would have called for more than a casual mention.

A Texas paper threatens to print the names of its delinquent subscribers. "Better stick to the old plan of printing the names of those who pay," says a neighbor, "it is easier."

Within a comparatively brief period two residents of Louisville have died of strains suffered while acting as pall-bearers. It is believed that this fact moved Professor J. Lawrence Smith, of that city, a well known scientific man, to request in his will that none of his friends be asked to be bearers of his coffin, and to direct that six strong men be employed for that purpose. Upon his death six masculine students in a theological seminary volunteered to be pall-bearers, but their services were not accepted, and men robust laborers were procured to a marble yard, who, still wearing their blouses, went in the funeral and bore the coffin.

It is announced that there is to be in Washington during the coming winter a Mexican lady of remarkable beauty, who "speaks English perfectly." Her acquired accomplishment will be quite likely than her natural gift in provoke jealousy.

An item in the local column of a Western newspaper notices: "William Lechleidmaster invites his friends to call at his place, corner of Vine and Third streets, and enjoy a choice pork-and-bean lunch all day Saturday." That seems a long time to devote to a lunch of such a substantial character, but of course there is no deep-seated objection to the whole-souled pursuit of any innocent recreation. The manner in which Mr Lechleidmaster's pork and beans were eaten all day Saturday in response to this invitation may be inferred from the following item, which appears in the same newspaper: "The ladies of the Episcopal church met with Mrs J. J. French yesterday. In the evening a number of young gentlemen were invited in to tea, and partook of the boundless hospitality of the ladies with a very nice and natural grace." When any man eats pork and beans from the rising to the setting of a Saturday's sun, or through the fullness of any other day, it were interesting and commendable to have the grace wherewith he does on of the sort herein specified.

A SWEET FAREWELL.

The sunny blossoms of the clematis
Linger the last of all the fragrant flowers,
Bringing remembrance of the summer's bliss,
And softly blessing autumn's misty hours.
And so—the winter being almost here—
They fade and die, they sweet and sweeter grow,
Like some fair spirits that become more dear
Nearing the time when they from earth must go.

A NIGHT OF TERROR.

By KATHARINE S. MACQUOID.

CHAPTER I.

It had been a bright and bitterly cold day. Toward sunset, however, clouds gathered, and the wind, which grew every hour more intense in its ice-like chill, soon spread these clouds over the upper part of the sky, and banished the brightness which had made the cold seem most endurable.

A lad about twelve years old was standing on the ridge that crested one side of a steep valley. He drew up the fur collar of his coat about his ears and pulled his fur cap down over his face before he began to descend to the river, which almost circled the town of Freitenberg, standing on the heights opposite.

Behind him the sun was still shining in fitful splendor. Ten minutes ago, before the clouds spread over its brightness, the old town, with its walls and numerous gate towers, had been bathed in gold. Now this had changed to a deep gray, except for the gilded vanes of the Rathhouse and those of the twin church spires, and against this massive background carts and horses and figures hurrying out of the city by the Regen-Thor showed with startling distinctness. While the boy on the opposite hill gazed at the multitude which came thronging out of the gate he saw that they all took the same road—that which led down the steep cliff to the one-arch bridge, and on on to the road below where he stood.

"What can have happened?" he said to himself; "it is not quite a week since I went away from Freitenberg."

The boy took less out of the open field where he had been standing to a wood on the side of the steep descent, river and road were alike hidden from view by the close-growing tree stems, and he hurried on, eager to learn what all this concourse meant.

"There is no fete till Easter," he thought, "it is not even market-day."

Then he smiled, for he well knew that market-day never brought such a throng of people into Freitenberg.

Long before he left the wood he ears told him that the crowd was passing along the road below, and when he at last reached the gate leading into this, he saw with increased wonder that the hurrying people were not strangers, but fellow townsmen and townswomen.

He looked first at one face, then at another, of those who were hurrying by, and there was the same look on every face—a look of terror.

"Hallo, Heinrich!" he called out, "what is the matter, and where are you all going?"

The man, a big brawny-looked smith, shook his head, and pointed to the cart beside which he walked. In it were his wife, two children, and a heap of household goods that seemed to have been flung into the cart at random.

Franz Herber turned to walk beside the smith. "No time for words, my lad. Have you not heard the French are marching on Freitenberg? They will be here to-night—let in, if you will."

The woman in the cart began to sob. "The French are butchers, if they catch us they will kill us," she cried, and she hugged her little ones closely.

"Thank you, Heinrich," the boy said; "I must go home at once to see after my grandmother."

"Lorenz Inchoff will see to her," the smith answered. "You are foolish if you go into Freitenberg."

"How long has this been known?" the boy asked.

"To-day," said Heinrich briefly; and he stopped on his horse.

Franz left him, and went rapidly toward the bridge. Everywhere he saw sullen, sometimes terrified, men and sobbing, despairing women. Those he asked had but one answer to his questions: "The French are coming; they are even now at the gates; that devil's crew, the worst of all that came out of Moscow."

In spite of his excitement the boy had to climb the opposite hill slowly, for the severe frost had made the steep road slippery. The gate was so thronged that instead of trying to force his way in, he passed on along the road outside the walls until he came to a smaller gate, a sort of postern, and through this he entered the town.

Here all was hurry and bustle, making a strange contrast with the leaden-colored sameness of the sky, and by this time the clouds had drooped so low that they seemed almost to touch the high-peaked roofs of Freitenberg. Under this canopy the red roofs looked taller than ever, and every detail of carved wooden gable, of sculptured stone dormer, and the plaster ornament between the multiform and irregularly placed windows showed out vividly.

Many of the houses of this small city seemed made for princely habitation, they were so lofty and stately-looking, though, for the most part, the lower stories were made up of court-yards, or Höfe, as they were called. These larger houses were chiefly found in the Herren Gasse, a broad, handsome street, with the Rathhaus at one corner, and looking down to the small gate by which Franz had come in. The market-place was at his further end in front of the Rathhaus, and Franz ran on to this, for though the Herren Gasse was deserted, he saw a crowd of people at the corner of the market-place, and on he reached it the councillors came out, and one of them stood on the steps of the Rathhaus, and said a few words to the crowd. Then he, too, hurried away, and Franz went back into the Herren Gasse.

Presently he turned out of it into a much narrower street on the right, and then into a curiously twisting alley leading into one rather wider. Here some of the houses were large, too. All had high-pitched gable ends, but few of them had large Höfe, and the living-rooms were on the ground-floor. Scarcely two houses were alike in either of the narrow streets. At the angle they made stood a house remarkable for the carving on the gable and on the oriel at one side. Two angels were used as brackets to support this window; in a niche above the nail-studded door was a figure of Our Lady with the Holy Child in her arms. The windows were low and square, protected by ornamental iron-work. Franz opened a little door in the large carriage gates and went into a small covered court-yard. He stopped and looked round, but there was no sign of departure here, and then he closed the door behind him.

The court-yard was dark, only lighted by the window of a great stone staircase at its further end. And on this murky afternoon, if Franz had not known his way well, he must have stumbled against the steps leading up to a door on the left of the entrance, but ever since the death of his parents, some years ago, he had been reared in his grandmother's old home. He hurried up the steps and opened the heavy door, pushed away the curtain that screened its inner side, and went in.

The large low room looked gloomy, but it felt warm and comfortable to the lad, who had been walking on many miles in the cold. Dark woollen curtains were drawn in front of the broad windows, and a fire of logs blazed up the broad chimney, showing the dark projecting oak beams, and the white ceiling between them. The cumbrous table and chairs were all of dark oak; on were the floor and the walls. This room was the kitchen as well as the living-room, so, instead of a closed stove, the broad stone hearth was open.

Beside the hearth an old woman sat in a three-cornered wooden chair, behind her was a huge folding black screen; her spinning wheel was at her side, but she was not spinning; her withered hands were folded together on her knees, and she sat quite still and silent. When the door opened, however, she gave a quick glance toward it; but when she saw her grandson she smiled.

Franz went up to her and kissed her forehead, then he stood beside her chair.

"Well, my boy, has your time passed pleasantly?" she said.

As the fire-light shone on his fair hair and sun-browned face her smile vanished, for there was such a sad seriousness in his bright blue eyes.

"What is it, my child?" she said. "Tell me, Franz, what has happened to you."

The boy looked round the room. "Nothing has happened to me, and I left my oncle well."

"She will be here presently; she is with Gretchen upstairs. But what is the bad news, my boy?"

"Every one is running out of Freitenberg, away from the French; they are going down the hill and across the bridge like a flock of frightened sheep. I saw all the Councillors leaving the Rath-haus as I came up the Herren-Gasse."

She drew herself up by grasping the arms of her chair, and sat erect looking earnestly at Franz.

"What do you mean, child? The Rathe do not hold council at this time of day."

"But, grandmother, don't you see—" he began, impatiently; then, shocked by the pale still face so near his own, he went on more quietly: "I had better begin at the beginning, and then you will understand. This is what I heard as I came along some hours ago—I don't know how long—a man came riding through the Spital-Thor, his horse covered with foam and ready to fall with fatigue when it stopped in front of the Golden Hirsch; the men gasped out, 'The French, the French are coming'; and then the Herr Walters and the Herr Stantchen, who were standing by, took the men into the Inn."

"Well?" said the grandmother.

"Well, he came to bring news of the French. Only last week Lorenz Inchoff was telling how the great French army had been defeated, and he said the soldiers that were left would perish on the way from Moscow; but they are alive, grandmother, and"—the boy's eyes were round with excitement—"that regiment, the worst of all, that calls itself 'Sans Merci,' is coming here to ruin Freitenberg."

His grandmother did not speak, but she clasped her hands together as she looked up, and her lips moved.

"Now do you not see why the Rathe called a council? One man said all the gates must be closed, and all the towers over them filled with fighting men. But, grandmother, that puzzled me, for we have no soldiers in Freitenberg—and those are two places in the walls which have never been mended, through which soldiers could get in directly."

"I heard a stir," Frau Herber said; "but Magdalene has been busy all day with Gretchen, she has not been out, and we have heard no news. . . . We are in God's hands," she went on, after a pause. "It would be impossible to defend Freitenberg without regular troops."

Franz patted her shoulder. "You ought to be a Rath," he said—"then is just what they decided. Louis Werner came out into the Herren-Gasse and told some of the people as he they stood there waiting."

"Is this all you heard, dear child?"

"Yes, grandmother."

"It is very terrible news," she said, shudder-ing. "God help us!" She knew that the treatment given to unoffending citizens by French artillery was at that time burning in the minds of all classes. "Did you say many people were leaving the town, dear child?"

"Every one, I think. Heinrich the smith said the French would be here soon; they will stop the night here, and take all they can get, and go on again in the morning. But I shall not let them rob you, grandmother," he said, proudly; "I shall bar the gates, and fire at them with my father's fowling piece."

She stroked his hair with her withered hand. "You are a brave boy, Franz; but you must not disobey orders, and if the Rathe lay on resistance is to be offered, we must all submit."

Franz stood looking at her. "I saw women crying fit to break their hearts, grandmother, but you do not seem frightened."

"I am an old woman, and it does not much matter what happens to me; I shall stay quietly here. But you and Magdalena may find a secure shelter" she paused. "And yet, perhaps it is better for you to stay. See how far we are from the main streets: the French will keep to them, for they will be worn out with cold and hunger and fatigue. God can keep us as safely here as anywhere else."

Franz shook his head. "No, on, grandmother; we must not stay here to be murdered on our own hearth. If you will not let me fight, we must find some way of escape. If Lorenz Inchoff would let you stay here, I will not."

A door on one side of the fire-place opened, and a woman came into the deeply shadowed corner. Her black dress made her at first indistinct, but as she advanced a fair young face with golden hair like her brother's showed plainly.

This was Franz's sister, Magdalean Herber. She looked at the boy's flushed, eager face, and then she saw that her grandmother was unusually serious.

"Something has been happening," she said. "Tell me what it is."

Franz broke in before Frau Herber could speak: "Magdalena, if you knew some one was coming here to rob the house, and perhaps murder you, what should you do?"

She laughed. "To begin with, there is nothing in the house worth stealing, and there has not been a murder in Freitenberg since I can remember. What has excited you, Franz? Have you been reading fairy tales? You have not even kissed me."

Franz went up to her and kissed her forehead. Of late he had grown impatient of her playful raillery. When he was her Franz, and felt sure that he had no rival in her affection, then Magdalena might do as she pleased, but for some months this had been changed, and Franz felt secretly uneasy. Lorenz Inchoff, the son of one of the wealthy citizens of Freitenberg, often came to the house, and Franz noticed that his sister blushed when Lorenz came, besides, his school-fellows had jeered him, and had asked him when the wedding was going to happen.

"I am not more excited, as you call it, than Herr Walters is, or Heinrich Tafel, or Louis Werner, or any good citizen of Freitenberg. Ah, well, laugh away! Grandmother does not think it a laughing matter. You will not laugh when the French soldiers are in the town: and they are on the road, and the Town Council says we are to sit still while the butchers rob and murder us."

Magdalena's usually pale face turned very white, while her eyes distended. She went up to her grandmother, and put her arms round her. "Can this be true?" she said.

Frau Herber bent her head. "I fear it is too true, my child. Still, when the French soldiers come, they may not harm us. They can not do more than they are permitted to do."

She said the last words in a low voice, but her grandchildren heard them. The girl's face brightened, and Franz looked a little less confident.

"Is there anything to be done?" Magdalena asked.

A minute ago Franz would have told her to pack what she most valued, in readiness for their flight, but now he wanted to let Frau Herber speak.

"It seems to me," she said, "that we may safely stay here: but if Lorenz Inchoff should come and propose to take you both away, then we will consider what he says. Still it is best to be prepared, and it may not be safe to go out late to purchase provisions, my dear child."

"That is what I mean," the girl said. "Come with me now, Franz, or shall I take Gretchen? She has just been telling me of something she will need to-morrow."

She went out of the room quickly to fetch her hood and cloak.

CHAPTER II.

Ten gates of the Inchoff house in the Herren-Strasse stood slightly ajar, though not wide enough to permit entrance. Any one who had peered into the opening them made would have seen a large covered court-yard, vast enough to allow more than one carriage to drive in and deposit its occupants at the foot of a splendid stone staircase on the right of the entrance.

Beyond the first court was another, much longer, but narrower, open to the sky, and surrounded on three sides by two tiers of galleries supported on pillars, open on one side to the court. Both these inner and outer Höfs were paved with round stones, and on this bitter winter's day these were covered with household articles of all kinds, waiting to be packed in a long narrow cart, to which three stout horses were harnessed.

Two men in flat cloth caps and jackets, and a bare-headed woman with full skirts, were packing with the most reckless haste, almost throwing one thing after another into boy which lined the sides and bottom of the cart, as if they were working for a wager. Every now and then they stopped to stamp their feet and rub their hands, for the icy wind whirled into the court-yard as if it was bent on freezing the workers, and on dispersing the boy which lay heaped about, ready to pack with.

Above, in the lowest of the galleries, stood a young man about twenty-five years old, leaning over the carved panelling. He had a frank, handsome face, and a well grown figure. At this moment he looked very impatient. "Be careful, Johann," he called out, as one of the two men below caught up a chased metal goblet and pitched it into the cart. "As well leave the valuables here for the French as damage them by your recklessness. Maria, take that out again, and see that it is carefully wrapped up, and place everything more gently, if you can."

The woman shook her head. "Yes, Master Lorenz, it will said—' if you can.' Time presses. We don't know how soon the French may be here."

"Yes, yes," the older man said; "we ought to have been away from here before now. Hans B—— says they see but three leagues off. By now the Herr Rath and the Frauen Rathina are safe at Altshorn."

"I believe the whole town is leaving," the young fellow said to himself; and then he hurried down the carved staircase, and out through the large double doors (which had been unbarred for the exit of the cart), and went into the street.

This Herren-Gasse—so called because the finest houses of the town stood in it—was silent as the grave. This, indeed, was its normal state, for, except on market-day or on the occasion of any public festival, life and movement were shut in behind the great doors of the houses, the grass grew between its pointed paving-stones. But this afternoon the street which crossed it from the market-place was full; a line of carts and trucks was passing along on its way to the Regen-Thor, on the opposite side of the town, and that by which the French soldiers, in full retreat from Moscow, were expected to enter. Women and children and household goods were heaped into these vehicles, while men walked beside them with sullen, downcast faces, as if they were going against their will.

The young fellow looked at them, and then he went on quickly up a turning at the end of the street. This brought him, as we know, among houses of a different character. Very soon—for the twisted alley was a long one—he stood before the quaint old gabled house with the carved oriel. He turned the handle of the entrance door, but it did not yield; he tried again, and then he rang the long wire bell pull with a wooden handle which hung beside the gate-post. The door was opened by Franz, but as soon as Lorenz entered, the bolted and barred the gate.

Lorenz looked round him impatiently. There were no signs of packing—everything looked quiet and undisturbed. "Your grandmother has not taken alarm, then?" he said, angrily. "or Magdalean either?" He went on, without waiting for an answer, and lifted the latch of the inner door. As he entered, he saw Frau Herber sitting before the fire.

She gave him a startled glance, but she did not move.

"Did you not get the message I sent you?" he said, abruptly. "I hoped to find you all ready to start. I only waited to see my own people off, and then I came round for you. We have not a moment to lose. Where is Magdalena? I have a carriage and two good horses waiting."

While he spoke she stretched out her hand, and he paused.

"Take the young ones, if you will, Lorenz Inchoff, I can not move."

"You need not, you shall be carried, and when you reach Altshorn you will not know that you have made the journey."

She feebly shook her head. "I have not uttered across the threshold since winter began, and to-day it seems to me that the cold is hour enough to freeze one in our seat by the fire. No, Lorenz, I must take my chance. My trust is that in this by-street our house may escape us too, and," she added, "God will watch over me."

"If you stay here," he said, angrily, "you will be butchered by these Frenchmen. I tell you they are the very pack of devils that are on their way here—that regiment that has dipped its name in blood by its cruelties. Their creed is that the old must be rich, and that all means are lawful which can extort money."

Frau Herber grew a little paler, but she kept her faded blue eyes fixed on his glowing face. "Lorenz, my son—for I think you will be my son if you come safe out of these troubles—do not waste time with me; call Magdalena and Franz, and go away with them to Altshorn. Do not fear for me."

"They will not go without you. I am sure they will not." Then he bent and kissed one of the withered hands that lay on her black gown. He was touched by her fortitude. "Grandmother, forgive me for urging you, but is it not selfish to sacrifice these two young lives? for they will not leave you."

Her lips trembled, but she did not answer. Soon, however, she looked serene again.

"Well," he said, "you will come?"

She shook her head. "I agree with King David," she said, pleasantly—"I prefer to fall into God's hands rather than into those of men. I stay here in full trust that He will not let ever me; and look you, Lorenz, these men, merciless though they be, will be foot-sore and exhausted, perhaps long with cold and hunger. You say they will pass the night here. Believe me, they will keep to the beaten track; they will need food and warmth and shelter from the icy wind; they will not come into the by-ways of the city."

"Perhaps that is true," said Lorenz. "Certainly this is a by-street, and the horses are not tall as some of the others are, but the only safety is undoubtable. You will not, then, think of Magdalena, and urge her to fly with me?" He suddenly pounded in his voice.

She gave him a smile full of tender pity. "Even if she stays, I do not fear for her, as you do; but call her, my friend, and let her decide for herself."

Lorenz hurried across the room into the outer court, and running up some of the steps of the huge stone staircase at its farther end, he called out, "Magdalena!"

CHAPTER III.

MAGDALENA had not really believed in the panic which had seized on the little town, but when she went out with Gretchen, the sight of hurrying men and women, the sad, tearful faces, the reckless confusion in which people whom she had always seen calm and collected were leaving their houses, as if they were in flames, thrilled through the girl's sympathetic nature. Two women came hurrying along, and one of them fell down at her feet in an agony of hysterical sobbing. She shrieked and tore at the ground; so convulsed was she that two strong men could scarcely hold her; but at last the one lifted up and placed in a wagon on its way to Ahnborn.

At this the maid Gretchen burst into violent sobbing. "I must go too," she cried. "I will not stay and be murdered, and worse, by those brutes of Frenchmen. Come with me, Fräulein; let us go to Ahnborn."

She began to run along the street, heedless that she had taken the wrong direction. The two men who had lifted the shrieking woman into the cart came up to Magdalena.

"You are Fräulein Herber," one of them said. "This wagon belongs to Herr Walters, there is still room for you and for your maid, and you will be safe at Ahnborn; you will not be safe in Frettenberg, Fräulein," he said, significantly.

Magdalena shuddered with fear, but she shook her head. "You are very kind, but I can not leave the others. Perhaps if Gretchen could go—" then, looking after the maid, she saw that she was almost out of sight. "Wait!" she cried to the men, and then she ran swiftly away.

Terror so possessed Gretchen that when she felt her skirt pulled vigorously she thought herself attacked by a French soldier, and gave a despairing shriek; it took some minutes to assure her that her young mistress had stopped her.

"Hush, Gretchen," the girl said; "I am ashamed of you. Suppose every one behaved as you do! You must quiet yourself."

"I can't," Gretchen sobbed. "There is no use in bidding me come home, Fräulein. I will not stay and be slaughtered like a lamb by those wicked men."

It seemed to the girl that they would be well rid of this excited, frantic creature.

"You are not much like a lamb," she said. "I think you had better go to Ahnborn. There is a place for you in the wagon of Herr Walters."

And when she had seen her placed in the wagon, Magdalena went home. She did not tell in detail what she had seen, or the terror it had aroused in her. Her grandmother's calm sweet face, and the smile of pity she bestowed on the account of Gretchen's alarm, quieted this terror. After all, God could save them if He willed to do so, and if He did not will it, then they might run into equal danger by flight.

Gretchen's absence kept her young mistress well employed, but though she had not told her fears to her grandmother, Magdalena's heart trembled, and she resolved to stay upstairs as long as possible, and then, like a message of joy, Lorenz's call reached her ears.

"Magdalena!" he called again.

There was a pause of waiting silence; then a door shut and opened in a[illegible], and light steps sounded, and then Magdalena came tripping down the massive staircase—panelled so high up that only a glimpse of her fair hair could be seen moving down the upper flight. In a few moments she appeared on the landing. Her fair sunny hair showed golden as she passed the window, and her sweet young face was full of brightness. She looked very lovely as a faint tinge of color rose in her pale face, and a corresponding glow in her dark eyes, at the sight of Lorenz Iserhoff.

She held out her hand, and her lover kept it between both his while he talked with her. They were not yet formally betrothed, so he did not offer her a warmer greeting, and something in the atmosphere of the coming peril gave a certain restraint to his manner. In the face of such danger he who could indulge himself in a caress, it seemed to him, ought to be made of steel.

"Magdalena"—her smile made him think she was unprepared—"have you not heard the bad news? I sent to warn your grandmother; did she not tell you about the French?"

The smile faded out of Magdalena's deep brown eyes, and carried away with it the pretty shell-like pink from her cheek. "Yes," she said, softly, "and Franz has told us."

"You will go with us, then? There is no time to lose."

Magdalena drew back from him. "Oh, Lorenz, I could never leave grandmother. We have sent away the maid, because she was crying with fear, and she has gone in Herr Walters's wagon. How could my grandmother stay here alone?"

"Well, but, dearest"—he again took possession of her hand, as if he felt that that gave him greater power over her—"when she sees that you and Franz are ready and willing to go with me, she will come too."

Magdalena shook her head. "She could not—she must not. I believe she ought to be in bed in this bitter cold, even I can not keep myself warm. If she were to go ever so short a journey, we should find her dead when we arrived." The girl said this with a shiver of horror at herself for using the word in connection with her grandmother.

FOUR PRIMA DONNAS.

THE presence of four great prima donnas in New York is the most remarkable feature of this season of opera. There is not a week during the season which does not afford the public the opportunity of hearing Madame NILSSON, Madame PATTI, Madame GERSTER, or Madame SEMBRICH. Indeed, the attractions sometimes offered simultaneously by both houses are so evenly great that it is difficult to choose between them. For instance, on Wednesday of last week the public was confronted with the announcements that Madame NILSSON and Madame SEMBRICH were to appear at the Metropolitan Opera-house in "Don Giovanni," and Madame PATTI at the Academy in "Aida." The masterpiece of MOZART was pitted against the masterpiece of VERDI, with all its modern glamour, while the greatest living Italian singer, and one but slightly her inferior, were pitted against Madame PATTI, who is, I believe, generally considered the greatest living Italian singer.

I have been careful to speak of Madame NILSSON as the greatest living prima donna, and of Madame PATTI as the prima donna who is generally considered the greatest. Though all four artists are in the first rank, there is a slight gradation in their merits. I would grade them as follows: Madame NILSSON, Madame PATTI, Madame GERSTER, and Madame SEMBRICH, and on looking back I find that I unconsciously mentioned them in this order in speaking of them above. I am aware that all the box-holders at the Academy, and many even at the new house where Madame NILSSON sings, will take exception to my placing the Swedish prima donna ahead of Madame PATTI. I am sure, however, that the small band of musicians who go to the Italian opera will agree with me, and as it is much easier to acquire a million than it is to acquire correct musical taste, I prefer in this instance their indorsement. At the same time it must be remembered that while distinctions are made in favor of one or the other of the artists, the degrees in which one appears to the writer to surpass the other are very slight, and that each has a band of stanch admirers who unhesitatingly proclaim their favorite the greatest of all; therefore, though Madame NILSSON is placed first and Madame SEMBRICH last, I have spoken of the latter as one but slightly Madame NILSSON'S inferior.

And now why is Madame NILSSON put down as the greatest of the four? On the principle that the artist—be he or she poet, painter, or musician—who gives expression with the greatest sincerity and truth to the greatest passions is the greatest artist. Madame NILSSON excels in the interpretations of music which sways the deepest emotions. It is impossible to imagine her in a flippant, trivial rôle. She leaves the Rosinas and Aminas to others, investing herself with the majesty and pathos of Elsa; and it is as difficult to think of Madame NILSSON interpreting one of the unsubstantial heroines of Italian opera as it is to think of Elsa flirting with the Herald or making eyes at the King. It is her glory that she excels as Elsa, the greatest character ever attempted on the Italian stage, though not so great as other heroines of WAGNER. To interpret Elsa requires majesty and grace, and at the same time dramatic passion far beyond the requirements of Italian opera. Singers who have succeeded with the entire range of Italian heroines have attempted Elsa and failed, for the character, while musically beautiful, is dramatically truthful, and its interpretation calls for more than the mere ability to sing. It requires as much study from its dramatic side as any heroine whom SHAKSPEARE created, and the singer who attempts it must possess a fine dramatic method as well as a voice fraught with that mystic elang of passion which we call personal magnetism. Madame NILSSON'S native grace and queenly bearing blend beautifully into the character of Elsa [illegible] Telramund— [illegible] realized—she throws herself with ecstasy into the whirl of the wonderful music with which WAGNER brings the first act to a close. It is unnecessary to go into details concerning the rest of the opera. Her performance reflects the purport of the drama as well as the spirit of the music. I would, however, call attention to one scene in which, to be true to her conception of Elsa, she throws away an opportunity for self-display and applause. It is the scene immediately preceding the departure of Lohengrin. I have seen other prima donnas at this point portray Elsa as crazed with grief. With Madame NILSSON Elsa is so overcome by the fate she has brought upon herself that she stands dazed and almost motionless until the critical moment, when she abandons herself to the emotion she has so long suppressed, and which by contrast comes to the hearer with greater force.

The majority of opera-goers, I believe, prefer her Margherita. I fancy this preference exists because, to the operatic public, GOUNOD'S music is more intelligible and delectable—it interferes less with conversation—than WAGNER'S. Madame NILSSON'S Margherita is not nearly so complete a conception as her Elsa. Though she rises swiftly and surely to the passion and despair of the final climax, she lacks the simplicity of the untutored German maiden in the earlier scenes of the opera. It may not be amiss to add that Elsa is Madame NILSSON'S favorite character. She says she never enjoyed a performance so much as a representation of "Lohengrin" at the Vienna Imperial Opera, in which she took Elsa to Madame MATERNA'S Ortrud. Shortly afterward she paid a tribute to the great German singers, which shows that, unlike many who excel in one department or the other of art, she is free from unworthy jealousies. She frankly acknowledged that the great heroines of WAGNER'S later music-dramas, standing upon heights from which the heroines of Italian opera seem dwarfs, require greater scope of acting and singing for their interpretation than the latter, and that German singers like MATERNA, who interpret them, are greater than the singers who confine themselves to Italian music—and here Madame NILSSON gracefully included herself in the latter class. But very few who have heard her Elsa will agree with her in this modest estimate of herself.

As a mere singer, Madame ADELINA PATTI is supreme. Her voice is beautiful in quality, she has complete and absolute control over the mechanism of song, and her acting is not deficient in grace and sentiment. Indeed, she shows excellent taste and judgment from a dramatic standpoint. But as she has clung steadily to the light traditional heroines of Italian opera, and has not chosen to appear in any character which requires breadth of treatment, it is not unreasonable to suppose that she finds herself limited by nature to the light genre; and it is on the hypothesis, suggested by her own course, that she is wanting in the passion and fervor called for by the interpretation of really great parts, that she is placed second in the list of our prima donnas.

It is unfortunate for Madame PATTI as an artist that she does not merge her personality into the character she is portraying. Thus you do not hear Lucia one night, Traviata the next, and Amina the third, but always Madame PATTI. Take her Lucia as an instance. You sit during the mad scene in rapt admiration of the marvellously executed scales and trills. The luckless Scotch maiden is entirely lost sight of. And if you do think of her, it is not as luckless. She can afford to go mad at so many dollars a trill; and when it is all over she will put a warm cloak around herself, be driven to a comfortable hotel, and send down next morning for her shekels. And yet it is fortunate, from a certain point of view, that in our admiration for Madame PATTI we lose sight of the particular heroine, for we also lose sight of many of the absurdities and incongruities of Italian opera. Consider "La Traviata" as an example. It is a musical setting of "Camille." Camille dies of consumption almost immediately after her reunion with her lover, and the few broken accents in which she gasps farewell are among the most pathetic words spoken in emotional drama. But in the opera this is all very different. The consumptive not only gasps, but sings, and that, too, fortissimo. The opera is therefore an interesting from a scientific as from a musical standpoint. For a woman who, when in the last stages of consumption, can advance with her lover to the foot-lights with an air which says, "I am about to die of consumption, but, before I do so, permit me to execute this difficult passage," and then executes it, is certainly a phenomenon worthy of the attention of medical experts. But to the non-experts among the public such a scene would be absurd and incongruous if their attention were not concentrated upon Madame PATTI.

How supremely Madame PATTI is mistress of the art of song is proved by a little incident in the music-lesson scene in "The Barber of Seville." Before she begins the series of brilliant solos which forms the main attraction of the scene to the general public, she sits down at the piano and executes her solfeggios. They are merely every-day exercises, but they are sung with a matchless grace and purity of tone. Then, too, her execution of rapid passages is remarkable, not only for the rapidity with which they are sung, but also because every note receives its full valuation, so that her phrasing is always clear and distinct, never vague or blurred.

Madame GERSTER'S voice is distinguished by a clear, bell-like purity of tone which gives it a unique value. As an actress she is bright and vivacious. Even the rocks in the Academy scenery which belong to the paleozoic strata of Italian opera, seem to advance to a less remote period when she is on the stage. The quality of Madame GERSTER'S voice is admirably suited to operas of the light genre, like "Sonnambula" and "Linda di Chamounix." She, however, takes more ambitious parts with success. She is pre-eminently the Amina of the modern stage. With less breadth than Madame NILSSON, and less command of the mechanism of song than Madame PATTI, she has a voice so pure, so clear, so supple, that it lends itself with simple and artless grace to BELLINI'S melodies. Her singing of "Ah Non Giunge" is perfection of its kind. Song and voice appear to blend like two petals of the same flower. Besides in Italian opera, Madame GERSTER is heard to great advantage in SCHUBERT'S and SCHUMANN'S songs. Madame GERSTER was born in Kaschau. Her father, who was wealthy, gave her a musical education, that she might sing, as a graceful accomplishment. By the advice of competent judges, she, however, determined to adopt the stage as a profession.

Madame MARCELLA SEMBRICH is a pianist, violinist, and singer. She has appeared in concert in this threefold capacity, but is most distinguished as a singer. She is passionately fond of CHOPIN'S compositions, and it is said makes a pilgrimage to his grave whenever she is in Paris. SEMBRICH is her mother's family name. Madame SEMBRICH'S maiden name was MARCELLINE KOCHANSKY. She was married to WILHELM STENGEL, her first piano teacher of distinction. Madame SEMBRICH was taught in a hard school. Her father was a wandering Galician music teacher, and stories are told that he would awaken during [illegible] nights, and [illegible] the day, would [illegible] him as the [illegible] one of [illegible] means to study [illegible] systematically. LAMPERTI was h[illegible] in singing.

Madame SEMBRICH'S success at the new opera-house has been complete. She brings to a pure, buoyant, ringing soprano the methods of the best school of singing. You can follow her without fear of the result as she soars intrepidly up to the highest notes of the soprano register. Her répertoire covers a wide range. Her success in highly dramatic scenes is, however, limited by her elementary acting. But she is, despite this limitation, the most charming singer who has made her début here since Madame GERSTER was first heard at the Academy.

While the appearance of these four prima donnas is the most remarkable feature of this opera season, another feature not less gratifying is the great success of "Lohengrin" at the new house. It has drawn the largest audiences—in fact, the only great audiences—from the opening night until the performance of "Don Giovanni." It proves very conclusively that the tendency of the day is toward the Wagnerian music-drama, and it will infuse hope into the projectors of the union which is to pave the way for the production, on a suitable scale, of WAGNER'S works in this country.

ROCK FORMATIONS ON LAKE SUPERIOR.

THE famous Pictured Rocks of Lake Superior annually attract to the southern shore of that mighty body of water vast numbers of tourists from every portion of the republic and from Europe. The cliffs border of the lake is of sandstone interlaid with strata of gravel; and stretching along the shore at a point beginning at about one hundred miles from the Sault Ste Marie, and ending at a point sixty miles from Marquette, are the Pictured Rocks. The entire panorama, if we may thus call it, is in Schoolcraft County, Michigan, and the curious formations have been named by French voyageurs, tourists, and chance comers. Not altogether appropriate or euphonious are these titles, but the localities depicted by our artist on page 789 are fitly named La Chapelle, Grand Portal, and The Cascade. In the native guide, however, these are known as "The Great Door" and "The Chapel." Less prominent in the series is "Sail Rock," a fallen mass of limestone which bears so close a resemblance to a schooner under full sail, and heading for the cliffs, that a passing stranger might well hail her ghostly skipper, if he beheld her in the dark, and warn him against the dangerous coast. The Grand Portal gives into a cave worn into the massive ledge of limestone. The cave widens slightly from the entrance, and is one hundred and eighty feet wide at its ampliest part, and four hundred feet long. The floor is the crystal wave, except in the back part, where the rocks are exposed, and afford a firm footing for the explorer. From the watery floor to the arched roof above, the height varies from one hundred and fifty to two hundred feet. The sweep of this arch is well nigh perfect in its symmetry, and as one looks out upon the surface of the lake from the cave, the effect of the exterior picture, framed as it is in the rocky curve of the portal, is striking and novel. The yellow sandstone drips with moisture, and is festooned here and there with close-growing mosses and lichens that dashes with olive greens and grays the stony surface. The side entrance to this wonderful cave is flanked by rocky columns of an exaggerated Egyptian type. They remind the traveller of the gigantic monoliths of Thebes and Karnak; or, to use a more commonplace figure, they are Titanic hour-glasses in shape, the lower members being partially submerged in the crystal tide. At evening, when the rays of the setting sun light up the surface of the lake, and the colors of the sunset are diffused throughout the atmosphere, the reflections that play along the inner walls of the cave, and gild with strange beauty the glistening roof, make the place seem like a bit of fairy-land.

The Chapel so closely resembles the ruin of some ancient temple that it is difficult to resist the idea that this is the work of men's hands, rather than the result of centuries of [illegible] wind and wave upon the friable rock. Seen from the beach, where the outlines are partially concealed by the thickets, one may fancy that here are the gloomy portals of some crumbling Hindoo temple, or the outer columns of the caves of Elephanta. The dome, which is deeply concave, is a solid mass of sandstone one hundred and ninety feet long and sixty feet wide. In the rear, and on the eastern side, it is supported by the cliff, into which it, the cave, has been hollowed, and on the front and west by huge columnar masses, resembling in contour the supports of the vaults of The Portal. A few of these masses stand out from the general structure, so to speak, and one of [illegible] west of The Chapel a few feet, is [illegible] feet in height from the surface of the [illegible] Pictured Rocks are [illegible] oxides, and the [illegible] prevailing [illegible] blue, pale blue, verdigris green, [illegible] yellow, and innumerable shades of gray.

The Cascade is a bright sheet of water, [illegible] thirty feet wide, which falls from the [illegible] cliffs sheer into the lake, having a height of [illegible] hundred and seventy-five feet. The projection of the cliff from the lip of which the cascade [illegible] is so great that a space of twenty-five or [illegible] feet remains behind the fall and between [illegible] the rock shore. It is the [illegible] of [illegible] invite those who do not dread [illegible] paddle around betwixt the [illegible]

THE MISSISSIPPI JETTIES.

The great Mississippi for centuries has been hurrying down with its current the rich sediments wrested from the lands through which it and its tributaries make their way, and, depositing them at its mouth, has formed those great shoals and bars which for so long a period had almost closed that great commercial door at the maritime entrance to the richest agricultural district of our continent. Many remedies to remove the evil have been tried, but none have met with the success of the Eads system of jetties now in operation at the South Pass of the great delta.

These works are simple immense dikes composed of layers of willow mattresses, stones, and blocks of concrete and cement, built up from the bed of the sea. They are parallel to each other, two and one-quarter and one and three-quarter miles long respectively, and are designed to confine and guide a portion of the Mississippi's volume, eight hundred feet wide, over the intervening shoals, and through and beyond the great bar lying outside the river's mouth. This great current of water, when confined between the narrow banks of the jetties, has its speed and scouring power greatly augmented, so that, meeting with the opposing barrier of the bar, a great contest immediately ensued for supremacy. The old wide-spreading and slower current was delayed when it came to the bar, and, as it paused, its sediment fell to the bottom, thus constantly adding to the barriers pushing ready into the Gulf. The new current, confined within the jetties' walls, can not stop to deposit sediment, but, urged forward by the pressure of waters behind, rushes over the bar and shoal places, tearing up the deposits of centuries, carrying them and its own through the bar into the deep Gulf waters beyond, leaving a wide, ever-deepening channel behind.

This great undertaking has proved a complete success, and stately fleets now breast the current in safety where a few years since they were barred out altogether, or only attempted the passage at the risk of disasters or delays well-nigh insupportable to commerce. Within the past month the British steamer Silverton, the largest freight-carrying steamer in the world, next in size to the Great Eastern, has passed through in safety with ten thousand bales of cotton, besides an assorted cargo, the largest that ever crossed the Atlantic.

The voyager passing from the restless waters of the Gulf into the comparative calm within the jetties looks about for the cause of the remarkable transition and is pointed out as the jetties two narrow low strips of gray wall stretching like thin ribbons on the water into the distant horizon. A tall skeleton lookout tower stands near one end, a low wooden structure with scaffoldings and stagings is perched on the other. Along their length appear at varying intervals queer structures, mysterious scaffolds, signal poles with waving pendants and spheres and outstretched arms, whose meaning can be read by the Pass pilots only. Over the low-lying barriers dash here and there feathery sprays of foam from the turmoil of ocean outside, while between comes down with a clean and impressive rush a portion of the mighty river.

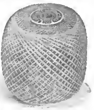
FLORENCE KNITTING SILK.


In order that our customers may not be deceived, the style of ball in which Florence Knitting Silk is sold is shown in our engraving. Observe that the brand Florence is stamped in each spool, also the No. 300 on the coarser silk and No. 500 on the finer.
Imitations in similar style are in the market, but under other names. Other imitations have a larger spool to hide the short weight of silk.
The Florence is positively the only silk suitable for knitting which will bear washing without injury to color or texture.
Sold by all enterprising dealers.
Our latest Book on Knitting (No. 3), with samples on Knitting and Etching Silk, sent on receipt of three 2-cent stamps.

The London Academy, in its review of Doré's "Raven," asks: "Are all the best books this season to come to us from America?"

THE LAST COMPLETE WORK
OF
GUSTAVE DORÉ.

By Edgar Allan Poe. With 26 Full-page Plates by Gustave Doré. Title-page Design by Elihu Vedder. Comment on the Poem by Edmund Clarence Stedman. Folio, Ornamental Cloth, Gilt Edges, and in a neat box, $10 00. Uniform with Doré's "Ancient Mariner."

The publication of "The Raven" by the Harpers is an advent in American bookmaking. It is perfect from the beginning of Mr. Stedman's charming "comment on the poem" to the last engraving. The typography is without a flaw. The engraving is beautifully done by skilled artists. Vedder contributes a title-page, and before the portals of the folio sits a mighty angel at the Gates of Death throwing the light of his torch upon the approach, but guarding from profane touch the key that opens to the unknown beyond.—Commercial Bulletin, Boston.

THE NEW YORK TRIBUNE.

THE LEADING PAPER.

SELLS FOR 3 CENTS,

AND IS WORTH IT!

THE TRIBUNE now sells for 3 cents a copy; the Sunday paper for the same price. The rates to mail subscribers, postage prepaid, are as follows:

	1 Year	6 Months.	3 Months.	1 Month.
DAILY, with Sunday	$8.50	$4.25	$2.15	$0.75
DAILY, without Sunday	7.00	3.50	1.75	.75
SUNDAY TRIBUNE	1.50	...	..

The yearly rates make the price to mail subscribers about 2 cents a copy. At this remarkably low rate, THE DAILY TRIBUNE gives the most and the best quality for the least money of any New York journal. THE TRIBUNE now costs no more per year than the majority of country dailies. No matter what papers you take you can now afford THE TRIBUNE. The Sunday paper at 3 cents is a great bargain. It is a rapidly growing paper, is now ahead of the Daily, and increases every Sunday.

THE TRIBUNE is the leading New York daily. Its news is complete, and its time is pure. The paper is not too large to read in the time people have for newspapers. It is not too small to give enough of everything worth telling. While reporting the daily life of the whole globe, THE TRIBUNE prints most prominently what is of most interest to intelligent men and women. Space is especially given to all the higher interests of Society, the Government, and the Human World. In politics, THE TRIBUNE is heartily Republican, and aims to be the most accurate exponent of the best sentiment of the party. During the Presidential contest of 1884 it will be indispensable. Having its own telegraph line to Washington, its reports of Government affairs are notably complete. No politician can afford to be without THE TRIBUNE when Congress is in session. Of all our friend of American industries, in view of the jealous watch THE TRIBUNE keeps on all matters pertaining to the Tariff and Protection. It employs a force of the most competent writers to criticise books, the drama, the opera, and works of art. For families, THE TRIBUNE is the best, cheapest, and most useful paper. It refuses to print the demoralising details of vice which many other papers resort to in order to build up a circle of readers among people of low and coarse tastes, and it believes that there can be no progress without the recognition of an ever-ruling power in the affairs of men.

THE SEMI-WEEKLY TRIBUNE is the best issue of the week. It always has 12, and occasionally 16 pages. It is pursuing a series of sketches of leading New York and Brooklyn pastors. It has very valuable special dispatches from Europe, and a great variety of correspondence, literary miscellany, and entertaining local features.

HOW JOHN NORTON KEPT HIS CHRISTMAS,

with fourteen spirited illustrations.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

THE President's message has made a remarkably pleasant impression upon the country, and the comments of the Democratic are hardly less commendatory than those of the Republican press. This is due to two reasons—that the message is a simple and clear statement of the condition of the country, and that it contains no political or partisan disquisition. The fact that such a message is most fitting for the situation is a gratifying tribute to the Administration. There is nothing to defend, or explain, or apologize for, and the national condition which the message reflects is of the kind which is always most satisfactory to the country.

We are at peace with all the world, and there are no clouds of trouble upon the horizon. The fishery provisions in the Treaty of Washington will be duly abrogated, and the exodus of paupers from British almshouses to this country will be arranged without serious friction. At home, the important questions are the finances and taxation, the sea-coast defenses, the Mormons, the reform in the civil service, the Presidential succession, and the postal telegraph. The redundant revenue, in the President's opinion, may be wisely reduced; but as the probable excess for the year will be but about $60,000,000, and as it is impossible definitely to foretell the effect of the tariff reduction of last year, the President does not favor any radical revision or sweeping modification of the existing laws, and would prefer to see the neglected coast defenses rehabilitated and local postage reduced from two cents to one cent. This, of course, is a temporary provision until the reduction of revenue now in operation can be measured. The Secretary of the Treasury thinks that the reduction will be $30,000,000 less than was anticipated, and that the excessive revenue should be diminished by a reduction of tariff taxation, especially upon sugar, molasses, and raw material. But the Secretary, like the President, and for the same reason, is not ready to recommend present action, as all such action must, under the circumstances, be experimental.

But it would be wise for the Republicans in Congress to acquiesce in any moderate reduction which should still leave resources enough for the proper and of the coast defenses, rather than to insist upon a revenue which the Republican administration concedes to be excessive, and which it admits should be diminished. The political situation is such that it is unquestionably sound policy for the Republican party to become the party of a reasonable reduction, rather than by opposition to all reduction to leave to the Democrats the prestige of a demand for a reduction of taxation. The reason is that the friends of a moderate reduction would greatly prefer to see it effected by a party whose action could not be interpreted as the first step toward free trade. It would therefore be a political blunder for the Republicans to resist every movement of the kind.

The President's urgent counsels upon a proper provision for the Presidential succession, to which we shall recur, should be heeded by Congress and the country.

He speaks of reform in these gratifying words:

"the practical methods appear to be adequate for the ends proposed, and there has been no serious difficulty in carrying them into effect. Since the 10th of July last, no person, so far as I am aware, has been appointed to the public service in the classified portions thereof at any of the [illegible] or [illegible] the places, offices and customs districts above named, except [illegible] certified by the Commission to be the most competent on the basis of the [illegible] held in conformity to the rules."

We trust that the Commission will recommend an extension of the rules, which have been found so advantageous and practicable, in other classes in the service, and the President will acquiesce.

CONVICT LABOR.

THE total vote upon the abolition of contract labor in prisons at the late election in New York was 673,000, of which 405,882 favored the abolition of the present contract system, and 266,966 were opposed to the abolition. As we have already pointed out, the vote effects no change, and is merely an expression of opinion. But it will be cited as a proof of the popular desire for a change of system, and as it represents the feeling of knavish demagogues and their ignorant followers upon the one hand, and the views of many of the sincerest and most eminent prison reformers upon the other, it is a subject which demands the most careful and prompt attention from intelligent members of the Legislature. It is they who should take the initiative upon the question, and they will be culpable if they leave it to the demagogues.

The vote undoubtedly largely represents those who are opposed to any kind of convict labor. Ohio also has declared against the ordinary contract system, and the Constitution of California prohibits it. But all prison reformers, however they may differ upon methods, earnestly concur in the imperative necessity and justice of such labor. Denunciation of it catches the fancy of the most ignorant, but no intelligent man seriously thinks that honest men, besides supporting their own families, should also support 45,000 criminals in absolute idleness. If anybody should be made to work for his living, it is the man whose crimes have made him a danger and a burden to the community. But the demagogue's cry against the competition of convict labor is a demand that the honest laborer shall support idle prisoners.

The article upon the question by Mr. F. B SANBORN which was lately published in HARPER'S WEEKLY has naturally attracted a great deal of attention, because Mr. SANBORN is known as one of the authorities upon the subject. He and Mr Z. R. BROCKWAY, of the Elmira Reformatory, whose labors in what may be called penal science are familiar to all persons who have looked into the subject, agree in the opinion that the mixed or piece-price system of prison labor is the best. This is a system "by which the prison authorities direct the labor without the intervention of contractors or their employés, but have contracts with manufacturers outside the prison to supply stock, and take the finished product at a certain specified price per article, thus avoiding the day's-work price, and the supervision of the convicts while at work by men who have no higher interest than salaries or profits in their management of prisoners." The agreement of these gentlemen upon the preferable system of convict labor should have great weight with members of the Legislature who are considering or who will be called upon to consider the subject. Of one thing they may be sure—that the spirit which prompted the submission of the proposition to the voters at the recent election is a spirit which seeks only to cajole voters, and is absolutely ignorant of the principles of prison discipline, and utterly careless of the public welfare. The proposition was mere political "gag." But the vote having been taken, wise legislators will heed the actual situation.

THE SPEAKER.

THE selection of Mr CARLISLE as Speaker was a surprise. The reports of the few days immediately preceding the caucus had, indeed, shown that he was a much stronger candidate than had been supposed, but the nomination of Mr RANDALL had been so long conceded and assumed that the result was practically unexpected. The significance of Mr CARLISLE'S nomination is not that of a simple division between the protection and the free-trade Democrats. It is partly sectional. Of the 95 votes from the Southern States Mr CARLISLE received 72. Of the 83 others he received 34, and the minor officers were of the same section. This fact must be taken into the estimate, as it certainly will be by the country, for it was frankly admitted during the last days of the contest that sectional considerations were in full play.

Apart from this, so far as the selection signifies anything, it shows that the number of Democratic members of the House who are disposed to undertake a revision of the tariff is larger than had been supposed. The question, indeed, can now hardly be avoided, and here begins the peril of the Democratic party which has been long foreseen. Undoubtedly its possible course has already aroused apprehension in business and industrial circles. The election of Mr. RANDALL would have been accepted as a declaration that the party was fully aware of the delicacy and danger of tariff tinkering, and that nothing of importance would be done. But the choice of Mr. CARLISLE shows the probability of an active and vigorous policy of tariff revision in what is called the free-trade direction. It tends, therefore, to alarm that great manufacturing and industrial interest which a large part of the Democratic party wished to propitiate by silence and evasion. It forces the party into the light. It compels it to take a positive position, and to declare a policy, because the question having been raised during the canvass the nomination of Mr. CARLISLE will be interpreted as a distinct committal of the party. The Speaker's speech upon his election shows the Democratic consciousness of the fact, and the deprecatory and explanatory and defensive tone of the Democratic press confirms it.

For the same reasons the election of Speaker will have the further effect of forcing the tariff forward as a leading issue in the campaign of next year. It will present the Democratic party as a free-trade party, although it will plead that it means only reasonable revenue reform, and compel it to encounter the cry of protection to American industry as against pauperized labor. But here the actual situation of the country and its own State platforms during the year will compel a Democratic policy of hedging, which in a general campaign, requiring simple and clearly defined issues, will be very disadvantageous. In this situation wise and moderate action upon the part of the Republicans will attract that large body of voters which, while not desiring a high protective policy, would carefully respect vested interests and established industries, and, fearing the spirit and extent of Democratic innovation, would prefer to see the subject under Republican control. The unexpected Democratic choice of a Speaker, therefore, should not be allowed to drive the Republicans into an extreme position. They may wisely co-operate in judicious measures of tariff revision as a means of reducing the revenue to the legitimate demands of the government. There are many Republican revenue reformers who profoundly deprecate Democratic ascendency upon many grounds, and there are many Democratic protectionists who would not wish to see "Democratic reform" of the tariff. The chances of Democratic success next year are not increased by the election of Mr CARLISLE, but the Democratic party now professes to represent something besides evasion and trickery, which is a great improvement in the political situation.

THE SITUATION IN VIRGINIA.

THE "Re-adjusters" and the "Bourbons" in Virginia, or the MAHONE party and the Democrats, have each published a document describing the political situation in that State. One of the original and ostensible objects of the formation of the MAHONE party, and that which gave it its distinctive name of Re-adjuster, is disposed of by the acquiescence of the Democrats in the decision of the Re-adjuster Legislature and the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States. This leaves each organization to be tried by its general character and the results of its administration. The Democratic address asserts that the question of the debt having been settled, the real reason for the new party has disappeared, and that the late election shows that the voters are returning to the Democratic fold. The MAHONE charges of systematic murder and bloodshed in certain counties and in Danville are met by the Democratic address with the assertion that in those counties the Re-adjuster or coalition vote was increased, showing that the disorder arose from individual quarrels. The address retorts the accusation by the declaration that the only intimidation was that of non-coalition colored voters by coalition colored voters. The general Democratic arraignment of the coalition party is this:

"A Legislature pledged by its majority in advance to obey every mandate of a party caucus, that caucus sitting only to register and transmit the decrees of his master; the executive and judicial offices generally seized by the dictator's personal adherents. Most loyalty to one man set up as the sole test of fitness for positions of trust, the asylums for the insane, those touching movements of the public charity, and the free-school system, that nobler monument of the public wisdom, thrown in to swell the dirty heap of party spoils—so much of this wild revel of mock statesmanship has passed into history. What was threatened—re-arrangement of Congressional districts and judicial circuits, repeal of municipal charters, usurpation of the powers long vested in chancery courts to control through their own commissioners judicial sales of lands—all this was intended to fix, confirm and perpetuate the power of the autocrat, this new Dr. Francia."

To all this the MAHONE manifesto [illegible] counter-statement, the chief allegations [illegible] far as they regard administration, do not [illegible] challenged. The coalition claims more [illegible] financial management, and charges the Bourbons with hostility to the colored voters and to the school system:

"The Funders by their unfriendly legislation and administration reduced the number of public schools from 3,067, of which 30 were colored, to 2,491, of which but 99 were colored. They reduced the pupils from 121,088, of whom 26,076 were colored, to 107,074, of whom but 8,206 were colored. They reduced [illegible] teachers from 3,064, of whom 304 were colored, to 2,804, of whom [illegible] 94 were colored. They reduced the expenditures from $667,473 for the year to $511,902. On the other hand, in their three years the Re-adjusters have increased the [illegible] number of schools from 2,491 to 3,567, the number of colored schools from 99 to 649, the pupils from 108,074 to 287,362, the colored pupils from [illegible] to 40,849, the teachers from 2,804 to 4,438, the colored teachers from [illegible] 94 to 644. The expenditures from $511,902 were increased to $[illegible]."

The coalition also insists that it has greatly improved the care of the insane, removing them from prisons to asylums with kind and skilful attendants, and it has abolished the whipping system, which was made 'a disfranchising machine' against the colored voters. The cost of the State government [illegible] averaged $1,084,664 annually, under the Re-adjusters averaged $402,234. The rate of taxation [illegible] reduced from sixty to forty cents on dollars. Within the last three years the floating debt of the State, which was nearly two millions, has been reduced to less than three-quarters of a million (675,000), while the balance of cash in the treasury has increased from twenty-three thousand dollars to over a million and a half.

The coalition claims, therefore, that while it has truly respected the spirit and purpose of the equal citizenship conferred by the Constitution of the United States, it has administered the government of the State more wisely and prosperously than the Bourbons. There is no question that its manifest is much the stronger of the two. But the coalition movement has failed to command general favor among intelligent and patriotic men, because its original purpose was quasi repudiation, and because it resorted to the bribery of patronage. Had it proposed the security of colored citizens in their rights, the improvement of the school system, and more efficient and economical administration as its great objects, it would have been sustained by the best and strongest Republican sentiment in the country. But handicapped as it was, it has not had united Republican sympathy, as BUTLER has not been supported by reformers, despite his profuse professions of reform. The massacre at Danville, according to the careful report in the New York Times, was not preconcerted, but it revealed a state of feeling which seems to make fair play for the colored voters very uncertain. The assertion that MAHONE ought to have been supported by all Republicans, whatever his financial plans and his political methods, because of his efforts for the colored people, seems to us extremely ill-judged. It is only another form of the Jesuit doctrine that the end justifies the means.

THE "ALASKA" COLLISION.

THE rousing dawn of a pilot-boat by the steam-ship Alaska, and the consequent great loss of life, should be most thoroughly investigated, because there is a general feeling that the enormous ocean steamers, relying upon their superior strength, are more anxious to maintain their record of speed than to proceed with caution. The suddenness and completeness of the terrible collision were appalling, and both the proprietors and officers of great steamers should be taught that they will be held to a strict account by public opinion.

The Herald says that the Alaska's officers and other employés in the office of the company were very reticent, and not disposed to answer the questions of reporters. But this was one of the instances in which the reporters were justified in seeking information. They often ask impertinent questions about matters with which the public has an rightful concern. But a disaster which involves a great loss of human life is in the business of the press to investigate and to lay before the public in its details.

This is equally true of railroad accidents, the causes and details of which companies and employés are very apt to try to conceal. The outcry upon the City Hall branch of the elevated railway the other day has caused general uneasiness, which would have been obviated if the company had itself published an accurate statement of the circumstances. The attempt to "hush up" such accidents always results in greater apprehension.

OUR READERS.

A PIERCE little paper in Baltimore, called the Sun, makes an appeal to "the Southern people" against HARPER'S WEEKLY, of the kind that was familiar before the war. It says that it is for those people to determine whether a journal "which so systematically maligns them" is worthy of admission to their homes.

We refer this question most cheerfully to the people in whom it is addressed, and we are perfectly willing to bear their verdict upon the charge of systematic maligning. HARPER'S WEEKLY treats "the Southern people" as it treats "the Northern people," frankly discussing before them public questions in which all parts of the country have a common interest, and regretting that by the political "solidity" of the Southern States a sectional aspect and tone should inevitably be given to political controversy.

If the suggestion of reasons for this attitude should seem to any reader in those States to be incorrect and mistaken, HARPER'S WEEKLY certainly does not do such a citizen the ludicrous injustice of supposing that he would indignantly cry out to stop his paper. The Baltimore Sun is probably not aware that there has been much change during the last twenty-five years. The readers of HARPER'S WEEKLY, wherever they may be, in the Southern or the Northern States, are quite intelligent, and perfectly capable of selecting their own reading, and we have no hesitation in saying for them that they do not look upon a strenuous difference of opinion from them, properly stated, as malignant misrepresentation of their views.

MR. BLAINE'S LETTER.

THE letter of Mr. BLAINE upon the distribution of the whiskey tax among the States has naturally attracted general attention, but the comment has been pretty unanimous that the scheme would be practically unequal, and that whether constitutional or not, it involves very serious consequences. It assumes a perpetual whiskey tax, and furnishes very strong motives for promoting the traffic in intoxicating liquor. This would be a serious misfortune. But while the scheme reckons upon a fixed amount of receipts from the tax, it forgets that it would be most unequally paid by the States.

A table published in the World, based upon the official returns, shows, for instance, that while the four States, Illinois, Ohio, Kentucky, and Indiana, pay, in round numbers, a liquor tax of $55,000,000, they would receive, under the plan of distribution proposed, only $17,000,000. On the other hand, while the six New England States contribute in round numbers $7,000,000, they would receive $14,000,000.

But besides such objections there is that of the immense and dangerous centralization involved in such a scheme. To the plausible question whether it is not better to tax whiskey than farms and households, the answer is yes; but it does not follow that it is well to tax whiskey according to this method and for this purpose. Indeed, nothing is well which seriously weakens the interest of the people in their local government, and this would be the inevitable result of this proposition. The reception of the suggestion has not been favorable; and there are those who see that the plan, like that of the total repeal of the internal revenue taxes, would necessarily make a judicious revision of the tariff much more difficult and improbable.

THE NEW DISTRICT ATTORNEY.

GOVERNOR CLEVELAND'S appointment of Mr. WHEELER H. PECKHAM to succeed Mr. JOHN MCKEON as District Attorney has been received with universal commendation, and is another illustration of the high sense of public duty which has generally characterized the Governor's administration. Mr. PECKHAM is a lawyer of honorable eminence, and a public-spirited citizen, who was selected by Mr. O'CONOR to conduct the suits against TWEED, and who admirably discharged the duty. He has not held other public office, and his appointment is of the very kind which good citizens hoped that the Governor would make, and which the ordinary party politicians hoped that he would not make.

AID FOR ASSOS.

THE Rev. PHILLIPS BROOKS introduced a resolution at a public meeting lately held in Boston, declaring that the work of the Archæological Institute ought to be supported and presented, and authorizing the appointment of a committee to secure means for publishing the report of the investigations at Assos, and for other work.

The sum of twenty thousand dollars is proposed, and as the most interesting enterprise which has been completed at Assos is not as yet fully reported, and as the report will be one of the most valuable contributions of American scholarship in the elucidation of ancient history, it is hoped that the pride and interest of liberal Americans will be sufficiently enlisted to furnish at least part of the amount desired without delay. Mr. HENRY L. HIGGINSON, of Boston, is the treasurer.

DISTRICT REPRESENTATION.

THE Republican National Committee, which will soon meet, will elect a chairman, and appoint a time and place for the assembling of the National Convention. It will also, in obedience to the instructions of the last Convention, provide for the appointment of district delegates by district conventions. The selection of a chairman and the provision for the conventions are peculiarly important duties, and the manner in which they are discharged will seriously affect the result of the election next year.

There is no question that the appointment of Mr. DORSEY as secretary of the committee in 1868 was a great mistake, and for obvious reasons. A choice of the same kind this year, the selection of an unscrupulous party politician, would justly alienate a sympathy and support that can not be spared. This is a plain truth, which certainly does not need to be enforced.

The rumor that the committee will interpret the mandate of the National Convention in regard to the district conventions in a manner certainly unauthorized, we do not credit. Nothing was plainer than the purpose of the Convention, nor more precise than its provision. It meant to secure to each Congressional district the selection of its delegates to the National Convention, unhindered by a State Convention, and by the methods which are practicable at such a Convention, but not at local conventions. An attempt to baffle this purpose by the National Committee would be a most disastrous beginning of the Presidential campaign, and it is not to be apprehended. The performances of the winter and spring of 1870-80 are among the most distasteful in the Republican annals, and we have no fear that they will be repeated this winter.

PERSONAL.

DURING his recent visit to this country Mr. HUBERT HERKOMER painted a number of portraits of Boston gentlemen, one of whom declares that to listen to that artist's talk, while his brush is delineating your features, is worth fully the price of the picture. As Mr. HERKOMER's price was twenty-five hundred dollars a head, this extensive constitutes a very respectable tribute to his conversational powers.

—Mr. WILLIAM BLAIKIE, author of Our Children's Bodies, How to Get Strong, and other hygienic manuals of importance, expresses his conviction that, so far as the taking of bodily exercise goes, Mr. GLADSTONE is the ideal man, the Premier's practice being in winter to walk an hour daily out-doors, and in summer to chop down trees an hour daily. Mr. BLAIKIE has long maintained that in hot weather a properly cared for person should feel as vigorous as in cold weather, and should eat as much and drink as much, the fluid, of course, being non-alcoholic. Race-horses, he says, do their best when the mercury is in the nineties.

—"During the war," said a hearty looking ex-Confederate soldier the other day, "I was shot through the foot, but it is all right now, and my shoe was broken twenty times, but the balm never went through."

—Mr. WILLIAM H. BEARD's easel contains a canvas representing a new version of the touching story, "Where are you going, my pretty maid?" The maid is a monkey dressed in royal style, and carrying a tin milk pail. In the presence of several coons with inquisitive but wondering eyes, the base just made to a strutting and indignant male monkey her considerate reply, "Nobody asked you, sir, she said," while a saucy young monkey, her brother, perhaps crawls through the grass to pull the tail of the rejected suitor, which protrudes curlingly beneath his platter. Mr. BEARD's revised version is full of snap and humor, and the expressions on the faces of his deeply interested coons are enough to make a bengman laugh.

—When "CHARLEY" RACKUS died, it was said by some of his admirers that negro minstrelsy in this city would die with him. The old firm of BUCH, WARMAN, & RACKUS is now extinct, the last surviving partner, Mr. "BILLY" BUCH, having succumbed to circumstances, although the new "end man" whom he had selected to take RACKUS's place was a melodious actor of unexampled impersonality. Whether the business of the departed, continued under the name of RAVERIA's San Francisco Minstrels, will be prosperous it is rare to predict; but the present temper of the metropolitan amusement-loving public, as manifested in the quality of the programmes nightly prepared for it, does not promise the speedy advent of the lay of the last minstrel.

—"Yesterday," said a New York man of letters, "I appreciated for the first time what our 'Munich painters' are driving at. After visiting the collection of pictures at the Bartholdi Loan Exhibition, where the effect of the juxtaposition of the Corots, Rousseaus, Rivots, Vollons, Courbets, Millets, and the rest is so low-toned that at first it struck me as dirty, I went to the gallery of a popular picture-dealer. Here the effect was rank and spotty. I prefer the other."

—Mr. DAVID DOUGLAS, of Edinburgh, Scotland, is publishing an edition of the works of Mr. GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS, and has already issued a reprint of Prue and I. Following the practice of American publishers in their dealings with foreign authors, Mr. DOUGLAS has sent Mr. CURTIS a pecuniary acknowledgment for the privilege of printing his work. It is pleasant to note the spread of American ideas in the old country.

—A number of New York ladies—among them Mrs. EDWARD CURTIS, Mrs. WILLIAM BRADBURY, Mrs. HENRY E. HOWLAND, Mrs. FRANCIS C. BARLOW, and Mrs. ROBERT B. MINTURN—who desire to give their children an opportunity of hearing good music, have planned a series of "Concerts for Young People," to be held in Steinway Hall on three successive Saturday afternoons, beginning on the 23d of December. Mr. THEODORE THOMAS will furnish an orchestra of the best Philharmonic musicians, and will procure the services of eminent vocal talent; and while the music chosen will be of the most artistic excellence as that given at the regular Philharmonic concerts, it will also be specially adapted for the entertainment and instruction of boys and girls between the ages of eight and sixteen years. This project bears the stamp of common-sense; of course it will succeed.

—Mr. CORNELIUS PALMER, President of the Nineteenth Century Club, announced to its members at their first meeting this season that he was neither an atheist nor a theist, but an agnostic. He denied that the club was an irreligious organization, and clinched his remarks by advising his listeners to attend Father PARSONS's course of lectures, in St. Ann's Church, in refutation of infidelity and atheism. Father PARSONS, he said, was the most eloquent preacher in the Roman Catholic Church.

—Mr. GEORGE W. CABLE, of New Orleans, rising to read his essay on the "Ideal Life and Art of the Fleetwoods" before the Nineteenth Century Club, presented the aspect of a man of thirty, slimmer and shorter than the average, with raven-black hair and raven-black full beard and long mustaches. His manner was modest, his voice irreconcilable, and his manuscript in some parts as illegible as to cause many breaks in the decipherment. Mr. CABLE maintained that it was the distinct duty of the novelist and of every other artist to aim for the moral well-being of his fellow-men. The Rev. JOHN W. CHADWICK, of Brooklyn, who followed him, remarked incidentally that the means "do virtuous, and you will be happy," states what is untrue. It would be more nearly true to say, "Be happy, and you will be good."

—The present King of Siam is doing his best to give his sons a European education, and his people good government, good roads, and good carriages. His army is drilled by Europeans, and many of his high functionaries of state can speak English, and have provided their houses with English furniture. Siam is rapidly advancing in prosperity.

—RALPH WALDO EMERSON had an aunt, MARY MOODY EMERSON, whose life, he said, "has to me a value like that which many readers find in Madame GUYON, in RAHEL, in EVERARD ou BUNAU." Mrs. EMERSON wrote in her diary the following, among other things: "My opinion is that a mind like Byron's could never be satisfied with modern Unitarianism; that the fiery depths of Calvinism, its high and mysterious elections to eternal bliss beyond angels, and all its attendant wonders, would have alone been fitted to fix his imagination."

—Mr. RICHARD GRANT WHITE proves from a letter of the Rev. HENRY VANE, an English vicar of the last century, that the phrase "to enjoy poor health" is evangelical English rather than American. The letter is dated October 19, 1784, and reads, "We expect Jemmy Scurry here to take home his wife, who is something better for our air, though at best she enjoys poor health."

—It is one of the distinguishing merits of the sons of Queen VICTORIA (observes the London Standard) that they have been trained to understand that this is a workaday world, in which every good citizen either finds his special share of duty allotted to him, or speedily discovers for himself some useful and honorable task. Upon the heir to the throne naturally devolves much of those social duties which people unfamiliar with them call pleasures, and cynics prefer to describe as frivolities. The keen professional interest exhibited by the Duke of Edinburgh in the navy is known to every one; and in the Duke of Connaught the crown has contributed a thorough soldier to the English army.

—A friend of the late ANTHONY TROLLOPE writes of that novelist's strong affection for Ireland, in connection with the appearance of his last novel, The Land Leaguers. "Mr. TROLLOPE knew Ireland as few Englishmen have known her. So far as Irishmen can be understood, he understood them. But of Nationalist M. P.'s, of their patriotism, of their good intentions, he thought contemptuously. Captain YORKE CLAYTON speaks the writer's sentiments as well as his own when he says: 'I do believe that men become cowards when they are tempted to become liars by getting into Parliament.'"

—M. DE LESSEPS boasts that his family is Scotch; that in Scotland there are LESSEPS and LESSELS, but in France none of his own name besides himself and his numerous family; and that the Cathedral of Edinburgh was constructed by an architect named LESSELS, who as one of his ancestors.

—Lord COLERIDGE is again on the bench, hard at work. In a recent case tried before him he propounded this conundrum: "If a man has a large house, and asks a number of his friends to a reading from Shakspeare by his family, does that make his house a place of public entertainment?"

—The first person who ever sent his friends a Christmas card is said to have been the late Sir HENRY COLE. Acting upon his suggestion, Mr. HORSLEY, the artist, designed a festive board of dinner holding up their glasses to toast the spectator, the scene being flanked on right and left by two allegorical drawings representing almsgiving, and supported by the legend, "A Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year to you!" It is doubtful, save a foreign writer, whether RAPHAEL or MICHAEL ANGELO, or an angel from heaven, could prepare a Christmas card without some apprenticeship. The design must have a directness which tells a plain story to a big, plain public. It must, further, be such as tells a reasonable story; and it must make due allowances for the short-comings and the possibilities and the tricks of color-printing. Thus it comes about that few designs, even from good artists, are accepted for ordinary reproduction by publishers. Plenty of English ladies of title curb fin the publishers of Christmas cards—baronesses, duchesses, and even princesses—and it is said that all of them look sharply after their gains.

LADY CONSTANCE MAKES A FINAL CONFESSION.

I HAVE entered into a few details touching the peculiarities of Harry's position and the views which he entertained with regard to it, but these failed to move Lady Constance, who merely exclaimed her conviction that my cousin was a scoundrel of a very perfect order.

"If you had only heard him," she continued. "He came to me with a thousand apologies—left that he was taking a liberty which nothing but my generosity could excuse, and so forth, and so forth, but you had been so kind to him, and I had been so kind to him, and, in short, he could rather run the risk of offending me than that one point lives should be sacrificed. It was an unseemly exposure of the true facts of the case. Was it not wicked and spiteful, I wonder, or did he really think that he could gain his own way by our marriage?"

"I am quite sure he did not," said I.

"Don't be too sure. If it were worth my while to, I believe we should find that there was a pecuniary motive at the bottom of him, though I confess I don't at present see what it could be. One can't help being a little amused at the fellow, too, in one way. It was very nearly ending in a joke, which we should have found rather difficult to laugh at. I may admit that, now that it is all over."

"I suppose it is all over," said I, looking down at the carpet.

Lady Constance made no reply, and for some minutes there was silence between us. When I looked up, I saw that there was a red spot on each of her cheeks, and that she was twisting and turning the rings upon her fingers nervously. I drew a little nearer to her, and said:

"I wish I knew whether you really cared for me at all. If you do, I believe, upon my honor and conscience, that you would be happier married to me, a good man, than to Mr Featheran or some other millionaire. I shall have a thousand a year—perhaps a little more, and you, I suppose, have something. You smile at the idea of marrying upon such a pittance, yet how many hundreds of people do it, and live decently enough! Ought you not to think again before you decide to turn me away?"

Lady Constance made no direct answer. "You don't plead very passionately," she remarked.

"Would it make any difference if I did?" asked I.

"Perhaps one, but it would lend an air of reality to the situation. You don't like me to laugh when you intimate that we might marry upon a thousand a year, but really, if you will think of it, it is much better to laugh a little, and the proposition is rather a funny one in itself. Do you know what my yearly dressmaker's bill amounts to? But never mind!—under the circumstances, we are not called upon to consider items. Just examine yourself strictly and honestly for a minute or two, and then tell me whether you are serious in suggesting that two such people as you and I should set up home upon a thousand a year, or even upon twice that amount."

I endeavored in comply with her request, but it was not an easy to say exactly what I thought. What I did say at last was: "The whole question depends upon the feeling that you may have for me. No one likes to be poor, yet there are worse things than poverty."

"When I first knew you," answered Lady Constance, "you had a simplicity of character which was very delightful, but I am afraid you are becoming corrupted. Your answer is nothing but a piece of sophistry, and you know it."

"And is it?" I returned, with some truth, for I was straight forward. "I tried to give you as honest an answer as the circumstances of the case would permit of. Tell me at least one thing. Is your refusal to marry Mr Featherstone?"

As matters have fallen out, it is extremely probable that I shall," she replied.

"Then," cried I, "you are deliberately choosing a life which you know beforehand must be miserable! Is there no way of saving you?"

She shook her head. "None. I am afraid. But I will make one more concession—a final one. If within a few weeks' time you are able to tell me that your uncle has dismissed his son, I, on my side, will dismiss Mr Featherstone. I think that ought to satisfy you."

It was the old temptation, but I was no longer scared by it. The gulf-stream of events had happily passed out of my hands, and I saw in Lady Constance's proposal only a means of gaining time and an enlarged field laid open to chance.

"Is that a bargain then?" she asked presently. "You shall write to me what you speak positively as to the future. (It is hope you will be able to do so.) You know my reasons for this particular, and I am not going to stay with them in Yorkshire on the 15th of September, and you can join me there between that and the 18th."

"But they haven't asked me," I objected.

"I will manage that. Now I won't keep you any longer. Remember me to your cousin, and tell him what a genuine admiration I feel for his talents."

She rang the bell as she spoke, and in the presence of the groom Antonio, who immediately appeared, I could only bid her a formal farewell.

CHAPTER XXXII.

THE GENERAL AND OTHERS ARRIVE.

ONE of those fugitive shocks of surprise which make one doubt for an instant whether one is awake or asleep awaited me on my arrival at Thirlby Station. As the train drew up beside the platform I saw in the roadway outside an old gentleman on a bay horse, and by his side, on a Shetland pony, a little boy so exactly the counterpart of me former self that I was fain to rub my eyes with some faint expectation that he would presently vanish into thin air. But the little boy stood this test, and remained a visible, palpable personage, seated not there on his pony in the autumn sunshine. His arther limbs were clad in untanned leather leggings (how well I remembered those old leggings!), his left hand held his reins and a short hunting crop, his right arm resting upon his pony's crupper, as he leaned back to talk to his companion in an attitude which I myself had been wont to assume in days gone by. I need to think that this pose showed an easy familiarity with all the conditions of horsemanship possible to any manner bof formed a similar opinion.

"Jimmy and I have come to meet you, you see, Charley," said my uncle. And then, just for one moment, I felt a sharp twinge of jealousy. That Harry could never supplant me in the old man's affections I well knew, but somehow or other it had not struck me before that the boy might very well do so; and now, when I saw them together, I could not help saying to myself that this was a little more than I had bargained for.

"We thought you would rather ride than drive, and we have brought the brown cob for you," my uncle went on. He spoke very gently, and when I glanced up at him I saw an anxious, deprecating look in his kind old face. He just touched my shoulder with his hand, saying, "Jimmy is not such a good rider as you used to be." He had read my thoughts at once, and understanding what his were, I made haste to re-assure him by a nod.

Jimmy, who all this time had been gazing with eagerness to make a hearing now burst forth into a clamorous welcome, which relieved the meeting of all its temporary awkwardness.

"Oh, Cousin Charley, I'm so awfully glad you've come! We shall have rare larks now. Bounce says I may go out shooting with you if you'll let me, and I can ride first rate, can't I, grandfather? Just look at this!"

And he administered a smart blow over the hind-quarters to his pony, who responded and flung up his heels, the result being a considerable exhibition of delight between Jimmy's person and his saddle. "I often make him do that," he said, complacently. "It gets one accustomed to the feeling, you know."

"But you mustn't break your pony without our reason, my boy," remonstrated my uncle.

"Oh, Lord bless your soul, he don't mind!" returned Jimmy, "he knows it's all fun. I say, Cousin Charley," he went on, "will you teach me how to jump? Grandfather said I wasn't to try till you came."

"All right," said I, "I'll give you some lessons. Canter on ahead now, and let us see how you sit."

We had ridden away from the station by this time, and I sent Jimmy on in front not so much in order to exhibit his seat as to get the opportunity of saying a word or two to my uncle.

"He isn't a bad little chap, is he?" I began, as soon as the boy was out of ear-shot.

"He is a good boy and a plucky boy, thank God!" replied my uncle. "He seems to have associated with some odd companions, and he has picked up a few expressions which are hardly suited for the drawing room; but he is so quick that I dare say he will soon learn the manners of civilized society. Shall we trot on after him now? I don't like him to be left quite alone."

It was evident that my uncle did not wish me be questioned. I forbore, therefore, to make any inquiries about Harry, and we pushed on toward the house, Jimmy undertaking the lion's share of the conversation.

As we approached, four persons strolled across the lawn to meet us. First came the General, then Mrs. Farquhar and Paulina, finally Harry, with his hands in his pockets, and a straw hat on the back of his head. All three, with the exception of Mrs. Farquhar, whose manner was cold and distant, welcomed me as cordially as I could have wished, but I had a disagreeable sensation of being treated like a guest in my own home, and I availed myself of the first pretext to slip away to the stables, where I was greeted with a silent and respectful sympathy scarcely less hard to bear than Mrs. Farquhar's politeness. Abdications would perhaps be more frequent if they did not almost necessarily imply exile.

I confess that I had some bitter thoughts to keep me company while I dressed for dinner. I loved Thirlby, as I suppose that every one must love the home of his childhood, and I had only just realized that Thirlby could never be mine any more. As long as my uncle lived, I should, no doubt, be free to use his house as my own, but it would not be in his power to give me the privileges of an heir-presumptive. An heir-apparent had replaced me. It was he who would henceforth give instructions [illegible] (not that Bunce ever obeyed instructions), but that would [illegible] here there). It was he who would receive the [illegible] supposing always that the neighbors condescended to [illegible] It was to him that the tenants, the [illegible] would address themselves with regard to [illegible] hitherto [illegible] within [illegible] on. but I felt that such a state of things would be simply intolerable, and that the same roof could not long shelter Harry and me. I went down stairs, however, resolved to put a good face upon it, and to let no one detect the mortification of which I was very properly ashamed.

Only Mrs. Farquhar and Pauline were in the drawing room when I entered. The latter, arrayed in a brilliant blue silk dinner dress, trimmed with Limerick lace, was sitting bolt-upright upon the edge of her chair and twirling her thumbs. Poor Paulina's hands were large and red, and the disproportionate amount of wrist characteristic of the lower middle class of Great Britain was rendered more conspicuous in her case by absence of bracelets or of any black velvet substitute for them. Mrs. Farquhar was evidently in the act of administering a lecture.

"My dear, you must allow me to tell you that it is a wife's duty to influence her husband for good. I'm not saying that I would favor a man to attend services twice in the day against his will, but to walk up and down the high-road on Sunday morning with a shooting-coat on his back and a cigar in his mouth, while the people are coming out of church, is just indecent; and it is your duty to make him see it."

Paulina threw an appealing glance at me. "You tell her, sir—Charles, I mean," she said. "There's an use of me talking. I'm sure I'm done my best with Harry; but if he won't go to church, he won't—and that's all about it."

I was preparing a little speech which should be pleasant to both parties, but before I could open my lips Mrs Farquhar turned upon me with:

"Oh, I couldn't expect you to advocate church-going. I'm told that you and your friends spend the Sunday in paying and receiving visits."

It struck me that, if I was to be lmbjerred by Mrs. Farquhar all the evening, I might lose that aspect of serenity which I was anxious to maintain, and I thought perhaps it would be the best to take the bull by the horns without further delay, so I said: "Mrs. Farquhar, suppose we conclude a treaty of peace. You have carried your point, or your point has been carried without your aid, I am out of the running, and you will do an good to anybody by saying disagreeable things to me. I make you welcome to call me anything you like when my back is turned; but as long as I am in the room, let us be civil to one another. I am sure you are far too sensible to flog a dead horse."

This appeal was not, perhaps, couched in the most judicious possible terms; but it had the merit of putting the case plainly, and I think most people would have seen the advisability of avoiding needless bickerings. But Mrs. Farquhar was not like most people.

"The man's demented!" she exclaimed, contemptuously. "I never say disagreeable things to any one."

Pauline broke into a short, startling laugh, which she checked abruptly.

"What I have said of you," Mrs. Farquhar continued, with dignity, "I maintain to be true; and if you find it disagreeable, it must be because your own conscience accuses you. As a Christian woman I am bound to protest against Sunday visiting—"

"Quite right, quite right," struck in the General, who entered the room at this moment. "We have six days in the week for work and play, and we ought not to go poaching on the seventh."

"You remind me of the devil quoting Scripture, Tom," said Mrs. Farquhar, ungratefully. "I would rather hear you practice than hear you preach."

"Well, well," muttered the General, looking rather disconcerted, "I'm afraid we're none of us what we ought to be. Charley, come and look at this clearing they have made in the shrubbery; I think it's an improvement." And, beckoning me toward the window, he whispered: "For goodness' sake, keep the peace, if you can. I've been feeling as if I was smoking in a powder-magazine ever since I came down here."

Harry joined us before I could ask for any explanation, but when we went in to dinner I was able to see for myself that the elements of an explosion were not lacking. During that long and most uncomfortable meal Mrs. Farquhar surpassed herself. Not one of us, except Harry, escaped attack; and one of us was suffered to make the most innocent remark without prompt and flat contradiction; and the luckless Pauline was snubbed and lectured after a fashion which Job himself would not have tolerated. What possessed the old lady to behave in this way I don't know. Perhaps she was beginning to perceive that her great scheme was not turning out a success; perhaps she merely wanted to stir up an argument, perhaps she was exasperated by the meekness with which we received her assaults.

It is probable that we should have been less meek if we had not felt that a spark would be sufficient to blow us all sky-high. Pauline was evidently controlling herself only by strenuous efforts, and of the men I declare I don't know which was the most ill at ease. The General's nervousness displayed itself in forced laughter and irrelevant anecdotes; my uncle's was apparent in total silence and loss of appetite: while Harry's took the most objectionable form of all. I had seen him in awkward situations before—as, for instance, at Lord Rosewin's dinner table—and he had always extricated himself from them with perfect ease and aplomb; but now these useful qualities seemed to have quite deserted him, and he contrived to do everything that he ought not to have done. He talked too loudly; he asserted himself a great deal too much; he complained that the sherry was corked, and sent Cooper for a fresh bottle, to which, when it was brought, he devoted himself more assiduously than was prudent; and all the time he kept glancing furtively at his father, as a half-appeased fox to be ordered out of the room. By the time that the ladies had left us he had worked himself up into a condition of pot-valiance which found expression in the most ill-judged Insolarities, and at last he forgot himself so far as to ask me, with a wink, whether I had had "any news of her ladyship."

Shortly after this my uncle, who had not once looked at or spoken to his son, withdrew, and reappeared no more that evening, and when we reached the drawing-room we found that Paulina also had retired.

Neither Harry nor Paulina appeared at breakfast the next morning, and I devoutly hoped that the former might be suffering from a headache and a fit of repentance. His absence was a comfort, so far as it went; but we should have been a morose party had not Jhanor enlivened us with an amusing flow of babble. As soon as we had risen from the table he possessed himself of my arm, and requested to be taken out to shoot partridges forthwith; but the General interposed.

"No," said he: "I want your cousin Charley to take a walk with me this morning; afterward you can do what you like with him."

"All right," answered the boy; "then I shall go out with grandfather."

The General and I walked across the dewy lawn in silence; but when we were out in the park, and beyond risk of being overheard, my companion took up his parable. "Well, of all the infernal schemes that ever were hatched for turning things topsy-turvy, this strikes me as being the most excalled-for! What do you expect to be the result of it?—that's what I want to know."

I confessed that I was in some doubt as to how it would all end.

"You ought never to have allowed it to begin!" cried the General, peevishly. "What's the good of you, if you can't make yourself heard on the side of order? I'm devilish sorry for you, Charley; but it seems to me that you have brought this upon yourself, and I tell you plainly I don't think you'll ever be squire of this parish now."

"I don't expect to be," answered I; "and, except for one or two reasons, I don't wish to be. I should be very well contented if Harry would only behave himself."

"Behave himself!—he'll behave himself as he always has done. Do you suppose his father didn't know what he was about when he turned him out-of-doors? He'll make ducks and drakes of the property as soon as he comes into it; and he won't have long to wait either, for he is killing my poor brother by inches."

"I hope not," said I.

"It's all very well for you to say you hope not," retorted the General, "but hoping till you're black in the face won't alter the fact. Some men might manage to put up with vulgarity and insolence on one side and everlasting nagging on the other—I might put up with it, or rather I should precious soon put a stop to it. But Bernard isn't made of that sort of stuff. He'll go on suffering in silence until one of these fine mornings he is found dead in his bed. It's—it's enough to make a man swear, by George!"

And the General proceeded to illustrate his assertion amply and satisfactorily.

For my own part, I should have been glad to get away and hear what my uncle had to say; but I was not allowed to return to the house before two o'clock, by which time the whole party was assembled in the dining room for luncheon.

Harry, looking pale and shamefaced, was more like himself and a great deal less voluminous than he had been on the previous evening. Pauline, on the other hand, was flushed and excited. The cause of this uneasiness upon her part explained itself to me when it transpired that we were all to attend a garden party at the Welbys' that afternoon. From various hints that were dropped I conjectured that this was the first public recognition of Harry and his wife vouchsafed by the county, and my surmise was converted into certainty by my uncle's whispering to me, as we left the room after luncheon: "I hope you won't mind being present at this function, Charley. I mean in no gyoself."

Now, as my uncle had not been seen at a garden party within the memory of man, it was safe to conclude that the present occasion was no ordinary one, and I could only trust—though without any sanguine expectations—that we might all come out of the ordeal creditably.

CHAPTER XXXIII

OAT LINA ENTARS SOCIETY.

A DARKEN CARTY nowadays is only another name for a lawn-tennis party, and has developed—so far as a mere on-looker can judge—into a form of entertainment rather popular than otherwise. But thirty years ago there were no such relaxations to mitigate the severity of the outdoor gatherings held periodically by Sir Digby and Lady Welby, and when the nobility and gentry of East Norfolk met together in the grounds of Stanningham Hall, there was literally nothing for them to do but to sit or stand in groups on the lawn and survey one another patiently.

From time to time Sir Digby would approach one of the most important ladies of the district, and would say to her in a low, confidential voice, "I want to show you my Lapageria alba," whereupon the two would pace gravely away together toward the conservatory to which the exotic referred to was to be admired. The lady would generally return alone, and after a decent interval Sir Digby would be seen bearing down upon the matron next in rank, whom he would address in precisely identical terms. As a matter of fact, he neither knew nor cared anything about horticulture, but probably he had a hazy notion that some attention ought to be shown to people, and in a moment of inspiration he had hit upon the above formula, which served him faithfully through many seasons.

The thought of Pauline making her début upon that solemn scene gave me a cold shiver all up my back, and when she entered the drawing-room, ready to start, with a flushed face, a Stuart-tartan gown, and a pair of yellow gloves much too small for her, I barely thanked my stars that there would be no room for me in the carriage, and thus therefore I should be spared the agony of witnessing the sensation which her first appearance would cause.

She herself appeared to be in an uncommonly high spirits, and was talking and laughing loudly, but Harry looked the picture of misery, and my uncle, though maintaining a calm exterior, was evidently apprehensive. Mrs Farquhar wore a resolute air. I fancied that she proposed to carry off things with a high hand.

Presently they all drove away together in the old green barouche, Paulina's nodding plumes towering above the head of her protectress, and my uncle and Harry sitting with their backs to the horses; and as soon as they were gone, the General and I, who had watched their departure from the door-step, looked at one another and burst into hysterical laughter.

"There's nothing to crack your sides over in this, you know, Charley," remonstrated the General, recovering his gravity, as we set off to take the short cut across the fields. "We shall be laughing on the wrong side of our mouths before the day is over, unless I'm very much mistaken."

It seemed quite upon the cards that we might. Stanningham is a good ten miles from Thorby, and by loitering and pretending to mistake the way, one may occupy a considerable time in walking two miles; but we reached the lodge all too soon, and here my companion, in the shabbiest way, declared his intention of deserting me.

"Can't help it," he said, in answer to my upbraidings. "Call me a coward, if you like; but not another step do I go, and that's flat! I may be wrong; but the way in which that Pauline woman was going on before she started inspired me with the gravest alarm."

"She was flurried," I observed, "and no wonder. But I think we may count upon her being awed into silence very soon after her arrival."

The General shook his head. "I doubt it," said he. "Shall I tell you what I think?" he added, bending forward, and speaking in low, impressive accents. "I believe she's intoxicated!"

And with this awful suggestion he turned and fled precipitately.

I walked on, with a sinking sensation about the fourth button of my waistcoat. I did not myself share the General's scandalous suspicions, but I thought it quite possible that others, remarking Pauline's heightened color and excited mien, might do so, and I knew that in no case would she hope to be met in a spirit of friendliness.

When I emerged upon the lawn where the company was assembled, my worst anticipations were realized. Pauline, seated upon a garden-chair in a conspicuous position, was surrounded by an irregular semicircle of grave, impassive ladies, who were surveying her much as if she had been some newly imported variety of wild beast. What she had been saying or doing before my arrival I could only surmise, but there was no mistaking the fact that she had been sent to Coventry. She was now beating the ground impatiently with her foot, while in her eyes there gleamed the light of battle. From a short distance off, Harry, also completely isolated, was gazing at her with a look of stony horror upon his face. I perceived that, if the worst had not already happened, it was going to happen shortly.

My own appearance upon the scene gave the signal for a demonstration which greatly astonished me, until I realized what it meant. No sooner had I advanced from behind the clump of rhododendrons which had masked my preliminary reconnaissance than the entire company, as if by one consent, jumped up and marched upon me in a solid mass. There was a positive rush to shake me by the hand; I was overwhelmed with the kindest expressions of welcome, I was asked to dinner a dozen times in the space of less than five minutes. Gradually the signification of these generous greetings unfolded itself to me. Out of respect for my uncle, East Norfolk had consented to meet Mr and Mrs. Harry Le Marchant, but they were not to be spoken to. A firm and united protest was to be entered against their restoration; and I, as the heir whom they had ousted, was to be made the subject of a distinct exhibition of sympathy.

I understood this, I say, but human nature is ever prone to self-love, and I will not deny that the sight of so many friendly faces and the sound of so many friendly words raised me for a minute or two almost up to the point of oblivion. But, chancing to meet my uncle's eyes, which were turned upon me with a certain look of grave regret, and catching sight immediately afterward of Pauline glaring at me from the background, I woke to the fact that I was playing the enemy's game, and determined upon making one last despairing attempt to avert defeat.

I detached myself from my friends, and approached Sir Digby Welby, who was standing apart, stroking his long nose, and doubtless meditating one of his periodical descents into the ladies' camp. He, like the others, received me with a double dose of cordiality, holding my hand and shaking it at intervals, while he expressed the pleasure that it gave him to see me amongst them again.

"I deplore this resolution of your poor uncle's," he began. "Although we have been friends for many years, I could not take upon me to tell him what I thought; but I very much fear that he is making a great mistake. I assure you that it went to my heart to purchase the Deophusa larva from him, often as I have coveted that corner of land."

"As far as I know, that had nothing whatever to do with my cousin's return," said I. "At all events, he is home now, and I am sure that, for my uncle's sake, you will stretch a point to make his position tolerable."

"Oh, certainly," answered Sir Digby, with a touch of coldness; "but I confess that I have my doubts."

"Yes, I know you have invited them here, and that was very kind of you; but it would be very easy to do a little more. Don't you think, Sir Digby," I added, persuasively, "that you might just step across the lawn and say a word or two to Mrs Le Marchant?"

"Well, well," replied the worthy baronet, not unkindly. "I will endeavor to find some subject of conversation. But really it won't do—it will never do. And the sooner your uncle understands that, the less vexation he will have."

Sir Digby, in fulfillment of his promise, crossed the grass toward Pauline's chair with a slow, dignified step, I following him in a respectful distance.

"I want to show you my Lapageria alba," I heard him say.

"Your what?" called out that misguided Paulina, accompanying her question with a short laugh.

"My Lapageria alba. If you will allow me to lead the way—"

"Oh, all right!" interrupted Pauline, jumping up with intentional alacrity, and speaking very loud. "I don't know what you are talking about, but I'm willing to look at anything. I'm sure About time, too, after being locked at myself for the best part of an hour!"

I began to think that Sir Digby was right, and that he really would never do. When the ill-matched couple had vanished into the conservatory, I drew a long breath of relief, feeling that, at any rate, the danger of some painful scene had been staved off, and I was debating whether I ought not to join Harry, who had now taken refuge upon a distant bench, when I was accosted by Mr Dennison.

The Rector's countenance wore an expression of the deepest concern. He said he had come to humble himself before me, and to confess the folly of his past conduct. "Father tad son, you see—that's the way I looked at it—each tad is apt that they should be divided! How was I to know that the fellow had gone and married a bar-maid? Dear! dear! what a bad job! The neighbors all turning up their noses, too—and troubles at home—sure to be troubles at home! If I could only have foreseen this I would have taken out my tongue sooner than advise Le Marchant to it."

I assured the Rector that he might set his mind quite at rest. "Whatever your advice may have been, it was well meant," I said; "but I am perfectly certain that neither your advice nor no one else's has been taken. My uncle has yielded to circumstances, not to the advocacy of his friends. As to the neighbors turning up their noses, he must have been fully prepared for that. He told me long ago that they would never consent to receive Harry again."

"Yes, yes," returned the Rector, who perhaps did not relish being told that his counsel carried little weight, "but being prepared for a thing is not liking it when it comes. I am prepared to be bullied by Mrs. Farquhar and the Dowager man, but their attacks interfere with my digestion all the same. I say, Charley, do you think it is too late to undo all this mischief?"

"I am sure it is," I answered. "You don't understand that my uncle has never really changed his mind; and he won't change it now, unless some positive catastrophe occurs."

"Then," cried the Rector, "let us pray for a positive catastrophe! You take it all in a very creditable spirit, Charley," he went on, "but, on the same time, I think you owe a little to some one—to some. You must see that Le Marchant can't possibly live in the same house with these people—perpetual quarrels and disturbances, you know, scandals too, very likely—oh, dear me, it's not to be thought of! I say, you ought to get them away, by hook or by crook. Let Harry be the heir, if he must be the heir; but at least let him hide himself out of sight till his time comes."

I was very much of the Rector's way of thinking, but I didn't see why the burden of carrying out his ideas should be thrown upon my shoulders in that jaunty manner, and I said I should be much obliged if he would kindly tell me how I was to accomplish Harry's expulsion.

"Oh, that I can't say," he replied, "but you ought to be able to manage it somehow. It's a question of money, I should think; the fellow will take a bribe to make himself scarce. But these are matters which women can judge of better than we can. Why don't you talk it over with Maud? Here she comes, and I know she wants to discuss things with you. Just say half a minute; I'll be with you again directly."

DANCE OF THE CROW INDIANS.

Of all the Northwestern tribes of the continent, the Absarokas, or Crows, have distinguished themselves by their unchanging friendship to the white race, whose allies they have been in the frequent wars which the tribes of the Siou confederation have waged against its progress in the far West. Comparatively few in numbers, the Crows have had no almost incessant struggle for existence against their fierce and more powerful neighbors. Not a single instance is known in which a Crow Indian has ever killed a white man, and their bravery and fidelity are highly prized by the many officers who have been attached to their commands in severe during the Sioux campaigns.

The Northern Pacific Railway crosses the reservation, which lies on the Upper Yellowstone, under the shadows of the Bull Range of the Rockies, and when the excursion which first opened the road passed through their domain the Crows celebrated the occasion by a series of "grass" dances, which were the most picturesque episode of that notable journey. Never had the extremes and highest types of tongue and civilized life been brought together as on this unique occasion, when the dandified habitués of Pall Mall and spectacled German "Fatherland" ribboned the painted warriors of the plains. The lurid light of the camp fires, deafening drum-beat, jingling bells of the dancers, and weird monotonous chant of the singers were echoed by the whistle of the locomotives as the excursion trains successively drew up. Great was the desire to secure mementos of the event amongst the foreign guests, and the untutored children of the desert sold the brass ornaments and bracelets which the President of the railroad had given them in the afternoon at a handsome advance over the original cost of the same. As the transatlantic guests are probably ignorant to the day of the facts of their disinterment, the desire for souvenirs was gratified, and the Crown retired to their teepees with many shining silver dollars in their pouches.

ROBIN, DEAR ROBIN!

I.

Beam, dear Robin, could you come back to us,
Back to the home you'll never more see,
Could you sit down at evening and crack of nic,
Oh, what a proud, happy woman I'd be!
On the white hearth the fire should burn clearly,
Nothing of comfort or rest you should lack,
And I would always be kindly and cheery,
Could you come back to me—could you come back.

II.

Oh, Robin, Robin, I've mind on ya' solely,
Morning, and evening, and a' the day long;
Many been trusted me worn unfairly;
O for your arm as tender and strong!
If once again in your love I could hide me,
Little I'd care though all else I should lack;
Sairly I'm sending your wisdom to guide me:
Oh, my lost darling, if you could come back!

III

Never again with frowns would I greet you;
Never again be your love be unkind;
Ever with kisses and smiles I would meet you:
Oh, to the days that are gone I was blind!
Oh, I was selfish, and foolish, and fretful,
Nine I remember—remember in vain;
But I would never be cross or forgetful,
Could you come back to me, darling, again!

IV.

No, you will never come back to me—never!
But I shall come to you, Robin, some day.
Then you will kiss a' my loving endeavors,
Just to grow better since you went away.
Yes, you will kiss, in that happy hereafter,
I has been true to you, darling—me true!
Asked my heart always, in joy or in sorrow,
"Will it please Robin, the thing that I do?"

V.

Oh, is that wonderin', wanderin' meeting,
What shall I say to him? what will to say?
We shalna weary Bob's story repeating,
Seeing the end o' the sorrow to' way.
With such a hope, then, how could I say truly,
"Robin, dear Robin, come back unto me?"
Heart, answer the thought me with such surety,
"Robin, dear Robin, I shall come unto Thee!"

A CARNIVAL OF AUTHORS.

"The biggest and most varied entertainment Hartford has ever had," to quote from a reportorial overflowness, was the Carnival of Authors, which began in that city on the 3d of December. Authors have undoubtedly held many "carnivals," both public and more or less private, but this carnival was something else. Several hundred men and women, boys and girls, each dressed to represent some hero or heroine of modern literature—prince, peasant, millionaire, knave, shepherdess, lord, or nun—gathered in the Union Armory, on Elm Street, and after marching in triumphal procession twice across the stage, proceeded to organize a series of brilliant tableaux. Sir Walter Scott, in a comfortable arm-chair, eyed benignantly the successive appearance in front and ahead of the principal personages he had contributed to bring, who, after bowing in turn before him, grouped themselves picturesquely around him. This took place on the main stage, and afterward five sidewalk were presented on separate booths, the subjects exemplified being cartoons from Punch, and scenes from Tennyson, Mother Goose, Dickens, the Arabian Nights, and Faust. So pleased were the spectators that many of them spoiled their pleasure by entertaining a fear that they had received too much for their money. The carnival was repeated every night for a week, in aid of a deserving charity.

FOREST PROTECTION.

The condition of the Hudson, the Mohawk, and other streams of Northern New York during the past summer and autumn has fixed public attention in a forcible manner upon the necessity for taking some steps to secure the permanency of these streams.

The water in the rivers of New York has been unprecedentedly low since midsummer. This is due, in part, to the severe drought which has visited the northern part of the State. But, severe as the drought was, it can not be held entirely responsible for the lack of water in the rivers. Droughts as severe and protracted as that of 1803 have occurred in previous seasons, but never before have they been followed by such disastrous results. The causes which have produced these changes in the condition of the rivers must rather be traced to the gradual destruction of the forests which covered the whole northern part of the State with one unbroken sheet of verdure, serving as a vast reservoir for the moisture it received from the clouds, than to any general diminution of the amount of precipitation.

Regions from which the forest has been stripped lose much of the benefit of a copious rain fall. The water is wasted by evaporation, to an unlikely poured into streams and lost in the ocean. The forest prevents this, and long holds moisture in its deep vegetable mould, giving it off gradually throughout the year to springs and streams. Forest preservation, therefore, means something more than the protection of growing timber, essential as timber is to our national prosperity. It means, besides this, the protection of all the springs and brooks which supply agriculture with moisture and feed the great rivers. If the forests of the country are allowed to perish, as they are destined to perish unless vigorous measures shall be taken to prevent it, agriculture will suffer, manufactures will languish for want of power, and the great internal waterways of the continent will be rendered useless for commercial interchanges. It will indeed be a sad commentary upon the folly, cupidity, and selfishness of the American nation if we allow the magnificent forests, once unequalled in variety, beauty, and density by those of any other part of the globe, to perish before a quarter of our land is peopled, and their real importance is fully felt. America must soon experience the calamities from which China has suffered during centuries through the destruction of the forests which once extended over her seaboard provinces, and which Europe has experienced from the destruction of the forests of the Alps, the Carpathians, and the Pyrenees, if the forests about the headwaters of our streams are allowed to disappear. Every one has a motive for preserving such portions of our forests as are necessary to furnish moisture to our farms and water to our mines and factories, for every one will feel the effects, directly or indirectly, of any injury to the agricultural, commercial, or industrial interests of the country.

In New York the threatened destruction of the Adirondack forests will be most injurious to the State and to this city. The great plateau which lies about the Adirondack region, from the nature of its light and sandy soil, is unfit for agriculture or grazing. The climate of this region is cold and inhospitable. It can never be thickly settled, and possesses no value except in the forests which cover it. These forests, from the stand-point of the lumberman, are not of any great value, and yet it is doubtful if any forest of similar extent is as valuable to the human race. This forest, extending over only a few million acres, regulates the commerce of a great nation. It has built up great cities, and has established upon the island one of the great commercial centres of the world. The Hudson River and the Erie Canal regulate and determine the most important traffic of this country; they have made this city what it now is, and bring prosperous cities near to them their origin. The Hudson River and the Erie Canal owe their existence such as they are to-day, to the Adirondack forests. If these perish, New York can not long maintain its commercial importance, for, the upper Hudson no longer navigable, and the Erie Canal deprived of its water supply, commerce will seek new channels.

It will be the duty of the next legislature to consider what can be done to preserve these forests, and avert the dangers which their destruction will bring upon this State. It should act liberally, intelligently, and quickly. New York can well set an example to the rest of the country in forest preservation. No other State can more surely and speedily benefit by it.

THE BARTHOLDI EXHIBITION.

Americans are proverbially fickle. Yet it must be admitted that they have treated the Goddess of Liberty, who came over here with a letter of introduction from a friendly nation, rather shabbily. The trouble about her reception no doubt arose from the fact that it was difficult to determine just who should receive her, and hear the expense of establishing her on a permanent footing. New Yorkers thought that the whole country should share in these expenses, because the Goddess of Liberty was presented by France, not to New York alone, but to the United States. But as she was to stand in New York Harbor, the country at large objected to paying for the beautifying of one already beautiful water approach. Now, however, that the responsibility has fallen plumb upon New York, most zealous efforts are making to secure a fund for the pedestal upon which the great statue is to stand.

It was suggested that much if not all the money needed might be raised by a loan exhibition, and, the idea seeming feasible, a number of ladies in society were enlisted in the laudable undertaking of procuring interesting articles for a loan exhibition at the Academy of Design. Society ladies, when their interest is once awakened, can work with surprising energy. Therefore it is not extraordinary that within a comparatively brief period the various committees succeeded in gathering in a large number of attractive features. While each of the numerous committees worked independently, some sort of system was maintained under the supervision of Mr. F. Hargrave Smith. It must also be said, to the credit of the men who were on certain committees, that they gave much valuable time and labor to their task. It is generally believed, for instance, that Messrs. Cozzens, Brandreth, and others who had the collection of paintings in charge found their task easy; that they merely had to ask to obtain all the pictures they needed. But the owner of a picture, the value of which runs into the thousands, will always hesitate before letting it be taken from his gallery. It may, is is true, be insured for the very price he paid for it, but, after all, money can never measure the value of the entertainment of a beautiful idea. For a beautiful idea is unique, while one dollar is like another. Therefore the collection of paintings in the Rautenzan exhibition, which includes a masterpiece of Cooper and other famous works, is the result of much labor, discrimination, and diplomacy on the part of the committee.

It is easy to fancy that Messrs. Lanyer and others on the committee of conference had a difficult task. They were after characteristic specimens of curious nations and old customs. There are plenty of representatives of other nationalities in the cosmopolitan population of New York, but a foreigner's characteristics, especially those of dress, are soon absorbed here. To obtain old costumes was still more difficult. In a country like ours, where ancestry goes for little, and newly wealth will sooner or later lift a family into the first social rank, it is not rare to find people who would view with pride the costumes of their grandfather or grandmother, to those even of a more remote generation. Yet by much untiring investigation some people were found with ancestors who were not bought like those of the Major General in The Pirates of Penzance, and the exhibition of colonial fashions was perhaps the best evidence of the zeal with which this committee went to work. The costumes, old gold, numbered about one hundred and twenty—not a large number, but intelligently arranged so as to bring the various national characteristics into most striking contrast.

Perhaps no subject has appealed so strongly to the ingenuity of men as the most effective method of killing one another from a distance. Therefore the fine collection of guns is not unexpected. There are also other paraphernalia of war, all arranged so as to show the special and peculiar part each plays in the taking off of mankind. Wherever new rifle enlistment will have some of his flash in the Malthusian theory of overpopulation.

Among the musical instruments I missed the quiet spot which Mozart played when he was in Paris. This instrument is in this city, and could easily have been obtained. Some of the violins are, has ever, very fine and valuable, as several are by the most renowned Italian makers. There are also glittering heaps of fabrics, delicateir decorated fans, costly china, some, manuscripts, and other articles worthy of study. For itself as much as for its worthy object, the Bartholdi exhibition should prove a financial success.

POE'S LAST RESIDENCE.

There was a spirit of revolt in Edgar Allan Poe which refused to accept whatever had established itself, and a spirit of unrest which drove him from place to place. He lived at different times in Richmond, Baltimore, Philadelphia, and New York, but at no time did he live long in either city; he pitched his tent in all, but he had in none an abiding home. He migrated to New York twice, once in the winter or spring of 1837, and again in the summer or fall of 1844. During his first residence here he wrote "The Narrative of Arthur Gordon Pym", during his last he wrote "The Raven." The reputation that "The Raven" made for him was the opportunity of his life, if he could only have known it, and could only have been wise enough to embrace it. It may be that he did know it, for he was not lacking in shrewdness; what he lacked was the wisdom that uses knowledge as the stepping-stone to prosperity. He was possessed by the imp of the perverse, which assailed him in a literal less strong drink, and to an inordinate belief in his own powers. The world had not accepted him at his own valuation, and that disappointed him. It had accepted lesser men, however, at a greater valuation, and that angered him. He would right himself, even if he had to pull down others, and, in his disordered way of thinking, the best way to right himself was to pull down others. He had a foe on his warpath, and he called it vetitism, he had also a talent for abuse, and he called that criticism. It was the rock on which he always wrecked his fortunes, and never so completely, so during his second residence in New York, first as the editor of the Broadway Journal, and later to the conception of the personal sketches entitled "Literati."

Everybody respected the author of "The Raven," but nobody respected the writer of these personalities. He lost caste by them, he lost friends by them, and he lost employment by them. Fallen upon evil days of his own making, he concluded to turn his back upon New York, and early in the summer of 1846 removed himself and his small belongings to Fordham, Westchester County. He hired a little two-story cottage at the top of a hill, with an acre or more of ground and fenced in about it, and a number of grand old cherry trees in the yard that threw a massive shade upon the front piazza. "It was, as poor, as unfurnished, and yet as charming a dwelling I never saw. The floor of the kitchen was white as wheaten flour. A table, a chair, and a bench, more than it sustained seemed to furnish it completely. The sitting-room floor was laid with check matting, four chairs, a light stand, and a hanging book-shelf composed its furniture. There were pretty presentation copies on the little shelves, and the Bonwoman had posies of honor on the stand." So wrote a lady who made a visit to Poe's cottage shortly after his removal to Fordham. From those who knew him at this time we learn that his habits were more regular than they had been in New York. An early riser, he was fond of taking long strolls in the morning, chiefly in the neighborhood of the High Bridge, upon which he was accustomed to pass at all hours of the day and night. There was a ledge of rocky ground near his cottage, crowned with pines and cedars, which commanded a fine view of the scenery about, and which he loved on that account. Such was the general life of Poe as his friends knew it. Of his internal life—his life in the little cottage with his delicate, sick wife and her devoted mother—they knew nothing. They guessed what it was, however, one day when a New York journal startled them with the melancholy tidings that the poor lady and her gifted husband were both dangerously ill, and so far reduced (the statement ran) as to be barely able to obtain the necessaries of life.

One of the first to relieve the wants of Poe and his family was the lady already referred to, who hastened at once to the bed-chamber of Mrs. Poe. "There was no clothing on the bed, which was or ir view, but a snow white counterpane and sheets. The weather was cold, and the sick lady had the dreadful chills that accompany the fever of consumption. She lay on the straw bed wrapped in her husband's great-coat, with a large tortoise-shell cat in her bosom. The wonderful cat seemed conscious of her great usefulness. The coat and the cat were the sufferer's only means of warmth, except as her husband held her hands, and her mother her feet." The evil slave of Poe's making were lightened by the benefactions of his friends and well wishers, but the evil days of nature's making—the awful last days of a failing life—were not to be lightened by any power on earth. Virginia Eliza Poe passed away on Saturday, January 30 1847, and was buried three days later in an old family vault in the Reformed church at Fordham. Married to her fourteenth year, and dead in her twenty-fifth year,

"her infidelity
Seemed to have yours her mate."

A darker shadow than was thrown by the Raven upon his floor was upon the soul of Poe, and it was never lifted from it. Poor always, he was poorer now, and never voluminous as rapid, he wrote less little, and with great difficulty. The hand that once penned "The Murders in the Rue Morgue," "The Purloined Letter," and "William Wilson," now penned "Eureka"; the genius that once inspired "The Raven," now inspired "Ulalume" and "Annabel Lee." But write what he might, he was still the author of "The Raven." His chief claim to distinction during his lifetime, "The Raven," will long preserve his memory, and with it the memory of the great artist who spent the last years of his life in illustrating it. Edgar Allan Poe has won the fame he coveted.

"And as republished in each penny dose he,
That lings for such a tomb would wish to die."

ELECTRICITY IN THEORY AND PRACTICE.

When the student in any branch of engineering is first ushered into the presence of abstruse theory he is apt to find great difficulty in making himself master of the subject, for the reason that he fails to see the practical application of many of the principles laid down. This difficulty would be to great measure removed if there were more work works as that of Lieutenant Fiske—Electricity and Mechanical Engineering (New York, D. Van Nostrand, publisher)—which, while giving briefly and clearly the elementary principles of both static and dynamic electricity, leads the reader easily and logically from the x, y, and z of the subject to the practical applications. "It is through the medium of magnetism," says the author, "that the principal applications of electricity are made in the arts." Following out this idea, the first chapter of the work is an explanation of the laws and phenomena of magnetism, together with a description of the methods and the apparatus used in preparing magnets, and in measuring the force of the attractive exerted by them. Then follow chapters on frictional electricity, on work and potential, voltaic batteries, etc., etc. In these are given clear statements of the laws governing the various phenomena, and the experiments by means of which they may be verified, so that the reader is well prepared to take up the more complex portions of the subject that follow in the chapters on "Laws of Currents," "Thermo-Electricity," "Induction Currents," and "Electro-Magnetism."

The pages containing descriptions of storage batteries are of great interest and practical value to the student, since they contain a list, with illustrations, of the leading patents relating to the subject. Under the heading of "Electrical Measurements," the author gives a very clear idea of the principles and practice of that branch of electrical work, describing the different instruments and methods used for the purpose.

We then come to the practical applications of all of the fascinating kind of electricity in the subjects relating to the telegraph, telephone, dynamo machine, electric railway, etc. The various telegraph systems are described, and the difficulty of induction in long lines clearly elucidated. The telephones of Reiss and Bell, and the curious mesograph receiver of Edison, are also illustrated and explained.

The theory of the action of the "dynamo" is very clearly stated. The chapters relating to transmission and distribution of power, and to electric motors and their applications to the electric railway, are of the greatest interest, for the reason that the subject is here not only considered as a scientific novelty, but also from a commercial stand-point. Lieutenant Fiske's work forms a very happy connecting link between theory and practice, and while it is certain to be a great aid to the student of electrical engineering in showing him the breadth of the subject, it can and fail to be of immense interest to the general reader as giving, in such language as to be easily understood by all, the principles upon which depend the many applications of electricity which we meet in our daily walks. The work is profusely illustrated with diagrams, plans, and careful engravings of machinery.

HOW WE FOUGHT THE FIRE.

By WILL CARLETON.

[See Illustration on Front Page.]

I.

'Twas a drowsy night on Tompkins Hill:
The very leaves in the trees lay still;
The world was slumbering ocean-deep;
And even the stars seemed half asleep,
And winked and blinked at the roofs below,
As yearning for morn, that they might go;
The streets as stolid and still did lie
As they would have done if streets could die;
The sidewalks stretched as quietly prone
As if a foot they had never known;
And not a cottage within the town
But looked as if it would fain lie down.
Away in the west a stack-and-cloud,
With white arms drooping and bare head bowed,
Was leaning against—with drowsy eyes—
The dark blue velveting of the sky.
And that was the plight
Things were in that night,
Before we were roused the foe to fight—
The foe so greedy and grand and bright—
That plagued old Deacon Tompkins.

II.

The Deacon lay on his first wife's bed,
His second wife's pillow beneath his head,
His third wife's coverlet o'er him wide,
His fourth wife slumbering by his side.
The parson visioned his Sunday's text,
And what he should hurl at Satan next;
The doctor a drowsy half vigil kept,
Still studying, as he partly slept,
How man might glutton, and tope, and fly
In the face of Death, and still not die;
The lawyer dreamed that his clients meant
To club together, and then present,
As proof that their faith had not grown dim,
A small bright silver hatchet to him;
The laborer such sound slumber knew,
He hadn't a dream the whole night through;
The ladies dreamed—but I can't say well
What 'tis they dream, for they never tell;
In short, such a general drowse tone
Had ne'er been known in that sleepy clime,
As no the night
Of clamor and fright,
We were roused the treacherous foe to fight—
The foe so greedy and grand and bright,
And carrying such an appetite—
That plagued old Deacon Tompkins.

III.

When all at once the old court-house bell
(Which had a voice like a maniac's yell)
Cried out, as if in its dim old sight
The judgment day had come in the night.
"Bang whang whang bang clang dang bang
whing."
The poor old parcel of metal sang;
Whereat, from mansion, cottage, and shed,
Rose men and women as from the dead,
In different stages of attire,
And shouted, "The town is all afire!"
Which came as near to being true
As some more leisurely stories do)
They saw on the Deacon's house a glare,
And everybody hurried there,
And such a lot of visitors he
Had never before the luck to see.
The Deacon received these guests of night
In costume very simple and white:
And after a decent, scared "Ahem!"
He asked them what he could do for them.
"Fire! fire!" they shouted; "your house's afire!"
And then, with angry sudden and dire,
They rushed through the mansom's solitudes,
And helped the Deacon to move his goods.
And that was the night
We had that night,
When roused by the people who saw the light
Atop of the residence, rare and bright,
Where lived old Deacon Tompkins.

IV.

Ah me! the way that they rummaged round!
Ah me! the startling things they found!
No one with a fair idea of space
Would ever have thought that in one place
Were half the things that, with a shout,
Those neighborly burglars hustled out.
Came articles that the Deacon's wives
Had all been gathering all their lives;
Came furniture such as one might see
Didn't grow in the trunk of every tree,
A tall clock, centuries old, 'twas said,
Leaped out of a window, heels o'er head;
A veteran chair, in which, when new,
George Washington sat for a minute or two;
A bedstead strong, so if in its lap
Old Time might take his terminal nap,
Dudes, thet in meals long agone
The Deacon's fathers had eaten on;
Clothes, made of every cut and hue,
That couldn't remember when they were new;
A mirror, seamless many a day,
Was promptly smashed in the regular way;
Old shoes enough, if properly thrown,
To bring good luck to all creatures known;
And children thirteen, more or less,
In varying phenakels of dress
And that was the night
We had that night,
When roused, the terrible foe to fight,
Which blazed aloft to a moderate height,
And turned the cheeks of the timid white,
Including Deacon Tompkins.

V.

Lo! where the engines, reeking hot,
Dashed up to the interesting spot
Came Number Two, "The City's Hope,"
Propelled by a line of men and rope;
And after them, on a spiteful run,
"The Ocean Billows," or Number One.
And soon the two, reduced to "play"
By a hundred hands, were working away,
Until, to the Deacon's flustered sight,
As he danced about in his robe of white,
It seemed as if, by the hand of Fate,
House-cleaning day were some 100 years late,
And with complete though late success,
Had just arrived by the night express.
The "Ocean Billows" were at high tide,
And flung their spray upon every side;
The "City's Hope" were in perfect trim,
Preventing aught like an interim;
And a "Hook-and-Ladder Company" came,
With hooks and poles and a long hard name,
And with an iconoclastic frown,
Were about to pull the whole thing down,
When some one raised the assuring shout,
"It's only the chimney a-burnin' out!"
Whereat, with a sense of injured trust,
The crowd went home in complete disgust.
Scarce one of those who, with joyous shout,
Assisted the Deacon in moving out,
Refrained from the honest-and-loving din,
To help the Deacon at moving in.
And that was the plight
In which, that night,
They left the Deacon, clad in white,
Who felt he was hardly treated right,
And used some words, in the flickering light,
Not orthodox in their purport quite—
Poor, put-out Deacon Tompkins!

A NIGHT OF TERROR.

By KATHARINE S. MACQUOID.

Lorenz hesitated—he was warmly attached to Frau Herber, but it was to him simply impossible that this young, lovely girl should remain in Freistenberg to fall into the hands of French soldiers. Of what use would his protection be against a band of brutal ruffians? He stood thinking. All the friends on whom he could have relied for help had by this time left the city; besides, they dwelt either in the Herrengasse or in the main thoroughfares, and as the houses along this street and the rich-looking dwellings would be certainly invaded by the French soldiers, it had been resolved, in the brief council held this afternoon in the Rathhaus, that although no resistance should be offered, the inhabitants most likely to be molested would act wisely in withdrawing themselves and their valuables to some place of refuge out on the line of the French retreat.

"Listen, Magdalena," he said—it seemed to him that any reasoning was justifiable which would make her consent to leave Freistenberg. "No doubt it would be dangerous to move your grandmother in this bitter cold. Let us, then, wrap her warmly in her chair, and make up a large fire, and leave her all the food she can want. It is supposed that the French will only halt here a few hours, for they believe the Russians are in pursuit. I promise that you shall retake the moment danger is over. Come, my dearest love! you will come with me?"

Magdalena's lips trembled, and the tears started to her eyes, but her answer was to step down the last stair, on which she had been standing, and to cross the floor toward the sitting-room.

"Stop"—Lorenz caught her arm. "You have only looked at one side of the matter. If you persist in staying here, I stay also. I can at least take the same risk as you do—a risk to which you will not open your eyes."

At this a sudden flush, a quivering of the eyelashes as the sweet eyes opened in wild terror, showed him how wrongly he had been reading her. He saw through the folds of her gown that Magdalena's heart was violently agitated—all her pulses were fluttering with fear, and her lips parted with agitation. She turned away from the door and faced him.

"You must not stay here, Lorenz: it would take away all my courage to know that you were in danger. And then think of your father and your mother—you are the only child they have. Your duty is to be with them now."

She saw that she had touched him, for he turned his head aside. Indeed, his mother's last words sounded in his ears: "Yes, my Lorenz, you may bring the dear Frau Herber and her grandchildren to us, but come without delay. I shall have no peace till I see you arrive at Amburn."

"Come in here," said Magdalena. She had opened the door. She went up to her grandmother. Franz stood beside her. When he saw Lorenz enter he frowned. He was surprised when the young man spoke to him.

"Franz," he said, "a time like this gives every one a responsibility. You are old enough to feel that Magdalena ought not to stay here. We must take her away."

It seemed to the boy that he was being cajoled. If Lorenz loved his sister, then he ought to stay and defend her. "If he goes away, he is a coward," said Franz to himself. "I see how it is: he wants me to go, so that he may not have to stay behind."

"Magdalena will not leave my grandmother," he said, coldly; "and she"—he stroked one of Frau Herber's hands—"can not travel in weather like this."

"Well, then," said Lorenz, quickly, for a new plan suggested itself, "stay you, then, with your grandmother. It is better to risk one life than two, and probably, even if they find you, the French will on ill treat you, my boy." He turned to Magdalena and took her hand.

"You—" Franz broke out, angrily; but his grandmother pressed his arm warningly. "Peace, my child," she said; "you are the youngest; you must let Magdalena decide."

"I can not leave you, grandmother," the girl said. "If no harm comes to this house, then I need never have left it; and if harm does come," she went on, slowly, "then I could never be happy again if I had left you."

She put both arms around Frau Herber's neck and tenderly kissed her. Franz bent down too, and rustled his sister's hair.

"You are a brave girl," he whispered, "and I'll never tease you again. Now, Lorenz Inchoff, I am going to bar and bolt the gates," he said, with an important air.

Lorenz smiled. "By all means, Franz. I will come and help you."

"You! are you going to stay?" Franz looked at Lorenz with a troubled face.

"If Magdalena will not come with me, do you think I am going to leave?" said Lorenz.

At this the girl came forward and put her hand on his arm.

"Remember your mother, Lorenz; by this time she must be anxious."

Lorenz took both her hands.

"If this news had not come," he said, "I should to-day have asked your grandmother's consent to our betrothal. If we escape this trial, you will be my wife, will you not, Magdalena?" Frau Herber said yes, Franz, ere withdrawn to our promise. And you know a man may not desert his wife even for his mother, and you are my wife, dear one."

"No, she is not," said Franz, impetuously; he could hardly keep himself from pulling his sister's hands away from her lover's clasp.

Lorenz looked at him in angry surprise.

"Lorenz, she is not yet your wife," Frau Herber said. "If she were, it would be different. Listen to me. When your message came I was sorely troubled, for I foresaw the conflict; but soon peace came to me. Something seemed to tell me to trust, and I fell asleep in my chair. While I slept I thought I wakened, and your mother stood beside me. 'Where is Lorenz?' she said. 'What have you done with my son?' While I tried to answer her she went. After this I roused, and found that I had been dreaming; but the dream meant something, Lorenz. You must not stay here. You must go to your mother. A good son makes a good husband, you know," she said, smiling.

"I can not stay in this house against your will, but I shall remain in Freistenberg." The young fellow spoke doggedly.

"You must go to Ahnbeen—indeed you must," Frau Herber said, entreatingly.

Lorenz smiled, kissed her hand, and bade her adieu, then he nodded to Franz, and went out of the room.

Magdalena followed him, and as soon as the door closed behind her Lorenz took her in his arms.

"I shall be near you, my beloved," he said. "If harm comes, we can at least die together."

Once more the lovers clasped hands, and then they parted. Franz closed and barred the gates at once, so that Magdalena had no chance of a last look.

CHAPTER IV.

The evening wore slowly away. Soon the noise of departure subsided, and when Franz came in—for he had said he could not stay cooped in-doors like a chicken—he reported that the town seemed asleep.

"Are there any signs of the French soldiers?" Frau Herber asked.

"No. I went out by the Wolfgang-Thor, and looked over the country, but I could not see them. It is so strangely dark, grandmother; I fancy there will be a heavy snow fall."

Although Magdalena tried not to feel disquieted, it was impossible to go about the house in her usual light-hearted fashion. The thought of Lorenz riding away somewhere so as to catch over her safety, instead of following his parents, disturbed her. If anything happened to him, then she would have been the cause of it. Would anything happen to any one? Was it not all a false alarm, and might not the French have taken the upper road, which would lead them some miles north of Freistenberg?

She was at the top of the house when this thought came, and she hurried up a ladder leading to the loft, only lighted by some slit-like dormers in the roof. She crossed the loft, and taking down a bar, opened a door just under the gable.

From this opening, spite of the growing darkness, Magdalena could see beyond the city walls, but she could only make out the head dry road stretching away to the east. Nothing stirred on it. Below her was the silent city; not a sound came from it, not even a wreath of smoke from one of the huge chimney-stacks. The darkness was unnatural, and the clouds looked even more heavy than they had looked. All at once something fell upon her face. It was a snow flake.

Magdalena closed the door again, shivering, for the keen wind had rushed in, almost blinding her with its icy force. The sense of loneliness was awful, and she went down to the sitting-room.

When she joined the others, her grandmother was sitting in her old place by the fire, but Franz had drawn one of the red curtains aside, and was looking out.

"I'll wager they'll not light the street lamps to-night," he said. "There never is one here, but there will not be one on the Herren-Gasse or the Market-place; there is no need to light the Frenchmen about. Perhaps the lamp men have gone away with the rest. Hullo! there is snow; do you hear, Magdalena?" he called to his sister.

She had knelt down before the fire, trying to warm herself, for she felt half frozen. She got up and touched her grandmother's hand. "I shall go and get your warm cloak," she said. "You can not be too much wrapped, grandmother."

"How slowly the snow comes down!" said Franz. "Great flakes as big as little white birds. Do come and look, Magdalena."

But she had gone for a cloak, and once she was wrapping the old woman carefully and tenderly within it. "You look drowsy, dear," she said. "Close your eyes and sleep."

Frau Herber smiled. "I am not sleepy. Go and look at the snow, my child."

And while the grandmother prayed silently beside the fire that her darlings might be spared the coming peril, Franz and Magdalena watched at the window.

At first the snow came as if cautiously, falling, in large, solemn flakes through the still air, but these seemed to spread into downy feathers as they reached the ground, and quickly the street below the window was white. Now the flakes became thicker, and the wind, which had completely lulled for a brief space, whirled them round and round here and there in swirling veils of silver, till even Franz's eyes ached with gazing at it. Now the snow drove against the window, but it was so soft it made no sound.

Magdalena at length turned slowly from the window, and then she paused, and stood still, with parted lips.

"Did you hear?" she said, in a low, startled voice, while she fastened the curtain closely.

Franz started up and ran to the window, but the girl stood still, her face white and set, one hand raised to keep him silent. As she listened there arose sounding from some way off the muffled notes of a trumpet.

"It is the French. They are in the town," said Franz. "We could not hear that from outside, the snow deadens the sound, or it would be plainer." He went back to the fire-place, and standing on tiptoe, took down his father's gun.

At this his grandmother sat upright in her chair.

"Leave the gun alone, Franz," she said, firmly; "resistance is absolutely useless. You might shed blood, but that is all you could do. You could not hinder them. We have only one weapon, my child—we can pray." And then she began slowly to repeat the 140th psalm.

At first Franz listened doggedly, and gave impatient glances at the curtained window, but the feeble voice went on, and presently Magdalena sank on her knees beside her grandmother, and joined in her supplication. Franz put the gun down on the table, and tried to listen to them, but his ears were strained to catch other sounds, and when the psalm was ended, he beckoned to Magdalena.

"We must cover the fire," he said, "and pull the screen close round it."

"It does not show outside," she said—"I looked when I came in." But still she did as he asked. Between them they moved Frau Herber close to the chimney breast, and then drew the many-leaved Indian screen completely across it.

"Hark!" said Magdalena.

There was a distant shouting, then a subdued but continued murmur; this went on and on till it came nearer, then it paused.

The three watchers held their breath, pale and open-eyed, fixed in the posture in which the sound had surprised them. Soon there came again shouts, muffled, but still sounds not to be mistaken, and the eager listeners could picture to themselves that some treasure had been discovered by the plunderers. The time passed slowly. The air grew more and more chill, for though the fire still burned on the hearth, they did not dare to add fresh fuel, so as to kindle a blaze. Now and then the grandmother prayed aloud, but scarcely a word was spoken.

All at once came a louder sound—a sound that rang out through the closely packed air, and reached them at their hearth-stone, thrilling through their blood—a sound of singing, many voices joined in what seemed to be a drunken chorus.

Magdalena flung both arms tightly round her grandmother. "They must be quite near," she whispered.

Frau Herber pressed the girl's cold hands in her own. "He is nearer," she said, "and those who trust in Him shall not be confounded."

But to Magdalena it seemed that the singers came nearer still, and her terror almost conquered her trust.

CHAPTER V.

Lorenz Inchoff had first gone back to his father's house in the Herren-Gasse, to make sure that the doors were securely fastened, and then he wandered about this quarter of the deserted town. He wished to find a refuge between the main thoroughfare and Magdalena's home, so that he might give her timely warning of the approach of the French, and mount guard before the door-way. More than one house in the narrow street which led in this direction had not been deserted, the inhabitants being either too poor or too infirm to think of taking the long, cold journey to Ahnbeen. Some, too, seem utterly incredulous. The French had been for so many years a bugbear that they believed this was but another false alarm. Lorenz talked to some of these unbelievers, but he refused their hospitality. He shook from finding himself shut up with others. The deserted houses had closed doors and windows, and it was long before he could discover any place to take shelter in, and the snow had begun to fall thickly.

At last, at the angle of a narrow alley, he saw a garden wall. The wall was low, and he easily climbed into the garden. By good fortune the open court-yard of the house bounded the garden on one side. Below the overhanging gallery of this Hof he found a small door which had been left unlocked. But when he had passed into the room to which it led, he found a succession of offices ending in a kitchen; barred off from the actual house, the windows looked into the Hof and garden; he was completely shut off from the street. However, the garden wall was close to and from it he could easily reach the street in a few moments.

There was a fire still burning on the hearth of the first room he had entered. He made this up, and then he went back to the garden, and began to pace up and down, straining his ears to listen through the falling snow-flakes.

They fell thicker and thicker, faster and faster, till they came with such driving force that, staggering under the weight he was carried, he turned to seek shelter in-doors.

The wind whirled the snow with such savage fury against the wall of the hut that in the darkness Lorens had some trouble in finding the door by which he had first entered, and when at last he opened it, the snow followed him in like a white phantom, in spite of the obstacle offered by the projecting gallery overhead. He was so chilled that he could scarcely move, but he heaped more wood on the fire, shook his cloak with some difficulty clear of the snow that covered it, and stamped to free his boots from the huge clumps of snow that almost prevented him from moving. Then he placed himself near the window, though he knew that outer sounds must be dulled before they reached him. He was strangely tired, but he felt too drowsy to allow himself to rest. All at once it seemed to him that he was turning into stone. His limbs were stiff, and his jaws clung together; a strange stupor began to steal over him.

With difficulty he dragged himself near the fire, which now burned cheerfully, and then he remembered that he had taken no food since early morning.

He sat down before the fire, and tried to find in the pocket of his coat some cordial which he had put there. All at once he heard a sound outside.

He struggled to his feet, and listened. Through the still air came the muffled notes of a trumpet.

Lorens made a rush to the door. This was the moment for which he had waited; he could at least die for Magdalena.

But he could not get to the door; he felt giddy, powerless, and he had to lean against the wall for support. Once more he dragged himself forward and reached the door, but he could not move it. Dimly he saw a mass of snow in front of it, then the ground seemed to slip from under his feet.

Lorens started; he shivered, and opened his eyes. What was this? He was lying on the floor of a strange room; daylight showed faintly in the gray outline of a window, and as his eyes became accustomed to the dim light he saw a horned ox fire on the hearth and a mound of snow near where he was lying.

Then he remembered, and he struggled to rise; but this was not easy. His feet had the limbs had stiffened with the cold; he could not move, and with the loss of power came the certainty that he must have been lying there for hours. What had happened? Had the French come to Freitenberg, or were they still expected? Then flashed the remembrance of the trumpet note, but it seemed to Lorens that he had dreamed it. But, if not, had the night he so dreaded passed away while he lay sleeping? The thought gave him strength beyond his powers, for he had risen self up from the ground. It was because the wall was close to, or he must have fallen. His head rested his hands felt cold, he knew that in his present state sleep would be death. Magdalena, the wall, seemed to swim. He tried to think calmly. Some one must have come into him from the heavy sleep—what was it? Then all at once, and near to him as it seemed a trumpet rang out the call for departure. Lorens had served against the French and he knew well the loud, braying notes, but no murmur of movement followed. It was true, then, that the French were actually in Freitenberg, and he well knew he had slept and left Magdalena to their mercy. The agony of the thought forced him, his numbed blood stirred and brought back the power of movement. He pulled out his flask and drank from it, and then guiding himself along by the wall, he brushed away some of the snow, and tried to open the door by which he had come in.

He pulled at it with all the strength he had, but he had soon to give up exhausted. Then he tried with his knife to remove the snow which had worked its way in all around, but he found that this had frozen fast to the posts and lintels—it was hard ice.

Lorens looked about him with despairing, haggard eyes. He was a prisoner! He saw now that the window was entirely snow-blocked, so that the morning was perhaps farther advanced than he had imagined. He went on through the offices till he reached the kitchen, and saw what had escaped him in the darkness last night, a door in the panelled wall beside the cooking stove. He opened the door, and, as he expected, he found a narrow staircase leading to the house itself. This assurance of escape from his prison helped his strength. He was soon up the stairs, and found himself at the end of the open gallery of the first. At the opposite end of this gallery was the great staircase of the mansion. The gallery was so full of snow that he was some time in making his way across it. In the corners, where it had drifted, it stood up in great white walls, and the staircase, when he came to it, was almost impassable.

At last, panting and exhausted, he reached the bottom of the staircase, and found himself in a dry covered court-yard. Two huge entrance gates were bolted and barred within. This house, then, had escaped. He embolted and unbarred the gates, and to his joy they yielded. He opened them, and then he started, not only at sight of the street marked to each with snow—again the trumpet sounded, and now from the western side of the town. Lorens waited, intently listening. Then he heard sounds as if the word of command were given; then came silence. They were departing. This terrible scourge had been removed from Freitenberg.

Lorens's dread overpowered his relief. Imagination went on painting to him how his short but conscious night had been passed by the French soldiers. The snow above silver white. It had drifted against the angle of the opposite house, but in the road between, its smooth surface had been disturbed; foot-prints had struck deeply into it, though they had been partially hidden by a fresh covering of snow. As he trod on the frozen snow the whole aspect of the place was so changed that he wondered if he should find his way. There was no one abroad in this quarter. The chains of the lamps suspended across the streets were snow-laden, the roofs and chimneys were shapeless under their silver-white mantle, and the windows and doors were deeply framed in snow, while every bit of carving, every projecting bracket, had taken colossal dimensions with their dazzling covering.

As Lorens went on, he saw more than one house where the open doorway and the marks of footsteps showed that the invaders had not been idle; but all was still. For him Freitenberg held only Magdalena, and at last, out of breath, and with snow-clogged feet, he reached the angle of the street she lived in.

Lorens stopped, and from his heart went up a cry of joy and thanksgiving. It seemed to him that he beheld a miracle. The silvery mass had drifted till a solid wall of snow meshed not only doors and lower windows, but covered even the eriel.

A track of footsteps showed that the street had been visited during the night, but the snow had so blocked the house that the work of breaking through such a barrier had, no doubt, seemed too fatiguing to the tired Frenchmen.

Lorens went closer, and saw how thick and strong the wall was. "I must get help," he said; "the snow may stand here for days if the frost lasts."

He turned away, and then looked back at the windows above the snow wall. The door beneath the gable was opening slowly. He held his breath, and then he saw Magdalena smiling down on him with shining eyes.

"Are you safe—quite safe? Thank God!" she cried; and then her tears fell like rain.

He kissed his hand, and waved it toward her. "I go for help, my beloved," he called out.

It took Lorens many time to get the help he needed. When the trumpet notes told the people of Freitenberg that the French were really in the town, they had hidden away in cellars and other places, and many of them had to be roused from deep sleep.

At last he got some men to come with shovels and pickaxes and the door into the court-yard was quickly opened.

Magdalena and Franz were waiting for him in the court-yard. The lovers eyes filled with tears as the storm his arms around Lorens.

"How is Frau Herbert?" the young man said.

"Quite well. I am glad we are here," said Franz. "She has been anxious for you. Never mind about Magdalena."

THE "TRAMP," AND HIS SUPPRESSION.

THE cruel and almost inconceivable ferocious murder of Mrs Maxson and her daughter in a little village of Long Island and other equally mysterious murders which have lately shocked the community, have brought the problem of the "tramp" before the country in the most startling manner. Every one familiar with rural or village life can readily understand the conditions which make such deeds not only possible, but, within not very long periods, almost certain. The scattered population, the protected railroads, the peaceful habits, the want of any organized or efficient police, with the existence of a class of wanderers, idle or half idle, and often criminal, spreading themselves over the country—these are the elements of the situation from which spring with considerable regularity petty thieving, outrage, assault, burglary, house robbery, and murder, most of which go undetected and unpunished.

"Tramps," by the greater part, are the overflow from city life. Their ranks are recruited from the vicious, the lazy and the unfortunate, who, driven from the haunts of organized society and the police, become, as their characters and habits indicate them, beggars, thieves, or criminals. The greater number are simply idlers, strolling from place to place, begging a dinner here, a breakfast there, a lodging in some outhouse, or sleeping à la belle étoile, and living on the pilferings of hen roosts or corn fields. These are merely the drones of the great human hive, who drag out in filth and disorder their miserable lives. But with these are the men of criminal instincts and habits, fired with brutal lust, hungry with the greed born of dissipation and drink, reckless of life, their own or others', and trained in the terrible school of self-indulgence of our large towns. Woe to those who may meet them in the lonely ways, or may extend as them the hand of charity! Their trail across the woods and fields is marked with crime too horrible to describe, in comparison with which murder itself is less terrible. And it is on one of these that the rustic householder may at any moment be spotted when the ragged costume, the unshaven face, the sunburned hands, of the stately beggar appears at the door. It is with this element that society must make up its mind to deal.

The obvious weapon with which to deal with it is a police force. The average village or country community will shrink from this. The suggestion to them means an organized force of blue coats, with sergeants and [illegible] and the excitement and [illegible] but this is not necessary. What is needed is a small force of mounted men, young, active, alert, with just enough organization to enable them to act together, and enough discipline to secure fidelity. Their chief function would be prevention rather than either detection or arrest. Patrolling the country roads frequently and rapidly, keeping a constant watch on suspicious persons, appearing often in the most secluded and exposed places, they could soon make it extremely dangerous for the criminal classes. An intimate and familiar knowledge of all persons with legitimate occupation is easily acquired in country neighborhoods, and that solves one half the difficulties of police work. A criminal is really far safer in the dense population of the cities than he could be in a village with such an organization, since in the latter he would necessarily be a marked man, and could hardly move from point to point unobserved.

Such a force should be organized in every county, or it might with advantage be made a State force, outside of the larger cities. Its members should be carefully selected, with absolute freedom from political interference. They should serve for life, or as long as they were faithful and capable. They should have a graded increase in salary, or promotion, according to length of service and superior merit. They should be well mounted, uniformed, thoroughly instructed, and well officered. They should be pensioned for disability in the service, or on retirement for honorable cause, according to service. These requirements, which are of value in any force, would be essential in this, because of its peculiar nature, and the necessity of securing the best men at the most economical rates. Properly managed, such a force would practically put no end on a short time to the worst evils of the "tramp," and there is nothing in it which is not entirely feasible. The fact that the tramp is practically unknown in the outer districts of New York city, some of which are as strictly rural as the heart of Long Island, is due to the crowded police of the city, and this could be applied in a modified form in every community.

LEROY D. BROWN

Leroy D. Brown, Ph.D., the School Commissioner elect for the State of Ohio, was born and reared on a farm not many miles north of Marietta. His father was the son of New England parents, and his mother's ancestry included the Hammonds of Maryland and the Hammons of Virginia. He is thirty-five years old, being the youngest man ever placed at the head of educational affairs in Ohio. In boyhood he attended a country school, and read nearly everything within his reach. At an early age he became a private collector on the Union army, in which he saw hard service, participating in some of the bloodiest battles of the rebellion. After the war closed he returned to the farm, again entering the district school to prepare himself for the position of teacher. Like Garfield and other noted Ohio men he defrayed the expenses of his collegiate course without help from others. After graduation he adopted teaching as a profession, reading law and travelling in America and Europe the latter to fit him for his work. He is a good speaker, an easy writer, and is well equipped for the high services to which the people of his State have called him. We predict great prosperity for the schools of Ohio on the result of his administration.

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

A CENTURY to the University of Berlin is said to be sixty-nine years of age. He graduated in theology at his youth, and went on a missionary to South Africa, where he remained until a year or two since, when he returned to Germany to study medicine. As soon as he has become a doctor of medicine he will go back to the Transvaal as a medical practitioner. In 1873 there shed to Göttingen a gray haired man who had been a student to the university there for forty years. It was said that an uncle had left him a legacy of a few hundred thalers a year, while he was a scholar as long as he was pursuing his university studies. He was of an unambitious, contented temperament, and the idea occurred to him not to stop pursuing them. He submitted to a lecture or two at the beginning of each semester, which was sufficient for the maintenance of his status as a student, but the intervals were very long between his appearances in a lecture-room. A boy's cap with a flaring crown afforded a curious covering for his venerable head, and he was conscious of a shiny old portfolio which could have been of no service to him except as a badge vouching for the respectability of his condition. Every child in Göttingen knew him as the "Old Student." He was astonishingly faithful to his beer. He was found one morning on his sofa, ex-matriculated, gone out, like his pipe, which had fallen on the floor by his side.

In the General Convention of Universalists at Washington, recently, objection was made to discussion of equal theological education for young women, on the ground that it was a side issue. "That's what I've been—a side issue," said one of the assembled divines.

A revival of the discussion whether it is decent to break your soft boiled eggs into a glass, or whether there must be nothing intermediate between the egg and the consumer save a spoon, suggests the possibility of its being a sandwiches thing to take a sherry flip as the manner which is now common. If there are people who can not bear the sight of burnt egg all alone by itself, it is not likely that they would be willing to be spectators of egg and sherry shaken up together, and it seems beyond question that they would be pained and even horrified to see the whole rude contents of an egg dropped with a hollow "hubble!" into a glass of sherry, and allowed to float there in all its gross and primitive entirety. The possible offensiveness of the present method might be avoided by taking the sherry out of one egg-shell and the egg out of another.

Moncure D. Conway wrote to the Glasgow Herald a description of the sun as he saw it for several days while he was on his way from England to Australia. One morning, in place of the usual ochy, an intense blue sun rose above the horizon and swung across the firmament, maintaining its startling color the entire day. The colorcause of Java was in eruption at the time of this remarkable appearance of the sun, and the phenomenon noted by Mr Conway is ascribed to the conditions arising from the tremendous disturbances in the distant Indian Island. In the accounts of the great Javanese upheaval it was reported that the sun was blue.

News comes from the Sandwich Islands that the first number of the Hawaiian Monthly Magazine will appear there about the beginning of the new year. Dr. Charles T. Rogers is to be the editor.

Logsdon Weaver and John Brown were recently taken to State-prison together in Kentucky. Weaver had killed a man, and his sentence was for two years. Brown's sentence was for three years. He had broken into a railroad car and stolen a water-melon.

A correspondent of the Cleveland Leader in Goshen, Indiana, tells a story of the first printing of Will Carleton's "Betsey and I are Out." The poem was sent, the correspondent says, to the Toledo Blade, where a subordinate, in the absence of the editor, threw it into the waste-basket. The editor had a habit of looking through the waste-basket, and he recovered the poem, all except the first sheet. For a duplicate of this sheet he wrote to the author, who furnished it, and the poem was printed. It was copied by nearly or very paper in America.

In a florid review of a drop-curtain, one of the Cincinnati newspapers says: "There was a moment of impatient anticipation after the audience had been seated, when the green house was rapidly rolled up and the new drop-curtain appeared to view. It was greeted with most enthusiastic applause, as it deserved to be. The scene represents the opening night of the Grand Opera-house in Paris, and gives a very carefully drawn and correct representation of the splendid entrance and stairs leading to the auditorium. While the staircase, with its lights and shadows, presents a difficult subject for treatment, it has been faithfully executed and is architecturally correct."

HEALTH

Is not possible when the blood is impure, and recovery from any ailment must be slow and uncertain while that condition continues. The blood may be corrupted by the taint of Hereditary Scrofula, and the poisons of Bacterial and Contagious Diseases, and also by impurities implanted in it through exposure to Local, improper food, derangement of the digestive and assimilatory organs, and other causes. The first external evidences of such vitiation are Blotches, Boils, Pimples, Sores, Eruptions, and Boils. To these ordinarily the symptoms absorb the internal effects in depression of the Spirits, Lassitude, Weariness without effort, Headaches, Dizziness, and disturbed circulation. Be warned in time!

Ayer's Sarsaparilla

Is the only medicine that will thoroughly purify the blood. In millions of cases, during nearly forty years in which it has been the best hope of humanity suffering from vitiation of the blood, it has effected cures beyond the power of any other remedy. Leading physicians know its composition from the most powerful alteratives, directives, and tonics, and prescribe it in their practice.

A Pretty Woman's Secret.

Fear of discovery, when she resorts to false hair and dyes, is a source of constant anxiety to her. The very persons from whom she most desires to hide the waning of her charms are the ones most likely to make the discovery. But there is no reason why she should not perish, and retain all the beauty of hair that was her pride in youth. Let her use AYER'S HAIR VIGOR, and, not only will her hair cease to fall out, but a new growth will appear where the scalp has been denuded; and locks that are turning gray, or have actually grown white, will return to their pristine freshness and brilliance of color. AYER'S HAIR VIGOR cures

Hereditary Baldness.

GEORGE MAYER, Flatonia, Texas, was bald at 25 years of age, as his ancestors had been for several generations. One bottle of HAIR VIGOR started a growth of soft, downy hair all over his scalp, which soon became thick, long, and vigorous.

Ayer's Hair Vigor

Is not a dye, but by healthful stimulation of the roots and color glands, speedily restores to its original color hair that is Turning Gray.

MRS. CATHERINE PLAISTER, Point of Rocks, Md., had her hair suddenly blanched by fright, during the late civil war. AYER'S HAIR VIGOR restored it to its natural color, and made it softer, glossier, and more abundant than it had been before.

Scalp Diseases

Which cause dryness, brittleness, and falling of the hair, dandruff, Rehine, and unsightly sores, are all quickly cured by AYER'S HAIR VIGOR. Dyspeptic Horace Boyd, Misanopolis, Miss., of intolerable Itching of the Scalp; J. S. CARTER, Jr., Occoquan, Va., of Scald Head; Mrs. D. Y. S. LOVELACE, Lovelaceville, Ky., of Tetter Sores; Miss Bessie H. BEDLOW, Burlington, Vt., of Scalp Disease and Dandruff. Torpidity of the roots of the hair, which, if neglected, may result in incurable baldness, is readily cured by AYER'S HAIR VIGOR. As

A Toilet Luxury

AYER'S HAIR VIGOR has no equal. It is colorless, cleanly, delightfully perfumed, and has the effect of making the hair soft, pliant, and glossy.

OF

GUSTAVE DORÉ.

By EDGAR ALLAN POE. With 26 Full-page Plates by GUSTAVE DORÉ. Title-page Design By ELIHU VEDDER. Comment on the Poem By RICHARD CLEVERIUS SPEDDEN. Folio, Ornamental Cloth, Gilt Edges, and in a neat box, $10 00. Uniform with Doré's "Ancient Mariner."

The publication of "The Raven" by the Harpers is an advent in American bookmaking. It is perfect from the beginning of Mr Brennan's charming "comment on the poem" to the last engraving. The typography is without a flaw. The engraving is beautifully done by skilled artists. Vignon contributes a title-page, and before the portals of the folio the mighty angel at the Gates of Death throwing the light of his torch upon the approach, but guarding from profane touch the key that opens to the unknown beyond.—Commercial Bulletin, Boston.

PEARS' SOAP

THE FAMOUS ENGLISH COMPLEXION SOAP.

"MY OPINION OF PEARS' SOAP"

GOOD COMPLEXION

PEARS' SOAP

ESTABLISHED LONDON 100 YEARS.

A Specialty for the Skin and Complexion,
As Recommended by the Greatest Known authority on the Skin.

Prof. SIR ERASMUS WILSON, F.R.S.
Pres. of the Royal Col. of Surgeons England

Nothing adds so much to personal [illegible] as a Bright, Clear Complexion and a Soft Skin. With these the [illegible] features become attractive. Without them the handsomest are but coldly impressive. Many a complexion is marred by coarse alkaline and Mineral Toilet Soaps.

PEARS' SOAP

is specially prepared for the delicate skin of ladies and children and others sensitive to the weather. Winter or summer. In England it is pre-eminently the complexion soap, as it is recommended by all the best authorities, on account of its pure emollient character. Redness, Roughness, and Chapping are prevented, and a clear and bright appearance and a soft, velvety condition imparted and maintained, and a good, healthful and attractive complexion ensured.

Its agreeable and lasting perfume, beautiful appearance, and soothing properties commend it as the greatest luxury of the toilet. Its durability and economy is remarkable.

THE TARIFF AND THE PARTIES.

IT would seem to be a truism that the policy of protection and that of free trade are irreconcilable, and that a party can not stand for both. But the Democratic press records from the admission that the election of Mr CARLISLE signifies the adoption of a free trade policy by the Democratic party, and Mr. CARLISLE'S speech upon taking the chair deprecated public apprehension that such legislation to promote free trade would be undertaken. It is now, indeed, alleged that he means only to favor measures to secure the remainder of the reduction of the revenue contemplated by the report of the Tariff Commission. That is to say, he would carry out a scheme begun by the Republicans, but he would carry it out in a free-trade and not in a protective manner. This is consonant with much that is said in the Democratic papers. Is that the Democratic programme? Do they propose to go to the country, not as a free-trade party, but as a non-protective tariff party? The speech of Mr CARLISLE and the tone of the Democratic press show plainly that they do not believe that the country would sustain a free-trade policy. Upon what grounds, then, do they suppose it would sustain the first steps toward a free-trade policy? Or do they mean to hold that they are not free-traders, but merely friends of a revenue tariff?

The word "revenue," however, is chosen as opposed to "protective." It implies a tariff designed solely to raise revenue, and adjusted to avoid protection as in itself an evil. The party which takes this position must be held to take it honestly, and the position, as the Sun says, is that of just as much free trade as is possible under the circumstances. To advocate this, however, is to be practically a free-trade party. When the Republican party was formed it was an antislavery party. It did not, indeed, propose the immediate abolition of slavery in the States, but it opposed its extension into the Territories. And it did this with the hope and expectation that it would lead to the complete destruction of the slave system in the Union. In the same way a free-trade policy, in the existing situation, does not necessarily mean the immediate abolition of the Custom-house; it means tariff revision in a sense hostile to the protective principle. The first honest thing for the Democratic majority in the House to do is to show precisely what the Democratic position is. The party can not hope to succeed by "hedging," or by trying to differ as little as possible from the other party. As we have often said, the Democratic effort to obtain power as an honester, more economical, and more sagacious party than the Republican is simply comical. To make its traditions and general character its platform would be inconceivably ludicrous. Its only hope of success would be in trying to be accepted as the sincere advocate of some intelligible policy. That this would be enough to secure the prize we do not say, but it is the only promising course to pursue. The first step in this endeavor must be to state clearly its hope and purpose upon the tariff question. If it favors a revision of the tariff with incidental protection, it holds a Republican position. If it favors a revision hostile to incidental protection, it is to the common apprehension a free-trade party. And it ought not to repudiate the name. The alternative, indeed, can not be agreeable to the party, because, if it takes the first course, it "throws up the sponge" for '84; and if it takes the second, it invites a reconstruction of parties, with a long contest for the supremacy of the free-trade principle.

But neither the Democratic nor the Republican party is organized upon the question of a tariff. And here is the fatal difficulty. A vital issue like this can not be taken up by an existing party and made its paramount policy without practically dissolving the party. Revenue reform is a desirable object, but the Democratic party does not stand for it, and should the Democratic revenue reformers obtain control of their party, and make such reform its chief policy, it would be at the cost of an immense secession, equivalent to a rupture and dissolution of what is now known as the Democratic party. There could be no hope of practical success except by union with Republican revenue reformers, and that would produce a new party. The antislavery triumph was impossible while the Whig and Democratic parties endured. It became practicable only when great bodies of Whigs and Democrats regarded that issue as of more importance than their old party attachments. We do not believe that a similar point has been reached in the tariff agitation. Important as the question is, it is not generally accepted as paramount, and it will not, in our opinion, generally control party conventions next year. As yet, certainly, we see no reason to suppose that Democratic protectionists like Mr. RANDALL and his friends are ready to leave their party even if it should make an exclusive revenue tariff its platform, or that Republican revenue reformers are ready to help the familiar old Democratic party into power because it might declare for an anti-protective revision of the tariff. If the Democratic free traders in the House should take a decisive position upon the question at this session they would divide their own party, and take a step toward the reconstruction of parties. If, however, they should pursue the usual Democratic course of shirking and dodging, the Presidential contest would turn upon the comparative merits of the two parties and the public confidence in them—an ordeal from which Republicans do not shrink.

MORMONISM.

THE President says in his Message that the law of the last Congress has practically failed as yet to remedy the trouble in Utah, and he adds:

"I am convinced, however, that polygamy has become so strongly intrenched in the Territory of Utah that it is profitless to attack it with any but the strongest weapons which constitutional legislation can fashion. I favor, therefore, the repeal of the act upon which the existing government depends, the assumption by the national legislature of the entire political control of the Territory, and the establishment of a commission with such powers and duties as shall be delegated to it by law."

To this the News, the Mormon organ in Salt Lake City, replies:

"The President's Message will be hailed by the hireling clergy with pleasure, and will receive an amount of popular support. It is not shown in what way the destruction of our local government would affect the question of polygamy. The plural marriages of the Mormons are not recognized by the Territorial laws, and could not be dissolved by commissions, by edicts, by armies, or other earthly power. They are ecclesiastical, perpetual, and eternal. Until the Mormons become recreant to their faith with high Heaven these unions will be recognized by the Almighty Being, who established them for the benefit of His people and the fullness of His glory. The President's remarks on Utah polygamy will not add force to his Message nor credit to his statesmanship. They are a sop to bigots and breath to the flame of popular passion. It is doubtful if it will have a practical bearing on Congress. It will certainly create no commotion among the God-fearing people of Utah."

Governor MURRAY, of Utah, in a long and careful interview reported in the Herald, says that the real trouble is not polygamy, but an absolute religious despotism hostile to the United States, to the spirit of the government and the letter of the laws, and which, while defying the authority of the government, is biding its time for trying armed conclusions with the national power. As Mormonism is spreading into neighboring territory, the question of dealing with it is one of immediate importance.

The Mormons are chiefly recruited from the most ignorant foreigners. They are secluded in a wilderness in the very heart of the country, entirely beyond the assimilating influence of the national life, and compose a trained host of religious fanatics with purposes, interests, and feelings wholly alien and hostile to those of the United States. One of the articles of their religious faith consecrates a practice which is made criminal by the laws of the United States, and which is designed to secure their rapid increase. Polygamy is absolutely incompatible with American civilization, and a religious despotism controlling civil and political relations is fatal to American polity. It is obvious, then, that the President speaks only the truth in saying that it must be attacked with the stoutest weapons that constitutional legislation can fashion. This, however, does not necessarily mean armed suppression. To say that the matter must be left to itself is to say that if a host of foreigners encamp in Washington Territory, and profess systematic murder of strangers as an article of religious faith, the matter should be left to itself. It is true that the plural wives probably consent to the relation, but it is equally true that polygamy, no less than murder, is under our laws a penal offense.

The Constitution vests the government of the Territories in the Congress of the United States. If the Congress finds that the rules which have been adopted for the government of Utah merely strengthen the hostility of the Mormons to the United States by giving the exclusive political authority to its enemies, it may wisely revoke those rules, and resume direct control, even if it can do no more. Such a course would not of itself abolish polygamy, indeed, nor would it be an act of oppression toward well-disposed citizens. But it would encourage those who are friendly to the national authority, and it would relieve the government of its present pusillanimous attitude of apparent acquiescence in flagrant defiance of its authority. Meanwhile Mr. EDMUNDS writes to the National League for the Suppression of Polygamy that the committee intend to propose amendments, of which they gave notice when the bill was passed, and which he has no doubt, "with good administration, without which all laws are useless, we shall gradually extirpate the crime." For this proposed legislation the country will wait with great interest and anticipation.

THE ELECTORAL COUNT.

THE President's Message recalls to the attention of Congress the unsatisfactory condition of "momentous questions" relating to the Presidential succession. The President properly alludes to the circumstances of his own accession, when his death or inability would have left the government without a constitutional head. The delicate question of the method of determining the "inability" of a President is still unsettled. But nothing commended President ARTHUR more closely to the confidence and respect of the country than his wise and honorable conduct during President GARFIELD'S actual inability. His course was in the highest degree patriotic. But there are men in public life who would be capable, under similar circumstances, of a course which would involve a civil convulsion. It is the duty of Congress to heed the recommendation of the President, and to guard against such possibilities.

A still more pressing question of this kind is that of the count of the Presidential vote. In 1876-7 a civil war was avoided by the patriotic action of Congress. It was an emergency in which the conduct of Mr RANDALL and that of Mr. TILDEN will be always mentioned with honor. It is an emergency which is possible at every election, and should it occur in 1885, a similar pacific solution can not be reasonably anticipated. A close or doubtful result would easily precipitate an armed conflict.

This can be avoided by a simple provision which has been presented to Congress more than once, and which involves no party advantage to either side. Such a plan as that proposed by Mr. EDMUNDS would secure the constitutional purpose of respecting the State authority in the election, and annul all risk of actual trouble. Objections to an electoral certificate are readily made, and where the result of the election would be affected they will certainly be made. Such objections will under such circumstances be made in 1885. Will Congress have the good sense to provide a satisfactory method of settlement? The President has done his duty; the country may reasonably expect both parties in the Senate and the House to do theirs.

CHARITY ORGANIZATION.

THE object of the Charity Organization Society in the city of New York should be distinctly understood. There are some three hundred and more charitable associations in the city, besides five hundred denominational associations, and the ordinary public charities, as they are called. There are also thousands of benevolent persons who wish to relieve deserving poverty and actual suffering, but who are aware of the enormous imposture which is practised in the name of want and in the form of beggary, and who fear to give lest they make the situation worse, and surely encourage fraud. It seems very hard not to give alms to an apparent sufferer. But nobody has a right to forget in an effusion of sentimental emotion that there is no greater wrong to honest labor than to reward idleness and swindling. Ignorant alms-giving, which is simply indolent self-indulgence, teaches that skillful lying and laziness can get more money in a day than honest labor.

This is a triple wrong: to the beggar, in whom it destroys self-respect and honesty; to the industrious worker, whom it seduces to desert honest industry for lying and criminal beggary; and to society, by degrading character and perpetuating pauperism and crime, leading to the enormous increase of taxation, which comes at last from the honest and industrious poor man. In a great city, therefore, where it is absolutely impossible personally to know the truth about beggars, or personally to inquire into the facts about the dozen or score who daily beset the passenger in the street or apply at the door, some kind of agency is indispensable, unless a man should sternly refuse to do his charitable duty, or should insist upon doing a great wrong by giving without knowledge. But if he neglects some one of the existing societies of relief as his agency, he will find that they also suffer from the want of mutual understanding. The deception which deals with the individual giver misleads the associations also, and sometimes a dozen of them are relieving the same person. The waste of money in this way is immense, and one of the primary objects of the Charity Organization Society is to foster harmonious co-operation among the existing societies, and to prevent the evils of this confusion and overlapping of relief.

It proposes also to investigate thoroughly, and without charge, all cases which are referred to it, to report fully to the person or society that desires the inquiry, and to provide friendly visitors to take in actual charge such cases as require such attention. Besides this, while the society does not directly dispense alms in any form, it will seek relief from the proper associations and individuals for deserving cases, it will procure work for the poor who are capable of helping themselves in some degree, and it will expose and prosecute impostors. This last point is very important. For under the circumstances of a great city the disposition to trade upon charitable feeling is so great that counterfeit societies arise, professing to be charitable agencies, the object of which is simply to furnish a comfortable support to the managers. Several of these have been exposed by vigorous and striking revelations in the Herald, and by the action of the Board of Charities. The charitably disposed, who do not avail themselves of the agency of a denominational society which they know, should seek the agency of the Society for Relief, at 79 Fourth Avenue, or that of the Charitable Organization Society, at 64 Madison Avenue. Those who doubt and hesitate must not forget that a vast amount of what seems to them deserving and suffering poverty is a kind of organized fraud, which can be successfully encountered only by organized inquiry. The fraud, indeed, does not dispense anybody from the duty of charitable relief to the honest sufferers, of whom there are only too many. But it is quite as imperative a duty not to encourage a vast system of swindling.

DR DEWEY'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

THE Autobiography and Letters of Orville Dewey, D.D., edited by his daughter, is a delightful picture of a very celebrated preacher and a very interesting man. He began his ministry as colleague of Dr. CHANNING, and he was settled afterward in New Bedford and New York. Born in Sheffield, in Berkshire County, Massachusetts, the peaceful village seemed always to be his heart's home. He finally returned to it when past sixty, and for the last twenty years of his life he lived in the house in which he was born, and there he died.

Dr. DEWEY was never in vigorous health, and was obliged to take frequent rests, but he lived to be eighty-eight years old, and only toward the very end did his mind and spirits share the decline of his body. He was a man of the deepest religious feeling and exquisite sensibility, and his emotional temperament made him a singularly fervent and persuasive preacher. Forty years ago his church in New York, on Broadway, opposite the New York Hotel, and now changed into a theatre, was the most thronged in the city on Sunday evenings, to hear a doctrine and an eloquence to which New York was unaccustomed.

The letters in this volume, full of gayety, ease, observation, and often of profound feeling, reveal a most affectionate nature and a very lovable man. They are a charming contribution to the literature of letters. The book is of filial use, the editor, who has done her work most modestly and happily, having been conscious that a selection was all that was possible, and the selection she has made with admirable taste and discretion. Dr. DEWEY'S autobiographical picture of retired rural New England life at the beginning of the century is very valuable, and the book is a notable addition to the best American biographies.

THE NEW DISTRICT ATTORNEY.

THE community learned with sincere regret that Mr. PECKHAM was forbidden by his health and the imperative warning of his physician to undertake the severe duties of the District Attorney's office, and he resigned after a very few days. Governor CLEVELAND, in pursuance of his policy of selecting the fittest man for the important office, immediately appointed Mr. PETER B. OLNEY as his successor.

MR. OLNEY is a man of whom the best expectations may be justly entertained. An excellent lawyer, an upright and public-spirited citizen, a man in the vigorous prime of life, and familiar with municipal affairs, he takes office at a time when fitness and promptness and cogency can be of the utmost public service. There is no reason to doubt that the expectations of a just and efficient administration of the office which were awakened by the appointment of his immediate predecessor will be fulfilled by Mr. OLNEY. He has the character, the ability, and the purpose to do the work of thorough municipal investigation which is now universally demanded by all good citizens.

In both the appointments to the District-Attorneyship the Governor has shown his earnest desire to serve the public and not the mere politicians, and he is entitled to the hearty thanks of the community.

"I SAY NO."

OUR readers will gladly welcome the return to our columns of an old friend WILKIE COLLINS, who begins in this issue a new story. Those who recall the eager and absorbed interest with which they awaited from week to week the unfolding of the strange mystery of The Woman in White, or the weird and fascinating plot of The Moonstone, will take up with singular curiosity the thread of the new labyrinth, sure that, if the magician has not lost his cunning, they have before them a continuous interest and pleasure until that thread shall lead them to the very heart of the mystery, and that most melancholy word to the true novel-reader—Finis.

A GALLERY OF DELIGHTS.

THERE is no more interesting resort in the city during the holiday season, and none more worthy of the attention of citizens and strangers, than the Loan Exhibition at the National Academy of Design for the benefit of the pedestal fund of the BARTHOLDI statue. It is a collection of the richest and rarest and most famous objects in every branch of art, and of the most various and exquisite skill.

The interest extends from striking pictures of modern European painters to a large and very valuable assemblage of old and new miniatures, representing famous and beautiful persons; from the marvellous carving of BENVENUTO CELLINI to the elaborate illumination of ancient missals; lace such as the "dear dead women" who stepped stately to the tuccatoe of GALEPPI in Venice might have worn; wonderful work in gold and silver, Dutch, Italian, and English; tapestries, carving, porcelain, and pottery of every degree—in fine, everything strange, beautiful, costly, and quaint, which has been accumulating in hundreds of families from all countries and times.

It is a place for many visits; and although the objects are private possessions which money can not buy, there are very appropriate memorials of the exhibition and of its object (the statue of Liberty) to be bought at the gallery—fragments of the stone upon which WASHINGTON stood when he was inaugurated, and which is now placed permanently upon the pedestal below the statue in Wall Street.

THE LETTER AND THE SPIRIT.

THE President says in his Message:

"Since the 16th of July last no person has been appointed to the public service in the classified portions thereof except those certified by the Civil Service Commission to be the most competent."

Is the spirit of the reformed system equally observed in the unclassified service? Is there any evasion of the rules themselves by temporary appointments? In any public office none political assessments recently levied despite the law, and under circumstances which virtually compelled payment?

Much beneficial change has been accomplished. The reformed system has become law. But good laws are ineffective without enforcement in their own spirit and for their especial purpose. If such questions as we have suggested point to any actual abuses and evasions of the law, we trust that the Civil Service Commission will bring them to the attention of the President. It is true in that reform as elsewhere that it is the spirit, not the letter, which giveth life, and we shall look with interest to see whether the report of the Commission states that while the classified service has been filled, as the President says, according to the letter, the unclassified has been filled according to the spirit, and that tricks and evasions and abuses have been as far as practicable corrected.

PERSONAL.

In answer to many inquiries from subscribers, we regret to say that Mr. THOMAS NAST, who still retains his connection with Messrs HARPER & BROTHERS, has not yet sufficiently recovered from the severe attack of pneumonia by which he was recently prostrated to give the public the benefit of his genius. We hope, however, that before many months have passed he will be able to resume the pencil with which he has done such vigorous and noble work in the cause of the Union and in support of an honest and enlightened administration of national, State, and municipal government. The public will be glad to learn that, should his health permit, Mr. NAST will deliver some lectures during the course of the winter.

—The attention of the managers of "church sociables" is directed at the present moment by the recent disclosures of the Rosen-Vaughan trial at New Utrecht, Long Island, to the possible and actual exclusively opportunities of those popular and pleasing entertainments, and the old subject of the propriety of permitting games of chance seems to have become uninteresting. It would be curious to inquire how far the promiscuous kissing brought to light at the aforesaid trial might justly be regarded by our foreign censors as a national characteristic.

—The Princess LOUISE is a contributor to the annual exhibition of the London Society of Painters in Water-Colors. The critic of the Standard expresses himself guardedly. "Perhaps the most significant comment on the Princess LOUISE'S 'Off Greenhithe' is to say that it struck us before we discovered that it was by a royal hand."

—It is not generally remembered that M. BARTHOLDI'S project of erecting a statue of Liberty in New York Harbor originated at the termination of our civil war, and was intended by him, and by the distinguished French statesmen who seconded his proposal, to commemorate the freedom of American slaves. The intervention of the Franco-German war has caused the long delay in the execution of the artist's purpose. The site on Bedloe's Island was chosen by M. BARTHOLDI himself during his last visit to this country, a few days previous to his marriage to an American lady in Newport.

—Mr. ELIHU VEDDER, the ugly principally known as a painter, is a sculptor as well, and some fine specimens of his plastic skill are to be seen at the large iron plates used to back the fire-openings of several Boston hearths. These plates are bas-reliefs of fauns, mythical heads, modelled with characteristic dash and strength. The very remunerative business of decorating the interiors of private houses is also engaging the attention of a large proportion of the best American painters and sculptors. Artists who, a few years ago, would have considered it beneath their dignity to paint a frieze or to design a mantel, are glad to exercise their genius in this direction. History repeats itself.

—A correspondent of a leading London journal writes: "It is well known that gangs of American card sharpers, 'bunco men,' and swindlers of different kinds pick up a very good living by crossing the Atlantic, and the first-class Atlantic liners, which are supposed to carry the wealthier class of passengers, scarcely make a trip without some of the passengers being fleeced. The victims of these sharpers are generally Englishmen, but I have known heavy sums to be lost by Americans who prided themselves on being more than usually 'astute.'" It is said that Mr OSCAR WILDE, after his experience in a New York "bunco" den, did not lose any money at cards on his last voyage.

—The Rev WILLIAM W. DE BARY, of Walden, New York, gives the following explanation of the affair which resulted in his resignation of the rectorship of St. Andrew's Church in that town. "I had been invited to spend the evening at my chorister's house, and when the aforesaid wife I laid my hand on his shoulder, with the remark, 'My friend, you must not strike a woman in my presence.' The man then turned and struck me full in the face. When this occurred, forgetting for the moment that I was a clergyman, and in the heat of passion, acting only as a man, I returned the blow, and returned it with the force and skill which I learned at college." Will this incident be made use of by those who believe that in some of our colleges undue attention is given to the study of athletics?

—The "unbidden guest" who created some excitement at Mr. W. H. VANDERBILT'S reception on the 11th of December said to the police authorities, after his arrest: "I stood for hours on the sidewalk watching the dancing lights inside. Suddenly a curtain was for a moment pulled aside, and the glimpse I caught of a bed of roses made me wild to get near them. I love flowers. I went to the door; it was open. I could smell the roses so plainly that, taking advantage of the absence of the doorman, I slipped in, and picking up two chairs, so that I might be thought a servant, I walked upstairs. I did not want to steal, but I did want to see the magnificent display of flowers." The man was discharged, although no mock was taken in his story. Their inordinate passion for flowers may yet lead our city tramps to wear button-hole bouquets.

—Mr. FRANCIS H UNDERWOOD, who has long been on terms of intimacy with the leading literary celebrities of New England, has written an interesting biographical sketch of Mr. JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER, showing the relations of that poet not only to the literature of his times, but to the work of emancipating the slave population of the United States. Mr WHITTIER'S art has not been for art's sake alone. He has sung with a purpose.

—Says the Pall Mall Gazette: "A curious report got about a few days ago, to the effect that Mr WILKIE COLLINS was about to publish a novel in the [London] Times, of all papers in the world. This was palpably absurd. We knew that the novel is to appear in certain weekly newspapers, and to monthly parts in Time. It is said that Mr WILKIE COLLINS'S novels are so popular with the natives of Bengal who can read English, that it is proposed to translate all of them into the Bengali language for the benefit of those who can not. The Woman in White is already in course of translation."

—Has a physician a right to use hospital patients for other purposes than those tending to their own benefit, without their free and full consent? Except in the case of those who have forfeited their right by crime (replies the Medical Times), no enlightened thinker can justifiably maintain that one body is more sacrosanct than another, and it is strange to find medical men familiar with the reprobation of the post-mortem table upholding such a distinction. If it is still allowable to make experiments on the poor without their full consent which it would not be thought justifiable to make on the rich, then all the political struggles of the past century have been in vain so far as regards any lesson which those who make such a claim have derived from them. Too much stress can not be laid on the fact that the main use of hospital patients is one of observation, not of experiment.

—An Italian professor has been examining a comet now showing itself above Italy. He recognizes it as a comet discovered in 1812, which is returning, after being 600,000,000 miles distant from the sun. It is travelling so fast that by the 8th of January it will be 32,000,000 miles nearer the earth than the sun is. The professor regrets that as yet it has only the rudiments of a tail.

—M. ERNEST OLLIVIER denies that on hearing of the first disasters to the French army in 1870 he exclaimed, "It is the end of France." What he did say was (he says), "It is all over with the Empire." "I affirm, and I shall demonstrate," he adds, "that to lose the Army of the Camp of Boulogne, such as accumulation of great blunders was necessary then, even intentionally, they could not be repeated a second time."

—Mr. GLADSTONE in 1860 thought it would be a great boon to England to have the cheap wines of France, and in arranging a commercial treaty to that effect he expected to promote the interests of temperance by substituting cheap wines for the strong liquors. At a recent conference of the Women's Union of the Church of England Temperance Society, the Rev. Canon ELLISON expressed a hope that Mr GLADSTONE would cause the treaty to be repealed, since its effect had been "precisely opposite" to that which had been intended. Dr NORMAN KERR lamented the increase of "female intemperance" in London. Many of his lady patients, he said, took so much drink that if they went out-of-doors they would be unable to walk straight.

—"Go where you will," said the Marquis of Lorne recently, "it is very difficult to get away from Scotchmen. I was on the coast of Labrador, visiting an encampment of Indians, and being then young in Canadian service, I wanted to see a pure-blooded Indian. I said to the friend who was with me, 'Make the race of purest blood among them come here;' upon which he shouted out in French, 'Come here, McDONALD!' Very near the Rocky Mountains I saw in a fine Indian lodge a beautiful baby, and I asked to whom the baby belonged—was it an Indian baby. 'Part Injun,' was the reply; and it turned out that it was partly the product of a Scotch engineer. In Nova Scotia I found a Highland woman, who could talk nothing but Gaelic, cultivating a very successful farm, while her husband would speak nothing but Italian. I have no doubt that the successful management was due to the fact that they had the ordinary Canadian family of about twenty children, who no doubt were able to act as interpreters."

PAULINA ASSUMES SOCIETY.

The Rector hurried away to intercept his daughter, who, if the torrent came out of the house, attended by two or three of the local girls' mates. Apparently he had some little difficulty in shaking off these young gentlewomen; but after a time he succeeded, and Maud walked across the lawn toward me with a smile of welcome upon her lips.

"So, for once you are anxious to talk to me," she began, after we had taken hands.

"I am always anxious to talk to you," I replied. "But, in the present instance, I feel sure that your father also wants you to help him. He thinks it desirable that Harry and his wife should do their best to leave Thirlby; and he has taken it into his head that I am the person to bring the argument. When I said that I didn't think it likely I could succeed to work he referred me with the most confident air

"It strikes me," observed Maud, smiling, "that we have only to leave your cousin and his wife alone, and that they will accomplish their own destruction. If Mr. Le Marchant has not seen enough this afternoon to convince him that they are impracticable, he must be beyond the reach of conviction."

"I can answer for it that he won't turn them out of his house because the neighbors look coldly upon them," said I. "In fact, it is very unlikely that anything would persuade him to turn them out. Yet, if they stay, they will make his life into a perpetual purgatory, I am afraid. What I should like to arrange would be a sort of amicable separation, and I think, if it were clearly understood that Harry was to come into the property eventually, he might consent to remove himself now."

"'GET AWAY, WILL YOU?' RETURNED THE INGRATEFUL PAULINA, WITH A SWEEPING BACKHANDER."

"Very likely he would," answered Maud; "but you will get no help from me toward making an arrangement of that kind. If you are bent upon hanging yourself, you must fit the noose round your own neck to best you can; I shall not do it for you."

"Nevertheless," I remarked, "you would have a poor opinion of me if I took advantage of Paulina's unlucky exhibition to push my own interests."

Maud made an impatient gesture. "You should remember that you are not the only person concerned in this matter," she said. "As for your cousin, I have no sympathy whatever with him. I here taken every opportunity of watching him since I have been home, and I must say that he appears to me to be as contemptible a little wretch as ever breed."

"Well, for the sake of argument, let us admit that he is," answered I, thinking of what had taken place on the previous evening. "Still, when all is said, he is my uncle's son."

"I can't discuss the question in this public place," said Maud; "it's too long and complicated. Will you come over to the Rectory to-morrow afternoon and see me? Or shall we meet somewhere? Perhaps the Broad would be the best place. I often walk down there in the evening about five o'clock, and we are not likely to be interrupted by anybody, except Bunce. Is that agreed, then?"

I should have preferred her coming any other trysting place, and I could not repress a pang of regret that she should have no tender association with a spot which, in spite of all that had come and gone, must always remain sacred to me; but, as our interview was now interrupted by two of the young men above referred to, I could make no demurrer, and only nodded in answer to her inquiring look.

By this time Paulina had returned from the conservatory, having been forsaken by her host, whom I detected furtively consulting his watch behind a tree. Some of the people were already leaving; I saw with joy that our own carriage had come round from the stable-yard, the close of our trial was at hand; and for the short time that remained I thought I could not do better than engage Paulina in conversation. The attentions of Sir Digby had not availed to soothe her anger, it appeared. She was pacing to and fro like a caged tigress, and swinging her parasol to a manner which suggested she would very much like to bring it down upon somebody's head. I drew nearer, and offered the innocent observation that the days were getting quite short.

"Don't talk to me like that!" shouted Paulina, turning upon me savagely. "Do you think I'm a stock or a stone to put up with such treatment as I've had this afternoon? I won't bear it—no! not for Harry nor anybody! I tell you I won't bear it!" she repeated, with a stamp of her foot.

She looked as wild that I really believed she had lost her senses. I had always been given to understand that the proper way to deal with the lunane is to quell them by a display of iron resolution and authority. I therefore fixed my eyes sternly upon those of my companion, and said—

"Listen to me, Paulina. I allow you command yourself and keep quiet. I shall put you into the carriage and have you driven straight home. If you have anything to complain of, keep it until afterward; you will not be allowed to make a disturbance here."

To my horror and amazement, she took two steps up to me, and snapped her finger and thumb defiantly within half an inch of my nose. "I'm me into the carriage, will you?" cried she. "It he'd need a bigger man than you to do that, my fine fellow! I dare you to lay a finger upon me! Now, then!"

What I should have done with this terrible woman I can not imagine, if her husband had not providentially heard her voice from afar, and come hurrying up.

"Leave her to me," he whispered—"for the Lord's sake, leave her to me, and take yourself off as quick as you can!"

I waited for no second invitation, but retired with more speed than dignity, promising myself that, so far as I was concerned, Paulina should be left to her lawful protector then and at all future times. When I looked round the pair had already vanished, and I did not see them again until my uncle and Mrs. Farquhar came out of the house and got into the carriage, when they re-appeared—Paulina having by that time subsided seemingly into a condition of stuffed fury.

I never felt more relieved in all my life than when I saw them drive away. Harry remained behind, saying that he would walk home with me, if I had no objection. I replied, not overgraciously, that he could if he liked; for I did not want his company, and I thought he would have been better employed in restraining his wife from tearing somebody to pieces. I hinted as much to him as we set off, but he answered, "She'll be quiet enough for the present"; and after that we pursued our way for some distance in silence.

I was feeling too disgusted and disheartened to talk; nor did my companion show any disposition to speak the first word. Thus we marched along side by side until we reached the confines of the park, when Harry remarked, abruptly,

"I suppose you understand all about it now."

It occured best to have it out; so I said—

"There's a good deal that I don't understand. I don't understand your conducting yourself at your father's table as if you were in a pot-house, for instance."

"Suppose we put that on one side for the present. It was unreasonable, of course."

"Quite," said I, having no inclination to spare him.

"Very well; but what I was thinking of was the charming experience that we have just passed through; and I say that I suppose you understand now why I felt some hesitation about introducing Paulina to my family."

I observed that she certainly appeared to have an ungovernable temper.

"It isn't temper," answered Harry, quietly; "it's drink."

So the General was right, after all! Being unable to find any comment that seemed suitable, I held my tongue, and by and by Harry resumed:

"Do you mean to say that you have never suspected it? I fancy you are about the only person in the house who has not, unless it is my grandmother, and she is one of those who are blind because they won't see. I knew from the first how it would be. She promised and vowed not to touch a drop of liquor while she was down here, and I took every possible precaution. But of course she has found some means of breaking her oath: they always do. And I can tell you that Paulina, when she has one of her drinking fits on, is about as good a candidate for a straight-waistcoat as you'll meet with out of Bedlam. It doesn't make her drunk—I wish to Heaven it did!—it simply maddens her."

I said I was very sorry to hear this.

"Are you?" returned Harry, with a harsh laugh. "Well, perhaps you may be, for you are—if you will excuse my saying so—quite the greatest fool I have met in the course of a varied experience. Now don't get angry. If I could begin again, I would much rather be a fool of your description than a—shall we say an experienced person?—of mine. But I am what I am, and there's an end of it. Last night I drank too much wine, and on double I said some unpleasant things. I lost my nerve, in fact. In former years I used to drink hard, and though I have given that habit up, the consequences of it have not given me up. I am heightened to death of my father; I always was. I dare say you see nothing very alarming in the fact of being treated with silent contempt; but then your nerves are stronger than mine; and besides, I have lived all these weeks with the perpetual dread of one of Paulina's outbreaks hanging over me. Now that it has come, I declare I feel a weight off my mind. Well, it's on ill wind that blows nobody any good. To-morrow, I take it, we shall receive our marching orders, and you and Lady Constance will be made happy. In all sincerity I can say that I shall be thankful to be out of this. But for the boy, I should never have troubled any of you."

"I thank you are jumping to conclusions rather too hastily," I said, feeling sorry for the unfortunate fellow in spite of myself. "I must confess that the experiment of your living with my uncle seems to me to have failed; but perhaps some other arrangement might be made, as that neither you nor Jimmy should be permanently cut adrift. The principal thing just now is to keep Paulina quiet."

Harry shrugged his shoulders. "That is more easily said than done. I tell you plainly it's beyond me. She's not likely to kick up a row before she reaches home, but when once she's there she'll go to the brandy bottle like a fly to a jar of honey, and no power on earth will stop her. You don't know what I have been through with that woman. It wouldn't surprise me in the least if she were to burn the house down to-night."

This was indeed delightful. "What on earth are we to do?" I ejaculated.

"Oh, nothing," answered Harry, placidly; "there's nothing to be done. I'll prevent her from coming down to dinner to-night, if I can, but I don't know that I shall achieve it."

"But, hang it all!" I exclaimed, somewhat provoked by his apathy, "surely you can keep her from drinking any more."

"Indeed I can not. If I could get hold of the bottle, I should confiscate it; but she'll take very good care I don't do that. It will be concealed in one of her boxes, or poked up the chimney, or something. Besides, to tell you the truth, I don't much care about irritating her in her present state of mind. She is in a towering rage; and, upon my word, I don't wonder at it. You must admit that she has had a good deal of provocation this afternoon."

"No doubt," I answered; "still, we mustn't be harmed alive. I wonder whether it would do any good if I spoke to her."

"You tried that just now," observed Harry, with a faint smile, "and it was not exactly a success. You are most welcome to try again; only I think I may say that, if I can't manage her, you can't. I tell you I will keep her in her own room for to-night, if I can. To-morrow, most probably, we shall put out to sea again, and then you will all sing 'Te Deum.'"

I said nothing, feeling quite unable to contradict him; and, after a pause, he added, "What a triumph it will be for you all! Everybody will be forced to admit that you have shown the noblest unselfishness, and you will be rewarded by the cordial approval of your own consciences into the bargain. As for me, I also shall have my little consolation; for I shall always be able to tell Paulina now that she has been the ruin of me."

Then, as I still remained silent, he fell to whistling softly, and the rest of our walk was accomplished without further exchange of words.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

THE CATASTROPHE COMES.

As I was on my way upstairs to dress for dinner I was intercepted by Cooper, who addressed me with that disquieting phrase, familiar to most people, "If you please, sir, could I speak to you a moment?" I guessed at once what it was that he had to say, and as soon as I had gone down to the dining room with him, and he had shut the door with an air of tragic mystery, he justified my forebodings.

"I hope you'll excuse my mentioning it, sir, but are we to supply Mrs. Le Marchant with brandy in her bedroom?"

"Has Mr Harry given any orders upon the subject?" I inquired; for I was unwilling to make damaging admissions, if they could be avoided.

"No direct orders, sir; but about a week ago brandy was ordered for, and Mr Harry sent the bottle down again immediate. So just now, when it was wanted again, Mrs. Peters she thought she had better take it up herself."

Here Cooper came to a full stop, cleared his voice, stood on one leg, and looked discreetly embarrassed.

"Well," I said; "Peters took up the brandy, and what then?"

"Well, sir, Mrs. Peters poured out a half a wine-glass and was leaving the room, taking the bottle with her, you understand, sir; but Mrs Le Marchant she says, 'Put down that bottle d'reckly!'"

"Yes, go on," said I; for Cooper had once more paused in his narrative.

"Well, sir, Mrs. Peters felt it her duty to remonstrate, and then Mrs. Harry she turns and flies out at her hawful, and frightens her as she comes running down to the housekeeper's room, and has a bad turn of palpitations. She tells me she never hear such language."

Blended with Cooper's assumption of respectful concern there was a perceptible leaven of curiosity, which I determined not to gratify. I observed that Peters, though doubtless animated by the best intentions, seemed to have been guilty of an impertinence which any lady would have resented, and added that I believed Mrs. Le Marchant was not feeling very well. "Did Peters—ahem!—leave the bottle behind her?" I inquired, rather marring the effect of my rebuke by this injudicious question.

"I am sorry to say that she did, sir," replied Cooper. "I ask her how she come to be so foolish, but she said that she was that upset she didn't know whether she was standing on her head or on her heels."

I could but trust that Paulina might not experience the same sensation before the evening was over. "Very well, Cooper," I said; "that will do. It's—it's all right."

"I hope I have not done wrong in mentioning of it to you, sir."

"Not at all; but you needn't mention it to any one else, you know."

Cooper replied in an injured tone that he should not dream of doing so, and I went upstairs with such confidence or his assurances as I could muster, but with a dreadful conviction that the storm was about to burst.

On entering the drawing room a quarter of an hour later I found my uncle, Mrs. Farquhar, and the General conversing together upon public affairs with a studied politeness and mutual deference which convinced me that they too were alive to the perils of the situation; and an unmistakable expression of relief appeared upon the countenances of all three of them when Harry came in with the announcement that his wife had a bad headache, which would prevent her from joining us to dinner. This, so far as it went, was good news; but I felt that we were not out of the wood yet. I took Harry aside, and hastily informed him of what I had heard from Cooper; whereat he whistled, and, after lamenting for a moment, left the room. When he re-appeared it was with a quiet smile upon his face.

"The deed is done," he took occasion to whisper to me. "I got her to turn her back for an instant, collared the decanter, and bolted, locking the door on the outside. She'll scream and kick like mad when she finds herself a prisoner; but mercifully nobody can hear her to this distance, and she hasn't had enough liquor to make her desperate. Very likely she may sober down now."

One could only hope so; but a vision of Paulina thundering with feet and fists upon the panels of her door remained with me throughout dinner, and caused me extreme discomfort.

For the rest, we got on more harmoniously than we had done the night before. Mrs. Farquhar showed a conciliatory disposition; Harry was quiet and unobtrusive; and the General, who looked, and no doubt was, very well pleased with the turn matters had taken, gathered me by choice snippets of autobiography. As for my uncle, he spoke little until Jimmy came in to dessert, and sat down beside him, when he roused himself from his abstraction.

And then, while we were lulled thus into a false security, the thunder bolt fell. The door facing me was opened slowly from without, Paulina, wrapped in a white dressing gown, strode in like the ghost of Banquo, and advancing with deliberate steps to her husband's side, stood and glared down upon him.

"So," said she, "you'll lock me into my room, will you? You'll keep me without food nor drink for fear of me telling too much, will you? Ah, you're a clever one! But next time you try that little game on, don't leave the key in the lock. Why, you silly fool, what had I to do but to ring the bell? I did ring the bell—and here I am, you see," she added, nodding at him.

Perhaps, like many other nervous people, Harry recovered his sang froid in moments of emergency; or perhaps it was the calmness of despair that he had arrived at. "It was an unlucky overnight," he said, "and I owe every one an apology. I ought, of course, to have put the key in my pocket; but one can't think of everything. I suppose it would be quite useless for me to suggest, Paulina, that we should go upstairs and fight it out in private; yet I will request you to bear in mind that I strongly recommend that course, because, if you don't adopt it, you will repent bitterly as soon as you come to your senses, you know."

Paulina snorted. "Much obliged to you; but I won't go upstairs yet—not just yet. I've something to say before I go. And I've got all my senses about me: you took good care of that. Oh, you are a mean toad!" she exclaimed, suddenly, the memory of her wrongs coming upon her, I suppose, with irresistible force. "I'll teach you to play me such tricks!"

"I was cruel only to be kind," said Harry, who positively seemed to be rather enjoying the scene.

I myself was too horror-struck to take much notice of the fact that Cooper and his subordinates were looking on with open eyes and mouths, but my uncle had kept his presence of mind. "You can go now, Cooper," he said, "and take Master Jimmy with you. Jimmy, my boy, run away and tell Mrs. Peters to give you some dessert."

Jimmy did not wait to be told a second time. He slipped off his chair and made for the door with great rapidity, followed by the reluctant Cooper. Doubtless he had seen more than one outbreak of hostilities between his father and mother, and was aware that as the sequel the rights of neutrals were apt to be disregarded.

When he was gone, Paulina resumed her denunciation. "Now, you know what I am. I've put up with a deal from you, and I've done a deal for you—and got more kicks than helfpence for my pains, too. But when I say I'll pay you out, you know I'll do it, and I'm going to tell your good friends here a thing or two that'll make them think rather different of you to what they have done—that's what I'm going to do!" At this juncture the General jumped up with great alacrity and offered Paulina a chair. "Pray sit down," said he, politely, "we are all attention."

"Thank you, old gentleman," answered Paulina; "but I'd as soon stand. I ain't going to be here long."

It was now Mrs. Farquhar's turn to intervene. She rose, and advanced with trembling outstretched hands, saying, "My dear, my dear, don't speak so. Come up with me and lie down upon your bed. You're just overwrought."

"Get away, will you?" returned the ungrateful Paulina, with a sweeping backhander. "I've had enough of you and your wheedling ways. I tell you my blood's up, and you'd best keep out of reach of my arm."

Mrs. Farquhar retreated to her chair and began to cry feebly. My uncle, with his elbow on the table, and his chin supported by the palm of his hand, was gazing at his son and daughter-in-law with a certain grave curiosity. The General had poured himself out a glass of claret, and was sipping it meditatively, while he trod, without much success, to compose his features into an expression of fitting solemnity.

"Now, listen all of you," Paulina began, speaking with a quick, broken utterance, "and you, Charley, pay attention to this, because it concerns you. I suppose, when this precious fellow turned up in Germany, you thought it was an accident. No such thing! He went out there on purpose to meet you, and see if he couldn't get you into trouble with your uncle some way, so as to step into your shoes."

"I am unwilling to interrupt," put in Harry, blandly, "but I feel bound to say that that is utterly untrue."

Paulina disdained to notice him. "He didn't have much difficulty about it neither. As soon as he found out that you was carrying on with that Lady What's-her-name he began to see his way. It was easy enough to flatter me up and lead you on, and it didn't need a conjurer to guess that your uncle might threaten to cut you off with a shilling sooner than you should marry a woman who'd run you to a couple of years. You ask your uncle whether he didn't get warnings of what was going on about that time from some kind friend."

"Anonymous letters," said my uncle, "are always doubtful weapons to me. They are especially so when the source from which they come is obvious."

"I never wrote any," returned Harry, calmly.

"No, that you didn't," Paulina went on. "You're telling the truth there, for once, because you made me write 'em too. Oh, you're artful, you are! You didn't think you was going to gain much by that letters. No, your game was to get a will made with your name in it—just as a matter of form, and by way of stopping the marriage. Your game was to make your father cut up rough with Charley, and swear that he'd have the estate away from him if ever that marriage took place. Your game was to frighten the old woman there by telling her the property was in danger and so work it all through her. And when you'd told lies enough to get Charley to marry on the sly, you didn't mean that that will should be burnt. You knew the sort of man your father was, didn't you? Recollect what you told me about him one day? Says you, 'He's such a pig-headed old devil that, if he'd given his word to eat he hat unless he was obeyed, he'd eat down and eat it as soon as ever the time came due.' Those are your very words, deny 'em if you can!"

"If you have done," said Harry, "you may as well go back to your room. No one is likely to believe your preposterous story, and as for me, I am afraid, can doubt that you are under the influence of liquor."

"Maybe I am," returned Paulina. "Maybe I shouldn't have plucked up the spirit to stand here and say what I have without I'd had a glass or two of brandy. But I've got my senses for all that, and I've told the truth, too. And if I do drink," she went on, with a sudden change of tone; "if I'm a drunkard—as I am. God forgive me—whose fault is it? Who taught me to drink? Who drove me to it? Who made my life as miserable that I should have gone and drowned myself times out of count if I hadn't known of a way to forget it all? Ah!" she exclaimed, turning away from her husband, and spreading out her hands with something of pathetic eloquence, "I'd have been an honest woman if he'd have let me. I tried to keep straight and to keep him straight; I loved him better than my own soul; but he soon tired of me. All he wanted me for was as do his dirty work. He taught me to lie and cheat, and—and then I lost heart and took to my bottle. After all, it's the best friend I've found in this wretched world. If he had gone on caring for me—" She broke off with a sort of sob, and then resumed defiantly: "But it's too late now, and I don't care! Drink and forget it—that's my motto!"

Mrs. Farquhar came out from behind her pocket-handkerchief to say, solemnly: "It is never too late to repent. Pray that your sin may be forgiven you, and—"

"Pooh!" interrupted Paulina, contemptuously, "don't you preach! Why, you're committing miserable little sins every hour of the day, and think yourself a saint all the time! Come! I'm honester than you are, anyway. Do you think I haven't prayed on my bended knees to be delivered from this curse?—ah! and read my Bible morning and evening, too. Much you know about temptation! You haven't to numb as found out what it is. Why? Because you never tried to fight it. Harry, there, he don't believe in God nor devil, but I do, and I say the devil's got a firm hold of us both."

"This is dreadful!" moaned Mrs. Farquhar.

Paulina burst out laughing. "Well," she said, "I've paid you out now, Harry, like I told you I would. I don't suppose they'll let you step on here after this, and I believe you are better out of it. Charley, you've been a good friend to us, and I'm sorry I had to deceive you that day at Richmond; but it hasn't made much odds, has it? Good by, everybody; don't break your hearts when I'm gone." And, with a mocking courtesy, Paulina retired.

The door closed behind her, and for a short space none of us spoke. I don't know how the others were feeling, but my own sensation was one of relief, and unmingled with surprise. The scene had been painful enough—half tragedy, half farce, like nearly all the saddest things in life—but it had passed off with more decorum than I had dared to hope for. We had at least been spared a downright brawl; and if poor Paulina had been—as she had declared herself to be—under the influence of liquor, she had not been sufficiently so as to justify the picture of her in that state drawn by her husband. Of her revelations I did not at that first moment think much, being only too thankful that she had confined her onslaught as words.

After a time, Mrs. Farquhar, murmuring something inaudible, hurried out of the room. Then my uncle got up, and, bending over the General's chair, whispered a few words to him; upon which they too silently withdrew.

A WAR CORRESPONDENT IN EGYPT.

Under the most favorable circumstances the lot of a war correspondent is not a happy one. His duties during operations in the field call him to the front ranks of danger, and inspire of him the highest qualities of courage and endurance. In a war like that now raging in the Soudan between the fanatical hordes that follow the banner of El Mahdi and the imbecile Egyptian troops, he is exposed to privations and dangers tenfold greater than those which he must encounter in a war between civilized nations. To be taken prisoner means a cruel death, or a still more cruel captivity, while the descendants not positive suffering of the long marches over the desert wastes under a burning sun, as described by the lamented O'Donovan, can hardly be exaggerated.

Those are, of course, some pleasant spots in the life of a war correspondent seen in the wilds of the Soudan. In letters written home a short time previous to his death his unfortunate victim in hunting, but couples his description with grave forebodings of the fate which awaited him, and which were too soon fulfilled, when the troops under Hicks Pasha were cut to pieces in an encounter with the hordes of El Mahdi. But for the moment, in the elation and excitement of the space, all risks was forgotten, and the oppressive forebodings came only during the slow return to camp, or when, seated in his tent at night, he backed the gloomy future in the face.

MEMOIRS OF LORD LYTTON.*

Reasons of biography have obtained a clearer insight into the lives of literary men within the last three or four years than for a long time before. What Carlyle was they have learned from his autobiography, which is a painful exhibition of vanity and arrogance; and what Trollope was they have learned from his autobiography, which is a delightful revelation of a frank and hearty nature. What another great Englishman of letters was there will shortly learn from The Life, Letters, and Literary Remains of Edward Bulwer, Lord Lytton, by his Son. The interest of this work differs from the interest which attaches to the autobiographies of Trollope and Carlyle in that only the opening portions of it are from the pen of Lord Lytton, and that these cover only the first twenty-three years of his life. They can not be said to end before his literary life began, for that really began in his childhood, but they end before his young and brilliant genius had burgeoned in Pelham and Devereux. The genesis of those and his later writings is traced for us by the present Lord Lytton, to whose filial hand is due the completion of this noble monument to his father. The work is a unity, in spite of its double authorship, and partly no doubt on account of it, for there were passages in the life of Lord Lytton the outside which no one but Lord Lytton the poet could or should relate. Such a passage, for example, was the unhappy marriage of his parents, an clear understanding of which could have been expected from either.

The great charm of Lord Lytton's autobiography is that it is an unconscious revelation of the personality of the writer, and merely the personality which he was he supposed to have inherited as one of the conditions of the rank of life to which he was born, but the posthumous personality of his ancestors—the qualities which were to their making as Bulwers and as Lyttons. The families were distinguished for their individuality, for their obstinacy, and for their infelicity in the married state. The grandparents of the first Lord Lytton separated after the birth of their only daughter, and his own parents were by no means a happy couple.

The grandfather was a very learned man, a friend of Dr Parr, who declared that he was the best Latin scholar of his time, inferior only to Porson as Greek, and to Sir William Jones in Hebrew and the Oriental languages. His forte lay in muddling away his property, and his foible in a great literary work. "Imagine what it was," his grandson writes. "But that is impossible. In the first place, it was in drama; there seems nothing remarkable in that. Yes; but do not fancy that he deigned, like his unworthy grandson, to write dramas in vulgar English. It was a drama in Hebrew, and, what is more, was intended for the stage. It is said that he afterward burned this work in despair, when complaining to a friend that he could not find Jews rolls ready versed in Hebrew to act it. The friend pertinently observed, 'And if you did, where on earth will you find an audience sufficiently versed in Hebrew to understand it?' At all events, the work was not forth-coming among the scholar's MSS. Even its title is lost. Echabod! Ichabod!" This pedantic old oddity was the original of Austin Caxton. He sought to be reconciled to his wife on one occasion, and invited her and her child to Knebworth, but the refused his invitation. "My grandmother was so essentially a London woman," Lord Lytton writes, "that to her the dignified gloom of an old manorial pile, far from the charms of quadrille and racons, probably presented anything but an allurement. She was also a woman of that high spirit which fully enjoys the blessings of liberty and independence. She dined with her man fair hands (I mention this as emblematic of her whole character) a tall pheasant and pair, and in this equipage she transported herself as she listed from London to Bath, and from Bath to London. So great was her confidence in herself that one dark moonless, being in return from some entertainment across Hounslow Heath—a, that time infested by highwaymen—she laughed to scorn the warnings of the coachman on the road and the terrors of her two men-servants, and in the very centre of the heath was stopped by three foot pads. She held down a moment to parley, and threw him off his guard, flicked the other in the eye, drove gallantly over the third, and arrived in London with spirits sufficiently composed to dress for a party, and relate her adventure, in illustration of the truth that a woman with her wits about her, and the whip hand disengaged, is a match for three men any day in the year."

The personality of young Mr Edward George Earle Bulwer, as manifests itself in the autobiography of Lord Lytton, is by no means the personality of Pelham and Devereux, into which he infused his intellect, but not his character, and in no sense the personality in which the young Thackeray of Fraser's Magazine clothed Sir Edward Lytton Bulwer. No coxcomb, no dandy, no mere man of fashion, ever had his acquirements and his ambitions. A great reader from his boyhood, he was a careful student in many directions. If he had deliberately planned the life that he afterward led, he could not have equipped himself for it more thoroughly than he did by his desultory studies. He was a patient scholar, and once the passion for literary distinction was aroused within him, there was no more patient seeker after taste and words until he had learned to say what he had to say with equal eloquence and correctness. He never penned a slovenly line. His daring ambition was to be a poet, but in this he was disappointed till his life, for though he reached a high level of verse in "King Arthur," the world has refused to recognize him as an English poet. The main source of his inspiration was his own life and experience, and as these needed his poetic powers, he moulded them in the form which is most nearly allied to poetry—that of romantic prose fiction—and by the laborious exercise of his creative and critical faculties made himself the first romantic novelist of England. Great names have risen since he published his first novels, and the manner of writing novels, which he was the first to make an art, has changed. He was followed by Dickens and Thackeray, and they by Trollope and George Eliot. The romantic novel has given place to the novel of humor and pathos, the novel of social satire, the novel that photographs life, and the novel that philosophizes about life. His school has had its day, as the schools of Scott and Smollett and Fielding had their day. But it will be remembered, as there are remembered, as an important movement in the history of English letters in the nineteenth century.

The character of Lord Lytton, as depicted by himself in his autobiography, and by his son in his memoir, is one that commands respect. He was a man of the world in the best sense of the phrase. Conscious of his powers, he determined to make the most of them; and having chosen literature as a profession, he pursued it with all his might. He valued his work, but he was not vain of it, for, knowing his strength and his weakness, he was neither boastful nor diffident. His industry, which was as untiring as that of Trollope, never degenerated into prudence, and his will, which was as brilliant as that of his friend Disraeli, was never cynical or heartless. That his observation was keen but kind is evident in the judgments that he passed upon his contemporaries. Here is what he said of Lord Holland, who did not, he thought, quite deserve the eulogies of Macaulay. "He was very accomplished and well read; but his mind was narrowed by intense partisanship in politics and the contracted views in criticism and philosophy which belonged to the French Revolutionary school. In his good nature there was considerable indolence and frigidity. Lady Holland had more energy and more warmth of nature. He would never a friend if it did not put him out of his way. She would go out of her way to serve one. No English house ever excelled theirs in social charm, but it owed more to Lady Holland than to him." Lord Lytton enjoys the distinction of being the only Englishman who ever said a pleasant word for her insolent ladyship, of whom it was remarked that to find any good in her one to find the soul of goodness in things evil. When Lord Lytton shall have published the Life of his illustrious father we shall have, I judge, from what I have of it, a biography that will rank with Trevelyan's Macaulay and Lockhart's Scott.

ENGLISH GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

An Honorable Ambition.—A Pitiable Case.—A Progressive Mayor.—The Claimant.—Mistletoe Bad.—The Rage for Relics.

I always wondered why great advertisers who spend their thousands a year upon our newspapers, and even our dead-walls, do not go to the comparatively small expense of getting their announcements written in good English. My only explanation of these marvellous compositions is that the proprietors write them themselves. "We may not be literary gents," I think, is their reflection, "but we at all events write something which shall obtain the honors, and much more than the usual honors, of print, and if people don't read it they must be blind." Well, there is something in that; an honorable ambition deserves to be gratified. Dear, charitable Leigh Hunt used to affirm that there was great excuse for the people who write their names on objects of public exhibition, statues and the like; it was "a humble effort after immortality." Let us be tender, therefore, with the great advertisers: only I think they should spy somewhere; and when they attempt Latin and Greek they should surely call in professional assistance. In many cases, however, he is clear they don't, and classical advertisements are now common. Only yesterday I saw cheap funerals advertised, with Ad Exequiasdina Pulpus on the top of the announcement. I wonder on the advertiser thought he was paying the public a compliment? What the public thought, I know. I asked one of them whether he would be as good as to tell me what ad exequiasdum meant, and he said it was a funeral "mottar," abbreviated to Roman Catholics only, an impression which I am sure it was not the intention of the advertiser—who was only pathetic in the sense of universal—to produce.

Of all the periodic creatures upon this earth or its waters, I suppose, a view-hare is the most miserable. In the first place, he goes to sea, which of itself is misfortune enough for most people; secondly, he is compelled to do so, either from fear of unearned ill-treatment, or from the vengeance of the law; thirdly, he must needs voyage in the worst part of the vessel—in the hold, among the rats, or near the engines, where he is half stifled; lastly, if he has any imagination, how depressing must be the reflection that his presence in the same ship with so many fellow-creatures is unknown! If he is seen, he is taken for a ghost at best, or, what is more likely, is recognized for what he is, and treated like a dog and worked like a horse for the remainder of the voyage. A very sad case has just occurred to an unfortunate of this kind seeking to escape (a natural impulse enough) from Hamburg. A young man hid himself among the bales of merchandise of a ship he supposed to be bound for England, taking with him a piece of meat that would have supplied him for such a voyage. The ship, however, was sailing for the west coast of Africa. On arrival at its destination, and its cargo being unloaded, his body was found "completely blocked in behn." He had been evidently starved to death. What agonies must have been his through the long watches of the night, and worse to the daytime, when the sailors worked and sang about him, and he had no means of making his presence known to them? "A stranger hath to crew and passengers," he is described, yet some one had known and loved him, doubtless; and his age "about twenty." Poor view-hare!

A provincial mayor is not quite the sort of person whom one would expect to follow Mr Carlyle's advice to "discard all formulas"; nevertheless, a candidate for that office lately announced his intention, if elected, to discontinue the use of the mace ("Take away that bauble"), and to hang up the municipal gown. He denounced these as relics of the Dark Ages. As nothing would induce me to take office anywhere, under any possible circumstances, I don't feel called upon to debate the question, but a mace I hate. When I was a boy, and tortured by nightly terrors of ghosts and goblins, I went to stay in the house of a relative, who happened to be mayor of the town in which he lived. On looking under my bed to make certain (as usual) that there was not a ruffian there, I found one. It was in reality the mace in question (the municipal insignia were kept, but in private and not), and the brass plate on which my relative's name was engraved, gave it a most funereal appearance, and almost made a corpse of one. It is one of those little experiences which, unimportant in themselves, can never forgets. It has stuck to me; even I like, and untimely, and cause mean, but name of your mace.

In October next—oh, joy!—the Claimant will be liberated on ticket-of-leave. His friends have promised to then rally round him, and set him up in a public-house. This is as it should be, for a sporting bar is just the place for him. My conviction is that in the position he will attract enormously, and make almost as much money as if he had contrived to get the estates to which he once aspired. His bar is to be called the "Fleshcreep Arms." If nine-tenths of the so-called Nationalists in the House of Commons could be similarly accommodated, it would suit them down to the ground, and be a most appropriate termination to their career.

The funniest example of the misdirected zeal of parishioners that has been exhibited for many a day was "an owre" last week in the columns of two of "not meaning contemporaries." No. 1, a Conservative organ, quoted "The stars in their courses," etc., as having been a phrase originally used by the late Lord Beaconsfield, and as belonging to his extensive repertoire of remarkable sayings. But No 2, a political adversary, while admitting the power of the observation, urged that tribute should be given where tribute was due, and pointed out that the statement in question fell from the lips of Mr Gladstone! And yet this is a Christian country! Political writers, however, know at least as much about the Bible as the public at large know about literature in general. A novel is now passing through the columns of a well known journal in which the recording angel is alluded to in the act of dropping his pen—would have thought—pretty well-known tear; and the editor tells me he has received numerous letters objecting to the introduction of the R. A. as fiction as being a blasphemous novelty. To a very large class of persons, I suppose, not only is Sterne unknown, but the term "profane" is applied to literature in a very harsh and unexpected manner; but this really beats everything.

An augenial German, with the euphonious name of Mummenhoff, has been fined ten shillings for knocking a boy over the head for whistling—a practice it seems which annoys him. The magistrate very properly said that even though a boy may not do it in time, whistling is a sign of lighthearedness, and should therefore be welcome as all best incense persons. But it is evident that he forgot the story of Gabriel Grubb and the goblins, or he would certainly have made it a text for his admonition. That Mummenhoff of fiction was a grave-digger, and got very justly punished for cuffing a boy for singing upon Christmas-eve. The tale occurs in Pickwick. It is told at Dingley Dell by Mr Wardle, and contains the germ of all those genial and generous thoughts that afterward found expression in Dickens's Christmas books. There are many notes in the more book which, having in truth nothing to do with the main story, have dropped out of recollection. It seemed, probably, at the time, a convenient channel through which to introduce them to a public who had up to that time been indifferent to the author's productions; and it is my conviction that they were amongst his very earliest compositions.

What amazing things people will buy in the way of "relics"! The effects of the late executioner, Mr Marwood, have recently been sold by public auction, and, as might have been expected, some of them excited great interest. If I cared for such things at all (which I do not), I should consider that the rope "actually used in the trade" went cheap at four pounds ten shillings. But who should "a pair of life old stockings" have fetched five shillings, and "an old neck tie and cuffs" eleven? His dog Nero, I read, was "run up" to thirty shillings, which seemed a very appropriate expression indeed.

H. KEMBLE, of London.

THE REV. WILLIAM R. HUNTINGTON, D.D.

The successor of Assistant-Bishop Henry C. Potter as rector of Grace Church in this city is the Rev. William R. Huntington, D.D., of All-saints Protestant Episcopal Church, Worcester, Massachusetts. Dr. Huntington came prominently before the country at the recent Protestant Episcopal Convention in Philadelphia, where, as chairman of the Committee on the Revision of the Prayer-book, he made a deep impression by his scholarly tastes, his courtesy, and his forensic ability; and after devoting the best part of many days to explaining the reasons of the changes which his committee recommended, he had the gratification of seeing most of those changes adopted, and was warmly congratulated by the delegates that thronged around him.

Dr. Huntington's parish in Worcester has long been the only Protestant Episcopal parish in that large city, with the exception of a small one in the outskirts. The church edifice is a noble specimen of architecture, and adjoining it are a chapel and no admirable suite of reading-rooms. Dr. Huntington's fine, thoughtful face, clear, strong voice, and wonderful sweetness and integrity of character have drawn around him a very considerable following from other denominations in Worcester, and the frequency with which he has refused calls to other parishes has caused him to be known among his friends as "The Great Decliner." He declined the call to Calvary Church in this city, to St Stephen's Church in Philadelphia, and has so generally understood to the Bishopric of Iowa. He is a widower, with a son at Harvard College and several young daughters. His wife was a daughter of the eminent Boston physician, Dr. Reynolds.

The new rector of Grace Church is still in Worcester, taking a little rest, by the advice of friends, after his severe and protracted labors at the late Convention. The time of his entry upon his duties in this city is still uncertain.

"THE WONDER AND PRIDE OF THE TABLE WAS THE PUDDING."

HOW JOHN NORTON KEPT HIS CHRISTMAS.

BY W. H. H. MURRAY.—WITH ILLUSTRATIONS BY A. B. FROST.

I.

A CABIN. A cabin in the woods. In the cabin a great fire-place piled high with logs fiercely ablaze. On either side of the broad hearth-stone a hound sat on his haunches, looking gravely, as only a hound in a meditative mood can, into the glowing fire. In the centre of the cabin, whose every nook and corner was bright with the ruddy fire-light, stood a wooden table, strongly built and solid. At the table sat John Norton poring over a book—a book large of size, with wooden covers lined in leather, brown with age, and smooth as with the handling of many generations. The whitened head of the old man was bowed over the broad page, on which one hand rested, with the forefinger marking the sentence. A cabin in the woods filled with fire light, a table, a book, an old man rendying the book. This was the scene on Christmas-eve. Outside, the earth was white with snow, and in the blue sky above the snow was the white moon.

"It says here," said the trapper, speaking to himself—"it says here, 'Give to him that asketh, and from him that hath not, withhold not thine hand.' If he a good sayin' for sartin, and the world would be a good deal better off, as I reckon it, of the folks followed the sayin' a leetle more closely." And here the old man paused a moment, and with his hand still resting on the page, and his forefinger still pointing at the sentence, seemed pondering what he had been reading. At last he broke the silence again, saying:

"Yes, the world would be a good deal better off of the folks as it followed the sayin'," and then he added, "There's another spot in the book I'd orter look at to-night, it's a good ways further on, but I guess I can find it. Henry says that the further on you git in the book the better it grows, and I reckon the boy may be right; for there be a good deal of murderin' and figlitin' in the fore part of the book, that don't make pleasant readin', and what the Lord wanted to put it in for is a good deal more than a man without book-larnin' can understand. Murderin' be murderin', whether it be in the Bible or out of the Bible, and pittin' it in the Bible and sayin' it was done by the Lord's commandment don't make it any better. And a good deal of fightin they did in the old time was sartinly without reason and ague judgment—specially where they killed the women folk and the leetle uns;" and while the old man had thus been communing with himself touching the character of much of the Old Testament, he had been turning the leaves until he had reached the opening chapters of the New, and had come to the description of the Saviour's birth, and the angelic announcement of it to the earth. Here he paused and began to read. He read as an old man unaccustomed to letters must read, and with a show of labor, but with perfect contentment and progress, and a brightening face.

"This isn't a trail that a man can hurry on unless he has a good deal of his time on it, or is careless about [illegible] for the words be weighty, and the man who [illegible] looks round awhile orter git a good deal of the [illegible] yes, a man orter travel this trail a leetle [illegible] all there is to see on it."

Then the old man began to read:

"'Then there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly hosts.' The exact number isn't set down here, he says, "but I reckon there may have been three or four hundred." "Glory to God and singin', glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace to men of good will." That's right," said the trapper, "peace to men of good will. That be the sort that deserves it. No other kind orter stand their chances." And here the old man closed the book, closed it slowly, and with the care that [illegible] a treasured thing, closed it fastened the [illegible] the great chest whence he had taken [illegible] Having done this he returned to [illegible] in front of the fire.

"HERE THE OLD MAN PAUSED A MOMENT."

the other, and said: "Pups, this be Christmas-eve, and I sartinly count ye be grateful for the comforts ye have."

He said this deliberately, as if addressing human companions. The two hounds both turned their heads toward their master, looked plainly into his face, and wagged their tails.

"Yis, yis, I understand ye," said the trapper. "Ye both be comfortable, and I dare say that after yer was ye be both grateful, too, for meat to eatin', a dog loves the best, and ye be ugly enough to the logs to be tasteful. Yis, this be Christmas-eve," continued the old man, "and in the settlements the folks be gittin' ready their gifts. The young people be doin' up the evergreens, and the lectic and be enableta sheep because of their dreamin'. It's a pleasant picter, and I sartainly wish I could see the merry-makin's as Henry has told me of them, some time, but I must it may be to his own house and with his own children." With this pleasant remark, in respect to the one he loved so well, the old man lapsed into silence. But the peaceful contentment of his face, as the fire light revealed it, showed plainly that though his lips moved not, his mind was still active with pleasant thoughts of the one whose name he had mentioned, and whom he so fondly loved. At last a more solemn look came to his countenance—a look of regret, of self-reproach, the look of a man who remembers something he should not have forgotten—and he said:

"I as the Lord to pardin me that in the midst of my plenty I have forgot them that must be in want. The shorts seemin look odd open enough the last time I fetched the trail gas at the clearin', and though with the help of the moss and the clay in the bank she might make it comfortable, tle, el the vagabond that he her husband has forgot his own and deserted them, as Wild Bill said he had. I doubt if there be victuals enough in the shanty to keep them from starvin'; so, pups," said the old man, rising, "it 'll be a good tramp through the snow, but we'll go in the mornin' and see of the old woman be in want. The boy himself said, when he stopped at the shanty last summer afore he went out, that he didn't see how they was to get through the winter and I reckin he left the woman some money, by the way she folk red him toward the boat, and he told me to bear them in mind when the spring came, and see to it they didn't suffer. I might as well get the pack basket out and begin to put the things in't, for it be a good distance, and an early start will make the day pleasant to the woman and the feetle one, of victuals be scant in the cupboard. Yis, I'll get the pack basket out, and look round a bottle, and see what I can find to take 'em. I don't concein it 'll make much of a show, for a lone might be good fun a man won't be of sure we to a woman, and as for the bottle was, I don't know if I've got a single thing but victuals that 'll do 'em. Lord! of I was near the settlements I might swap a dozen skins for just what I wanted to give 'em; but I'll get the basket out and look round and see what I've got."

In a moment the great pack basket had been placed in the middle of the floor, and the trapper was busily rummaging his stores to see what he could find to make a little Christmas gift for those he was to visit in the morning. A can of coffee was first deposited on the table, and after it had been tried it and placed a few grains of it on his tongue, like a connoisseur he proceeded to pour more than half of the contents into a little bark box, and having carefully tied the cover, he placed it in the basket.

"The yarb be of the best," said the old man, putting his nose to the mouth of the canister and taking a long sniff. Once he inserted the stopple—"the yarb be of the best, for the smell of it goes into the nose strong as mustard. That be good for the woman for sartin, and still closer her spirits when she be down-hearted, for a woman takes as naturally to tea as an otter to bit slide, and I warrant it 'll be an amazin' comfort to her after the day's work be over, more specially of the work had been hears and goos norter arrowwise. Yis, the yarb be good for a woman when things go crossways, and the box 'll be a great help to her many and many a night beyond doubt. The Lord sartinly had women in mind when he made the yarb, and a kindly feelin' for their infirmities, and I dare say they be grateful accordin' to their knowledge."

A large cake of maple sugar followed the tea into the basket, and a small chest of honey accompanied it.

"That's honest enoshin's," remarked the trapper, with decided emphasis; "and that is more'n ye can say of the sugar of the settlements, leastwise of a man can judge by the stuff they peddle at the stores." The bees be an chemist; and a man who taps his own trees [illegible] like the cannie' into sugar under his own eye, knows [illegible] of [illegible] he' gittin'. The woman won't find any [illegible] in her teeth when she takes a bite from that loaf, as stirs a bottle of the honey in the cup she's steepin'."

Some salt and pepper were next added to the package already in the basket. A sack of flour and another of Indian meal followed. A generous round of pork, and a bag of jerked venison, a twenty-pound weight at least, went into the [illegible] to-morrow's [illegible] had been [illegible] The offerings [illegible] old man [illegible] far, after looking around awhile and searching the cupboard from bottom to top, he returned to the basket and contemplated it, with satisfaction, indeed, and yet with a face slightly shaded with disappointment.

"The victuals be all right," he said, "for there be enough to last 'em a month, and they needn't tetimp themselves either. But eatin' isn't all, and the feetle one was nigh on to naked the last time I saw 'em; and the woman's a drone, in spite of the patchin', looked as of it would desart her of she didn't keep a close eye on't. Lord! Lord! what shall I do? Has there's room enough in the basket, and the woman and the feetle one need garments—that is, it's more'n likely they do, and I haven't a garment in the cabin to take 'em."

"Hello! Hello! John Norton! John Norton! Hillo!" The voice came sharp and clear, cutting keenly through the frosty air and the cabin walls. "John Norton!"

"Wild Bill!" exclaimed the trapper. "I sartinly hope the vagabond hasn't been a-drinkin'. His voice sounds as of he was sober, but the chances be agin the signs, for of he isn't drunk, the mercy of the Lord or the scarcity of liquor has kept him from it. I'll go to the door and see what he wants. It's sartinly too cold to let a man stand in the holler long, whether he be sober or drunk," with which remark the trapper stepped to the door and flung it open.

"What is it, Wild Bill?"—what is it?" he called. "Be ye drunk or be ye sober, that ye strand there shoutin' in the cold with a fog eaten within a dozen rods of ye?"

"Sober, John Norton, sober. Sober as a Mormon preacher at a funeral, sober afore God."

"Yer trappin' must have been mighty poor, then, Wild Bill, for the last month, or the Dutchman at the clearin' has watered his liquor to a strong measure for once. But of ye be sober, why do ye stand there 'hoogin' like a fullin when the ambulance is unhitched and the hosses be alive with the hunves? Why don't ye come into the cabin like a sensible man, of ye be sober? The signs be agin ye, Wild Bill—yis, the signs be agin ye."

"Come in the cabin!" returned Bill. "Aa' so I would mighty lively of I could, but the load is heavy, and your path is as slippery as the plank over the creek at the Dutchman's when I've two horns aboard."

"Load! What load have ye been draggin' through the woods?" exclaimed the trapper. "Ye talk as of ma cabin was the Dutchman's, and ye was balancin' on the plank at the mill."

"Come and see for yourself," answered Wild Bill, "and give me a lift. Draw in your cabin, and in front of your fire, I'll answer all the questions you may ask. But I'll answer no more until I'm inside the door."

"Ye be certainly sober to night," answered the trapper, laughingly, as he started down the hill, "for ye talk sense, and that's more'n a man can do when he talks through the muzzle of a bottle."

"Lord o mercy!" exclaimed the old man as he stood near the sled and saw the huge box that was on it. "Lord o mercy, Bill, what a log ye must have had, and how ye came to be sober with such a load is beyond ye is beyond the reckinin' of a man who has knowed ye nigh on to twenty year. I never knowed ye disappint one arter thin fashion afore."

"It be strange, I confess," answered Wild Bill, appreciating the humor that lurked in the lowness of the old man's utterance. "It be strange, that's a fact for it's Christmas-eve, and I ought to be roaring drunk at the Dutchman's this very minit according to custom, but I pledged him to get the box through just as he wanted it done, and that I wouldn't touch a drop of liquor until I had done it. And here it is according to promise, for here I am sober, and here is his box."

"Heist along, Bill, h'ist along!" exclaimed the trapper, who suddenly became alive with interest, for he surmised whence the box had come. "Heist along, bill, I say, and have done with yer talkin', and let's see what ye have got on yer sled. It's strange that a man of your sense will stand jibberin' here in the snow arth a coarsin' fire within a dozen rods of ye."

However recent Wild Bill may have contemplated, it was effectually prevented by the energy with which the trapper pushed the sled after him. Indeed, it was all he could do to keep it off his heels, so earnestly did the old man propel it from behind, and so, with many a slip and scramble on the part of Wild Bill, and a continued muttering on the part of the trapper about the "nonsense of a man's jibberin' in the snow after a sweaty mile drag, with a good fire within a dozen rods of him," the sled was shot through the doorway into the cabin, and stood fully revealed in the bright blaze of the fireplight.

"Take off yer coat and yer moccasins, Wild Bill," exclaimed the trapper as he closed the door. "And get in front of the fire, pull out the coals, and set the teapot a steepin'. The task will take the chill out of ye better than the queen of the Dutchman. Ye'll find a haunch of venison in the cupboard that I roasted to-day, and some Johnny-cake; I should of either be sold. Help yerself, help yerself, Bill, while I take a peep at the box."

No one can appreciate the intensity of the old man's feelings in reference to the [illegible] box [illegible] who will [illegible] of the [illegible] with which he was wont to [illegible] and [illegible] the duties of hospitality. It was evident that Bill was equal to the occasion, and was not aware [illegible] neglect. At least his actions were [illegible] the neglect of the trapper rendered less decided, or the quality of his appetite affected, for the consternation he made of the old man's cupboard, and the familiarity with which he handled the contents, made it evident that he was not in the least abashed or uncertain how to proceed; for he attacked the provisions with the energy of a man who had fasted long, and who has at last not only come [illegible] to a ample supply of food, but also feels that has a few moments at least he will be undisturbed. The trapper turned toward the box and approached it for a deliberate examination.

"The boards be sawed," he said, "and they came from the mills of the settlements, for the smoothin'-plean has been over 'em." Then he inspected the jointing, and noted how truly the edges were drawn.

"The box has come a goodly distance," he said to himself, "for there isn't a workman this side of the Horicon that could join it in that fashion. There certainly other be some letterin', or a bottle bit of writin', somewhere about the chist, tellin' who the box belonged to, and who it was sent to." Saying this, the old man unlashed the box from the sled and rol[illegible] it [illegible], so that the side might come uppermost. A [illegible] tion appeared on the smoothly [illegible] surface, he rolled it half over again. A little white card neatly tacked to the board was now revealed. The trapper stooped, and on the card read

JOHN NORTON,

To the care of Wild Bill.

"Yis, the 'J' be his'n," muttered the old man, as he spelled out the word J-o-h-n, "and the big 'N' be as plain as an otter trail in the snow. The boy don't make his letters over-plain, as I remark, but the 'J' and the 'N' be his'n." And then he paused for a full minute, his head bowed over the box. "The boy don't forget," he murmured, and he wiped his eyes with the backs of his hands, "The boy don't forgit." And then he added, "No, he ain't one of the forgittin' kind. Wild Bill," said the trapper, as he turned toward that personage, whose attack on the venison haunch was as determined as ever—"Wild Bill, this box be from Henry!"

"I shouldn't wonder," answered that individual, speaking from a mass of edibles that filled his mouth.

"And it be a Christmas gift!" continued the old man.

"It looks so," returned Bill, as laconically as before.

"And it be a mighty heavy box!" said the trapper.

"You'd a thought so if you had dragged it over the hills and a half carry. It was good sleddin' on the river, but the carry took the stuff out of me."

"Very like, very like," responded the trapper; "for the gullies be deep on the carry, and it must have been slippery loadin'. Didn't ye git a leetle arnest in yer feelin's, Bill, afore ye got to the top of the last ridge?"

"Old man," answered Bill, as he wheeled his chair toward the trapper, with a pint cup of tea in the one hand and wiping his mustache with the coat sleeve of the other, "I got a to the top three times, as within a dozen feet from the top, and each time it got away from me and went to the bottom again, for the roots are slippery, and I couldn't git a grip on the toe of my moccasins, but I held on the rope, and I got to the bottom neck and neck with the sled every time."

"Ye did well, ye did well," responded the trapper, laughing; "for a loaded sled goes down-hill mighty fast when the sled is steep, and a man who gits to the bottom a quick as the sled must have a good grip, and be considerable in arnest. But ye got her up finally in the same path, did ye?"

"Yes, I got her up," returned Bill. "The fourth time I went for that purpe I fetched her to the top, for I was madder than a hornet."

"And what did ye do, Bill?" continued the trapper—"what did ye do when ye got to the top?"

"I just tied that sled to a sapling as it wouldn't git away agin, and I got on to the top of that box, and I talk to that gulch a minit or two in a way that satisfied my feelings."

"I shouldn't wonder," answered the trapper, laughing, "for ye must have been a good deal riled. But ye did well to git the box through, and ye got it here in time, and ye've arnt yer wages, and now ye'll tell me how much I am to pay ye, ye shall have yer money, and ye needn't scrump yerself as the price, Wild Bill, for the drag has been a hard on; so tell me yer price and I'll count yer out the monies."

"Old man," answered Bill, "I didn't bring that box through for money, and I won't take a—"

Perhaps Wild Bill was about to emphasize his refusal by some verbal allusion to the outside statements, but if it was his intention he checked himself, and said, "a cent."

"It's as ill said," answered the trapper—"ah, it's well said, and shows ye have no feelin's, I don't doubt; but no eaten pan of breeches one of these days wouldn't hurt ye, and the money aren't come amiss."

"I tell ye, old man," returned Wild Bill, earnestly, "I won't take a cent. I'll allow there's several colors to my trousers, for I've patched 'em a dozen different places off and on, and I doubt, as we heat, if the patching kobbs together aren't larger, but I've eaten at your table and slept in your cabin more than once, John Norton, and whether I've come to it drunk or sober, your door was never shut in me face, and I don't forget either that the man who sent you that box risked me from the creek one day when I had walked into it with two bottles of the Dutchman's whisky in me pocket, and most one cent of your money or his will I take for bringing the box in to you."

"Have it yer own way of ye will," said the trapper, "but I won't forgit the deed we have did, and the boy won't forgit it neither. Come, let's clear away the victuals, and we'll open the box. It's sartinly a log on, and I would like to see what he has put inside of it."

The opening of the box was a spectacle such as gladdens the heart to see. At each moment the countenance of the trapper was as [illegible] in the changefulness of its expression as that of a child. The passing feelings of his soul found an adequate mirror in his face, as the white clouds of a summer day find full reflection in the depth of the tranquil lake. He was not too old or too learned to be wise, for the simplest of hearts happiness was his—the wisdom of being glad, and gaily amazing it.

As for Wild Bill, the best of his nature was in the ascendant, and with the curiosity and pleasure of a child, and a happiness as sincere as of the box was his own, he assisted at the opening.

"THE YARB BE OF THE BEST."

"The man who made this box did the work in a workman-like fashion," said the trapper, as he strove to insert the edge of his hatchet into the jamming of the cover, "for he shet these boards together like the teeth of a bear-trap when the bars be well fed. It's a pity the boy didn't send him along with the box. Wild Bill, for it certainly looks on ef we should have to kindle a fire on it, and burn a hole in through the cover I hope the boy didn't have to pay for all these nails, for they be chicken's quills on a turkey's back when the feathers be growin'"

At last, by dint of great exertion, and with the assistance of Wild Bill and the poker, the cover of the box was wrenched off, and the contents were partially revealed.

"Glory to God, Wild Bill!" exclaimed the trapper. "Here be yer breeches" and he held up a pair of pantaloons made of the stoutest Scotch stuff. "Yes, here be yer breeches, for here on the waistband be pinned a bit of paper, and on it be written, 'For Wild Bill.' And here be a vest to match; and here be a jacket; and here be two pair of socks in the pockets of the jacket; and here be two woollen shirts, one packed away on each sleeve; and here!" shouted the old man, as he turned up the lapel of the coat—"Wild Bill, look hain't Here be a five-dollar note!" and the old man swung one of the socks over his head, and shouted, "Hurrah for Wild Bill!" And the two hounds, catching the enthusiasm of their master, lifted their muzzles into the air, and bayed deep and long, till the cabin fairly shook with the joyful uproar of man and dogs.

It is doubtful if any gift ever took the recipient more by surprise than this bestowed upon Wild Bill. It is true that, judged by the law of strict deserts, the poor fellow had not deserved much of the world, and certainly the world had not forgotten to be strictly just in his case, for it had not given him much. It is a question if he had ever received a gift before in all his life; certainly not one of any considerable value. His reception of this generous and thoughtful gift from the hands was characteristic both of his training and his nature.

The old trapper, as he had ended his cheering, flung the pants, vest, the coat, the jacket, the socks, the shirts, and the money into his lap.

For a moment the poor fellow sat looking at the warm and costly garments he held in his hands, silent in an astonishment too profound for speech, and then, recovering the use of his organs, he gasped forth,

"I swear!" and then broke down and sobbed like a child.

The trapper, kneeling beside the box, looked at the poor fellow with a face radiant with happiness, while his mouth was stretched with laughter, utterly unconscious that tears were brimming his own eyes.

"Oh! trapper," said Wild Bill, rising to his feet and holding the garments forth in his hands, "this is the first present I ever received in my life. I have been kicked and cuffed, sneered at and taunted, and I deserved it all. But no man ever gave me a life, or showed he cared a cent whether I starved or froze, lived or died. You know, John Norton, what a fool I've been, and what has ruined me, and that while a button is on these jacket breeches hold together, I'll never touch well, so help me God!"

"Amen!" exclaimed the trapper, clasped in his own strong palm the hand out to him. "The Lord in His mercy Bill, and keep ye true to yer pledge"

Of all the pleasant sights that from their high homes, saw on earth not one was dearer in their eyes than —the two men standing with their hands of the reformation of the one and the other, above that Christmas-box in the

It is not necessary to follow in detail the examination of the box. The readers' happy remembrance, will enable them was a small keg of powder, a large pi tea, a bag of sugar, and also one of matches, thread, buttons, a woollen and a cap of choicest fur made of an otter's skin that Bill had trapped a year before. All these and other packages were taken out one by one, carefully examined, and characteristically commented on by the trapper, and passed to Wild Bill, who in turn inspected and commented on them, and then had them carefully on the table. Beneath these packages was a thin board constituting a sort of division between the upper and lower half.

"There seems to be a sort of cellar to this box," said the trapper, as he sat looking at the division. "I shouldn't be surprised if the boy himself was to have somewhere, to be ready, Bill, for anything, for the Lord only knows what's underneath this board." Saying which the old man thrust his hand under one end of the division, and pulled out a bundle loosely tied with a string, which became unfastened as the trapper The roll fell from its place in the box, and as he shook it open and held its contents at arm's-length to the light, the startled eyes of Wild Bill and the earnest gaze of the trapper beheld a woman's dress.

"Heavens and earth, Bill!" exclaimed the trapper, "what's this?" And then a flush of light crossed his face, in the illumination of which the look of wonder vanished, and dropping upon his knees, he flung the shrinking board out of the box, and his companion and himself saw at a glance what was underneath.

Children's shoes and dresses of warmest stuffs; tippets and mittens; a full suit for a little boy, boots and all; a jackknife and whistle, two dolls dressed in brave finery, with foxes' hair and blue eyes; a little hatchet, a huge ball of yarn, and a hundred and one things needed in the household, and underneath all a Bible, and under that a silver star on a blue field, and pinned to the silk a scrap of paper on which was written,

"flung this over the picture of the Lad."

"Ay, ay," said the trapper, in a tremulous voice, as he looked at the silver star, "it shall be done as ye say, boy; but the Lad has got beyond the clouds, and in walkin' a trail that is lighted from east to west by a light clearer and brighter than ever come from the shinin' of any star. I hope on man be found worthy to walk it with him, boy, when on has to come to the edge of the great clearin'"

To the trapper it was perfectly evident for whom the contents of the lower half of the box were intended: but the sender had left nothing to doubt, for when the old man had lifted from the floor the board that he had flung out, he discovered some writing traced with heavy pencilling on the wood, and which without much effort he spelled out to Wild Bill

"Give these an Christmas-day to the woman at the dismal hut, and a merry Christmas to you all."

"Ay, ay," said the trapper, "it shall be did, harrin' accidents, as ye say; and a merry Christmas it 'll make for us all. Lord-a-massy, what will the poor woman say when she and her brats see all the good things gathered on? There be no trouble about fillin' the basket now, no, I sartinly can't get half of the stuff in. Wild Bill, I guess ye'll have to do some more sleddin' to-morrow, for these presents must go over the mountain in the mornin', of we have to harness up the pups." And then he told his companion of the poor woman and the children, and his intended visit to them on the morrow.

"I fear," he said, "that they be havin' a hard time of it, especially of her husband has deserted her"

"Little good would he do her of he was with her," answered Wild Bill, "for he's a fair knave when he's sober, and a thief as well, as you and I know, John Norton; for he's fingered one traps more than once, and swopped the skins for liquor at the Dutch man's, but he's thieved other ten mant times, for the folks in the settlement has ketched him in the act, and they put him in the jail for ten months, as I heard day before yesterday"

"I'm glad on't—yis, I'm glad on't," answered the trapper; "and I hope they'll keep him there till they've learnt him how to work. I've had my eye on the hoave for a good while, and the last time I seed him I told him of he fingered any more of my traps I'd larn him the commandments in a way he wouldn't forgit, and as I had him in hand, and felt a heetle like talkin' that mornin', I gave him a piece of my mind, techin' his treatment of his wife and lovin uns, that he didn't relish, I fancy, for he winced and squirmed like a fox in a trap. Yis, I'm glad they've got the knave, and I hope they'll keep him till he's answered for his mishmin', but I'm sartonly afeered the poor woman be havin' a hard time of it."

"I fear on son," answered Wild Bill, "and if I can do anything to help you in your plans, just say the word, and I'm your man to back or haul just as you want me."

And so it was arranged that they should go over the mountain together on the morrow, and take the provisions and the gifts that were in the box to the poor woman, and after talking awhile of the happiness that visit would give, the two men, happy in their thoughts, and with their hearts full of that peace which passeth the understanding of the selfish, laid themselves down to sleep, and over the two—for one drawing in the close of an honorable and well spent life, the other standing at the middle of a hitherto useless existence, but facing the future with a noble resolution—over the two, as they slept, the angels of Christmas kept watch.

II.

On the other side of the mountain stood the dismal hut; and the stars of that blessed eve had shone down upon the lonely clearing in which it stood, and the smooth white surface of the frozen and snow-covered lake which lay in front of it, as brightly as they had shone on the cabin of the trapper, but on friendly step had made its trail in the surrounding snow, and no blessed gift had been brought to its solitary door

As the evening wore on, the great clearing round about it remained drearily void of sound or motion, and filled only with the white stillness of the frozen, snow-lighted night. Once, indeed, a wolf stole from underneath the dark baleams into the white of home, and canning up a huge log that lay extant a ledge of rocks, looked across and round the great opening in the woods, stood a moment, then gave a shivering sort of a yelp, and scuttled back under the shadows of the forest, as if its darkness was warmer than the frozen stillness of the open space. An owl, perched somewhere amid the pine tops, sang and warm within the cover of its arctic plumage, engaged from time to time in solemn gossip with some neighbor that lived on the opposite shore of the And once a raven, roosting on the dry bough of a lightning blasted pine, dreamed that the white moonlight was the light of day and began to caw his calls to his and but awakened by his blunder, and ashamed of his mistake broke off in the very midst of his discordant call, and again settled gloomily down amid his black plumes to his interrupted repose, making by his sudden silence the surrounding silence more silent than before. It seemed as if the very angels, who, we are taught, fly abroad over all the earth that blessed night, carrying gifts to every household, had forgotten the cabin in the woods, and had left it to the cold hospitality of unsympathetic nature.

Within the lonely hut, which seemed forgotten of heaven itself, sat a woman holding her young—two girls and a boy. The fireplace was of monstrous proportions, and the chimney yawned upward so widely that one looking up the sooty passage might see the stars shining overhead. A little fire burned feebly in the huge stone recess, scant warmth might such a fire yield, kindled in such a fire-place, to those around it. Indeed, the little flame seemed conscious of its own inability, and burned with a waver ing and mistrustful flicker, as if it was discouraged at the view of the task set before it, and had more than half concluded to go out altogether.

The cabin was of large size, and undivided into apartments. The little fire was only able to illuminate the central section, and more than half of the room was hidden in utter darkness. The woman's face, which the faint flame over which she was crouched revealed with painful clearness, showed pale and haggard. The imbrution of exposure and the lines of hunger sharpened and marred a countenance which a happier fortune would have kept even comely. It had that old look about it which comes from wretchedness rather than age, and the weariness of her expression was pitiful to see. Was it work or pain waiting for happier fortunes that made her look so tired? Alas! the weariness of waiting for what no long for, but never comes! Is it the work or the longing—the long longing—that has put the silver in your head, friend, and scarred the smooth bloom of your cheeks with those ugly lines?

"Mother, I'm hungry," said the little boy, looking up into the woman's face. "Can't I have just a little more to eat?"

"Be still," answered the woman, sharply, speaking in the tones of vexed inability. "I've given you almost the last morsel in the house."

The boy said nothing more, but nestled up more closely to his mother's knee, and stuck one little stockingless foot out until the cold toes were half hidden in the ashes. Oh, warmth! blessed warmth! how pleasant art thou to old and young alike! Those are the emblem of life, as the absence is the evidence and sign of life's cold opposite. Would that all the cold toes in the world could get to my grate to-night, and all the shivering ones be gathered to this fire side! Ay, and that the children of poverty that lack no bread might get their hungry hands into that well filled cupboard there, too!

In a moment the woman said, "You children had better go to bed. You'll be warmer in the cold than in the miserable fireplace."

The words were harshly spoken, as if the very presence of the children, cold and hungry as they were, was a vexation to her, and the mood of obedience to her command.

Oh, cursed poverty! I know thee to be of power, for I myself have eaten of thy scant table, and slept in thy cold bed. And never yet have I seen thee bring one smile to human lips, or dry one tear as it fell from a human eye. But I have seen thee sharpen the tongue for biting speech, and harden the tender heart. Ay, I've seen thee make even the presence of love a burden, and cause the mother to wish that the babe nursing her scant breast had never been born. And so the children went to their unsightly bed, and silence reigned in the hut.

"Mother," said one of the girls, speaking out of the darkness—"mother, isn't this Christmas-eve?"

"Yes," answered the woman, sharply. "Go to sleep." And again there was silence.

Happy is child-hood that could whatever deprivation and misery it can so weary itself in the day that when night comes on it can lose in the forgetfulness of slumber its sorrows and wants!

Thus, while the children lost the sense of their unhappy surroundings, including the keen pangs of hunger, for a time, and under the tattered blankets that covered them now, perhaps, visions of enchanting lands, and in their dreams feasted at those wonderful tables which hungry children see only in sleep, the poor woman sitting at the failing fire threw some on sorrow, and as sleep threw over an evanescent bright the hard cold facts of her surroundings. And the condition was dire enough, God knows. Alone miles from any human habitation, the trails snow, her provisions exhausted, and suffering them, and starvation staring them now in her face. the dust her soul sank within her as she turned toward bitterness!

"Yes, it's Christmas-eve," she muttered, "and the keep it gayly. God sends them presents enough, but He remembers me! Oh, there may talk about the angels more eve flying abroad to-night loaded with gifts but they'll by mighty high above this shanty, I reckon, for they drop a piece of meat as they soar past." And so she long and moaning over her woes, and they were heavy too heavy for her, poor soul, unassisted, to lift—while the the hearth grew thinner and thinner until it had on in it then the shadow of a ghost, and, like an about to die and fade away. At last she said, as if the remembrance of the Christ only thoughts and sweetened the bitter

"A WOLF STOLE FROM UNDERNEATH THE DARK BALSAMS."

Alas! poor woman, that puzzle has puzzled many besides thee, and many lips besides thine have asked that question, mechanically or entreatingly, many a time, but whether they asked it in vexation and rebellion of spirit, or humbly brought Heaven to answer, no mother mortal nor prayer did Heaven vouchsafe a response. Is it because we are so small, or because being small we are so inquisitive, that the Great Oracle of the blue remains so dumb when we cry?

At this point the poor little flame, as if unable to abide the cold much longer, flared fitfully, and uneasily shifted itself from brand to brand, threatening with many a flicker to go out; but the woman, with her elbows on her knees, and her face settled firmly between her hands, still sat with eyes that saw not the feeble flame at which they so steadily gazed.

"I will do it—I will do it!" she suddenly exclaimed. "I will make one more effort. They shall not starve while I have strength to try. Perhaps God will aid me. They say He always does at the last pinch, and He certainly sees that I am there now. I wonder if He's been waiting for me to get just where I am before He helped me? There is one more charge left, and I'll make the trial. I'll go down to the shore to where I saw the log tracks in the snow. It's a long way, but I shall get there sometime. If God is going to be good to me, He won't let me freeze or faint on the way. Yes, I'll creep into bed now, and try to get a little sleep, for I must be strong in the morning." And with these words the poor woman crept off to her bed, and burrowed down, more like an animal than a human being, beside her little ones, as they lay, huddled close together and rolled up, deep down in the sedge.

What angel was it that followed her to her miserable couch, and stirred kindly feelings in her bosom? Some one, surely; for she shortly lifted herself to a sitting posture and gently drawing down the old blanket with which the children had wrapped their heads, looked as only a mother might at the three little faces hung side by side, and bending tenderly over them, she placed a gentle kiss upon the fore head of each; then she settled down again in her own place, and said, "Perhaps God will help me." And with this sentence, half a prayer and half a doubt, born on the same breath from that sweet faith which never quite deserts a woman's bosom, and on the other from that bitter experience which had made her sworn, in her own eyes, deserted of God, she fell asleep.

She, too, dreamed; but her dreaming was only the prolongation of her waking thoughts; for long after her eyes closed she moved uneasily on her hard couch, and muttered, "Perhaps God will. God—" Sad is it for us who are old enough to have tasted the bitterness of that cup which life sooner or later presents to all lips, and have borne the burden of its toil and fretting, that our vexations and disappointments pursue us even in our slumber, disturbing our sleep with reproachful visions and the sound of voices whose upbraiding robs us of our otherwise peaceful repose. Perhaps somewhere in the years to come, after much wandering and weariness, guided of God, we may come to that fountain of which the ancients dreamed, and for which the noblest among them sought so long, and died seeking; plunging into which we shall find our lost youth in its cool depths, and rising refreshed and strengthened, shall go on our eternal journey refreshed with the beauty, the innocence, and the happiness of youth. The poor woman slept uneasily, and with much muttering to herself, but the rapid hours slid noiselessly down the icy grooves of night, and soon the cold morning put its white face against the frozen windows of the east, and peered shiveringly forth. Who says the earth can not look as cold and forbidding as the human countenance? The sky hung over the frozen world like a dome of gray steel where dazzling metal-bed plates were riveted here and there by a few white gleaming stars. The surface of the snow sparkled with crystals that flashed coldly cold. The air seemed armed and full of sharp outer points that pricked the skin painfully. The great tree-trunks cracked their sharp protests against the frost's entrances being made beneath their bark. The lake, from under the smothering ice, roared in shame and pain, and sent the thunders of its wrath at its imprisonment around the resounding shores. A bitter morn, a bitter morn—ah me! a bitter morn for the poor!

The woman, wakened by the gray light, moved in the depths of the tattered blankets, sat upright, rubbed her eyes with her hands, looked about her as if to recall her scattered senses, and then, as thought returned, crept painfully out of the hole in which she had lain, that she might not wake the children, who, coiled together, slumbered on, still closely clasped in the arms of the sacred unconsciousness.

"They had better sleep," she said to herself. "If I fail to bring them meat, I would they may never wake!"

If the poor woman could only have foreseen the bitter disappointment, or that other something which the future was to bring her, would she have made that prayer? Is it best for us, as some say, that we can not see what is coming, but must weep on until the last tear is shed, unchecked by the sweet fortune on high, or laugh unchecked until the happy tones are mingled with and smothered by the rising moan? Is it best? I wonder.

She noiselessly gathered together what additions she could make to her garments, and then, taking down the rifle from its hangings, opened the door, and stepped forth into the outer cold. There was a look of brave determination in her eyes as she faced the chilly greeting the world gave her, and with more of hopefulness than had before appeared upon her countenance she struck bravely off along the lake shore, which at this point receded toward the mountain.

For an hour she kept steadily on, with her eyes constantly on the alert for the least sign of the wished and prayed for game. Suddenly she stopped, and crouched down in the snow, peering straight ahead. Well might she seek concealment, for there, standing on a point of land that jutted sharply out into the lake, not forty rods away, unsreened and plain to view, stood a buck of such goodly proportions as one even in years of hunting might not see.

The woman's eyes fairly gleamed as she saw the noble animal standing thus in full sight, but who may tell the agony of fear and hope that filled her bosom! The buck stood loftily erect, facing the east, as if he would do homage to or receive homage from the rising sun, whose yellow beams fell full upon his uplifted front. The thought of her mind, the fear of her heart, were plain. The buck would soon move; when he moved, which way would he move? Would he go from or come toward her? Would she get him, or would she lose him? Oh, the agony of her thought!

"God of the starving," burst from her quivering lips, "let not my children die!"

Many prayers more ornate rose that day to Him whose ears are open to all cries. But of all that prayed on that Christmas morn, whether with few words or many, surely no heart rose with the

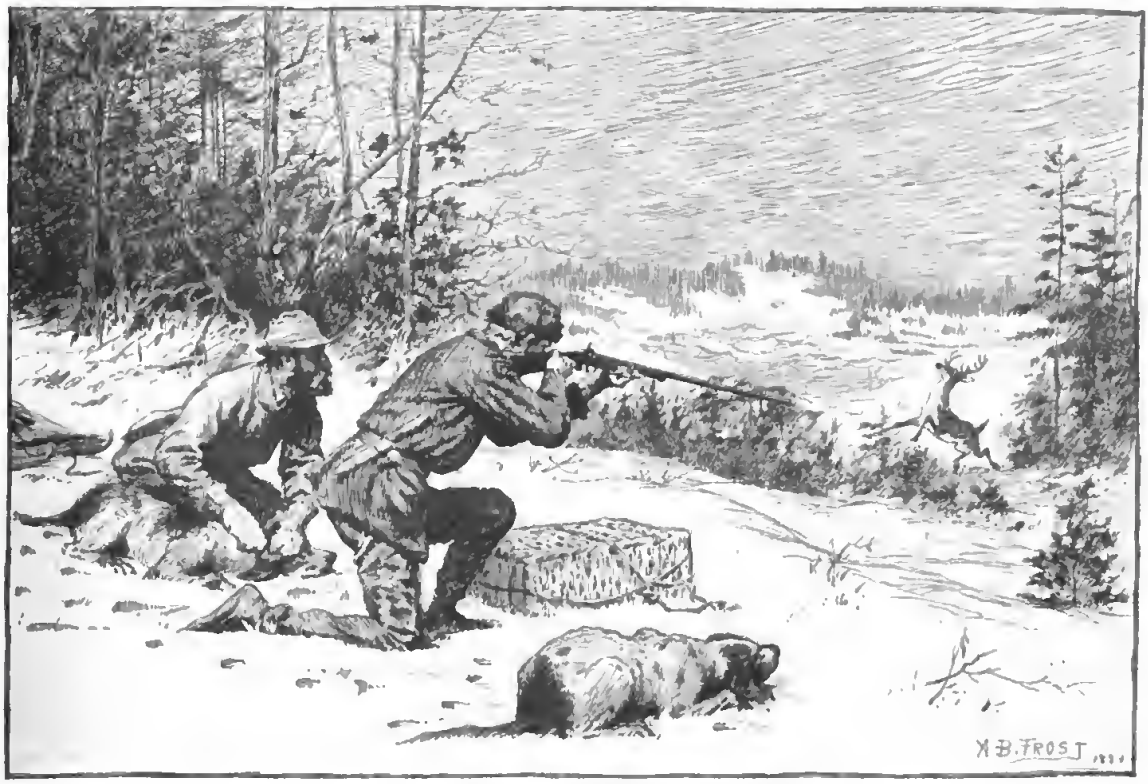
"GOD OF [illegible] NOT MY CHILDREN DIE"



"THE DEER, STRICKEN TO HIS DEATH, FELL WITH A CRASH TO THE GROUND."

seeking words more earnestly than the poor woman kneeling, as she prayed, rifle in hand, amid the snow.

"God of the starving, let not my children die!"

That was her prayer; and as if in answer to her agonizing petition, the buck turned and began to advance directly toward her, browsing as he came. Once he stopped, looked around, and sniffed the air suspiciously. Had he scented her presence, and would he bound away? Should she fire now? No, her judgment told her she could not trust the gun or her aim at such a range. He must come nigher—come even to the big maple, and stand there, not ten rods away; then she felt sure she should get him. So she waited. How the cold ate into her! How her teeth chattered as the chills ran their torturing courses through her shivering frame! But still she clutched the cold barrel, and still she watched and waited, and still she prayed:

"God of the starving, let not my children die!"

Alas, poor woman! My own body shivers as I think of thine, and my pen falters to write what misery befell thee on that wretched morn.

Did the buck turn? Did he, having come thus tantalizingly near, retrace his steps? No. He continued to advance. Had Heaven heard her prayer? Her soul answered it had; and with such feelings in it toward Him to whom she had appealed as she had not felt in all her life before, she steadied herself for the shot. For even as she had prayed the deer came on—came to the big maple, and lifted his muzzle to its highest reach to seize with his tongue a thin streamer of moss that lay against the smooth bark. There he stood, his blue-brown side full toward her, unconscious of her presence. Noiselessly she cocked the piece. Noiselessly she raised it to her face, and with every nerve drawn to its tightest tension, sighted the noble game, and fired.

Had the frosty air watered her eye? was it a tear of joy and gratitude that dimmed the clearness of its sight? or were the half-frozen fingers unable to steady the cold barrel at the instant of its explosion? We know not; we only know that in spite of prayer, in spite of noblest effort, she missed the game. For, as the rifle cracked, the buck gave a snort of fear, and with swift bounds flew up the mountain, while the poor woman, dropping the gun with a groan, fell fainting on the snow.

III.

At the same moment the rifle sounded, two men, the trapper with his pack and Wild Bill with his sled heavily loaded, were descending the western slope of the mountain, not a mile from the clearing in which stood the lonely cabin. The sound of the piece brought them to a halt as quickly as if the bullet had cut through the air in front of their faces. For several minutes both stood in the attitude of listening.

"Down into the snow with ye, pups!" exclaimed the trapper, in a hoarse whisper. "Down into the snow with ye, I say! Rover, ef ye lift yer muzzle agin I'll warm yer back with the ramrod. By the Lord, Bill, the buck is comin' this way; yo can see his horns lift above the beetle balsams as he breaks through the thicket yender. Ef he strikes the runway he'll certinly come within range," and the old trapper slipped his arms from the pack, and lowering it to the earth, sank on his knees beside it, where he waited as motionless as if the breath had departed his body.

Onward came the game. As the trapper had suggested, the buck, with mighty and far-reaching bounds, cleared the shrubby obstructions, and entering the runway, tore up the familiar path with the violence of a tornado. Onward he came, his head flung upward, his antlers laid well back, tongue lolling from his mouth, and his nostrils smoking with the hot breathe that burst in steaming columns from them. Not until his swift career had not only brought him within range, but had even carried him exactly in front of his position, did the old man stir a muscle. But then, quick as the motion of the leaping game, his rifle jumped to his cheek, and even as the buck was at the central point of his leap, and suspended in the air, the piece cracked sharp and clear, and the deer, stricken to his death, fell with a crash to the ground. The quivering hounds rose to their feet and bayed long and deep; Wild Bill swung his hat and yelled, and for a moment the woods rang with the wild cries of dogs and man.

"Lord-a-massy, Bill, what a mouth ye have when ye open it!" exclaimed the trapper, as he leisurely poured the powder into the still smoking barrel. "Atween ye and the pups, it's enough to drive a man crazy. I should certinly think ye have never seed a deer afore by the way ye be actin'."

"I have seen a good many, as you know, John Norton, but I never saw one tumbled over by a single bullet when at the very top of his jump, as this one was. I surely thought you had waited too long, and I wouldn't have given a cent for your chances when you pulled. It was a wonderful shot, John Norton, and I would take just such another tramp as I have had to see you do it again, old man."

"It wasn't bad," returned the trapper; "no, it certinly wasn't bad, far be me goin' as of the Old Harry was arter him. I shouldn't wonder of he had felt the tech of lead down there in the heller, and the smart of his hurt kept him fivin'. Let's go and look him over, and see of we can't find the markin's of the bullet as him."

In a moment the two stood above the dead deer.

"It is as I thought," said the trapper, as he poked with his ramrod to a stain of blood on one of the loins of the buck. "The bullet drove through his thigh here, but it didn't tech the bone, and was a sheer waste of lead, for it only set him goin' like an arrer. Bill, I sartinly doubt," continued the old man, as he measured the noble animal with his eye—"I sartinly doubt of I ever seed a bigger deer. There's seven prongs as his horns, and I'd bet a horn of powder ags a chargeful that he'd weigh three hundred pounds as he lies. Lord, what a Christmas gift he'll be for the woman! The skin will make a blanket fit for a queen to sleep under, and the meat, pedmously cured for, will last her all winter. We sont manage to gin it to the edge of the clearin', nor how, or the wolfire might make free with our venison, Bill. Ter sind is a strong un, and it 'll bear the leadin' of ye go keerful."

The trapper and his companion set themselves to their task with the energy of men accustomed to surmount every obstacle, and in a short half hour the sled with its double loading stopped at the door of the lonely cabin.

"I don't understand this, Wild Bill," said the trapper. "Here be a woman's tracks in the snow, and the door be left a bettle ajar, but there be no smoke in the chimney, and they sartinly ain't very noisy inside. I'll jest give a knock or two and see of they be stirrin';" and acting the action to the word, he knocked long and loud as the large door. But to his noisy summons there came no response, and without hesitation he shoved open the door and entered.

"God of mercy, Wild Bill," exclaimed the trapper, "look ito here!"

A huge room dimly lighted; holes in the roof; here and there a heap of snow as the floor; as immense fire place with no fire in it; and a group of scared, wild-looking children huddled together in the farther corner, like young and timid animals that had fled in affright from the nest where they had slept at some fearful intrusion. That is what the trapper saw.

"I—" Whatever Wild Bill was about to say, his astonishment, and we may say his pity, were too profound for him to complete his ejaculation.

"Don't ye be affected, bettle ma," said the trapper, as he advanced into the centre of the room to more fully survey the wretched place. "This be Christmas morn, and ma and Wild Bill and the pups have come over the mountain to wish ye all a merry Christmas, but where be ye mother?" queried the old man, as he looked kindly at the startled group.

"We don't know where she is," answered the elder of the two girls, "we thought she was in bed with us till you woke us. We don't know where she is I guess."

"I have it, I have it, Wild Bill!" exclaimed the trapper, whose eyes had been busy scanning the place while talking with the children. "The title be gone from the hangings, and the tracks in the snow be hers. Yi-yi-yi, I see it all. She sont out to hope of gettin' the bettle ma somethin' to eat, and that as be her title as bested, and her bettle inside that he be in the form of the bed. What a dimply'mented to be pose evolve when she as I she hain't hit him! Her heart s'n't most broke I state ony. But the Lord was be in it—hastening He didn't get agin the proper shapin' of things arter a while. Come, Bill, let's stir round lively and get the shanty in shape a bettle, and some vittles as the table afore she comes. Yes, get out of a case, and fix it so that wind hovels at the corner of the cabin, while I see what's inside. A fire as the first thing on such a morning as this, so scout round, Bill, and bring in the wood as of ye was a good chap! Be smart, and do ye cut to the measure of the fire place, and don't waste ter time in shortenin' it, for the longer the fire-place the longer the wood—that is, of ye want to make it a bette."

His companion obeyed with alacrity, and by the time the trapper had cleaned out the snow, and swept down the soot from the sides of the fire place, and put things partially to rights, Bill had stacked the dry logs into the huge opening nearly to the upper jamb, and with the help of some large sheets of birch bark had kindled them to a flame. "Come here, bettle ma," said the trapper, as he turned his good natured face toward the children—"come here and put yer bettle feet on the hartsh stun, for it's warmin', and I concoit ye toes be almost frostin'."

It was not in the power of children to withstand the attraction of such an invitation, extended with such a hearty voice and such benevolence of feature. The children came promptly forward, and stood in a row as the great stone and seemed little little shivering bodies by the abundant flames.

"Now, bettle folks," said the trapper, "jest git yerselves well warmed, then git on what clothes ye've got, and we'll have some breakfast—yis, we'll have breakfast ready by the time yer mother gits back, for I know where she be gone, and she'll be hungry and cold when she gits in. I don't concoit that this little chap here can help much, but ye girls be big enough to help a good deal. So when ye be warm, do ye put away the bed to the farderest corner, and shove out the table in front of the fire, and put on the dishes, and as ye have, and be smart about it too, for yer mother will sartinly be comin' soon, and as we must be ahead of her with the cookin'."

What a change the next half-hour made in the appearance of the cabin! The huge fire sent its heat to the farthest corner of the room. The miserable bed had been removed out of sight, and the table, drawn up in front of the fire, was set with the needed dishes. On the table came a large platter of venison steak, broiled by the trapper's own hand, simmered in the heat. A mighty pile of cakes, thrown as a turn, flanked one side, while a couch of potatoes baked in the ashes supported the other. The [illegible] sent forth its refreshing odor through the room. The children washed and hair partially at least combed, ran [illegible] floor, comfortable and happy. To them [illegible] The breakfast was ready, and the [illegible] where sat the [illegible] the trapper, "as we quick as we had sought the [illegible] changing step." The mere "She's coming!"

Too weary and faint, too sick of heart and exhausted by body, to observe the unaccustomed signs of human presence around her dwelling, the poor woman dragged herself to the door and opened it. The gun she still held in her hand fell rattling to the floor, and with eyes wildly opened she gazed bewildered at the spectacle. The blazing fire, the set table, the food as the hearthstone, the smiling children, the two men! She paused her hands across her eyes as one waking from sleep. Was she dreaming? Was this cabin the miserable hut she had left at daybreak? Was that the same fire-place in front of whose cold and cheerless recess she had crouched the night before? And were these two strangers there men, or were they angels? Was what she saw real, or was it only a favored vision born of her weakness?

Her senses actually reeled to and fro, and she trembled for a moment on the verge of unconsciousness. Indeed, the shock was so overwhelming that in another instant she would have swooned and fallen to the floor, had not the growing faintness been checked by the sound of a human voice.

"A merry Christmas to ye, ter good woman!" said the trapper. "A merry Christmas to ye and yours!"

The woman started as the hearty tones fell on her ear, and steadying herself by the door, she said, speaking as one partially dazed:

"Are you John Norton, the trapper, or are you an an—"

"Ye needn't sight agin," interrupted the old man. "Yis, I'm old John Norton himself, nothin' better and nothin' wuss; and the man in the chair here by my side is Wild Bill, and ye couldn't make an angel out of him of ye tried from now till next Christmas. Yis, my good woman, I'm John Norton, and this is Wild Bill, and we're come over the mountain to wish ye a merry Christmas, ye and yer leetle uns, and help ye keep the day, and ye see we've been sittin' a leetle in yer absence, and breakfast be smittin'. Wild Bill and ma will just go out and cut a leetle more wood, while ye warm and wash yerself, and when ye be ready to eat ye may call us, and we'll eat which can git into the house fust."

So saying, the trapper, followed by his companion, passed out of the door, while the poor woman, without a word, moved toward the fire, and casting one look at her children, at the table, at the food on the hearth-stone, dropped on her knees by a chair, and buried her face in her hands.

"I say!" said Wild Bill to the trapper, as he crept softly away from the door, to which he had returned to shut it more closely—"I say! John Norton! the woman is on her knees by a chair!"

"Very likely, very likely," returned the old man, reverently, and then he began to chop vigorously on a huge log, with his back toward his comrade.

Perhaps some of you who read this tale will come some time, when weary and heart-sick, to something dreaier than an empty house—some bleak, cold day, some lonely morn, and with a startling heart and benumbed soul—ay, and empty handed, too—enter in only to find it swept and garnished, and what you most needed and longed for waiting for you. Then will you, too, drop upon your knees, and cover your face with your hands, ashamed that you had murmured against the hardness of your lot, or forgot the goodness of Him who suffered you to be tried only that you might more fully appreciate the triumph.

"By good woman," said the trapper, when the breakfast was eaten, "we're come, as ma said, to spend the day with you, and accordin' to custom—and a pleasant us it be fur sartin—we're brought ye some presents. A good many of them come from him who called on ye, as he and me passed through the lake last fall. I dare say ye remember him, and he sartinly has remembered ye. And last evenin', when I was makin' up a bettle pack to bring to myself, for I concoited I had better come over and spend the day with ye, Wild Bill came to my door with a box on his sled that the two had got to from his home in the east, and in the box he had put a good many presents for him and me, and in the inner box of the box he had put a good many presents for you and yer children, and we've brought them all over with us. Some of the things is for the cabin, and some of them be for wearin', and that there may be no misunderstandin, I would say that all the things that be in the pack basket there, and all the things that be on the sled box, belong to ye, and as I see the wood pile isn't a very big one—less than it of the year, Bill and I be goin' out to settle our account a bettle with the axe. And when we come in I sarch you'll have got rummage in the things over, and them that be good for wearin' 's fust better put on yourself and yer leetle uns, and then we'll all be ready to make a fair start. For this be Christmas-day, and we're goin' to keep it as it ortes be kept. Ef ye're half as hungry as I feel I reckon we'll laugh, and we'll eat, and be merry. For this be Christmas, my good woman! Children, this be Christmas!" Wild Bill, my boy, this be Christmas! And, pups, this be Christmas!" And we'll all laugh, and eat, and be merry!"

The gentleness of the old man was contagious. His happiness flowed over as a wave flows over the rim of a fountain. Wild Bill laughed as he went out. The woman rose from the table standing, the girls giggled, the little boy stamped, and the hounds rattling the spurs of their merry master, sang their tails round and bayed to express gladness, and amid the joyful uproar the old trapper again himself out of the door, and closed Wild Bill through the snow like a lark.

The dinner was to be served at two o'clock, and what a dinner it was, and what preparations preceded! The snow had been shovelled from around the cabin. The holes in the roof roughly but effectually thatched. A good pile of wood was stacked in front of the doorway. The spring that bubbled from the bank had been cleared of ice, and a protection constructed over it. The huge bush had been dressed, and hung high above the reach of wolves. Cedar and fir sam branches had been placed in the corners and along the sides of the room. Great spears of the tasselled pine and the feathery tamarack were suspended from the ceiling. The table had been enlarged, and extra seats extemporized. The long-mussed oven had been cleaned out, and molten tin cast down the red flames flashed and rolled upward. What a change a few hours had brought to the lonely cabin and its wretched inmates! The woman, dressed in her new garments, her hair smoothly combed, her face lighted with smiles, looked positively comely. The children, happy in their new clothes and their marvellous toys, danced round the room, wild with delight, while the little boy strutted about the floor in his new boots, proudly showing them to each person for the hundredth time.

The hostess's attention was equally divided between the temperature of the oven and the adornment of the table. A snow white sheet, one of a dozen she had found as the box, was drafted peremptorily into service, and did duty as a table-cloth. Oh, the luxurious and fancy make-shifts of poverty, and the goodly distance it can make a little go! Perhaps some of us, as we stand in our rich dining rooms, and gaze with pride as the silver, the gold, the cut glass, and the transparent china, can recall a little kitchen to a homely home far away, where our good mothers once set their tables for their guests, and what a brave show the few extra dishes made when they brought them out on the rare festive days!

However it might strike you, fair reader, to the poor woman and her guests there was nothing meagreous in the sheet serving as a table-cloth. Was it not white and clean and properly shaped—and would it not have been a table-cloth if it hadn't been [illegible]

How very nice and particular some people can be over the trifling matter of a name! And this sheet had as right to be a sheet, for any one with half an eye could see at a glance that it was predestined from the first to be a table-cloth, for it sat as naturally on the wooden surface as pious looks as a deacon's face, while the easy and unashamed way in which it draped itself as the corners was perfectly jaunty.

The edges of this square of white sheeting that had thus providentially found its true and predestined use were ornamented with the leaves of the wild myrtle, stitched on in the form of scallops. In the centre, with a brave show of artistic skill, were the words, "Merry Christmas," prettily worked with the small brown cones of the pines. This, the joint product of Wild Bill's industry and the woman's taste, commanded the enthusiastic admiration of all; and even the little boy, from the height of a chair into which he had climbed, was profoundly affected by the shot it made.

The trapper had charge of the meat department, and it is safe to say that no Delmonico could undertake to serve venison in greater variety than did he. To him it was a grand occasion, and—in a culinary sense—he rose grandly to meet it. What lesson is without its little vanities, and shall we laugh at the dear old man because he looked upon the opportunity before him with feeling other than pure benevolence—even of complacency that what he was doing was being done as to one else could do it?

There was venison roasted, and venison broiled, and venison fried; there was hashed venison, and venison spitted; there was a side dish of venison sausage, strong with the odor of sage, and slightly dashed with wild thyme, and a huge kettle of soup, in whose rich creamy surface plates of bread and here and there a slice of potato floated.

"I tell ye, Bill," said the trapper to his companion, as he stirred the soup with a long ladle, "this pot isn't actily rovin' over with intern, but ye can see a bit occasionally of ye look sharp and keep the ladle goin' round pretty lively. No, the taters ain't over-plenty," continued the old man, peering into the pot, and sinking his voice to a whisper, "but there wasn't but fifteen in the bag, and the woman took twelve of 'em for her kittle, and we can't make three taters look actilly crowded in two gallons of soup, can we, Bill?" And the old man punched that personage in the rib with the thumb of the hand that was free from service, while in kept the ladle going with the other.

"Lord!" exclaimed the trapper, speaking to Bill, who, having taken a look into the old man's kettle, was digging his knuckles into his eyes to free them from the spray that was jetted into them from the fastness of which within that were now to full play—"Lord! of there isn't another piece of toter gone all to pieces! Bill, I make another circle with this ladle there won't be a whole slice left, and ye'll swear there wasn't a tater in the soup." And the two men, with their faces within twenty inches, laughed and laughed like boys.

How sweet it is to think that when the Baker on up this strange instrument we call ourselves, and strung it for service. He selected of the heavy chords as few, and of the lighter ones as many? Some muffled ones there are, some slow and solemn sounds swell sadly forth at intervals, but blessed be God that we are so easily tickled, and the world is so funny that within it, even when exiled from home and friends, as find, as the days come and go, the causes and occasions of hilarity!

Wild Bill had been placed in charge of the liquids. What a satire there is in circumstances, and how those of to-day laugh at those of yesterday! Yes, Wild Bill had charge of the liquids—no mean charge, when the occasion is considered. Nor was the position without its embarrassments, as few historic positions are, for it brought him face to face with the problem of the day—dishes; for, between the two cooks of the occasion, ever dish in the cabin had been brought into requisition, and poor Bill was, metaphorically speaking, left stranded high and dry on a desert there, with "Water, water everywhere,

And not a drop to drink."

But Bill was not lacking in wit if he was in pots, and he solved the conundrum how to make tea without a tea pot in a manner that extorted the woman's laughter, and commanded the old trapper's admiration.

In ransacking the lofts above the apartment he had lighted on several large stone jugs, which with the courage—shall we call it the audacity?—of genius he had seized upon, and having thoroughly rinsed them and freed them from certain odors which we are free to say Bill was more or less familiar with, he brought them forward as substitutes for kettle and pot. Indeed, they sucked admirably, for in them the berry and the leaves might not only be properly steeped, but the flavor could also be retained. Who would what it might be in many of our famous and high-sounding patented articles?

But Bill, while ingenious and courageous to the last degree, was lacking in education, especially in scientific directions. He had never been made acquainted with that great promoter of modern civilization—the expansive properties of steam. The corks in his whittled out for his brevity extemporized tea and coffee pots were of the closest fit, and being inserted with the energy of a man who, having conquered a serious difficulty, is determined to reap the full benefit of his triumph, there was at least as danger that the flavor of the concoctions would escape through any leakage at the mouth. Having thus prepared them for steeping, he placed the jugs in his corner of the fire place, and pushed them well up through the ashes toward the live coals.

"Will Bill," said the trapper, who wished to give his companion the needed warning in as delicate and easy a manner as possible—"Will Bill, ye have sartinly got the right idee to-day in the makin' of tea and coffee, for the yarb should be steeped, and the berry too—least-ways arter it's biled up once or twice—and therefore it be only reasonable that the smoke should be closed mortally tight, but a man wants considerable experience to the business or he's likely to overdo it just a leetle, and of ye don't cut some slots in them wooden corks ye'll drive it down into them sides, Bill, there'll be a good deal of tea and coffee feedin' round in your corner of the fire-place afore many minutes, and I concoit there'll be a man about your size lookin' for a couple of corks out pieces of jugs out there in the clearin', now."

"Do you think so?" answered Bill, incredulously. "Don't ye be scared, old man, but keep on stirring the soup and tuning the meat, and I'll keep my eye on the bottles."

"That's right, Bill," returned the trapper, "so keep me eye right on 'em, specially on that as that's furderest to reward the butt of the bench leg there, for if there's any virtue to sage, that jug be giddin' uneasy. Yis," continued the old man, after a while's pause, during which his eye hadn't left the jug—"yis, that jug will want more room afore many minutes, of I'm any judge, and I concoit I had better give it the biggest part of the fire-place;" and the trapper hastily moved the soup and [illegible] as plates of cooked meats to the other end of the [illegible] whether he retired himself, like one who, feeling that he is [illegible] upon to contend with unknown forces, [illegible] a retreat. He even put himself behind a stack of wood that [illegible] piled up in his corner, like one who does not despise, in a sudden emergency, an artificial protection.

"Bill!" called the trapper, "edge round a bettle—edge round and get be closer to the jamb. It's those fashionable [illegible] where ye be, for the water will be wallopin' in a minit, and of the rocks he swelled in the nozzle there'll be an explosion. Git in yonard the jamb, and watch the ambushment under hirer."

"Old man," answered Bill, as he turned his back carelessly toward the fire-place, "I've got the beamn's of this trail, and know what I'm about. The jugs are as strong as iron kittles, and I ain't afraid of their bust—"

Bill never finished the sentence, for the explosion predicted by the trapper occurred. It was a tremendous one, and the huge fire-place was filled with living brands, ashes, and clouds of steam. The trapper ducked his head, the woman screamed, and the hounds rushed howling to the farthest end of the room, while Bill, with half a somersault, disappeared under the table.

"Hurrah!" shouted the trapper, lifting his head from behind the wood and critically surveying the scene—"hurrah, Bill!" he shouted, as he swung the ladle over his head. "Come out from under the table and man your battery agin. Yer old mortars was loaded to the muzzle, and ef ye had depressed the pieces a leetle, ye'd blowed the cabin to splinters, as it was, the chimney got the biggest part of the chargin', and you'll find yer remainers on the other side of the mountain."

It was, in truth, a scene of uproarious hilarity; for, once the explosion was over, and the woman and children saw there was no danger, and apprehended the character of the performance, they joined unrestrainedly in the trapper's laughter, in which they were assisted by Wild Bill, as if he was not the victim of his own misconfidence. "I say, old trapper," he called from under the table, "did both guns go off? I was sitting under cover when the battery opened, and didn't notice whether the thing was in sections or along the whole line. If there's a piece left, I think I will stay where I am, for I am in a good position to observe the range, and watch the effect of the shot. I say, old man," continued Bill, who felt himself in circumstances to return the submissive the other had shown in his behalf—"I say, hadn't you better get behind your wood pile and watch?"

"No, sir," interrupted the trapper; "the whole battery went at the word, Bill, and there isn't a gun or a gun-carriage left to the encampment. Ye've wasted a gill of the oats, and a quarter of a pound of the berry, and ye must hurry up with another bottle of bottles, or we'll have nothin' but water to drink at the dinner."

The dinner! That great event of the day, the crown and diadem to its regality, and which became it so well, was ready promptly to the hour. The table, enlarged as it was to nearly double the original dimensions, could scarcely accommodate the abundance of the feast. Ah, if some great power would only enlarge our hearts when on festive days we enlarge our tables, how many of the world's poor, that now go hungry while we feast, would then be fed!

At one end of the table sat the trapper, Wild Bill at the other. The woman's chair was at the centre of one of the sides, so that she sat facing the fire, whose generous flames might well symbolize the abundance which amid cold and hunger had so suddenly come to her. On her right hand the tom-girls sat, on her left the boy. A goodly table, a goodly fire, and, a goodlier company. What more could the angel of Christmas ask to see?

Thus were they seated, ready to begin the repast, but the plates remained untouched, and the happy noises which had to that moment filled the room ceased, for the Angel of Silence, with noiseless step, had suddenly entered the room. There's a silence of grief, there's a silence of hatred, there's a silence of dread—of these men may speak, and these they can describe; but the silence of our happiness, who can describe that? When the heart is full, when the long longing is suddenly met, when love gives to love abundantly, when the soul lacketh nothing, and is contented, then language is useless, and the Angel of Silence becomes our only adequate interpreter. A humble table, surely, and humble folk around it, but not in the houses of the rich or the palaces of kings does Gratitude find her only home, but in more lowly shades and with lowly folk—ay, and often at the scant table too—she setteth a perpetual guest. Was it memory? Did the trapper in that brief moment visit his absent friend? Did Wild Bill recall his career past? Were the thoughts of the woman busy with sweet scenes of earlier days? And did memory, to those reminding them of the absent and the past, of the sweet things that had been and were, stir within their hearts thoughts of Him from whom all gifts descend, and of His blessedness, in whose house the day was passed?

O Memory! thou tuneful bell that ringeth on forever, friend of our hearts, and friend, too, let us call thee, at our best, what means can equal thine? Fan in thy magic globe all time's whole—the birthday note for lunge, the marriage peal, the funeral knell, the gleeful jingle of merry bells, and those sweet memories that float our thoughts, like fragrant oils upon a fragrance-way toward Heaven—all these! Ring on, thou tuneful bell, ring on while these glad rays must drink the melody, and when the chimes are heard by me no more, ring loud and clear above my grave that peal that echoes to the heavens and tells the world of immortality, that they who came to mourn may check their tears and say, "He liveth still!"

"The Lord be praised for His goodness!" said the trapper, whose thoughts unconsciously broke into speech. "The Lord be praised for His goodness, and make us grateful for His past mercies, and the plenty that be here!" And lasting down upon the viands spread before him, he added, "The Lord be good to the boy, and make him as happy in a city home as he they who be wearin' and eatin' his gifts in the woods!"

"Amen!" said the woman, softly, and a grateful tone fell on her plaint.

"A—hem!" said Wild Bill, and then looking down upon his waxen suit, he lifted his voice, and bringing it out in a clear, strong tone, said, "Amen!"

At many a table that day more formal grace was said, by priest and layman alike, and at many a table, by lips of old and young, response was given to the benediction; but we doubt if ever all the earth a more honest grace was said or assented to than the Lord heard from the cabin in the woods.

The feast and the merry-making now began. The old trapper was in his best mood, and fairly bubbled over with humor. The wit of Wild Bill was naturally keen, and it flashed at its best as he ate. The children stuffed and laughed as only children on such an elastic occasion can. And as for the poor woman, it was impossible for her, in the midst of such a scene, to be otherwise than happy, and she joined modestly in the conversation, and laughed heartily at the witty sallies.

But why should we strive to put on paper the wise, the funny, and the pleasant things that were said?—the exclamations, the laughter, the story, the joke, the verbal thrust and parry, of which no account? Those, springing from the centre of the circumference and flashed into being at the instant, can not be preserved for after-rehearsal. Like the effervescence of champagne, they jet and are gone; their force passes away with the cause that accompanied its outcoming.

So it not enough to record that the dinner was a success, that the trapper's meats were put upon the table in a manner worthy of his reputation, that the woman's efforts at pastry making were generously applauded, and that Wild Bill's tea and coffee were pronounced by the hostess the best she had ever tasted? Perhaps on meal was ever more enjoyed, to certainly none was ever more heartily eaten.

The wonder and pride of the table was the pudding—a creation of Indian meal, flour, suet, and raisins, reinforced and accented by innumerable spicy elements supposed to be too mysterious to be grasped by the masculine mind. In the production of this wonderful centre piece—for it had been unanimously voted the place of honor—the poor woman had summoned all the latent resources of her skill, and in reference to it her pride and fear contended, while the anxiety with which she rose to serve it was only too plainly depicted on her countenance. What if it should prove a failure? What if she had made a miscalculation as to the amount of suet required—a point upon which she had been somewhat confused? What if the raisins were not sufficiently distributed? What if it wasn't done through, and should turn out pasty? Great heavens! The last thought was of so overwhelming a character that no fruitless courage could encounter it. Who may describe the look with which she watched the trapper as he tasted it, or the expression of relief which brightened her anxious face when he pronounced warmly in its favor?

"It's a wonderful bit of cookin'," he said, addressing himself to Wild Bill, "and I scarcely doubt of there be anything in the settlements to-day that can equal it. There be just enough of the suet, and there be a plum for every mouthful; and it be solid enough to stay in the mouth until ye've had time to chew it and git a taste of the corn—and I wouldn't give a cent for a puddin' of it gins runs from yer teeth fast, yis, it be a wonderful bit of cookin'," and turning to the woman, he added, "ye may well be proud of it."

What higher praise could be bestowed? And so it was re-echoed by all present, and plate after plate was passed for a second filling, the dinner came to an end with the greatest good feeling and hilarity.

IV.

"Now for the sled!" exclaimed the trapper, as he rose from the table. "It be a good many years since I've straddled one, but nothin' settles a slumber quicker, or wets the heels faike better. I convict the crust be lush enough to bear us up, and of it is, as can fetch a course from the upper edge of the clearin' fifty rods into the lake. Come, children, git on yer mittens and yer tippets, and h'ist along to the big pine, and we shall have some fun yo won't fought could yer heads be where they mine."

It is needless to record that the children hailed with delight the proposition. The trapper, on that they were at the appointed spot sang to for the sport, and his companion reached it with the sled.

"Wild Bill," said the trapper, as they stood on the crest of the slope down which they were to glide, "the crust be smooth as glass, and the hill be a steep un. I warrinty double ef mortal man ever rode faster than the sled 'll be goin' be the time it gets to where the bank reaches into the lake and ef we should git a heelo reaches in yer stern'n, Bill, and hit a stump I reckon that nothin' but the help of the Lord or the nativeness of the stump would save ye from starvin'. I certinly think we better tie the childin' the foot tom down without the children, for it wouldn't do to have one of the brats [illegible] today."

Now Wild Bill was blessed with a sanguine temperament. To him no obstacle seemed serious if bravely faced. Indeed, his natural confidence in himself bordered on recklessness, to which the drinking habits of his life had perhaps contributed.

When the trapper had finished speaking, Bill ran his eye carelessly down the steep hill side, smooth and shiny as polished steel, and said: "Oh, this isn't an thing comy for a hill! I've steered a good many steeper ones, and in nights when the moon was at the full, and the sled overloaded at that. It don't make any difference how fast you go," he added, "if you only keep to the path and don't hit anything."

"That's it—that's it," replied the trapper; "but the trouble here be to keep in the path, for, in the fast place, there isn't any path and the stumps be pretty thick, and I doubt of ye can line a trail from here to the bank by the lake without one or more sudden jukes in it, and a twist in the trail, goin' on fast as we'll be goin', has got to be taken judiciously, or somethin' will happen. I say Bill, what plan will ye steer for?"

Wild Bill, thus addressed, proceeded to give his opinion touching the proper direction of the flight they were to make. Indeed, he had been closely examining the ground while the trapper was speaking, and therefore gave his opinion promptly and with confidence.

"Ye have chosen the course with judgment," said the old man, approvingly, after he had studied the line his companion pointed out critically for a moment. "Yis, Bill, ye have a natteral eye for the traverses, and I certinly have more confidence in ye than I had a minit ago, when ye was talkin' about a steeper hill than this, for this hill drops mighty sudden in the patches, and the crust be smooth as ice, and the sled 'll go like a streak when it gits started. But the course ye've p'inted out be a good on, for there be only one bad turn in it, and good steerin' arter got a sled round that. I say," continued the old man, turning toward his companions, and pointing out the crook in the course at the bottom of the second dip, "can ye swing around that big stump there without upsetting when ye come to it?"

"Swing around? Of course I can," returned Wild Bill, positively. "There's plenty room to the left, and—"

"Ay, ay, there be plenty of room, on ye say, of ye don't take too much of it," interrupted the trapper, "but—"

"I tell you," broke in the other, "I'll turn my back to an man in steering a sled, and I can put this sled and you on it around that stump a hundred times and never lift a runner."

"Well, well," responded the trapper, "have it your own way. I dare say ye be good at steerin', and I certinly know I'm good at ridin', and I can ride as fast as ye can steer, ef ye hit every stump in the clearin'. Now, children," continued the old man, turning to the little group, "we be goin' to try the course, and of the crust holds up, and Wild Bill keeps clear of the stumps, and nothin' on usual happens, ye shall have all the sliddin' ye want after ye go in. Come, Bill, git yer sled p'inted right, and I'll be gittin' on, and we'll see of ye can steer a man round a stump as handily as ye say ye can."

The directions of the trapper were promptly obeyed, and as an instant the sled was in a right position, and the old man proceeded to greet himself with the carefulness of one who feels he is embarking on a somewhat uncertain venture, and has grave misgivings as to what will be the upshot of the undertaking. The sled was large and strongly built, and it added not a little to the trapper's comfort to feel that he could put entire confidence in the structure beneath them.

"The sled 'll hold," he said to himself, "of the bindin' goes to the judgment."

The trapper was on sooner seated than Wild Bill threw himself upon the sled, with one leg under him and the other stretched at full length behind. This was a method of steering that had come into vogue since the trapper's boyhood, for in his day the steersman sat astride the sled, with his feet thrust forward, and steered by the pressure of either heel upon the snow.

"Hold on, Bill!" exclaimed the trapper, whose eye this novel method of steering had not escaped. "Hold on, and hold up a minit! Heavens and 'arth! ye don't mean to steer this sled with one toe, do ye, and that, too, the length of a rifle-barrel astern! Wheel round, and spread yer legs out as ye ortter, and steer this sled in an honest fashion, or there'll be trouble aboard afore ye git to the bottom."

"Sit round!" retorted Bill. "How could I see to steer if I was sitting right back of you? Fan you're nigh a foot taller than I be, and your shoulders are as broad as the sled!"

"Yer p'ints be well taken, for sartin," replied the trapper, "for it be no more than reasonable that the man that steers should see where he be goin', and I am anxious as you be that ye should. Yis, I certinly want ye to see where ye be goin' on this trip, anyhow, for the crew be a fresh un, and the channel be a little crooked. But be reasurin, Bill, that ye can fetch round that stump there as it ortter be did, with nothin' but yer toe out behind? It may be the best way, as ye say, but it don't look like honest steerin' to a man of my years."

"I have used both ways," answered Bill, "and I give you my word, old man, that this is the best one. You can get a big swing with your foot stretched out in this fashion, and the sled feels the least pressure of the toe. Yes, it's all right. John Norton, are you ready?"

"Yis, yis, or ready as I ever shall be," answered the trapper, in a voice in which doubt and resignation were equally mingled. "If sure he be as we say," he continued, "let the rudder be free for behind to suit me, and ef anything happens on this course, jest remember, Wild Bill, that my judgment—"

The sentence the trapper was uttering was abruptly cut short at this point, for Bill had started the sled with a sudden push, and leaped on his seat behind the trapper as it glided downward and away. In an instant the sled was under full headway, for the dip was a sheep one, and the crust smooth as ice. Scarcely had it gone ten rods from the point whence it started before it was in full flight, and was gliding down and ever with what would have been, to any but a man of the steadiest nerve, a frightful velocity. But the trapper was of too cool and courageous a temperament to be disturbed even by actual danger. Indeed, the swiftness of their downward career, as the sled with a hum and a roar swept along over the resounding crust, stirred the old man's blood with a tingle of excitement, while the splendid manner with which Wild Bill was keeping it to the course settled upon filled him with admiration, and was fast making him a convert to the new method of steering.

Downward they flashed! The trapper's hat had been blown from his head, and as the old man sat bolt-upright on his sled, his long tresses plaited on the round, his face flushed, and his whole hale streaming, he looked the very picture of hearty enjoyment. Above his head the faces of Wild Bill looked actually sharpened by the pressure of the air on either cheek as it clove through it, but his lips were heavily set, and his eyes were fastened without sinking upon the big stump ahead, toward which they were rushing.

It was at this point that Wild Bill vindicated his ability as a steersman, and at the same time barely escaped shipwreck. At the proper moment he swept his foot to the left, and the sled, in obedience to the pressure, swerved in that direction. But in his anxiety to give the stump a wide berth, Bill exerted the pressure that was needed a trifle, for in calculating the curve required he had failed to allow for the sidewise motion of the sled, and instead of hitting one stump, it looked for an instant as if he would be precipitated among a dozen.

"Heave her stern up, Wild Bill; up with her stern, I say," yelled the trapper, "as they won't be a stump left in the clearin'."

With a quickness and courage that would have done credit to any steersman—for the speed at which they were going was terrific—Bill swept his foot to the right, leaning his body well over at the same instant. The trapper instinctively seconded his endeavors, and with hands that gripped either side of the sled, he hung over that side which was upon the point of going into the air. For several rods the sled glided along on a single runner, and then righted itself with a bound, jumped the remnants of the last dip, and raced away, like a swallow in full flight, toward the lake.

Now, at the edge of the clearing that bounded the shore was a bank of considerable elm. Shrubs and stunted bushes fringed the crest of it. These had been buried beneath the snow and the crust formed smoothly over them, and as it was upheld by no stronger support than such as the hidden shrubbery furnished, it was incapable of sustaining any considerable pressure.

Certainly no sled was ever moving faster than was Wild Bill's when it came to this point, and certainly no sled ever stopped quicker, for the treacherous crust dropped suddenly under it, and the sled was left with nothing but the hind part of one of the runners sticking up in sight. But though the sled was so suddenly checked in its career the trapper and Wild Bill continued their flight. The former shot from the sled without meeting an obstruction, and with the same velocity with which the sled had moved, so Bible was his position changed, the [illegible] that no accident had happened, and the old man, looking forward to the end of the course with a [illegible] the hill. A CHRISTMAS PANTOMIME IN THE NURSERY.—DRAWN BY J. W. ALEXANDER.

MY GIFT FROM SANTA CLAUS.

Yes, I was dark, and she was fair.
Oh did we make a "handsome pair."
But oh, the little maid was shy;
And, to be candid, so was I.
Long had I striven, with many a sign,
To make her read this heart of mine,
Where often love songs died unsung,
For timid lips and trembling tongue.

But Christmas time was coming fast,
And old "Kriss Kringle" 'twas at last
Inspired me with happy thought,
To help me gain the gift I sought.
Whispering, I said to her: "Last night
A sweet dream filled me with delight,
For Santa Claus most generously
A woman's dear heart gave to me.

"And bade me, darling, go to you
To find its owner, fond and true.
So I have come. I pray you, sweet,
Kind Santa Claus's gift complete;
And if your heart I have indeed,
Another in its place you'll need;
And oh, my love, I'll gladly sign
A deed in full to you of mine."

CHAPTER I.

THE SMOTHERED SUPPER.

Outside the bedroom the night was black and still.

The small rain fell too softly to be heard in the garden; not a leaf stirred in the airless calm, the watch dog was asleep, the cats were making love far or near, under the dusky heaven, not a sound was stirring.

Inside the bedroom the night was black and still.

Miss Ladd knew her business as a school-mistress too well to allow night lights; and Miss Ladd's young ladies were supposed to be fast asleep, in accordance with the rules of the house. Only at intervals the silence was faintly disturbed, when the restless turning of one of the girls in her bed betrayed itself by a gentle rustling between the sheets. In the long intervals of stillness not even the softly audible breathing of young creatures asleep was to be heard.

The first sound that told of life and movement recorded the mechanism at the top of the clock, speaking from the lower regions the organ of Father Time told the hour in music.

A soft voice rose weakly from the floor of the room. It counted the strokes of the clock, and reminded one of the girls of the lapse of time.

"Emily! eleven o'clock."

There was no reply. After an interval the weary voice tried again, in louder tones.

"Emily!"

A girl whose bed was at the inner end of the room sighed under the heavy heat of the night, and said, in peremptory tones, "Is that Cecilia?"

"Yes."

"What do you want?"

"I'm getting hungry, Emily. Is the new girl asleep?"

The new girl answered promptly and spitefully, "No, she isn't."

Having a private object of their own in view, the fun wise virgins of Miss Ladd's first class had waited an hour, in wakeful anticipation of the falling asleep of the stranger, and it had ended in this way. A ripple of laughter ran round the room. The new girl, mortified and offended, entered her protest in plain words.

"You are trusting me shamefully! You all distrust me, because I am a stranger."

"Say we don't understand you," Emily answered, speaking for her school fellows, "and you will be nearer the truth."

"Who expected you to understand me, when I only came here to-day? I have told you already my name is Francine De Sor. If you want to know more, I'm nineteen years old, and I come from the West Indies."

Emily still took the lead. "Why do you come here?" she asked. "Who ever heard of a girl joining a new school just before the holidays? You are nineteen years old, are you? I'm a year younger than you, and I have finished my education. The next big girl in the room is a year younger than me, and she has finished her education. What can you possibly have left to learn at your age?"

"Everything!" cried the stranger from the West Indies, with an outburst of tears. "I'm a poor ignorant creature. Your education ought to have taught you to play me instead of making fun of me. I hate you all. For shame! for shame!"

Some of the girls laughed. One of them—the hungry girl who had counted the strokes of the clock—took Francine's part.

"No—and their laughing, Miss De Sor. You are quite right; you have good reason to complain of us."

Miss De Sor dried her eyes. "Thank you—whoever you are," she answered, bravely.

"My name is Cecilia Weyll," the other proceeded. "It was not, perhaps, quite nice of you to say you hoped us all. At the same time, we have forgotten our good-breeding, and the least we can do is to beg your pardon."

This expression of generous sentiment appeared to have an irritating effect on the peremptory young person who took the lead in the room. Perhaps she disapproved of free trade in generous sentiment.

"I can tell you one thing, Cecilia," she said; "you sha'n't beat us in generosity. Strike a light, one of you, and lay the blame on me if Miss Ladd finds us out. I mean to shake hands with the new girl—and how can I do it in the dark? Miss De Sor, my name's Brown, and I'm queen of the bedroom. I—not Cecilia—offer our apologies if we have offended you. Cecilia is my dearest friend, but I don't allow her to take the lead in the room. Oh, what a lovely night-gown!"

The sudden flow of the candle-light had revealed Francine sitting up to her bed, and displaying such treasures of real lace over her bosom that the queen lost all sense of royal dignity in irrepressible admiration. "Seven and sixpence," Emily remarked, looking at her own night-gown, and despising it. One after another the girls yielded to the attraction of the wonderful lace. Slim and plump, fair and dark, they crowded round the new pupil in their flowing white robes, and arrived by common consent at one and the same conclusion: "How rich her father must be!"

Favored by fortune in the matter of money, was this enviable person possessed of beauty as well?

In the disposition of the beds, Miss De Sor was placed between Cecilia on the right hand and Emily on the left. If he some fantastic turn of events a man—say, in the interests of propriety, a married doctor, with Miss Ladd to look after him—had been permitted to enter the room, and had been asked what he thought of the girls when he came out, he would not even have mentioned Francine. Blind to the beauties of the expensive night-gown, he would have noticed her long upper lip, her obstinate chin, her sallow complexion, her eyes placed too close together, and would have turned his attention to her nearest neighbors. On one side his intimate interest would have been instantly aroused by Cecilia's glowing auburn hair, her exquisitely pure skin, and her tender blue eyes; on the other, he would have discovered a bright little creature, who would have fascinated and perplexed him at once and the same time. If he had been questioned about her by a stranger, he would have been at a loss to say positively whether she was dark or light; he would have remembered how her eyes had laid him, but he would not have known of what color they were. And yet she would have remained a vivid picture in his memory when other impressions, derived at the same time, had vanished. "There was one little witch among them who was worth all the rest put together, and I can't tell you why. They called her Emily. If I wasn't a married man—" There he would have thought of his wife, and would have sighed, and said no more.

While the girls were still admiring Francine, the clock struck the half hour past eleven.

Cecilia stole on tiptoe to the door, looked out, and listened, then [illegible] Ladies on all the matters with the [illegible] of her own [illegible] questions, such

Are none of you hungry yet?" she inquired. "It matters not one rap to [illegible] rooms, we have [illegible] right with Lucasta. Who'll keep the supper waiting under Emily's bed?"

[illegible] this with such personal attractions to recommend it, admitted [illegible] reply. The queen waved her hand graciously, and said: "Pull it out."

In a lovely girl, whose face possesses the crowning charm of expression, whose slightest movement betrays the supple symmetry of limb [illegible] the [illegible] blessed with good appetite, and is not ashamed to acknowledge it. With a grace all her own, Cecilia dived under the bed and produced a basket of pastry, a basket of fruit and sweetmeats, a basket of [illegible] side, and a [illegible] of [illegible] in general circulation, and [illegible] glee into the room by kind permittance of the servants. On this occasion the feast was especially plentiful and expensive, in commemoration of the arrival of the midsummer holidays, but of the running freedom of Miss Ladd's two leading young ladies. With wildly different destinies before them, Emily and Cecilia had completed their school life, and were now to go out into the world.

The contrast in the characters of the two girls showed itself even in such a trifle as the preparations for supper.

Gentle Cecilia, sitting on the floor surrounded by good things, left it to the ingenuity of others to decide whether the baskets should be all emptied at once, or handed round from bed to bed one at a time. In the mean while her lovely blue eyes rested tenderly on the tarts. Emily's commanding spirit seized on the reins of government, and employed each of her school-fellows in the occupation which she was fittest to undertake. "Miss De Sor, let me look at your hand. Ah, I thought so. You have got the thickest wrist among us, you shall draw the corks. If you tie the lemonade pop, not a drop of it goes down your throat. Effie, Annis, Priscilla, you are three notoriously lazy girls; it's doing you a true kindness to set you to work. Effie, clear the toilet table for supper: away with the combs, the brushes, and the looking-glass. Annis, tear up that old newspaper, and set the pieces out neatly for dishes and plates. No! I'll unpack; nobody touches the baskets but me. Priscilla, you have the prettiest eyes in the room; you shall act as sentinel, my dear, and listen at the door. Cecilia, when you have done devouring those tarts with your [illegible] take that pair of scissors (Miss De Sor, not a one to apologies for the mean manner in which this school is carried on; the knives and forks are counted and locked up every night)—I say take that pair of scissors, Cecilia, and carve the cake, and don't keep the largest bit for yourself. Are we all ready? Very well. Now take example by me. Talk as much as you like, as long as you don't talk too loud. There is one other thing before we begin. The men always propose toasts on these occasions: let's be like the men. Can any of you make a speech? Ah! It falls on me as usual. I propose the first toast. Down with all schools and teachers—especially the new teacher who came this half-year. Oh, sorry, how it stings!" The fixed gas in the lemonade took the orator at that moment by the throat, and effectually checked the flow of her eloquence. It made no difference to the girls. Excepting the case of feeble stomachs, who cares for eloquence in the presence of a supper table? There were on feeble stomachs in that bedroom. With what inexhaustible energy Miss Ladd's young ladies ate and drank! How merrily they enjoyed the delightful privilege of talking nonsense! And —alas! alas!—how vainly they tried in after-life to renew the once unalloyed enjoyment of tarts and lemonade!

In the unintelligible scheme of creation there appears to be no human happiness—not even the happiness of school girls—which is ever complete. Just as it was drawing to a close, the enjoyment of the feast was interrupted by an alarm from the sentinel at the door.

"Put out the candle!" Priscilla whispered. "Somebody on the stairs."

CHAPTER II.

DISCOMFORT IN THE BEDROOM.

The candle was instantly extinguished. In discreet silence the girls stole back to their beds, and listened.

As an aid to the vigilance of the sentinel, the door had been left ajar. Through the narrow opening, a creaking of the broad wooden stairs of the old house became audible. In another moment there was silence. An uncertain pause, and the creaking was heard again. This time, the sound was distant and diminishing. On a sudden it stopped. The midnight silence was disturbed no more.

What did this mean?

Had one among the many persons in authority under Miss Ladd's roof heard the girls talking, and ascended the stairs to suppress them in the act of violating one of the rules of the house? So far, such a proceeding was by no means uncommon. But was it within the limits of possibility that a teacher should alter her opinion of her own duty half-way up the stairs, and deliberately go back to her room again? The bare idea of such a thing was absurd on the face of it. What more rational explanation could ingenuity discover on the spur of the moment? Francine was the first to offer a suggestion. She shook and shivered in her bed, and said, "For Heaven's sake, light the candle again!—it's a ghost."

"Clear away the supper, you fools, before the ghost can report us to Miss Ladd!"

With this excellent advice Emily checked the rising panic. The door was closed, the candle was lit, all traces of the supper disappeared. For five minutes more they listened again. No sound came from the [illegible], no teacher, or ghost of a teacher appeared at the door.

Having eaten her supper, Cecilia's immediate attentions were at an end, she was at leisure to consider her failings in the [illegible] of her school fellows. In her gentle ingenuous way, she offered a [illegible] suggestion. "When we heard the creaking, I don't believe there was anybody on the stairs. In those old houses there are always strange noises at night, and they say the timbers have been made more than two hundred years since."

The girls looked at each other with a sense of relief—but they wanted to hear the opinion of the queen. Emily, as usual, justified the confidence placed in her. She discovered an ingenious method of putting Cecilia's suggestion to the test.

"Let's go on talking," she said. "If Cecilia is right, the teachers are all asleep, and we have nothing to fear from them. If she's wrong, we shall sooner or later see one of them at the door. Don't be silent, Miss De Sor. Cecilia is talking at night, in this school, only women are permitted. Cecilia, go with a light ends in punishment. Blow out the candle."

Francine's belief in the ghost was too sincerely superstitious to be shaken: she started up in bed. "Oh, don't leave me in the dark! I'll take the punishment, if we are found out."

"On your sacred word of honor?" Emily stipulated.

"Yes, yes!"

The queen's sense of humor was tickled. "There's something funny," she remarked, addressing her subjects, "in a big girl like that coming to a new school, and beginning with a punishment. May I ask if you are a foreigner, Miss De Sor?"

"My papa is a Spanish gentleman," Francine answered, with dignity.

"And your mamma?"

"My mamma is English."

"And you have always lived in the West Indies?"

"I have always lived in the island of San Domingo."

Emily checked off on her fingers the different points thus far discovered in the character of Mr De Sor's daughter. "She's ignorant, and superstitious, and foreign, and rich. My dear (forgive the familiarity), you are an interesting girl, and we must really know more of you. Enter into the [illegible]-room. What have you been about all your life? And what, in the name of wonder, brings you here? Stop! Before you begin, I insist on one condition, in the name of all the young ladies in the room. No useful information about the West Indies!"

Francine disappointed her audience.

She was ready enough to make herself to object of interest to her companions, but she was not possessed of the capacity to arrange events in their proper order, necessary to the recital of the simplest narrative. Emily was obliged to help her by means of questions. In one respect the result justified the trouble taken to obtain it. A sufficient reason was discovered for the extraordinary appearance of a new pupil on the day before the school closed for the holidays.

Mr De Sor's social position in San Domingo had been (to use his daughter's words) the position of "a small planter, too poor to send to France or England for a governess." The mother's health was delicate, and the mother's interest centered in her only other child—a son, born in the later years of her married life. From first to last, Francine (in her own opinion) had been shamefully neglected. Six months since, the prospects of the family had changed for the better on the death of a bachelor relative. Mr. De Sor's brother had left him one of the finest estates in San Domingo, and a fortune in money as well, on the one easy condition that he should reside in the island. The question of expense being now beneath the notice of the family, Francine had been sent to England, especially recommended to Miss Ladd as a young lady with grand prospects, sorely in need of a fashionable education. The voyage had been continued, by advice of the school mistress, so as to make the holidays a means of obtaining this object privately. Francine was to be taken to Brighton, where excellent masters could be obtained to assist Miss Ladd. With six weeks before her, she might in some degree make up for lost time; and, when the school opened again, she would avoid the mortification of being put down in the lowest class along with the children.

The examination of Miss De Sor, having produced these results, was pursued no further. Her character now appeared in a new, and not very attractive, light. She audaciously took to herself the whole credit of telling her story.

"I think it's my turn now," she said, "to be interested and amused. May I ask you to begin, Miss Emily? All I know of you at present is that your family name is Brown."

Emily held up her hand for silence.

Was the mysterious creaking on the stairs making itself heard once more? No. The sound that had roused Emily's quick ear came from the beds, on the opposite side of the room, occupied by the three last girls. With an ear alert to disturb them, Effie, Annis, and Priscilla had yielded to the composing influences of a good supper and a warm night. They were fast asleep, and the fattest of the three (sadly, as became a young lady) was snoring!

The indescribable expiration of the bedroom was due to Emily in her capacity of queen. She felt herself humiliated in the presence of the new pupil.

"If that girl ever gets a sweetheart," she said, indignantly, "I shall consider it my duty to warn the poor man before he marries her. Her ridiculous name is Euphemia. I have christened her (for many appropriately) Boiled Veal. No color in her hair, no color in her eyes, no color in her complexion. In short, an flavor in Euphemia. You naturally object to snoring. Pardon me if I turn my back on you—I am going to throw my slipper at her."

The soft voice of Cecilia—exquisitely drowsy in tone—interposed in the interests of mercy.

"She can't help it, poor thing, and she really isn't loud enough to disturb us."

"She won't disturb you, at any rate! Leave yourself, Cecilia. We are wide-awake on this side of the room, and Francine says it's our use to amuse her."

A low murmur, dying away gently in a sigh, was the only answer. Sweet Cecilia had yielded to the somnolent influences of the supper and the night. The soft infection of repose seemed to be in some danger of communicating itself to Francine. Her large mouth opened luxuriously in a long-continued yawn.

"Good-night!" said Emily.

Miss De Sor became wide-awake in an instant.

"No," she said, positively, "you are quite mistaken if you think I am going to sleep. Please exert yourself, Miss Emily—I am waiting to be interested."

Emily appeared to be unwilling to exert herself. She became interested in the weather.

"Isn't the wind rising?" she said.

There could be no doubt of it. The leaves in the garden were beginning to rustle, and the pattering of the rain sounded to the windows.

Francine (to her straight chagrin) proclaimed in all students of physiognomy) was an obstinate girl. Determined to serve her purpose, she tried Emily's own system to Emily herself—she put questions.

"Have you been long at this school?"

"More than three years."

"Have you got any brothers and sisters?"

"I am an only child."

"Are your father and mother alive?"

Emily suddenly raised herself in her bed.

"Wait a minute," she said. "I think I have it again."

"The creaking on the stairs?"

"Yes."

Either she was mistaken, or the change for the worse in the weather made it not easy to [illegible] slight noises in the house. The wind was rising. The passage of it through [illegible] trees in the garden began to sound [illegible] the lid of [illegible] was on a distant beach. It [illegible] heavy drops [illegible] by this time—coming against the windows.

"Almost a storm, isn't it?" Emily said.

Francine's last question [illegible] her answered yet. She took the earliest opportunity of repeating it.

"Never mind the weather," she me about your father and mother. Are they both alive?"

Emily's reply only related to one of her parents. "My mother died before I was old enough to feel my loss."

"And your father?"

Emily referred to another relative—her father's sister.

"Since I have grown up," she proceeded, "my good aunt has been a second mother to me. My story is, in one respect, the reverse of yours. You are unexpectedly rich, and I am unexpectedly poor. My aunt's fortune was to have been my fortune if I outlived her. She has been ruined by the failure of a bank. In her old age she must live on an income of a hundred a year—and I must get my own living when I leave school."

"Surely your father can help you?" Francine persisted.

"His property is landed property." Her voice faltered as she referred to him, even in that indirect manner. "It is entailed; his nearest male relative inherits it."

The delicacy which is easily discouraged was not one of the weaknesses in the nature of Francine.

"Do I understand that your father is dead?" she asked.

Our thick-skinned fellow-creatures have the rest of us at their mercy: only give them time, and they carry their point in the end. In sad, subdued tones—telling of deeply rooted reserves of feeling, seldom revealed to strangers—Emily yielded at last.

"Yes," she said, "my father is dead."

"Long ago?"

"Some people might think it long ago. I was very fond of my father. It's nearly four years since he died, and my heart still aches when I think of him. I'm not easily depressed by troubles, Miss De Sor. But his death was sudden—he was in his grave when I first heard of it—and— Oh, he was so good to me! he was so good to me!"

The gay, high-spirited little creature, who took the lead among them all, who was the life and soul of the school, hid her face in her hands and burst out crying.

Startled and, to do her justice, ashamed, Francine attempted to make excuses. Emily's generous nature passed over the cruel persistency that had tortured her. "No, no; I have nothing to forgive. It isn't your fault. Other girls have got mothers and brothers and sisters, and get reconciled to such a loss as mine. Don't make excuses."

"Yes, but I want you to know that I feel for you," Francine insisted, without the slightest approach to sympathy in face, voice, or manner. "When my uncle died, and left us all the money, papa was much shocked. He trusted to time to help him."

"Time has been long about it with me, Francine. I am afraid there is something perverse in my nature; the hope of meeting again in a better world seems so faint and far away. No more of it now! Let us talk of that good creature who is asleep on the other side of you. Did I tell you that I must earn my own bread when I leave school? Well, Cecilia has written home and found an employment for me. Not a situation as governess—something quite out of the common way. You shall hear all about it."

In the brief interval that had passed, the weather had begun to change again. The wind was as high as ever, but, to judge by the lessening patter on the windows, the rain was passing away. Emily began.

She was too grateful to her friend and schoolfellow, and too deeply interested in her story, to notice the air of indifference with which Francine settled herself on her pillow to hear the praises of Cecilia. The most beautiful girl in the school was not an object of interest to a young lady with an obstinate chin and unfortunately placed eyes. Pouring warm from the speaker's heart, the story ran smoothly on, to the monotonous accompaniment of the moaning wind. By fine degrees Francine's eyes closed, opened, and closed again. Toward the latter part of the narrative Emily's memory became, for the moment only, confused between two events. She stopped to consider—noticed Francine's silence, in an interval when she might have said a word of encouragement—and looked closer at her. Miss De Sor was asleep.

"She might have told me she was tired," Emily said to herself, quietly. "Well! the best thing I can do is to put out the light and follow her example."

As she took up the extinguisher, the bedroom door was suddenly opened from the outer side. A tall woman, robed in a black dressing-gown, stood on the threshold, looking at Emily.

CHAPTER III.

THE LATE MR. BROWN.

The woman's lean long-fingered hand pointed to the candle.

"Don't put it out." Saying those words, she looked round the room, and satisfied herself that the other girls were asleep.

Emily laid down the extinguisher. "You mean to report us, of course," she said. "I am the only one awake, Miss Jethro; lay the blame on me."

"I have no intention of reporting you. But I have something to say."

She paused, and pushed her thick black hair (already streaked with gray) back from her temples. Her eyes, large and dark and dim, rested on Emily with a sorrowful interest. "When your young friends wake to-morrow morning," she went on, "you can tell them that the new teacher, whom nobody likes, has left the school."

For once even quick-witted Emily was bewildered. "Going away," she said, "when you have only been here since Easter!"

Miss Jethro advanced, not noticing Emily's expression of surprise. "I am not very strong at the best of times," she continued; "may I sit down on your bed?" Remarkable on other occasions for her cold composure, her voice trembled as she made that request—a strange request, surely, when there were chairs at her disposal.

Emily made room for her with the dazed look of a girl in a dream. "I beg your pardon, Miss Jethro, one of the things I can't endure is being puzzled. If you don't mean to report us, why did you come in and catch me with the light?"

Miss Jethro's explanation was far from relieving the perplexity which her conduct had caused. "I have been mean enough," she answered, "to listen at the door, and I heard you talking of your father. I want to hear more about your father. That is why I came in."

"You knew my father?" Emily exclaimed.

"I believe I knew him. But his name is so common—there are so many thousands of 'James Browns' in England—that I am in fear of making a mistake. I heard you say that he died nearly four years since. Can you mention any particulars which might help to enlighten me? If you think I am taking a liberty—"

Emily stopped her. "I would help you if I could," she said. "But I was in poor health at the time, and I was staying with friends far away in Scotland to try change of air. The news of my father's death brought on a relapse. Weeks passed before I was strong enough to travel—weeks and weeks before I saw his grave! I can only tell you what I know from my aunt. He died of heart-complaint."

Miss Jethro started.

Emily looked at her for the first time with eyes that betrayed a feeling of distrust. "What have I said to startle you?" she asked.

"Nothing. I am nervous in stormy weather—don't notice me." She went on abruptly with her inquiries. "Will you tell me the date of your father's death?"

"The date was the thirtieth of September, nearly four years since."

She waited, after that reply.

Miss Jethro was silent.

"And this," Emily continued, "is the thirtieth of June, eighteen hundred and eighty-one. You can now judge for yourself. Did you know my father?"

Miss Jethro answered, mechanically, using the same words.

"I did know your father."

Emily's feeling of distrust was not set at rest. "I never heard him speak of you," she said.

In her younger days the teacher must have been a handsome woman. Her grandly formed features still suggested the idea of imperial beauty—perhaps Jewish in its origin. Not the faintest change had disturbed the composure of her face, until Emily said, "I never heard him speak of you." Then the color flew into her pale cheeks; her dim eyes became alive again with momentary light. She left her seat on the bed, and, turning away, mastered the emotion that shook her.

"How hot the night is!" she said, and sighed, and resumed the subject with a steady countenance. "I am not surprised that your father never mentioned me—to you." She said it quietly, but her face was paler than ever. She sat down again on the bed. "Is there anything I can do for you," she asked, "before I go away? Oh, I only mean some trifling service that would lay you under no obligation, and would not oblige you to keep up your acquaintance with me."

Her eyes—the dim black eyes that must once have been irresistibly beautiful—looked at Emily so sadly that the generous girl reproached herself for having doubted her father's friend. "Were you thinking of him," she said, gently, "when you ask if you can be of service to me?"

Miss Jethro made no direct reply. "You were fond of your father?" she said, faintly, in a whisper. "You told your school-fellow that your heart still aches when you speak of him."

"I only told her the truth," Emily answered, simply.

Miss Jethro shuddered—on that hot night she shuddered as if a chill had struck her.

Emily held out her hand; the kind feeling that had been roused in her glittered prettily in her eyes. "I am afraid I have not done you justice," she said. "Will you forgive me and shake hands?"

Miss Jethro rose and drew back. "Look at the light!" she exclaimed.

The candle was all but burned out. Emily still offered her hand, and still Miss Jethro refused to see it.

"There is just light enough left," she said, "to show me my way to the door. Good-night—and good-by."

Emily caught at her dress, and stopped her. "Why won't you shake hands with me?" she asked.

The wick of the candle fell over in the socket, and left them in the dark. Emily resolutely held the teacher's dress. With or without light, she was still bent on making Miss Jethro explain herself.

They had throughout spoken in guarded tones, fearing to disturb the sleeping girls. The sudden darkness had its inevitable effect. Their voices sank to whispers now. "My father's friend," Emily pleaded, "is surely my friend?"

"Drop the subject."

"Why?"

"You can never be my friend."

"Why not?"

"Let me go!"

Emily's sense of self-respect forbade her to persist any longer. "I beg your pardon for having kept you here against your will," she said, and dropped her hold on the dress.

Miss Jethro instantly yielded on her side. "I am sorry to have been obstinate," she answered. "If you do despise me, it is, after all, no more than I have deserved." Her hot breath beat on Emily's face: the unhappy woman must have bent over the bed as she made her confession. "I am not a fit person for you to associate with."

"I don't believe it!"

Miss Jethro sighed bitterly. "Young and warm-hearted—I was once like you!" She controlled that outburst of despair. Her next words were spoken in steadier tones. "You will have it—you shall have it," she said. "Some one (in this house or out of it I don't know which) has betrayed me to the mistress of the school. A wretch in my [illegible] suspects everybody [illegible] and, [illegible] still, does it without reason [illegible]. I heard you girls talking when you ought to have been asleep. You all dislike me. You know what I heard on the other side of that door, and why I was interested in hearing it. Your father never told me he had a daughter. 'Miss Brown,' at this school, was any 'Miss Brown' to me. I had no idea of who you really are until to-night. I'm wandering. What does all this matter to you? Mrs. Ladd has been merciful; she lets me go without exposing me. You can guess what has happened. Emily shrank from that miserable farewell. "Bid me good-night," she said, "[illegible] but not good-by. Let me see you again."

"Never!"

The sound of the softly closed door was just audible in the darkness. She had spoken; she had gone never to be seen by Emily again.

The recent remarkable series of sunsets that New Yorkers have seen were not confined to this longitude. They were as broad as the continent. The fire-engines were sent skurrying in many of the Western States, but of course no hose was brought to bear upon these conflagrations. A scientific man in San Francisco ascribed the phenomenon to volcanic eruptions in Alaska. According to him, volcanic ashes from Mr. Seward's purchase have been carried all over Japan and beyond, and similar coloring of the skies has been observed there. He says that at the time of the eruptions in Java such sunsets were seen at points as distant as Panama, and that the beauty of many of the Italian sunsets is due to volcanic ashes and dust from the African deserts. His idea is that the ashes hang in the sky like a canopy, and that the up-thrown sunlight is reflected from them in a great red glare. Those teachers who advise mankind of what and how it is healthful to eat declare that drinking at meal time is not good. Perhaps it [illegible] be proper for a man to drink more if he [illegible]

Fifteen hundred cab owners in Berlin are reported to have memorialized the City Council against the laying down of any more street pavements of wood or asphalt. The memorialists assert that accidents to pedestrians from vehicles, and [illegible] the [illegible] of vehicles, are from [illegible] to seventy-five per cent. more numerous on the [illegible] pavements than on those that are stone.

It is said that nearly half of the patents applied for in recent years have been for car couplers, and still that the bulk of car coupling to-day is done with the primitive link and pin.

It [illegible] the [illegible] the members of the Corean [illegible] when informed [illegible] would be carried to Europe in a [illegible] of the United States navy. It [illegible] also add [illegible] to the prestige of our navy in foreign lands to have it known that these representatives of an insular nation trusted themselves in one of our war vessels where deep water abounded.

An editor in an Illinois town said in his paper that a rich citizen was going to give each poor family in the place a turkey at Thanksgiving. The [illegible] a joke, wishing [illegible] at the supposed [illegible] of the rich citizen, and to show that he [illegible] it, he added that he (the editor) would give ten dollars to [illegible] get a turkey in the way specified. [illegible] Thanksgiving day delegates from [illegible] upon him and asked him for ten [illegible] each. The rich citizen had sent the turkeys. The editor could not pay, indeed, one of the charity turkeys had been sent to him.

A respected citizen of Aurora, Indiana, wished to get rid of his dog. He thought he could do it by taking [illegible] to New Orleans and leaving him there. The journey was made on a flat-boat, and the dog was deposited at the [illegible] of [illegible] River. The owner returned [illegible]. About three months afterward the dog [illegible] the back [illegible] his yard in A[illegible] [illegible] up to the kitchen door. It is reported that the animal looked lank, woe-begone, and hungry, and that by other evidences he had made the whole journey from New Orleans on foot. Aurora and New Orleans are something more than 1000 miles apart. Lest anybody should doubt this story, its truth is vouched for by the dog's owner, who tells it.

CURE

DR. TOBIAS,—I write to inform you that the child of a friend of mine was cured of croup, after being given up to die by three physicians. One hour after your Venetian Liniment was used it was out of danger. I hope you will publish this, so that mothers may know that they have a remedy for this terrible complaint. I lost a child by croup previous to hearing of your Liniment, but must have had it at hand, as I have your medicine always in the house. I have also used it for pains, sore throat, etc., and always found it to cure.

GIANT CURE OF RHEUMATISM.

This is to certify that I had the rheumatism in my hip so I could not walk a block my crutch, and after using Dr. Tobias's Venetian Liniment a short time I was entirely relieved, and candidly believe it a most certain cure for rheumatism as I have tried many things without ever getting relief. I have also used it for bruises, sore throat, etc., and always found it to cure.

The Sun

NEW YORK, 1884.

About sixty million copies of THE SUN have gone out of our establishment during the past twelve months.

If you were to paste end to end all the columns of all THE SUN printed and sold last year you would get a continuous strip of interesting information, common-sense wisdom, sound doctrine, and sane wit long enough to reach from Printing-House Square to the top of Mount Copernicus in the moon, thence back to Printing-House Square, and then three quarters of the way back to the moon again.

But THE SUN is written for the inhabitants of the earth; this same strip of intelligence would girdle the globe twenty-seven or twenty-eight times.

If every buyer of a copy of THE SUN during the past year has spent only one hour over it, and if his wife or his grandfather has spent another hour, this newspaper in 1883 has afforded the human race thirteen thousand years of steady reading, night and day.

It is only by little calculations like these that you can form any idea of the circulation of the most popular of American newspapers, or of its influence on the opinions and actions of American men and women.

THE SUN is, and will continue to be, a newspaper which tells the truth without fear of consequences, which gets at the facts no matter how much the process costs, which presents the news of all the world without waste of words and in the most readable shape, which is working with all its heart for the cause of honest government, and which therefore believes that the Republican party must go, and must go in this coming year of our Lord, 1884.

If you know THE SUN, you like it already, and you will read it with accustomed diligence and profit during what is sure to be the most interesting year in its history. If you do not yet know THE SUN, it is high time to get into the sunshine.

TERMS TO MAIL SUBSCRIBERS.

The several editions of THE SUN are sent by mail, postpaid, as follows:

DAILY—50 cents a month; $6 a year; with Sunday edition, $7.

SUNDAY—Eight pages. The edition furnishes the current news of the world, special articles of exceptional interest to everybody, and literary reviews of new books of the highest merit. $1 a year.

WEEKLY—$1 a year. Eight pages of the best matter of the daily issues; an Agricultural Department of unequalled value, special market reports, and literary, scientific, and domestic intelligence make THE WEEKLY SUN the newspaper for the farmer's household. To clubs of ten with $10, an extra copy free.

BAKER'S
Breakfast Cocoa.
Warranted absolutely pure Cocoa, from which the excess of Oil has been removed. It has three times the strength of Cocoa mixed with Starch, Arrowroot or Sugar, and is therefore far more economical. It is delicious, nourishing, strengthening, easily digested, and admirably adapted for invalids as well as for persons in health.
Sold by Grocers everywhere.
W. BAKER & CO., Dorchester, Mass.

A Great Conflagration
That sweeps away a whole city, starts from a flame so small that a glass of water would extinguish it. In like manner, the most powerful and fatal maladies of the throat and lungs ordinarily develop from small beginnings, and difficult of cure if not promptly treated with the proper remedy. But their progress is insidious and delay may be fatal. Colds and coughs lead to Laryngitis, Asthma, Bronchitis, Pneumonia, and Consumption. The only medicine certain to cure every bronchial and pulmonary affection not absolutely incurable is
Ayer's Cherry Pectoral.
During 35 years it has steadily grown in popular estimation, and is now a household reliance in many thousands of families. Parents, whose lives were preserved by AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL when they were young, are now saving the lives of their children with it. Leading physicians extol its virtues and prescribe it in their practice. Intelligent druggists everywhere report extraordinary cures effected by it, within their personal knowledge.

BREAKFAST.
By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected Cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately flavored beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.

WHY

Is a policy better worth having at a fair price in

THE TRAVELERS

Than at Half Price in any hat-passing Society?

BECAUSE

Our rates are as low as will SECURE payment of the FACE VALUE of Policies. Cheaper Rates are a sign of Defective Security. We do not scale down claims because assessments don't "pan out" well, nor steal claimants' money because "members" were dilatory about paying it in.

We charge premiums for CERTAINTIES, not random rates for payments that may never be made.

We clear our book of claims by PAYING THEM, not by discharging them with the fraction yielded by an assessment.

WHICH ARE BEST:

Worthless Goods at Half Price, or First-Class ones at full price!

If you wish INSURANCE, and not a gamble, apply to any of our countless agencies, or the Home Office at Hartford.

We have insured over 1,000,000 men, or more than any other Company in the world, and paid cash benefits to over 100,000 of them.

FASHION, PLEASURE, AND INSTRUCTION

"NO FAMILY SHOULD BE WITHOUT IT"

HARPER'S BAZAR is the leading family paper of America. It saves its readers both time and money. It carries the latest fashions every week from Maine to California, and the dwellers on the remotest prairies are as well informed as to respect to taste and style in dress as the citizens of the metropolis. By the aid of its Pattern-sheet Supplements, between twenty and thirty of which are issued gratuitously every year, each containing a dozen or more patterns of ladies' and children's garments, ladies can save many times the cost of subscription by becoming their own dressmakers, or intelligently superintending those whom they employ. Its columns are filled with all kinds of economical suggestions concerning household adjustment and all needle work, the management of servants, cookery for the well and the sick, the best methods of regulating family expenses, the care of the house, gardening, etc. Practical instructions are given for remodelling garments for refurnishing houses tastefully and cheaply, and in all the departments of domestic economy. Special attention is also paid to social etiquette and polite usages—always topics of interest to ladies.

A host of brilliant attractions will be found in the new volume. Among these will be a Social Story of powerful dramatic interest, by the distinguished novelist CHARLES READE, which, as the author himself remarks, "is the first social story of any length I have written this five years, and may be the last." A fascinating Serial Story by the favorite author I. W. RUSSELL, entitled THE MAN SHE CARED FOR," is now in course of publication in its columns, and will be followed by other tales from popular writers.

In literary and artistic merit HARPER'S BAZAR is unapproached by any journal of its class. Its stories, sketches, poems, and other articles are by the best writers in Europe and America. Its short stories have won marked distinction, its editorials are vigorous and sensible, and its miscellany is both useful and readable. Its brilliant art pictures would fill a large portfolio every year, and are models of superb engraving, while its humorous illustrations are second to none other in America. Fresh, racy, bright, and sparkling, it is always entertaining as well as always useful, and has established its reputation as the ideal Combination Home Journal, not only of America, but also of the world.

THE PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN

THE call of the National Republican Convention at Chicago on the 3d of June marks the opening of the Presidential campaign of 1884. The meeting of the committee was immediately followed by speculations about candidates and rumors of every kind regarding the combinations and plans of various Republican politicians. In all that said and wrote it is noticeable that there is great wariness of formally declaring the candidature of any particular person, as if there were a feeling that to take that step would greatly injure his chances of success. Meanwhile there are very few persons mentioned as probable candidates. The list comprises only the names of President ARTHUR, Mr. BLAINE, Mr. EDMUNDS, Mr. LOGAN, Mr. LINCOLN, Mr. HARRISON, and Mr. CRESSWAY. The Herald has announced in a letter from Washington—but the story rests only upon its assertion—that Mr. BLAINE and General GRANT and Mr. CONKLING have declared themselves friendly to the nomination of General LOGAN, and also that the LOGAN platform is an high tariff, with distribution of the proceeds of the whiskey tax among the States to promote education.

This may be classed among the humors of an early political season. But it is not too early to remark that the political situation is such that the result of the contest is not as yet to be forecast, and that all which can be plainly seen is that the party must be wise if it would succeed. There is no doubt that the Republican prospect of carrying the election is most promising, but that much depends upon the selection of a candidate is equally unquestionable. We shall probably not see the plan of 1880 repeated—the attempt to pack the National Convention in advance by trickery in the State Conventions. The Convention will be unusually independent and truly representative, and while the friends of different candidates will try to aid them in the preliminary movements, they know that the reaction against machines and bosses which followed the antics of 1880 and of the spring of 1881 is not yet spent, and that their efforts must not be of that kind if they are to be useful. The situation would seem to show certain things to be imperative. Among these [illegible] the necessity of a hom[illegible] not renew differences that are now quiescent if not healed. Another is that when there is a redundant revenue the party shall not declare for high taxation. Another is that it shall maintain the unequivocal position which it has taken in New York and elsewhere upon administrative or civil service reform. Another is that the proceedings of the Convention and before it shall show distinctly that the nomination is the free action of the party, and that its character shows the party fidelity to its own professions. These conditions seem to us to be essential to a vigorous campaign and a successful result, and they suggest the importance of a careful selection of the candidate.

In the absence of a paramount special purpose to be gained—a situation to which this generation has become accustomed, such as the extension of slavery, or the prosecution of the war, or reconstruction and its consequent policy—a situation which makes the individuality of the candidate of less importance—the candidate will next year be regarded as the guarantee of the good faith of the party. For instance, the sincerity of a party declaration of reform, whether in the revenue system or the civil service, will be tested by the reform sympathies and record of the candidate. It is a situation which demands that, whoever may be selected, he shall be by his character and services a distinct source of strength to the party in the campaign. If there be such a man, and he be also a Republican for whom every member of the party would willingly vote, who would be equally acceptable to Half Breeds and Stalwarts, to Kickers and Scratchers and Independents and Reformers, is he not manifestly the man to nominate? It is generally thought in a national electoral that it is a wise plan to listen politely to the more independent members of the party, but to select a candidate "to please the boys," counting upon the independents to fall in at the polls. But it is well to remember, in preparing for the nomination, that "the boys" always fall in, while the independents sometimes fall out, and if enthusiasm be essential, the only way to arouse enthusiasm is by proving that the party is really progressive. It, as will not be denied, the Republican prospect is very much fairer than it was a year or two ago, the reason is that its general course for some time has shown that it is in accord with the real wishes and convictions of the country. Let the Convention prove this by its declarations and its nominations, and it will have taken a long step toward victory.

THE CASE OF O'DONNELL.

THE prompt trial and punishment of O'DONNELL for the murder of CAREY, the Irish informer, contrasts, not to our credit, with the prolonged and grotesque proceedings in the case of GUITEAU. The murder, like the atrocious assassinations in Phœnix Park, belonged to those revolting and melancholy incidents which make the tragical story of Ireland one of the most painful in history. The attempts to arouse sympathy for the murderers of Phœnix Park, like Mr. PRYOR'S remark of O'DONNELL, reported in the Times, that "there was never a grander hero," are the worst possible service to Ireland. The pallination of deliberate murder, under the circumstances of the crime in Phœnix Park, or of the shooting of CAREY is an offense against society itself, and nothing more effectually or reasonably chills sympathy for Irish suffering than the impression produced by professional Irish sympathizers that every form of atrocity is to be condoned and commended if committed by an Irishman upon Englishmen or upon Irishmen in defiance of English law. The President, in compliance with the request of the House of Representatives, instructed Mr. LOWELL to bring the subject of delay in the execution of O'DONNELL to the attention of the British Government. Mr. LOWELL did so immediately, and the British Government replied as every sensible man knew that it would reply, that all the representations for delay or mitigation of punishment had been carefully examined and considered, and that it did not feel itself justified in interfering with the course of law.

Mr. PRYOR'S interpretation of the conduct of the judge at the trial as indicative of a determination at all hazards to secure a verdict of guilty can not be verified, and his remark that if Mr. LOWELL had applied to Mr. GLADSTONE a respite would have been at once granted is merely his opinion. Mr. LOWELL understands the duty of humanity and of an American representative quite as well as Mr. PRYOR, and it is very fortunate for this country that the American Minister in England has worthier motives of action than the desire to propitiate the most ignorant and un American sympathy in his own country. The cause of Ireland has not been aided by the crime of O'DONNELL, nor by the crimes in the Phœnix Park, nor by the impertinent interference of our Government, nor by the speech of Mr. PARNELL upon receiving the subscription. Mr. PARNELL'S vulgar abuse of officers of the government who are honestly endeavoring to carry out the measures of a ministry friendly to Ireland, and his threat to give the Irish Parliamentary vote to any party with which it can make the best terms—without regard, of course, to the principles of the party—will gain respect neither for the speaker nor for his cause.

But there are signs which show that English statesmen will pursue steadily the course of relief upon which they have entered, despite the taunts and threats of Irish leaders. No Englishman is more friendly to Ireland than Mr. FORSTER, and few Englishmen have been more hated there. Nevertheless, he advocates extending the proposed franchise bill to Ireland, which would increase its representation in Parliament. It is unfortunate for his country that Mr. PARNELL'S methods of agitation do not produce a different impression from that of most of the Irish agitations, except that of GRATTAN. However sorrowful the situation, and however imperative the necessity of relief, the agitation is always apparently maintained for the benefit of the agitators, not of the country. In the same way the Irish performances in Congress of Messrs. ROBINSON, COX, and HEWITT are humiliating to honorable and intelligent Americans. Whatever their real inspiration, they unfavorably impress the country as chiefly designed for effect upon the Irish-American vote. "If O'DONNELL," said a wise observer, "had been an American citizen of French or Bohemian birth, and had committed a cold-blooded murder, for which he had been lawfully tried and sentenced in Austria or Italy, Mr. HEWITT would not, in my judgment, have introduced a resolution of inquiry." That, however, as we have said of Mr. PRYOR, is but an opinion. But it is the opinion of a vast body of intelligent American citizens, and it only deepens their conviction that nothing would be more unwise and hazardous than to intrust the government to a party whose best members are capable of such conduct. An administration conducted with a view to pander to the Irish vote would readily involve this country in hostility with England; and that a Democratic administration would not hesitate at such servility the course of Mr. HEWITT shows.

REPEAL OF THE FOUR YEARS' LAW.

No friend of reform in the civil service expects to see a recurrence of the Annus Mirabilis like last year. The reform bill was passed by Congress and in this State in obedience to a great popular demand, and the principle of reform having been thus embodied in law, the next steps will be more fragmentary and less imposing. But the work which was begun a year ago is progressing admirably. The letters from Washington mention the great relief already found by members of Congress and by the incumbents of official places. Members are not besieged by the old host of office seekers, and the clerks in the departments do not fear removal to make room for fresher favorites of politicians. The Republican in the Senate, however, have displaced one or two clerical officers apparently for no adequate reason. We do not refer to the Secretaryship, which was vacant, and which has been admirably filled by the appointment of General MCCOOK. But if the Chief Clerk and the Sergeant-at-arms were efficient officers, there would seem to be no sounder reason for their dismissal than for that of equally efficient non political clerks and employes in the departments. Mr. SHERMAN'S remark that the Republicans were doing only what the Democrats had done was merely a declaration that bold pirates thought the victors entitled to the spoils. The party, not to say the cause, would have gained very much more by adherence to the spirit of the reform than it possibly can by the possession of the two or three places.

In the State of New York Governor CLEVELAND has most cordially co-operated with the Commission, which has made the first classified list of State employes, and prepared an admirable detailed scheme for carrying the law into effect on the 4th of January. The real position of the new State officers will then be tested. They will have time to make a clean sweep before the law goes into effect, if they are so disposed. Their course will be watched with interest. Mayor LOW, of Brooklyn, has promulgated his scheme and appointed his examiners. Mayor EDSON, of New York, has heartily approved the reform and has proposed a scheme not essentially different from that in Brooklyn, and he awaits the response of the other city officers. His authority is so restricted by the charter that his position is very difficult. But Mr. EDSON sees, as Mr. GRACE saw, that, under the present charter and with the spoils system, the almost extravagance and enormous frauds are almost unavoidable. What he can accomplish under the restrictions of the charter and the exceptions of the law remains to be seen. But there is no reason to doubt his earnest intention to do all that is possible. These are all great results, and we hope to see Massachusetts, at least, and other States, following the good example of New York, and adopting the reformed system.

The specific work to which the various associations composing the National Civil Service Reform League will now devote themselves is the repeal of the four years' acts. For this purpose they are preparing petitions which will be sent to Congress. The laws restricting to four years the terms of the commissions of the chief public officers who appoint the [illegible] body of clerks and employés tend to vacate the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] sons for that time, and to enable the appointing power to fill all the places at his pleasure without incurring the odium of removal. It is agreed that the object sought by the law—that is, greater responsibility and care—has not been attained, while the law has been the great bulwark of the spoils system. It is entirely inconsistent with the reformed system, which, selecting by proved capacity, and retaining unrestricted power of removal, determines the term by the efficiency and integrity of the service. Under such a system nothing is more absurd than to turn everybody out periodically, however clearly their service may have demonstrated the public advantage of retaining them. If the theory of such a proceeding is the desirability of new brooms, it is evident that the practice dispenses with good brooms. There can be no ambition, no self-respect, no interest in improvement, among men who know that the most faithful and successful service can not save them from being dropped. To say that they may be re-appointed is idle, for they may not, and, in fact, usually have not been re-appointed, while no folly is more exquisite than to prescribe a fixed term for a valuable employé without certain re-appointment, in which case the fixed term is absurd. It will be interesting to observe how the repeal of the four years' law fares in a Democratic House.

MERRY CHRISTMAS.

"God rest you, merry gentlemen!
Let nothing you dismay."

CHRISTMAS is a finer festival in the great city every year, and there is no prettier sight than the Christmas shops and the Christmas shopping. Fourteenth street, from Broadway to the Sixth Avenue, has been filled with a solid crowd from morning until night for a month, and the procession in MACY'S window has indefinitely prolonged the Christmas delight of thousands of children.

This is the season when the appeal of the Children's Aid Society is most timely and most persuasive. It is one of the oldest and best of our societies of relief, and the names of Mr. BRACE, the secretary, Mr. BOWEN, the president, and Mr. COE, the treasurer, are the guarantee of the honesty and efficiency of its service. Its Christmas offers are well worthy the attention of those who are looking out to find suitable gifts for the holidays.

One hundred dollars will send five homeless children to a home in the West. Sixty dollars will put shoes upon the bare feet of sixty children. The same amount will give a plain hot meal to a hundred children for a month. Or a hundred dollars will give a bountiful Christmas or New-Year's dinner to several hundred boys on a lodging-house. These are tempting offers, and the holiday air is sweet with the old maxim, Who lends it to the least of these doeth it to me.

THE NIAGARA PARK.

IT appears from the statement of President ANDERSON, of Rochester University, who is one of the Niagara Falls Park Commissioners, that the Commission is now engaged in the preparation of its report to the Legislature. It will state the cost of the land which has been condemned, and ask for the necessary appropriation to complete the purchase and establish the park.

The design does not contemplate elaborate treatment. It proposes to remove the unsightly structures which deform and destroy the beauty of the scene, and to restore so far as practicable the natural landscape, with simple walks, greensward, and trees. The present system of exorbitant fees which practically excludes poor people from the grounds will be abolished, and the residents at the Falls, excepting those who profit by these fees, are very friendly to the proposed rescue of the sublime spectacle of the cataract from practical destruction.

There ought, of course, to be no doubt of the passage of the appropriation which will be asked of the Legislature. There can not be the remotest suspicion of a job in any recommendation which the Commission may make, and the people of the State will have reason to congratulate themselves that a really great work, which will protect properly and forever the sublimest natural object in the commonwealth, will have been honorably and worthily accomplished.

MATTHEW ARNOLD AND EMERSON.

MR. MATTHEW ARNOLD'S lecture upon EMERSON has aroused a great deal of feeling in Boston, and there has been much adverse criticism, which has sometimes taken the form of personal retort. But nothing is more evident than Mr ARNOLD'S profound admiration and reverence for EMERSON, even if his estimate of his genius denies him the precise classification to which we have become accustomed. Mr. ARNOLD is certainly not the first to question whether EMERSON could be called a great philosophical writer, or, in the full sense, a great poet, and when he is unable to class him among great men of letters he gives the reason—which, however, seems to us quite insufficient. It is easy to understand Mr ARNOLD'S point of view, but in deny to the author of Nature and the Essays a place among the masters of literary art is like denying to MILTON the name of poet.

But while Mr ARNOLD makes critical distinctions and qualifications according to his standards, he certainly has the most adequate impression of the essential greatness of EMERSON'S power. To say that "EMERSON'S essays are the most important works done in prose" during this century, and that FRANKLIN and EMERSON are the "most distinctively and honorably American," and the "most original and valuable" of any authors, is not to depreciate EMERSON. But how a critic can deny to an author of whom he says this the praise of a great prose writer it is difficult to understand, unless he means that the American standard is very low, which is clearly not his intention. Would Mr. ARNOLD say of any of the masters whom he mentions—CICERO, PLATO, SWIFT, VOLTAIRE—that they have a more vigorous command of language or a more exquisite perception of the subtle force and significance than EMERSON? With any of them in literary expression more distinctly an art than with him, and in their works in those deeper earnestness or more spiritual insight than in his? Other qualities which are not in EMERSON they doubtless have, but is not no author who has these a great man of letters?

All this, however, seems to us to be skirmishing upon the surface. The whole spirit of the lecture, so far as it can be derived from a report, is plainly that of the sincerest expression of the essential greatness of EMERSON. Those who are inclined to resent the tone of the critic in dealing with his subject, and who are quick to credit any injurious story of no English visitor, may profitably ponder a little story which Mr HIGGINSON tells in the Women's Journal, in an article regretting Mr. ARNOLD'S criticism. It was stated in the newspapers that when Mr EMERSON'S daughter told Mr. ARNOLD that her father was sorry not to see him when in England, he answered, "Yes, I was told that he wished to see me." Incident — Yes, but the fact was, as a lady who heard the remark told Mr. HIGGINSON, that Mr. ARNOLD said, "Yes, I was told that he did me the honor to wish to see me." Nothing in essence than a perversion which entirely changes the significance of no answer.

TURNING ON THE LIGHT.

THE Tribune is doing a good service in exposing the dark ways of the Department of Public Works in the city of New York, and its details of amusement and its figures make a case so imperative that more denial will not avail. The personal reputation of the head of the department, a strong partisan, and one of the chiefs of the "County" or "Reform" Democracy, has been hitherto unassailed. But the charges marshalled by the Tribune day after day require a prompt, detailed, and clear explanation, which the Legislature will probably demand by ordering an investigation.

The Tribune gives a glimpse into a corner of one of the city departments which naturally startles the easy-going citizen who supposed, when TWEED was exposed and punished, in obedience to an "uprising of the people," that municipal government was purified. He naturally wonders whether the taint now disclosed runs through the whole municipal system.

The press can be a most efficient agent of reform if it does no more than tell the simple truth of the chaotic system of the government of this city. The system was contrived by a gang of robbers to enable them to steal more conveniently from the city Treasury, and a thorough survey and statement of it as it is should show the Legislature the necessity of radical reform of the whole system. This survey HARPER'S WEEKLY will immediately present in a manner which must command general attention, and which will be of especial service to the Legislature, and of the deepest interest to every good citizen. Those who have a hopeless feeling that the municipal snarl can not be unravelled, and that nothing can be done, will learn that careful and patient investigation, analysis, and comparison are equal to the task of showing just what a grotesque and intolerable system the municipal government is.

THE OLD STORY.

IT will not escape public attention that two or three days after the passage of Mr. HEWITT'S resolution bringing to the attention of the President the case of the Irish murderer O'DONNELL, and asking him to inquire whether he were a citizen of the United States, and if so whether the requirements of the local law had been complied with in his trial, Mr. HOUK, of Michigan, introduced a resolution, precisely similar in terms to that of Mr. HEWITT, in regard to the massacre of colored citizens at Danville, in Virginia.

Mr. MORRISON, of Illinois, at once objected, saying that the President knew as much of the matter as the House. But does Mr. MORRISON suppose that the President did not know quite as much about the case of O'DONNELL as the House? Or does he suppose that anybody supposes that if there had been an Irish massacre in Danville, Mr MORRISON would have objected to the consideration of the resolution?

PERSONAL.

AFTER playing Hamlet in Philadelphia, Mr HENRY IRVING said to a reporter: "Actors regard success in Hamlet as the blue ribbon of the stage. You may therefore imagine that I am more than delighted that the first time I played Hamlet in America it was received with such spontaneous enthusiasm. Neither Miss TERRY nor I ever acted to a more fervid house."

—Monsignor PREVI, it seems, does not see direct means on all occasions. "Dante," who refers to him as "this most agreeable person," testifies that though she saw him at one of her garden parties, and lunched with him once or twice afterward, "he never mentioned theology, and I never heard him preach."

—The conduct of the soldier under fire, observes Mr ARCHIBALD FORBES, in the grand test of true soldiership. The cramming records of needlessness moral and professional training is that when the bullets are humming and the shells are cranking the soldier shall be a composed, alert, disciplined unit of a mighty whole, whose purpose is victory. The marauding "Yank" philosophically remarked to General SHERMAN, "You can't expect all the cardinal virtues, uncle, for thirteen dollars a month." No, but you can get a good many of the simpler martial virtues for less money.

—A veteran New York financier was much amused the other day to find, in some household rubbish, an old school-book called Epitome Sacra, and to me as a fly-leaf, in his early handwriting, the lines,

"Steal not this book, my honest friend,
For fear the gallows will be your end:
Up the ladder, down the rope,
That's the way for thieves will choke."

—The dolorous HAYES, MAGGIE'S successor as bourgeon, has been accused of drunkenness at a recent execution. He answers the charge as follows: "It is not true that I was the worse for drink. I got straight up out of bed, had my breakfast, and went to the jail. No man can say he ever saw HAYES that morning, or the day before, take a drop of drink." The question still remains whether HAYES is in any on the sly.

—The writer of a magazine article on social life at Washington declares that a politician is not aided by social influences at the capital. The strength which a member of Congress has with an administration depends on his standing at home. All the allurements of beauty, all the charm of the most delightful hospitality, can not alone advance a politician to the cabinet. Back of all the attractions that may surround a public man must stand heavy masses of voters, who can repay the administration for the favors bestowed upon their "favorite son."

—Portraits of three American statesmen appear in the number of this journal. General ANSON G. MCCOOK, a member of the family of "fighting McCooks," is a brave soldier and a wise legislator. Senator SAWYER, the new Chairman of the Republican National Committee, has served several terms in the Legislature of his State, and is a shrewd and successful business man, with no pretensions to forensic oratory. The late Representative D. C. HASKELL, of Kansas, was a quartermaster in the late war, a popular speaker, and an enlightened student of the grave public questions of the day.

—Private theatricals, according to an English exchange, have nearly lost their character of privacy. Even amateur companies consisting of ladies and gentlemen performs in public society has become stage struck, and ladies and gentlemen are taking to the stage. "We hope the rising caste for amateur acting will be kept within reasonable bounds, and that it will be a long time before the stage is inundated with men who, if ladies, could have done better anywhere else, and if men, should rather have taken to the forest or the prairie."

—ANTHONY TROLLOPE as JULIAN HAWTHORNE saw him in 1879: A broad-shouldered, sturdy man of middle height, with a ruddy countenance, and snow white temperament beard and hair. He wore large gold-rimmed spectacles, but his eyes were black and brilliant, and looked at his interlocutor with a certain genial fury of inspection. His voice was full-toned and powerful, though pleasant to the ear, and his words burst forth from beneath his white mustache with such an impetus of hearty breath that it seemed as if all opposing arguments must be blown quite away. He was an exceedingly fine looking old gentleman, and at the first glance you would have taken him to be some civilized and most refined Squire Western, nourished with beef and ale, and roseate hues not of the most robust and least refined variety of human clay.

—The London Standard in a recent biography of GEORGE WASHINGTON: "The character of WASHINGTON was a very noble one, and his life may well be taken as an example for boys."

—They able and conspicuous member of the GLADSTONE cabinet, Mr CHAMBERLAIN, caused much laughter and many cheers by closing a public address on the present issue "between the peers and the people, between the privileges of the few and the rights of the many," as follows: "I am inclined to hope, in the words of that beautiful Church litany which is read every Sunday, that all the nobility may be endued with grace, wisdom, and understanding."

—Almost all the Mormon converts made in Europe are Anglo Scandinavians and Germans. The Latin races are uncompromisingly opposed to Mormonism, and not one French woman is to be found among the wives of Utah.

—That fine old captain of a packet-ship, the late EDWARD FOX, whose funeral took place a few days ago, was one of the few officers of the American merchant marine of forty years ago who had no bad habits. He did not even swear, and it was his daily practice when at home to read from the Book of Common Prayer in the presence of his family. With the exception of Captain W. W. PELL, of Brooklyn, he was the sole surviving commander of the line of packets that used to ply between this city and Havre.

—Next year will be the hundredth anniversary of the old Volunteer Fire Department of New York city, and it is proposed by several of the most distinguished members of that famous organization to celebrate the event with becoming honors. Every surviving engine, hose-carriage, or truck that once ran to the music of the brave will be brought into service again, and Broadway will see an old-fashioned firemen's parade.

—The death last week of an aged woman who for forty-six years had been a faithful servant in a New York family will remind some of our readers that in earlier days their household service was more nearly satisfactory than at the present epoch of Celtic domination.

—The Hon. GAMALIEL PAINE is the owner of Mr E. D. PALMER'S full-length marble statue of a female savage, entitled "The Dawn of Christianity," the woman bending reverently over a cross which she holds in her hand. Her nude back is modelled so pictorially that the late Mr EDWARD KEMBLE, an ecstatic, told Mr PAINE that it was "the finest thing of the kind in existence." Mr PAINE'S drawing-room has recently been handsomely decorated by LOCKE C. TIFFANY & CO.

—Sir WILFRID LAWSON thinks that when electioneering is carried on in a way that appeals to men's reason, and not to their passions and pockets, it is one of the best parents in which men can engage.

—In discussing the relations of morality to religion, Professor A. A. HODGE, of Princeton observes: "We do not deny the existence in this day of exceptionally lovely characters who are skeptical—often most sadly so—to all religious truth, natural and revealed. We deem, however, that these prove that morality is independent of religion. Morality in them, as in all others, has its root in theology, and their cases are easily explainable on the scientific principles of heredity, education, and environment."

—Dr. R. W. RICHARDSON has been investigating the subject of felicity. He finds that felicity is not seated in the brain; in other words, that it is not a quality which a man can think himself into, or reason himself into. Rather, like the bearing of the heart, it is a vital process going on independently of his volition. He can kill it, but he can not will himself into it. Moreover, of the two natures with which man is endowed—the pure animal and the pure intellectual natures—felicity belongs to his animal nature. "Felicity and misery are the signs of his still existing animal nature."

—The receipts at the Théâtre Français, Paris, for the year 1882-3 were 3,381,000, which shows a slight falling off, at the Grand Opera-house they were 613,250, or 80,000 less than last year. The value of the scenery and appointments of the twenty-eight operas put on the stage was 950,000. The dramatic company of the Théâtre Français consists of fifty-seven artists, of whom twenty-five are sociétaires and thirty-two pensionnaires. The play most frequently repeated was Le Roi s'Amuse, which was seen forty-eight times. The government will give 160,000 to the Grand Opera the ensuing year, and 48,000 to the Théâtre Français.

—The difficulty that women encounter in obtaining remunerative employment may be illustrated by the following case. Last week an educated and refined woman, with the advantages of a good presence and a letter of recommendation from a Monsignor in the Catholic Church, succeeded, after much diligence, in getting the offer of a position as clerk behind a ten counter in a large fancy-goods store in this city, at a stipend of four dollars a week, the position to be retained only during the holidays. We are assured that this case is a typical one. Perhaps one reason why the outlook in this direction is so discouraging appears in the following incident. A young woman of manners, attractive but needy, obtained a situation as folder in a printing-office through the exertion of a benevolent acquaintance. On the first day she appeared at 9.30 o'clock, and earned a dollar. On the second day she appeared at 10.30 o'clock, and earned fifty cents. On the third day she did not appear at all. The kind-hearted person on whom she was indebted for this opportunity of making an honest living declares herself disinclined to do anything more for the irresolute and careless damsel.

THE CATASTROPHE COMES.

Harry and I were thus left in sole possession of the field, and it became necessary that one or other of us should speak. He it was who broke the silence presently, in a steady though somewhat hoarse voice:

"I suppose you believe that cock and bull story?"

I glanced across the table at him, but his lowered eyes refused to meet mine. His face, colorless as usual, betrayed no emotion; only the hand with which he was stroking his mustache trembled slightly.

"Yes," I answered, "I believe it."

"Nevertheless," remarked Harry, "the evidence of a tipsy woman ought not to be considered conclusive, and the story in itself seems rather far-fetched. Taking it for granted that I wished to stand in your shoes, you are asked to believe that, instead of profiting by your own readiness to help me, I fell back upon a very dubious sort of plot, which might have been discovered at any moment, and was sure to be discovered in the long run. The thing does not sound probable."

"I don't know that it matters much whether it is probable or improbable," I said. "The question is whether it occurred."

"Apparently there is no question about that in your mind. Well, you are quite right. I have lost the game, and I don't mind your seeing my hand. I did fully intend to do all that Pauline said. I thought that Lady Constance, who is fearfully hard up, and who, I believe, has a real weakness for me, might be induced to marry you under the case, if I could persuade her that my father would certainly provide you with a sufficient income as soon as the marriage was an accomplished fact. I thought, too, that he would do a great deal to prevent that marriage, and that a will naming me as his heir would strike him in the light of a telling move. His attorney would probably prevent him from destroying it when once it was made. It was chance-work, of course; but it seemed just worth while to make the attempt, especially as I knew that you had strengthened your position by your ridiculous efforts to gain a pardon for me. As it happened, you know, I was not called upon to go on with the thing; but I still think that it might have succeeded."

"WHILE MAUD HERN SPEAKING, I HAD BEEN LYING ON THE GROUND AT HER FEET, AND LOOKING UP INTO HER BEAUTIFUL FACE, WHICH WAS HALF TURNED AWAY FROM ME."

The cool impudence of the man fairly astounded me and deprived me, for the moment, of the use of my tongue.

"Do you mean me to understand," I exclaimed, indignantly, at last, "that all your protestations of gratitude and affection, and I don't know what else, were so many lies? Your preferring trickery to plain dealing I don't so much wonder at, since it seems that you have an invincible love for that sort of thing; but I can't for the life of me see why you should have made all that pretense of friendship."

"Well, if I hadn't, I should have had no opportunity of getting you and Lady Constance married, you know," answered Harze, with perfect composure.

I was half inclined to walk round the table and give him the thrashing he deserved, but I perceived that, under all the circumstances, such a course was scarcely practicable, so I contented myself with saying, "You are far and away the greatest scoundrel I ever saw or heard of."

Harry laughed a little. "Quite so," he said. "And afterward? I told you, when we first met, that I was a scoundrel. By the way, what Paulina said about my going to Germany on purpose to look you up was nonsense. It is true that I knew you were at Frankenthale, and, having to go there upon business of my own, I thought it might be as well to make your acquaintance, with a view to getting a rather larger allowance out of my father, if it could be managed. I had no idea of supplanting you at that time. Come, Charley," he added, in a slightly altered tone, "I am not altogether an black, nor as good an actor, as I have made myself out. I did feel grateful to you for asking me father to throw you over and put me in your place—though, between ourselves, that was rather a cheap piece of generosity, for you can't have been quite so simple as to suppose that he would take you at your word, still I gave you credit for a certain degree of sincerity. And from the first I always had, and I have still, a real liking for you."

"And yet," I remarked, "you would have married me to Lady Constance to serve your own ends, although you knew you would be sending me to what was at all events, would entender a life of poverty and misery."

Harry shrugged his shoulders. "I assure you I deplored the necessity," answered he.

"I wonder what the General is about?" I sighed, after a long silence.

"Dear me! don't you know?" said Harry. "He is closeted with my father somewhere, holding a council of war, and urging the expediency of prompt and vigorous action. He will come in here presently, you'll see, to tell me that the up-express leaves at 11.15 to-morrow morning, if only trust he won't add that my allowance is to be reduced; but I have no fears."

It was past ten o'clock when the General came in, with a grave and rather pertinacious face.

"My brother has sent me to make a proposition to you," he said to Harry. "I don't approve of it myself, but I can't get him to see the matter as I do, and I am to lay his suggestion before you. I suppose you will be prepared to hear that he has given up all idea of leaving Thrifby to you."

Harry nodded.

"And also that he thinks it would be for everybody's comfort that you should leave as soon as possible."

"Certainly," answered Harry. "It only remains for us to take ourselves off the first thing to the morning, and never be heard of again."

"I should say so," agreed the General. "To my mind that would be beyond all comparison the most satisfactory way up at the business. But Bernard, unfortunately, holds a rather different opinion. He doesn't consider himself justified in visiting the sins of the father upon the child, therefore he proposes, with your consent, to adopt the child, but only upon the distinct understanding that you resign all rights, present and future, over him, and that he becomes, as it were, my brother's son instead of yours."

"And suppose I decline this offer?" said Harry.

"Well, if you decline," answered the General, heightening visibly, "the property goes to Charley, and though the boy might come down here upon a visit every now and then, he would inherit nothing at my brother's death beyond the reversion of the sum which you have to expect. This appears to me to be to every way the most proper and suitable arrangement."

"Ah!" said Harry, "but, you see, I don't think I shall decline. If I agree to this, may I ask whether Jimmy would be allowed to come and see me, and if so, how often he the year?"

"He would not be allowed to see you at all," replied the General, curtly. "In fact, from the moment that you signed the agreement, you and his mother would cease to exist so far as he was concerned."

Harry flushed slightly. "Hard terms!—devilish hard terms!" he muttered.

"I dare say. I am not called upon to give an opinion as to that. You must judge for yourself whether you are entitled to expect easy terms, and also whether it would be for your son's advantage or not to be removed from his parents. There's the offer—you can take it or leave it."

Harry pushed back his chair, sprang to his feet, and began pacing up and down the room with quick, irregular steps. Presently he paused beside the table, his face convulsed by a curious smile. "It's a refined revenge," said he.

"Not at all," resumed the General; "it's an attempt to do justice, which you are not bound to take advantage of. Though I imagine that you will," he added, with a sigh.

"Damn it all, sir!" broke out Harry, fiercely, "do you suppose that, because I am this, that, and t'other, I have ceased to be a human being? Does a man become blind when he loses his bearing, or deaf when he loses his sight?"

"All this is quite beside the mark," answered the General, coldly, though he looked a little shamefaced, I thought. "It was my brother's wish that I should put the two alternatives before you, and I have done so. All I have to add is that there can be no compromise."

"Then tell him that I accept his infernal office!" cried Harry. "He knows, and so do you, that I can't refuse. The boy is all I have to care for in the world, and I care for him enough to let him go. His mother will be glad to get rid of him, and he'll soon forget us both, I dare say. I am sorry for Charley, who is left out in the cold, but I am a great deal more sorry for myself. However, there's not much good in talking. Go and tell him that I accept."

The General bowed. "I have drawn up a draft agreement for your signature," he said. "Perhaps you will come with me into the study and put your name to it. If a more formal document is required, the lawyers will see to that in a day or so, though I doubt whether any legal contract could be made in such a matter."

"Thank you, I'll sign here," answered Harry. "I don't want to see my father any more as long as I live."

The General bowed again. "There is no necessity for your meeting that I am aware of," he said. "I will go and fetch the paper."

"I wish to God I had never come near this cursed place!" exclaimed Harry, as soon as he was gone. "You may say that it serves me right, and perhaps it does, but that's cold comfort."

The General came back, bearing a half-sheet of foolscap and a pen, which he handed to Harry. "I am to tell you," said he, "that you can take a couple of days for considerations, if you choose."

Harry seized the pen and scrawled his name at the foot of the agreement, without deigning to reply. Then he tossed the paper over to the General, saying, "There! When you give that to my father you may tell him that he can draw comparisons between me and himself as his leisure. We have both of us discarded an only son; but he backed his out of doors because he hated him, whereas I have renounced mine because I love him. Sounds odd, doesn't it?—considering which a very good and virtuous man he is, and what an unmitigated ruffian I am. Perhaps his books of philosophy may help him to solve the problem."

The General, who had assumed a demeanor of cold indignity, only replied, "I am not here to undertake my brother's defense, and I think you are forgetting that you have very good reasons for dreaming you out in the first instance, and that, since you have been here this time you have had an opportunity of convincing him that he was right."

"Right?—oh, to be sure he was right," returned Harry, with a laugh. "He has always been right; and that, I suppose, is why he finds it difficult to make the smallest allowance for people who are occasionally wrong. He is quite right, for instance, in removing an innocent child from the contagion of bad example. And yet, such is my ingratitude and perversity that, so far from admiring him for this last performance of his, I consider it to be, upon the whole, about the most cold-blooded piece of malignity I ever heard of."

And, without bidding either of us good night, Harry turned on his heel and left the room.

CHAPTER XXXV

MY CHILD WISHES ME GOOD LUCK.

All my life I have been, in a humble sort of way, an observer of human character, and have taken such opportunities as have come to me of noticing its various developments under various conditions, but I have never been favored far enough by love of this kind of study to enjoy the spectacle of misery or disgrace. When, therefore, I woke up on the morning that was to witness the expulsion of Harry and Paulina from Thrifby, I became seized with a longing to run away on irresistible that I stole down the back stairs, requisitioned some bread and cheese which I found in the kitchen, and was half-way across the park, with my rod and fishing-basket, before I had time to reason with myself as to the propriety of such a line of conduct.

I spent what, under any other circumstances, would have been a very pleasant morning, and did not make for home again until after two o'clock, thus avoiding luncheon, as well as the distressing scene which I felt sure must have preceded that meal. As I was crossing the park, the General, walking briskly and swinging his stick, overtook me.

"Well, Charley," said he, somewhat unsteadily, "is it all over? Our friends off and away, eh?"

"That is the very question," I answered, "that I was going to put to you. I haven't seen a soul, except Bunce, to-day. The truth is that I funked it, and locked before breakfast."

"There are two of us, then," observed the General, laughing. "While I was dressing I thought as much; that any presence wouldn't be required, and I didn't much want to see that unfortunate chap say good by to his son, you know, so I just walked over to have a chat with Dennison, and I have been at the Rectory ever since. I think it was rather shabby of me to shirk away like that, Charley; I expected to hear from you how it all went off."

"And I expected to hear the same thing from you," returned I, "so it's even."

I suppose we were both rather ashamed of ourselves, for we continued to exchange repartees until we reached the house, where Mrs Farquhar gave us a tearful and confused account of what had occurred. It seemed that Harry had behaved very well, but that Paulina, whose wrath of the previous evening had completely evaporated, had made a dreadful disturbance, accusing herself of having ruined her husband, offering to go away without him, and displaying a lamentable want of reticence before the servants. It had been thought better not to let Jimmy know that he would see his parents no more, and he had submitted to the parting with the utmost philosophy.

"It's an awful responsibility to have taken," concluded Mrs Farquhar, sobbing, "and I can but pray that Bernard may not be called upon to give an account of it at the last day. I wash my hands of it—I've done my best—but, oh! he's a headstrong man!"

There was some comfort in hearing Mrs Farquhar making an accusation which she assuredly would not have phrased in that way a few days before. Her manner, even more than her words, showed she had at last discovered my uncle to be a somewhat different person from what she had hitherto imagined, and there seemed ground for hope that she might entertain a salutary awe of him for the future. I left her appealing to the General to say whether events like these were not calculated to bring her gray hairs down with sorrow to the grave, and betook myself to the study, which my uncle's voice, in answer to my knock, at once bade me enter.

He here lighted up when he saw me. "Ah, Charley," he said, "I have been waiting a long time for you. Come and sit down here. I owe you an explanation."

I took a chair beside him, as he asked me, but assured him that he owed me nothing.

"Yes," he said, with a smile, "I don't think you would be satisfied if I kept silence."

"Not if you kept silence about it all," I confessed, "but I thought you meant that something ought to be said about me not inheriting the property."

"Well, so I do. Something must be said about that, undoubtedly."

"Not very much, then. We agreed upon that point long ago, and I am sure you have done the right thing in adopting Jimmy. Very likely you have done the right thing all through; but I can't help feeling a little uneasy about it, somehow."

"In what sense?"

"Only that one doesn't like to think of a father and child being separated forever. Upon the face of it, it does seem rather cruel."

"The necessity, no doubt, is cruel," answered my uncle, gravely; "but it does not appear to me that it is the instrument of necessity, any more cruel than the surgeon who cuts off a diseased limb. Of course it would have been easier and pleasanter not to perform the operation. I don't forget that, such as Harry is, I am in a great measure responsible for him. If I had only myself to think about, I should have no business to drive him away because he is what he is, or because he has a wife who drinks. But I am not to make fresh mistakes by way of atoning for old ones which can never be repaired now. For the boy's own sake, as well as for the sake of our name and of those who have to follow me, I am bound to do all he my power to bring him up as a gentleman and a man of honor, and I ask you, would the example of his father and mother be likely to do him good?"

"Do you think it would really do him so very much harm?" I said, for my uncle's deliberate utterances had to me an enervating effect.

"I don't feel the smallest doubt about it," he answered; "you can't both pinch and escape degilement. Very likely if I were to allow the boy to go to his parents for a week or two every now and then, they would be open their good behavior before him, they would try to avoid scandals and to live decently, or seem to live decently, while he was with them. But one of them, at least, could never change his nature, and I don't see how it would be possible for a growing lad to associate with him and not be the worse for it. Of course," he added, after a pause, "there are loads of obvious objections to the plan that I have decided upon, but I have come to the conclusion that there could be worse objections to any other plan that could have been devised."

"What do you mean to say to Jimmy himself about it?" I inquired.

"That is a great difficulty, I allow. Happily, children have short memories, and are soon consoled. My hope is that he will like his new life well enough to accept it without many questions. As he grows older he will naturally wish for more information, and then he will have to be told the truth."

"Quite so; and then—unless he grows up very unlike other mortals—he will take his father's part."

"I dare say he may. When he is grown up there will be no objection to his meeting his father; only, as I shall take care that he will be able to do little or nothing for his father, in a pecuniary sense, either before or after my death, I think we may fairly doubt whether his advances will be responded to."

"What an awfully bad opinion you have of Harry!" I exclaimed.

"Have you a good opinion of him?"

"No, but let us give the devil his due. I think he is fond of Jimmy. He has shown it by giving the boy up; because, or you say, he can never get any personal profit out of the arrangement."

My uncle looked troubled, and sighed. "That is true," he answered. "It is a bad business. All I can say is that compromises would only have turned it into a worse one. And although I don't want to evade the responsibility of having suggested the present solution, I may remind you that Harry agreed to it of his own free will. Had he chosen otherwise, I should have been better pleased. We might then have had Jimmy down here as much as possible, and among us, I think, we might have made something of him. Only, in that case, I should not have ventured to run the risk of making him my heir."

After this there was a rather long pause, during which my uncle fidgeted with the books and papers that were lying on the table before him. I knew what he was thinking about, and that he was waiting for me to open the subject which was uppermost in both our minds; but I was extremely reluctant to say the first word, and it was only when I saw that he would not speak at all, unless I did, that I began.

"Was what Paulina said last night true—that Harry wrote to you about me and Lady Constance Milner?"

"Oh yes," answered my uncle. "He wrote anonymously to begin with, and afterward he was careful that full reports of your proceedings should reach me through my mother. The whole thing was sufficiently silly and contemptible, and I need hardly say that I saw through it from the first. The result of it, however, he added, smiling, "is that I could give a tolerably accurate account of your relations with this lady from the time that George Warren first came to see about her up to a recent date."

"Why have you never said anything to me?" I asked.

"I thought perhaps you would say something to me," answered my uncle.

I confessed that I had been ashamed to speak. I said, "I knew what you must think of me. I told you, before I went abroad, that I should never change, and then, almost immediately, I did change—the doesn't like to acknowledge one's self a weather-cock."

"I fancy that most men would have to make that acknowledgment, if we lived in a Palace of Truth," observed my uncle. "If there had been an engagement between you and Miss Maud, the case would have been altogether different, but as there was none, I don't see that you have any serious sin to reproach yourself with. What I should like to know, if you don't object to telling me, is whether you have chosen finally now."

"I am not sure," I answered, emboldened into saying about what I had hitherto hardly ventured to say to myself. "When I am away from her I sometimes think that it has been all a mistake; but as soon as I see her again I feel as if I had no will of my own, and must do whatever she tells me. It seems like awful bosh, I know," I continued, cheerfully, "but I can't help thinking that she has some way of mesmerizing me."

"That sounds very uncomfortable," remarked my uncle. "Do you suppose that she has any—affection for you, or is she only amusing herself with those mesmeric performances?"

I replied that I hadn't the slightest idea. I did not believe that she was merely amusing herself, but, on the other hand, I could see no that I had any reason to suspect her of being in love with me. "However, in all equities very little now," I concluded, "because she will certainly decline to marry me when she learns that I am not to have Thrifby."

"Pear!—if you are quite sure of that, Charley, I should strongly recommend you not to see her again," said my uncle. "From what you tell me, I doubt whether either of you will be broken-hearted."

I explained that this course, however advisable in the abstract, would not be adopted by me, as I had already promised to meet Lady Constance Milner in Yorkshire. "It will be our last meeting, most likely," I added, sadly.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

I MAKE A DISCOVERY.

When I left my uncle's study it was already past four o'clock, and I had not forgotten an appointment to meet Maud at five. I strolled down toward the place agreed upon, wondering what my uncle would think if he knew whether I was bound, and wondering still more what Maud would say to me. She would, of course, have heard the news from the General, and perhaps she might not now think it necessary to greet me at all. As a foreboding of this possibility crossed my mind, I became aware that I should be very much disappointed if it were fulfilled.

I made instinctively for the spot where Maud and I had parted two years before, and which I had never revisited until now. Everything was startlingly unchanged. There was the old pane, resting away slowly in its old position; the osiers had not been thinned, nor the reeds mowed with. I could even hear the ducks hard by in the decoy which Bunce and I had constructed together so long ago. And while I stood gazing at the far-away opposite shore, and thinking that I would give ten years of my life to obliterate the last two and start afresh, I heard a rustle behind me, and turning round, saw the figure that had been wearing to render the resurrection of the dead part complete.

Maud had not mentioned any particular part of the water-side as being the scene of her evening walks, as this was a spot somewhat difficult to reach at times; yet I had felt sure that it was here that we should meet, and now she was standing at my elbow, looking at me with grave, sorrowful eyes.

I couldn't help it—I knew it was wrong—but, as I held her hand, I murmured, "Do you remember?"

She nodded. "Have you been here since?" she asked.

"Never. And you?"

"No, this is the first time. Have you altered it off is?"

"Yes," said I, sadly; "nothing is changed, except—"

"Except everything," she interrupted, hastily. "Suppose we go somewhere else."

She turned as she spoke, and brushing through the reeds and undergrowth, made her way into the track of the woods, I following her. After a time we came to the fallen trunk of a tree, upon which she seated herself, remarking:

"So it is all over, and settled: I had prayed, a great many very sensible things to say to you; but they will have to remain unsaid. There is nothing to be done now but to make the best of it."

"You don't look pleased," I observed.

"As far as I can make out, nobody is pleased," she returned. "General Le Marchant is not; he says his brother is not; Mrs. Farquhar, it appears, is in the depths of woe; and as for your cousin and his wife, one can imagine what their feelings are likely to be. Really, I don't know who is pleased—unless you have the perversity to tell me that you are."

"I am a good deal better pleased than I was yesterday afternoon, anyhow," said I. "I little thought then that we should have taken a final leave of Harry and Paulina within twenty-four hours. And I believe, upon the whole, I am glad that Jimmy is to take up his abode here. He will be a companion for my uncle, and I dare say he won't miss his father very much. One can't wish that he should."

"His father," observed Maud, "appears to have got his deserts; and now that he has been kicked off into space, one may allow one's self to feel a little sorry for him, perhaps. Only I wish he had seen fit to take his child with him. General Le Marchant says they would have been quite comfortably off, and he thinks your uncle was a good deal taken aback when his offer was accepted. However, the thing is done now, and can't be undone."

"I, for one, have no wish to undo it."

"That is nonsense, Charley!" exclaimed Maud, drawing her brows together. "One may bear misfortunes, and put a good face upon them; but I never yet heard of anybody who said he liked them."

I submitted that it was not always so easy to tell what were and what were not misfortunes.

"I can't see much difficulty in the present instance," Maud declared; "and though you won't say that you are disgusted, I haven't the slightest objection to acknowledge that I am. All this long time I have watched Mrs. Farquhar busily building up her plot, bit by bit, dropping little doses of calumny here and there, sighing over Tom as a reprobate, and letting fall mysterious hints about 'poor dear Bernard,' and 'poor dear Harry,' and the obstinacy of the one and the wrongs and repentance of the other; and I have consoled myself by thinking that the truth would certainly come out one of these fine days. Now the truth has come out at last, and after all the wrong side wins! One can't blame anybody either, which adds to the bitterness of one's disappointment." She ceased for a moment, and then resumed: "My regrets are chiefly unselfish, and if you don't share them, so much the better. But you told me in London that your engagement to Lady Constance Milner would be broken off if you were disinherited, and surely you will allow that to be a misfortune."

While Maud had been speaking I had been lying on the ground at her feet, and looking into her beautiful face, which was half turned away from me. I heard what she said, but I paid little attention to it; for, as I lay there listening to her, I was recalling the regretful expression I had seen in her eyes at the moment of our meeting; I was thinking, as I had often thought before, of George Warren's prophetic words, and I was admitting to myself for the first time that they were true. A pale gleam of sunshine escaped from the clouds, and penetrated the open the thick foliage overhead. It seemed to me like a presage of brighter things. All that had happened in the past two years appeared on a sudden to have had no actual existence. I awoke from my long dream, and knew that in truth I had never ceased to love Maud at all.

From the mingled pleasure and pain of this swift discovery I was roused by the sound of Lady Constance Milner's name, and I said, quickly, "I am not engaged to Lady Constance, and if I were, I should think it anything but a misfortune that the engagement would now have come to an end."

"What do you mean?" exclaimed Maud, rather impatiently.

"Exactly what I say," I replied. "I have come to my senses, that's all. One afternoon—it was among the ruins of an old Greek theatre in Sicily—I lost my head and I thought I had lost my heart too. Ever since then I have been nursing that delusion. It has required a good deal of nursing at times, but at last I am quit of it. I know now that I have never really been in love with Lady Constance."

Maud shifted her position a little, so as to face me. "And pray when did you find this out?" she asked.

"About five minutes ago, I think," answered I.

She either did not understand me or did not choose to do so. She rose from the log upon which she had been seated, stood for an instant, looking away from me, and then—

"You will think differently after you have seen her again, perhaps," she said. "Shall we walk on? I can't stay out late this evening."

We passed through the trees in single file, neither of us speaking for some little time; but at length Maud stopped, and faced about abruptly.

"I wish you wouldn't talk as you have taken to doing lately," she said. "You are not a bit like what you used to be. You seem anxious to make me believe that you don't care a straw about anything."

That was not quite the effect that I had intended to produce; but I only answered, "I don't care very much about having lost Thirlby, I confess; and, after what I said just now, you must see that I can't care very much about the consequences of my having lost it either."

"You had no business to say what you did just now," she returned.

"But if it was true?"

"It can not be true," replied Maud, with a touch of anger.

"But it is," I persisted.

"Then," said she drily, "I don't envy you the duty of telling Lady Constance the truth."

"I don't think I shall be called upon to tell her anything beyond the fact of Jimmy's promotion," I said. "That will be quite conclusive."

"And yet," remarked Maud, thoughtfully, "she must care a good deal for you, or she would not have thought of marrying you upon the strength of your expectations. What if she were to say that she was willing to take you as you are?"

"She won't."

"But supposing that she did?"

"Well, in such a case," I replied, "I don't think I could draw back. I don't think I could tell her that I found I had made a mistake. No; I should have to go on with it then, and forever hold my peace."

"Come!" cried Maud, "I am glad to hear you say that. That is the first satisfactory thing that you have said this afternoon. And do you know, I should not be very much surprised if she did consent to marry you, in spite of all your poverty."

"You don't know Lady Constance," I said. "She will never consent to marry a poor man. If she is in one of her softer moods, she will perhaps express some regret; but she will certainly send me about my business. And so, you see," I added, "the misfortune you were speaking of may turn out to be no misfortune after all."

Maud walked on without replying. As soon as we had emerged from the wood, and I could step up to her side, I asked her why she should wish me to marry a woman whom I did not love.

"I never said that I wished that," she answered; "I was only glad to hear that you recognized some sort of obligation in the matter. If you change about in the way that you say you do, it is no fault of yours, perhaps—I suppose you can't help it—but I think you ought to understand that everybody is not like that. Now I must say good-by, for I promised to go and see one or two poor people before dinner."

Had her words a double meaning? If they had, I could well afford to put up with a rebuke which my conscience told me was not undeserved. Her manner was decidedly colder than it had been at the beginning of our interview; but I was not surprised at that, nor was I discouraged. I watched her out of sight, and then walked homeward with a light heart, for I thought to myself, "Come what may, I have at least found my liberty again."

And the condition of London represents that of all great cities. Paris, Naples, and Vienna are even worse off. Berlin and Liverpool are centres of numberless want. If we cross the ocean, we find that the spectre of human misery haunts us still. Our finest cities, Boston and Philadelphia, Chicago or New York, still echo the "outcry of the outcast." Our freedom, our boundless charity, have failed to shield us from these scenes of hopeless woe.

It is something, at least, that we have begun to see our danger. It is time that we prepare to ward off from the New World the [illegible] that appears so terrible in the [illegible]. In [illegible] and Paris the evil is partly attributed to overcrowding. The Paris municipality proposes to throw down its walls and extend the space allotted to the homes of the working classes. In London, philanthropists, almost hopeless in the presence of so much of human degradation, are still looking for its removal in better homes and a general education. But it is remarkable how religion, philanthropy, and every form of active benevolence have in all past ages failed wholly to extirpate human want. Charity in the Middle Ages produced only a general beggary. Charity in the time of Sir Thomas More was only a cloak for clerical selfishness. His Utopia is a bitter satire on the cruelty of priests and kings. Charity in the opening of the century had left Europe a land of misery. Charity, boundless as it is in London and New York, has failed to reach its aim; men, women, children, still perish of want in cities that boast of their wealth and splendor.

The problem is an unsolved one. Is it not left for us to solve? There is no doubt that charity fails of its aim because it is never judiciously organized and directed. Sectarian, philanthropic, and almost every other form of alms-giving is pursued in a costly, careless way; the expenses of collection and distribution sometimes consume the income, as is often the case in London; or the great number of small charitable institutions impede and clash with each other, as in New York. It is plain that charity wants a definite organization and a clear aim. It must provide improved homes, free air, a pure moral influence, for those it would aid; it must possess a government as wide as the nation itself, or at least the city it would benefit. Can we not have a "Society of the Public Good"—a league of the charitable in every city, from ocean to ocean, to discuss, determine, and carry out with energy the plans it may approve of? In this way New York would unite with New Orleans, Boston with San Francisco, and a higher aim be given to the people.

In the hundredth year of our freedom we seem pledged to such a scheme. It was the promise of our forefathers that the crimes and want of the Old World should be banished from the New. The promise is not fulfilled. It is in part our fault. Let us listen on this glad anniversary season to the "outcry of the outcast," and bring all our intelligence to their relief.

THE BELLS OF TRINITY.

The bells of Trinity ring out,
And far and wide their music ring;
Above the noise and tramp and shout,
Between the earth and heavens they ring
A moment stay
Upon your way,
And hear them say:
"Chime, happy bells, all strife above—
Chime, chime, 'The Bread of Life is Love.'"

The bells of Trinity ring out
Like tongues of angels, glad and strong,
The [illegible]
The[illegible] pushing.
A moment stay
Upon your way
And hear them say.
[illegible]
[illegible] 'The [illegible] of Life is Work.'

The bells of Trinity ring glad,
Ring hope[illegible] grief.
And [illegible] with [illegible] and [illegible] sweet relief.
Hope on! they say,
The dawning day
[illegible]
If [illegible] and thorns in the stalls,
Then Hope, for Hope's the Stream of Life.'

The bells of Trinity ring clear
Above the sounds of trade and gain,
And weak souls halting in their fear,
Perchance may hear this bolder strain:
"[illegible] from grief,
Time brings relief—
The watch is brief.
Hold on, be patient in the strife
For Patience is the Strength of Life."

The bells of Trinity ring sweet
Ah! gentle soul of one dear near,
Perchance may drop into the street
Some tones as natural and clear
That day by day
Upon your way
Your soul shall say,
I know though I be true and strong,
The Sunshine of my Life is Song."

The bells of Trinity ring high,
Ring far and wide, ring east and west,
O toiling men that fear and sigh,
Hear what they say, and be at rest:
"True hearts, good cheer!
There is no fear,
For God is near;
However hard and dark the strife,
Trust Him: Faith is the Light of Life."

BOSTON'S NEW MAYOR.

GENERAL AUGUSTUS P. MARTIN, the Citizens' candidate, who, without spending a dollar or soliciting a vote, has been elected Mayor of Boston, is widely known among business men, and is exceedingly popular. He is less than fifty years of age, and is in the height of his prime. When a child his parents removed from Abbott, Maine, where he was born, to the city of Boston. There he attended the public schools, and afterward passed through Wilbraham Academy, and finished at a private school in M[illegible]. He has been a very [illegible]. He [illegible], [illegible]ly [illegible] ship, and to-day [illegible] establishment. During the war [illegible] himself by his bravery, and [illegible] grew until finally he led his [illegible] bury. He was brevetted Colonel [illegible] and meritorious conduct." He has held a number of prominent public positions, and in all of them has won the approval of the people.

WAIFS AND STRAYS.

THE festivities attending what the local reporter calls an "old-fashioned" wedding in Rantoul, Wisconsin, recently, endured for three days. One of the striking features of the festivities was "a wrestling match between a Rantoul girl and a gentleman of Chilton, in which the girl succeeded in throwing the Chiltonian three successive times."

An aged Kentucky woman can not see from her window in the Floyd County poor-house the neighboring fine farm of her son, who is worth $20,000—because, it is said, she is blind.

It is alleged, with the confirmatory statements of time and names, that an Indiana man who had taken his daughter into a Chicago dry-goods store was asked by her, as she caught sight of the elevator, "What is that, pa—that thing going up and down with the sofies in it?" and that the father replied, after a long, calm, and careful scrutiny, "It's a telephone—the first I ever seen!"

The Chicago papers, referring to the fact that the Republican National Convention will assemble in that city next June, jocosely assure Cincinnati that neither of the Presidential Conventions could afford to meet there, because it is behind time. The rest of the United States, they say, is running by the new standard, but Cincinnati still goes by grandfather's clock, and it is to be feared that a ticket nominated by such time would get left.

It has been a general impression that tramps liked Connecticut, but news comes of one who had some fault to find in that State. Mr. Thompson, of Bridgeport, in answer to his request for something to eat, gave him some ham, which he declared to be too fat. When Mr. Thompson attempted to reason with him the tramp attacked his benefactor with a knife, and slashed his face in a most shocking manner.

Beef tea is coming to be a popular beverage in bar-rooms. The idea started, it is said, in Omaha. The price is ten cents anywhere off Broadway. Since its introduction the sale of hot-water cocktails has notably diminished.

It is said that the recent strangely crimson sunsets mean that the temperature will go below zero in those places where they have been observed. If this is so, the fact will awaken considerable interest when it becomes known in India, which is one of the lands in which the brilliant spectacle has extended.

How sudden the West is! Denver is still quite in the flush of youth, and yet the Denver University has just received a new equatorial telescope of extraordinary power, and conservative citizens are making a determined stand to prevent the Denver Elevated Railroad Company from carrying out its schemes.

To a passenger's question, "We've struck a smoother strip of road, haven't we?" an Arkansas railway conductor replied, "No; we're only run off the track." This was as uncomplimentary to the road as was the remark of an Eastern conductor, who, upon being discharged, said that he was intending to quit anyway, for there was "nothing left of the old road but two streaks of iron rust and the right of way."

Let no struggling young professional man despair. John Saum, a citizen of the West, began life as a lawyer, and finding that there were many moments in which he was not bothered by his clientèle, he devoted them to rag-picking. It was forty years ago when he began this thrifty dovetailing of his intervals of time. For thirty-five years, according to common report, he has not slept in a bed, which is mentioned with the desire not so much to set forth the habit of sleeping out of a bed as a meritorious example as to indicate how long and steadfastly he could pursue a given scheme. The business which he undertook as an incidental assistance to his establishment in life gradually overspread and swallowed up the one which he had intended should be his main pursuit, and for many years he has been a lawyer not at all and a rag-picker a great deal. As a lawyer there is no telling what his reward would have been; as a rag-picker he has come to own several fine farms, and is worth $300,000.

On a cold, lowery day an Ant was dragging some corn which he had laid up in the summer time. A Grasshopper, half perished with cold and hunger, besought the Ant to give him some of his substance. "What were you doing," said the Ant, "the last summer?" "Oh," said the Grasshopper, "I kept singing all the summer long." Said the Ant, "Since you would sing all summer, you may dance all winter."

CHAPTER IV.

MISS LADD'S DRAWING MASTER.

Francine was awakened the next morning by one of the house-maids bringing up her breakfast on a tray. Astonished at the concession to laziness on an institution devoted to the practice of all the virtues, she looked round. The bedroom was deserted.

"The other young ladies are up hours and hours, miss," the house-maid explained. "They were up and dressed two hours ago, and the breakfast has been cleared away long since. It's Miss Emily's fault. She would rather then to make you, she said you could lie of as possible you down stairs, and you had better be treated like a visitor. Miss Ladd was in distressed at your missing your breakfast that she spoke to the housekeeper, and I was sent up to you. Please excuse it if the toast is cold. This is Grand Day, and we are all upper-turns in consequence."

Inquiring what "Grand Day" meant, and after it produced the extraordinary result in a ladies' school, Francine discovered that the first day of the vacation was devoted to the distribution of prizes in the presence of parents, guardians, and friends. An entertainment was added, comprising those mere three kinds of human endurance called recitations, light refreshments, and musical performances being distributed at intervals to encourage the exhausted audience. The local newspaper sent a reporter to describe the processions, and some of Miss Ladd's young ladies enjoyed the intoxicating luxury of seeing their names in print.

"It begins at three o'clock," the house-maid went on; "and what with practising and rehearsing, and unexpecting the school room, there's a hot hole to make a person's head spin. By-the-bye, which," said the girl, lowering her voice and speaking a little nearer to Francine, "we have all been taken by surprise. The first thing in the morning Miss Jethro left us, without saying a word to anybody."

"Who is Miss Jethro?"

"The new teacher, miss. We none of us liked her, and we all suspect there's some thing wrong. Miss Ladd and the clergyman had a long talk together yesterday afternoon, you know, and then sent for Miss Jethro, which looks bad, doesn't it? Is there anything more I can do for you, miss? It's a beautiful day after the rain. If I was you, I should go and enjoy myself in the garden."

Having finished her breakfast, Francine decided on profiting by this sensible suggestion.

The servant who showed her the way to the garden was not favorably impressed by the new pupil. Francine's temper asserted itself a little too plainly on her face. To a girl possessing a high opinion of her own importance it was not very agreeable to feel herself overlooked, as an utter stranger, from the one absorbing interest of her school fellows. "Will she come over some," she muttered bitterly, "when I call her a pet, and pay and play her the pet pets? How I should enjoy making the girls envy me!"

A broad lawn, overshadowed at one end by fine old trees, flower beds and shrubberies, and winding paths prettily and lovingly laid out, made the garden a welcome refuge on that [illegible] morning. The novelty of the scene after her experience in the West Indies, the delicious breezes cooled by the rain of the night, exerted their influence even on the sullen disposition of Francine. She smiled, in spite of herself, as she followed the pleasant paths, and heard the birds singing their summer songs over her head.

Wandering among the trees, which occupied a considerable extent of ground, she passed into an [illegible] and discovered an old fish pond [illegible] public [illegible]. Dribblets of water trickled from a dilapidated fountain in the middle. On the farther side of the pond the ground sloped downward toward the south, and [illegible], over a low paling, a private view of a [illegible] for the woods mountain [illegible] of hills beyond. A beautiful [illegible] ing the [illegible] to com- [illegible] ing the [illegible] view of [illegible] shady and table, with [illegible] on the other [illegible] the mercy of the [illegible] drawing paper. Francine ran round the pond, and picked up the paper just as it was on the point of being tilted into the water. It contained a sketch in water-colors of the village and the woods. Francine had looked to the trees itself with indifference; the picture of the view interested her. Gradually visitors to galleries of art which adjoin exhibits show the same strange perversity. The work of the copyist commands their whole attention; they take no interest in the original picture.

Looking up from the sketch, Francine was startled. She discovered a man, at the window of the house-summer house, watching her.

"When you have done with that drawing," he said, quietly, "please let me have it back again."

He was tall and thin and dark. His finely shaped, intelligent face—hidden, as to the lower part of it, by a curly black beard—would have been absolutely handsome, even in the eyes of a school girl, but for the deep furrows that marked it prematurely between the eyebrows and at the sides of the mouth. In the same way an underlying mockery impaired the attraction of his otherwise refined and gentle manner. Among his fellow-creatures, children and dogs were the only ones who appreciated his merits without discovering the defects which lessened the favorable appreciation of him by men and women. He dressed neatly, but his morning coat was badly made, and his picturesque felt hat was too old. In short, there seemed to be no good qualities about him which was not perversely associated with a drawback of some kind. He was one of those harmless and luckless men, possessed of excellent qualities, who fail, nevertheless, to achieve popularity in their social sphere.

Francine handed his sketch to him through the window, doubtful whether the words that he had addressed to her were spoken in jest or in earnest.

"I only presumed to touch your drawing," she said, "because it was in danger."

"What danger?" he inquired.

Francine pointed to the pond. "If I had not been in time to pick it up, it would have been blown into the water."

"Do you think it was worth picking up?"

Putting that question, he looked first at the sketch, then at the view which it represented, then back again at the sketch. The corners of his mouth turned upward with a humorous expression of scorn. "Mediocre Nature," he said, "I beg your pardon." With those words, he contemptuously tore his work of art into small pieces, and scattered them out of the window.

"What a pity!" said Francine.

He paused and looked at her—and sighed, as if he pitied so young a woman for having a temper to tempt to take offense. In his limited contact once he always presented the character of a politely passive man.

"Put it in plain words, miss," he replied. "I have offended the predominant sense in your nature—your sense of self-esteem. You don't like to be told, even indirectly, that you know nothing of Art. In these days everybody knows everything—and thinks nothing worth knowing, after all. But beware how you pronounce an appearance of indifference, which is nothing but conceit in disguise. The ruling passion of civilized humanity is Conceit. You may try the regard of your dearest friend in any other way, and be forgiven. Ruffle the smooth surface of your friend's self-esteem, and there will be an ugly unacknowledged coolness between you which will last for life. Excuse me for giving you the benefit of my unhappy experience. This sort of smart talk is my form of conceit. Can I be of use to you in some better way? Are you looking for one of our young ladies?"

Francine began to feel a certain reluctant interest in him when he spoke of "our young ladies." She asked if he belonged to the school.

The corners of his mouth turned up again. "I'm one of the masters," he said. "Are you going to belong to the school, too?"

Francine bent her head, with a gravity and condescension intended to keep him at his proper distance. Far from being discouraged by permitted her consent to talk. [illegible] Are you [illegible] the [illegible] one of our pupils?" he asked.

"I don't know what you are."

"You won't be much wiser when you do know. My name is Alban Morris."

Francine introduced herself. "I mean I don't know what you teach."

Alban Morris pointed to the fragments of his sketch from Nature. "I am a bad artist," he said. "Some bad artists become Royal Academicians. Some take to drink. Some get a pension. And some—I am one of them—find refuge in schools. Drawing is my 'extra' at this school. Will you take my advice? Spare your good father's pocket—say you don't want to learn to draw."

He was so gravely in earnest that Francine burst out laughing. "You are a strange man," she said.

"Wrong again, miss. I am only an unhappy man."

The furrows on his face deepened, the lateral humor died out of his eyes. He turned to the summer-house window, and took up a pipe and [illegible] pouch left on the edge.

"I lost my only friend last year," he said. "Since the death of my dog, my pipe is the one companion I have left. Naturally I am not allowed to enjoy the honest fellow's society in the presence of ladies. They have their own taste in [illegible]. Their clothes [illegible] letters reek [illegible] of [illegible]. The clean vegetable smell [illegible] tobacco is unendurable to them. Allow me to retire—and let me thank you for the trouble you took to save my drawing."

The tone of indifference in which he expressed his gratitude piqued Francine. She resented it by drawing her own conclusion from what he had said of the ladies and the musk-deer. "I was wrong in admiring your drawing," she said; "and wrong again in thinking you a strange man. Am I wrong, for the third time, in believing that you dislike women?"

"I am sorry to say you are right," Alban Morris answered, gravely.

"Is there not even one exception?"

The instant the words passed her lips the saw that there was some scarcely sensitive feeling in him which she had hurt. His black brows gathered into a frown, his piercing eyes looked at her with angry surprise. It was over in a moment. He raised his shabby hat and made her a bow.

"There is a sore place still left in me," he said, "and you have innocently hit it. Good-morning."

Before she could speak again he had turned the corner of the summer-house, and was lost to view in a shrubbery on the westward side of the grounds.

CHAPTER V.

DISCUSSIONS IN THE GARDEN.

Left by herself, Miss De Sor turned back again by way of the trees.

So far her interview with the drawing-master had helped to pass the time. Some girls might have found it no easy task to arrive at a true view of the character of Alban Morris. Francine's essentially superficial observation set him down as "a little mad," and left him there, judged and dismissed to her entire satisfaction.

Arriving at the lawn, she discovered Emily pacing backward and forward, with her head down and her hands behind her, deep in thought. Francine's high opinion of herself would have carried her past any of the other girls, unless they had made special advances to her. She stopped and looked at Emily.

It is the sad fate of little women in general to grow too fat and to be born with short legs. Emily's slim, finely strung figure spoke for itself as to the first of these misfortunes, and asserted its happy freedom from the second if she only walked across a room. Nature had built her, from head to foot, on a skeleton scaffolding in perfect proportion. Tall or short matters little to the result in women who possess the first and foremost and supreme of becoming well in their bones. When they live to old age they often astonish thoughtless men who walk behind them in the street. "I gave you my honor, she was as erect and upright as a young girl, and when you got in front of her, and looked—white hair and seventy years of age."

Francine approached Emily, moved by a rare impulse in her nature—the impulse to be sociable. "You look out of spirits," she remarked. "Search you don't regret leaving school?"

In her present mood, Emily took the opportunity to put the popular phrase of snubbing Francine. "You have guessed wrong; I do regret," she answered. "I have found in Cecilia an dearest friend at school. And school brought with it the change to my life which has helped me to bear the loss of my father. If you must know what I was thinking of just now, I was thinking of my aunt. She has not answered my last letter, and I am beginning to be afraid she is ill. If you find me in bad spirits, that is the reason."

"I'm very sorry," said Francine.

"Why? You don't know my aunt, and you have only known me since yesterday afternoon. Why are you sorry?"

Francine remained silent. Without realizing it, she was beginning to feel the dominant influence that Emily exercised over the weaker natures that came in contact with her. To find herself irresistibly attracted by a stranger at a new school—an unfortunate little creature, whose destiny was to earn her own living—filled the narrow mind of Miss De Sor with perplexity. Having waited in vain for a reply, Emily turned away, and resumed the train of thought which her school-fellow had interrupted.

By an unconscious act of ideas of which she was not herself aware, she was passed from thinking of [illegible] to thinking of Miss Jethro. The [illegible] of the [illegible] roused [illegible] in her mind at [illegible] the lessons of the new day.

Acting on motives rather than reasons, she had kept that event hidden in her own breast like a secret from every one. No discoveries had been made by other persons. In speaking to her staff of teachers Miss Ladd had all [illegible] to this affair in the most emphatic terms. The circumstances of a private nature have obliged the lady to retire from my school. When we meet after the holidays another teacher will be in her place." These Miss Ladd's explanations had begun and ended. Inquiries addressed to the servants had led to no results. Miss Jethro's luggage was to be forwarded to the London terminus of the railway, and Miss Jethro herself had baffled investigation by leaving the school on foot. Emily's interest in the lost teacher was not the transitory interest of curiosity, her father's mysterious friend was a person whom she honestly desired to see again. Perplexed by the difficulty of finding a means of tracing Miss Jethro, she reached the shady limit of the trees, and turned to walk back again. Approaching the place at which she and Francine had met, an idea occurred to her. It was just possible that Miss Jethro might not be unknown to her aunt.

Still meditating on the cold reception that she had encountered, and still feeling the influence which one [illegible] her in spite of herself, Francine [illegible] up, and saw Emily approaching. The cause of injury, strong as it was, failed in constancy. For the first time in her life she was ready to forgive. Interpreting Emily's return as an implied expression of regret, she advanced with a constrained smile, and spoke first.

"How are the young ladies getting on in the school-room?" she asked, by way of renewing the conversation.

Emily's face assumed a look of surprise which said plainly, Can't you take a hint, and leave me to myself?

Francine was constitutionally impenetrable to reproof of this sort: her thick skin was not even tickled. "Why are you not helping them," she went on—"you who have the clearest head among us, and take the lead in everything?"

It may be a humiliating confession to make, yet it is surely true, that we are all accessible to flattery. Different tastes appreciate different methods of learning incense, but the perfume is more or less agreeable to all varieties of nose. Francine's method had its tranquillizing effect on Emily. She answered, indulgently, "My dear, I have nothing to do with it."

"Nothing to do with it? No prize to win before you leave school?"

"I won all the prizes years ago."

"But there are recitations. Speak memorable?"

Harmless words in themselves, pursuing the same smooth course of flattery as before, but with what a different result! Emily's face reddened with anger the moment they were spoken. Having already irritated Alban Morris, unluckily Francine, by a second mischievous interposition of accident, had succeeded in making Emily smart next. "Who has told you?" she burst out. "I insist on knowing!"

"Nobody has told me anything," Francine declared, piteously.

"Nobody has told you how I have been insulted?"

"No, indeed! Oh, my dear, who could insult you?"

In a team, the sense of injury does sometimes submit to the discipline of silence. In a woman—never. Suddenly reminded of her past wrongs (by the fortunate error of a prize school-fellow), Emily committed the startling inconsistency of appealing to the sympathies of Francine!

"Would you believe it? I have been forbidden to recite—I, the head girl of the school. Oh, not to-day! It happened a month ago, when we were all in examination, making our arrangements. Miss Ladd asked me if I had decided on a piece to recite. I said, 'I have not quite decided, I have learned the piece.' 'And what may it be?' 'The dagger scene in Macbeth.' There was a howl—I can call it by no other name—a howl of indignation. A man's soliloquy, and, worse still, a murdering man's soliloquy, recited by one of Miss Ladd's young ladies before an audience of parents and guardians! That was the issue they took with me. I saw as firm as a rock. The dagger scene or nothing. The result is—nothing! An insult to Shakspeare, and an insult to me. I felt it, I feel it still. I was prepared for any sacrifice in the cause of the drama. If Miss Ladd had met me in a proper spirit, do you know what I would have done? I would have played Macbeth in costume. Just hear me, and judge for yourself. I begin with a dreadful vacuum in my eyes, and a hollow moaning of my voice, 'Is this a dagger that I see before me—'"

Reciting with her face toward the trees, Emily started, dropped the character of Macbeth, and instantly became herself again—herself, with a rising color and an angry heightening of the eyes. "Excuse me; I can't trust my memory. I must get the play." With that abrupt apology, she walked away rapidly in the direction of the house.

In some surprise, Francine turned and looked at the trees. She discovered—in full retreat, on his side—the eccentric drawing master, Alban Morris.

Did he too admire the dagger scene? And was he similarly desirous of hearing it recited without showing himself? In that case, she should Emily to some bleeding weakness we cannot but not want of confidence in her own resources) leave the garden the moment she caught sight of him? Francine consulted her manners. She had just arrived at a conclusion which expressed itself outwardly by a malicious smile, when [illegible] Cecilia appeared on the lawn—a lovable object in a broad straw hat and a white dress, with a nosegay in her bosom—smiling, and [illegible] herself.

"It's no use in the school-room," she said, "and some of the girls, your things, are in ill-tempered at rehearsal. I have made me scarce. I hope you got your breakfast Miss De Sor. What have you been doing here all by yourself?"

"I have been making an interesting discovery," Francine replied.

"An interesting discovery in our garden? What can it be?"

"The drawing master, my dear, is in love with Emily. Perhaps she doesn't care about him. Or perhaps I have been an [illegible] obstacle in the way of an appointment between them."

Cecilia had breakfasted to her heart's content on her favorite dish—buttered eggs. She was in such good spirits that she was inclined to be sympathetic, even when there was no more present to fascinate. "We are not allowed to talk about love in this school," she said, "but I'll let love behind her fan. Besides, if [illegible] Miss Ladd's care, poor Mr. Morris might [illegible] time."

"But isn't it true [illegible] Francine.

"It may be true [illegible] Emily doesn't breathed a word [illegible] to one of us. And Mr. Morris keeps his own [illegible] And then we [illegible] him looking at her, and draw our [illegible]

"Did you [illegible] Emily [illegible] way?"

"Yes, and she passed [illegible]

Thinking, perhaps, of Mr. [illegible] Cecilia shook her head. Thinking [illegible]

of the new life before her, and regretting, I am afraid, that she ever confided her hopes and wishes to me. Did she tell you last night what her prospects are when she leaves school?"

"She told me you had been very kind on helping her. I dare say I should have heard more if I had not fallen asleep. What is she going to do?"

"To live in a dull house, far away in the north," Cecilia answered, "with only old people in it. She will have to write and translate for a great scholar who is studying mysterious inscription—hieroglyphics, I think they are called—found among the ruins of Central America. It's really no laughing matter, Francine. Emily made a joke of it, too. 'I'll take anything but a situation as governess,' she said; 'the children who have to be taught them would have to be pitied indeed!' She begged and prayed me to help her get an honest living. What could I do? I could only write home to papa. He is a member of Parliament, and everybody who wants a place seems to think he is bound to find it for them. As it happened, he had heard from an old friend of his (a certain Sir Jervis Redmond), who was in search of a secretary. Being in favor of letting the woman compete for employment with the men, Sir Jervis was willing to try what he calls 'a female.' Isn't that a horrid way of speaking of one? and Miss Ladd says it's ungrammatical besides. Papa had written back to say he knew of no lady whom he could recommend. When he got my letter, speaking of Emily, he kindly wrote again. In the interval Sir Jervis had received two applications for the vacant place. They were both from old ladies, and he declined to employ them."

"Because they were old," Francine suggested, maliciously.

"You shall hear him give his own reasons, my dear. Papa sent me an extract from his letter. It made me rather angry: and (perhaps for that reason) I think I can repeat it word for word. 'We are four old people in this house, and we don't want a fifth. Let us have a young one to cheer us. If your daughter's friend likes the terms, and is not encumbered with a sweetheart, I will send for her when the school breaks up at midsummer.' Coarse and selfish—isn't it? However, Emily didn't agree with me when I showed her the extract. She accepted the place very much to her aunt's surprise and regret, whom that excellent person heard of it. Now that the time has come (though Emily won't acknowledge it), I believe she secretly shrinks, poor dear, from the prospect."

"Very likely," Francine agreed, without even a pretense of sympathy. "But tell me, who are the four old people?"

"First, Sir Jervis himself, seventy last birthday; next, his unmarried sister, much eighty; next, his man-servant, Mr. Rook, well past sixty; and last, his man servant's wife, who considers herself young, being only a little over forty. That is the household. Mrs. Rook is coming to-day to attend Emily on the journey to the north, and I am not at all sure that Emily will like her."

"A disagreeable woman, I suppose?"

"No—not exactly that. But dowdy and frightened. The fact is, Mrs. Rook has had her troubles, and perhaps that has made a little unsettled her. She and her husband used to keep the village inn close to our park. We know all about them at home. I am sure I pity those poor people. What are you looking at, Francine?"

Feeling no sort of interest in Mr and Mrs Rook, Francine was studying her school fellow's lovely face in search of defects. She had already discovered that Cecilia's eyes were placed too wide apart, and that her chin wanted size and character.

"I was admiring your complexion, dear," she answered, coolly. "Well, and why do you pity the Rooks?"

Simple Cecilia smiled, and went on with her story:

"They are obliged to go out to service in their old age, through a misfortune for which they are in no way to blame. Their customers deserted the inn and Mr Rook became bankrupt. The inn got what they call a bad name—in a very dreadful way. There was a murder committed in the house."

"A murder!" cried Francine. "Oh, this is exciting! You provoking girl, why didn't you tell me about it before?"

"I didn't think of it," said Cecilia, placidly.

"Do go on! Were you on home when it happened?"

"I was here, at school."

"You saw the newspapers, I suppose?"

"Miss Ladd doesn't allow us to read newspapers. I did hear of it, however, in letters from home. Not that there was much in the letters. They said it was too horrible to be described. The poor murdered gentleman—"

Francine was audibly shocked. "A gentleman?" she exclaimed. "How dreadful!"

"The poor man was a stranger in our part of the country," Cecilia resumed, "and the police were puzzled about the motive for a murder. His pocket-book was missing, but his watch and his rings were found on the body. I remember the initials on his linen because they were the same as my mother's initials before she was married—J. B. Really, Francine, that's all I know about it."

"Surely you know whether the murderer was discovered?"

"Oh yes, of course I know that. The government offered a reward, and clever people were sent from London to help the county police. Nothing came of it. The murderer has never been discovered from that time to this."

"When did it happen?"

"It happened in the autumn."

"The autumn of last year?"

"No, no. Nearly four years since."

THE NEW RAILWAY TIME SYSTEM.

STANDARD TIME.

We give in this number the portrait of CHARLES F DOWD, A M., Principal of Temple Grove Seminary, Saratoga Springs, New York, the originator of the system of national time lately adopted throughout the country. The accompanying map will help the reader to form a correct idea of the system, and the magnitude of the work accomplished.

Professor Dowd began his work systematically by presenting the rude outlines of his plan before a convention of trunk lines held in New York city in October, 1863, although several years before he had presented the subject in his regular course of lectures at the Oneonta State Normal School, of which he was then associate principal.

In order to get a graphic view of the confusion of time standards as they then existed, let one imagine the country broken up into eighty irregularly irregular fragments, each governed by a different time standard, and these time standards differing from each other in entrances from one minute to nearly four hours. Were these fragmentary portions to be represented on the map, each by a different prime color, the colors of the rainbow multiplied by twelve would be brought into requisition. Then the map would look as if a child had been aimlessly experimenting upon it with his paints, making ballet and thither stripes interweaving one another in all directions. In short, in respect to time, the whole country was a patch-work of crazy quilt. Any traveler by rail going in any direction, or even from one remote to nearly four hours. Were these fragmentary portions to be represented on the map, each by a different prime color, the colors of the rainbow multiplied by twelve would be brought into requisition. Then the map would look as if a child had been aimlessly experimenting upon it with his paints, making ballet and thither stripes interweaving one another in all directions. In short, in respect to time, the whole country was a patch-work of crazy quilt. Any traveler by rail going in any direction, or even from one remote to nearly four hours. Were these fragmentary portions to be represented on the map, each by a different prime color, the colors of the rainbow multiplied by twelve would be brought into requisition. Then the map would look as if a child had been aimlessly experimenting upon it with his paints, making ballet and thither stripes interweaving one another in all directions. In short, in respect to time, the whole country was a patch-work of crazy quilt. Any traveler by rail going in any direction, or even from one remote to nearly four hours.

His watch was to him but a delusion; clocks in stations, staring each other in the face defiant of harmony both with one another and with surrounding local time, and all a riddle at variance with his watch, were wholly baffling to all intelligence, and time tables were time but to bewilder the public. His only satisfaction could come from resting blissful in ignorance. No more blissful conditions could have engrossed to train the sanguine, and passed into an adage, "Where ignorance is bliss, 'tis folly to be wise." Such was the confounding condition of 1863.

To bring order out of this vast confusion was the problem Professor Dowd undertook to solve, and it may well be said that no time problem involving such extensive difficulties in its conditions had ever before been presented to civilization. A few years before England had established a national standard for her home province, but this covered a difference of only about a half hour's extent, and, following England by a little, France had adopted a national standard, yet this covered a difference of less than one hour's extent, while our system must provide for a difference nearly four hours' extent. Hence their system gave no clew to the solution of the problem presented in this country.

At the start Professor Dowd took his model from astronomical time reduced to the standard of one meridian. Time zone, in relation to any place, is local time with a difference. He adopted the Washington meridian for the national standard, and then worked out the local differences for about 8000 stations along the lines of about 300 railroads. Then he laid out the country into sections of fifteen degrees of longitude each, with the Washington meridian as the prime standard, and the fifteenth, the thirtieth, and the forty-fifth meridians for the subordinate standards. He then carefully drew out a full explanation of the system, and published all, with a map, in a pamphlet of over 100 octavo pages. Then pamphlet he sent out to all railway officials and others who might be interested in the subject. This was done in 1870.

After publishing his work, Professor Dowd attended conventions of railway managers in Boston, in New York, in the West, and in the South, and he then was found that the differences exceeding an hour were regarded as impracticable. This led to the adoption of the subordinate standards as essentially undignificant of each other, only that the every-hour differences must be preserved. This done, each time section became a well defined section, with its own time standard, and, with standards so nearly and so simply related, the necessity for any more exact local time vanished. He further found that the Washington and the fifteenth meridians were located too far east to suit the wants of the Eastern and the Central sections. Therefore, after meeting a convention at Atlanta, Georgia, in the spring of 1872, he changed the system from Washington to Greenwich longitude, thus moving all the hour sections one degree further east. This made the seventy-fifth meridian the standard for the Eastern section, the ninetieth for the Central, the one hundred and fifth for the Mountain, and the one hundred and twentieth for the Pacific—the fifth hour east-ward being the standard time of England. During these three years his investigations, by study, and he traveled so as to come into contact with practical men, especially railway managers, were so thorough that the system as then matured has required no further modification. That is the system now in operation.

Three years were then consumed in maturing the ideal, but eleven more years have been consumed in making the ideal a reality. Even in this part of the work Professor Dowd for several years labored essentially alone. He got out a little appendix to his original work, he met conventions; he wrote extensively for the press; in 1877 he published the Traveller's Railway Time Adjuster, in 1879–80 he prepared indexes for sale as time-tables, and urged the editors of railway guides to adopt them; and all the with no recompense whatever, save the consciousness that it would result in the public good.

In the work of securing the adoption of the system Professor Dowd would bring into prominent notice several important agencies which, within the last few years have entered the field, notably the American Meteorological Society, led by Dr BARNARD, the president of Columbia College, and the committee of the society on Standard Time, led by Professor PLEASANTON ANNE, of the Signal Service Bureau Washington, and Charles Pelham Fleming, of Ottawa, Canada. Specially worthy of notice in the practical aspect of the subject is WILLIAM F ALLEN, Esq., the secretary of the General and Southern Railway Time Convention. This convention is the exponent of the great system of railways throughout the country, and Mr ALLEN was appointed a special committee upon the subject of standard time in 1881, and hence became the exponent of the convention. This agency specially hastened the adoption of the system.

A single glance at results will show what the system has accomplished. Instead of the eighty fragmentary pieces of country above mentioned, four orderly hour sections, as seen in the accompanying map, form the only divisions for the whole country, and less time standards, with exact hour differences, constitute the only standards of the country. Indeed, with the system fully carried out, twenty-four would constitute all the standards of the world.

On Sunday, the 18th of November, when the sun reached the meridian of the eastern border of Maine, clocks began their jaunt for the hour of twelve, and this was kept up in a drift across the continent for four hours, like hair-breadth rivals in a mid wood. But on Monday, the 19th—supposing all to have changed to the new system on the 18th—no clock struck for this hour till the sun reached the seventy-fifth meridian. Then all the clocks on the continent struck together, those in the Eastern section striking twelve, those in the Central striking eleven, those in the Mountain striking ten, and those in the Pacific striking nine. The minute-hands of all were in harmony with each other and with those of all travellers' watches. Time tables everywhere became perfectly intelligible, and the times of ignorance were no longer at a premium.

THE WAR IN THE SOUDAN.

The Soudan, roughly speaking, may be described as the enormous extent of country lying south of the great Sahara Desert, between Abyssinia on the east and Senegambia on the west. Its area and population have been variously estimated, and its resources have been exaggerated or depreciated according to the prejudices of travellers.

The French projectors of the Trans-Saharian Railroad put down the population at about fifty millions and described the bulk of the country as consisting of the richest alluvial soil in the world. But it is not that part of the Soudan in which lie the city of Timbuctoo and Lake Tchad to which the attention of the world is at present directed. It is the Egyptian Soudan, whose the English government of Egypt finds itself face to face with unforeseen difficulties.

At the present time it is impossible to ascertain with anything like accuracy the position of the victorious chief who, under the appellation of El Mahdi, has annihilated the Egyptian army commanded by General Hicks, and who is now threatening Khartoum and the valley of the Upper Nile.

No details of the destruction of General Hicks's army have yet been received. He marched out with 10,000 men, 6000 camels, and a large train of luggage mules, but on the invading column advanced into the desert they suffered terribly from want of water, their guides purposely led them into a district where the wells are few, and thus they easily fell victims to the numerous cavalry and the fanatic followers of the "False Prophet."

The battle was fought with the courage of despair, and lasted three days. Hicks Pasha was slain by a lance-thrust on the third day when the ammunition had given out their last cartridge.

After his fall the rout of the general, and the fugitives, who had been deprived of water for three days, were nearly all massacred as they fled toward the wells. Native accounts state that Hicks's lands were first cut off, and he was afterward cut to pieces.

Two Europeans, distinguished members of the press—Monsieur ——, the famous correspondent of the London Daily News, whose adventures in Tonkin have given him world-wide fame, and Mr. FRANK VERTEBLY, the brilliant artist of the London Graphic—are, it is stated, among the survivors.

After the battle, according to reports El Mahdi returned to El Obeid with the arms and cannon he had taken from Hicks, and was preparing to send 10,000 men to Darfour. Since the occupation of Berber another Egyptian column has been annihilated near Suakin.

At present a corps of engineers has been dispatched by the Egyptian government to erect fortifications at the second Cataract and at Koroska, between Khartoum and Assouan, and Baker Pasha is under orders to leave Cairo for Suakin, and to endeavor to relieve Khartoum.

The provinces of the Upper Nile are traversed in every direction by the Mahdi's missionaries, and are in such a ferment against the Christians that the governor of Sinat has advised the American mission to withdraw to Cairo.

Altogether the situation looks gloomy enough for the Khedive and his English masters, as well as for the sultan, whose title of "Commander of the Faithful" El Mahdi boldly challenges.

A few years ago the ruler of the Soudan was but an obscure dervish; he is about forty years old, tall, and of a copper red complexion, and announces that he knows that the government of Egypt is false to Islam in three works, first in allowing Christians to have churches, secondly, that it protects them, thirdly, that it taxes the faithful.

THE CHRISTMAS ROSE.

I.

THE ROSE.

In the fair sunny parks stood a tree
Bearing one snowy hope, and day by day
A maid of His flower-like face bent tenderly
Above the budding warrior, risen to see:
"Rose, blow, my Christmas Rose, and on you fall
When Advent bells ring over hill and dale!

"For then he comes! he comes!"—and, like a flame,
A rose soft light lit up her fair still face.
"Keep sweet in thy sweet heart the dear name.
And blow, my Christmas Rose, that I may place
There on my breast, and he shall see I love
The flower he gave all other flowers above."

Then to its soft green shield the flame's heart
Throbbed with a passionate longing for release,
Dreaming of Christmas joys, and at the past
That it might bear in that bright feast of peace.
"Ah me!" it sighed; "if I might only rest
In snowy purity upon her breast!"

"If from that throne of love I might behold
The splendid rooms, with box and holly bright,
The lighted Christmas tree, the green and gold,
The maidens loitering in glowing white!
What bliss it were to thus nigh life away
On her sweet breast through such a happy day!"

II

THE BLOOM.

One dawn, when stars yet hung above the wood
And over the lake, the Advent bells rang clear,
Trembling with mystic music, the Rose stood
It was the gladdest birthday of the year,
And hours that lived in the dusky light
Were but one flame—more perfect, sweet, and white.

Out in the house there was no sound of song,
No tripping feet, no laughter gay and free.
The Rose sighed: "Oh, she is so long! so long!
Alas! my first sweet bloom she will not see."
And thus the day went by, four silent hour,
And no one came to greet the Christmas flower.

The pleasant parlor was left dim and still,
Yet far away the sad Rose seemed to hear
Some strange sharp cry the empty chambers thrill.
Till her white petals shook with unspoken fear;
And then the sun went down, and hopeless gloom
Touched the white Rose in the deserted room.

III.

THE END.

But about midnight, when the room was clear
There came a step, and hushed, the Rose
Felt on her heart one happy, bliss'ful tear.
Ah me! how speedily a true love knows
When love is fled! There was no need to say,
"Sweet Rose, an angel bride has passed away."

"Come now to oneness her fair life!" And so
The Rose was borne to a dim room, all cold
And still. There was no song, no splendid glow
Of dancing maids in shimmering white and gold,
Only one pale dead maid, in fair white bed,
With snow-drops wan and lilies overspread.

Within her small crossed hands on her pure breast,
Oh, happy, happy Rose! This is thy fate.
To stream with her in calm and peaceful rest,
While I, alas! must weep and watch and wait
And rouse it by, a glory in the gloom,
A white-eyed wonder in the white death-room.

Wet with love's tears, bowing her, whispered prayers,
Breaking no life in solemn peace away.
Woe is me! woe is me! these earthly cares,
The joys and splendors of a festal day?
Pure maid, that found on Christmas God's glad rest,
And white-eyed Christmas Rose—was it not best?

THE GREEN SUN IN INDIA.

RECENT letters from Ceylon show that the green or blue sun was seen there as a marked phenomenon from the 9th to the 12th September, inclusive. The Ceylon Observer contains some interesting communications on the subject. One correspondent, writing on September 12 from Paleadichakam, states that no light came from the sun, though he was visible, until nearly seven in the morning. "For the last four days," he says, "the sun rises in splendid green when visible; that is, about ten degrees from the horizon. As he ascends he becomes a beautiful blue, and as he recedes further on he looks like a brilliant blue, resembling burning sulphur. When about forty-five degrees high it is not possible to look at the sun with the naked eye, but even when at the very zenith" (meaning, no doubt, "the highest point of his path over, but not absolutely at, the zenith) "the light is blue, varying from a pale blue early to a bright blue later on, almost similar to moonlight even at mid-day. Then, as he declines, the sun assumes the same changes, but vice versâ. The heat is greatly modified, and there is nothing like the usual hot days of September. The moon, now visible in the afternoon, looks also tinged with blue after sunset, and as she declines assumes a most fiery color thirty degrees from the zenith." It is rather singular that the moon when nearing the horizon should have assumed a fiery hue, while the sun, when in the same position, looked blue. This seems to show that though the moon looks white, there is really a certain degree of redness in her surface-tint.

As to the explanation of the changed tint of the sun a few points are clear. It is obvious that the absorptive medium whose action gave to the sun its bluish-green tint was in our own atmosphere, not in the sun himself. As the sun was seen blue at Trinidad on September 2, it seems probable that the Java earthquake had nothing, or little, to do with the sun's peculiar tint in India and Ceylon, for the blue sun of Trinidad can not possibly have been caused by the Java disturbance. The spectroscopic evidence seems to show that the greenness of the sun was due to an exceptional development of the rain-band in the red part of the spectrum. This was accompanied by abnormal absorptions of red and orange-red rays, leaving a separate balance of rays from the rest of the spectrum, and consequently a tint of green.

It is noteworthy that an explanation advanced in Nature (whose editor is supposed to know something about spectrum analysis), by Mr. W. H. Mushy, Principal of the High School of Madras, is entirely incorrect. He finds in the circumstance that the color of the sun varied after the order of the colors of the solar spectrum evidence that there was some refracting medium in the atmosphere which resolved the sun's rays into primary colors. This would not account for the sun appearing green. There is no sort of prism which will show the sun green, or blue, or red, let the refracting quality of the medium be what it may. Seen through any prism whatever, the sun would simply show rainbow-tinted fringes on opposite sides of a central and not quite circular white disk. Absorption was manifestly the cause of the sun's color, not simple refraction, though refraction, of course, took place, as it always does.

A correspondent calls attention to the circumstance that in the arctic regions the sun often shines with a pure emerald-green tint all through the day.

A BLOCKADE ON BROADWAY.

THE countryman who didn't want to cross Broadway "till the procession had passed" would have wasted long of a policeman had not volunteered to pilot him through the apparently endless tangle of carts, stages, express wagons, and other vehicles that fill the broad thoroughfare from side to side. Even old New Yorkers, accustomed every day to brave the perils of the crossing, often hesitate and wait for a break before making the attempt. A weather-beaten sea-captain, who made nothing of Atlantic storms, once declared that he would rather double Cape Horn than cross Broadway in a jam. But formidable as the undertaking may appear to a stranger in the city, very few accidents occur, even in the most crowded portions of the street.

"Character in Smoking" is the title of an excellent article recently published. The writer judges the men by the kind of tobacco they smoke. All like good tobacco, but all are not judges. It is only the even-tempered, level-headed, carefully inclined man that takes pains to make a selection. He grows to be very particular about purity and flavor. But when he strikes a tobacco like Blackwell's Durham Long Cut he is tenacious of his prize, and intolerant of all inferior tobaccos.

A CLERGYMAN'S CURE.
The Rev. R. J. GRAHAM, Presiding Elder of the U. B. Church at New Haven, W. Va., writes that he had been a sufferer from Erysipelas for twenty years, when he was advised to try AYER'S SARSAPARILLA as a remedy for it. He did so, obtained relief before he had used half of the first bottle, continued taking it, and, when he had used three bottles, found himself "completely cured of the tormenting disease." This was after he had, unavailingly, tried many other remedies, and had the treatment of some leading physicians.

AYER'S SARSAPARILLA
Is the most perfect blood-purifier known to medical science. It
Purifies blood corrupted by Hereditary Scrofula, poisoned by Mercury, or tainted by the sequelæ of Diphtheria, Scarlet Fever, and other Contagious Diseases;
Extirpates from the blood the germs of disease implanted by excesses in living, and by disorder of the digestive functions,
Invigorates the system, enriches impoverished blood, re-establishes the harmonious working of all the machinery of life, and

TAKE NOTICE [illegible]

A Safeguard.

The fatal rapidity with which slight Colds and Coughs frequently develop into the gravest maladies of the throat and lungs, is a reason which should impel every prudent person to keep at hand, as a household remedy, a bottle of AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL.

Nothing else gives such immediate relief and works so sure a cure in all affections of this class. That eminent physician, Prof. F. Sweetser, of the Maine Medical School, Brunswick, Me., says:—

"Medical science has produced no other anodyne expectorant so good as AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL. It is invaluable for diseases of the throat and lungs."

The same opinion is expressed by the well-known Dr. L. J. Addison, of Chicago, Ill., who says:—

"I have never found, in thirty-five years of continuous study and practice of medicine, any preparation of so great value as AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL, for treatment of diseases of the throat and lungs. It not only breaks up colds and severe coughs, but is more effective than anything else in relieving even the most serious bronchial and pulmonary affections."

AYER'S
Cherry Pectoral

Is not a new claimant for popular confidence, but a medicine which for nearly forty years has been constantly growing in the favor of the third generation of those who have come into being since it was first offered to the public.

There is not a household in which this invaluable remedy has once been introduced where its use has ever been abandoned, and there is not a person who has ever given it a proper trial for any throat or lung disease susceptible of cure, who has not been made well by it.

AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL has, in numberless instances, cured obstinate and dangerous bronchial affections, Laryngitis, and even acute Pneumonia, and has saved many patients in the earlier stages of Pulmonary Consumption. It is a medicine that will accomplish all that can be claimed for it, so far as the relief and cure of throat and lung diseases are possible, in every case where these are curable, no matter how prostrate and general the system may be. AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL for treatment of Croup and Whooping Cough.

These are all plain facts, which can be verified by anybody, and should be remembered by everybody.
